Jez're-el (jěz'rě-él) [God sows]. 1. A fortified town (I Kings 21:23, wall; II Kings 9:17, tower; 10:7, 8, gate), in the territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:17, 18), not far from Mount Gilboa (cf. I Sam. 31:1-5 with ch. 29:1 and II Sam. 4:4). The Israelites encamped at a fountain in its vicinity just before the battle of Gilboa (I Sam. 29:1; cf. II Sam. 4:4), the Philistines following them to the same locality (I Sam. 29:11). Ish-bosheth ruled over Jezreel among other places (II Sam. 2:9); and it was one of the capitals of Ahab (I Kings 18:45), and also of his son (II Kings 8:29). Naboth was a Jezreelite, his vineyard was in close proximity to Ahab's palace, and he was stoned outside the city (I Kings 21:1, 13). Jezebel met her violent death in Jezreel (I Kings 21:23; II Kings 9:10, 30-35). The heads of Ahab's 70 sons were piled at the gate of Jezreel by order of Jehu (II Kings 10:1-11). The bloodshed in these sanguinary transactions is called by Hosea "the blood of Jezreel," and he prophesied that it should be avenged (Hos. 1:4). The crusaders correctly identified Jezreel with the Parvum Gerinum, now the village Zer'in. Though in a plain, the site was an admirable one for a fortified city, standing as it does upon the brow of a very steep, rocky descent, of 100 feet or more, toward the n.e., with a splendid view all the way to the Jordan. The fountain of Jezreel, which is below the village, is copious and good. It is called 'Ain el-Meiyiteh. Another and yet more copious one, 'Ain Jälüd, is at no great distance. The ancient vineyards seem to have been to the e. of the city, where rock-cut wine presses now exist.

The term "valley of Jezreel" has been applied to the great plain intersecting Palestine immediately n. of Carmel, but this is better known as the Plain of Esdraelon (a Gr. modification of Jezreel) or the Plain of Megiddo (cf. Judith 1:8; 3:9; 4:6; 7:3). Jezreel is the gate to the valley of Jezreel, which is a broad deep vale e. of Jezreel descending to the Jordan (Josh. 17:16; Hos. 1:5). In the O.T. the valley of Jezreel is the vale down which Jezreel looks to the Jordan, and not the plain across which Jezreel looks to Carmel. In Gideon's days the Midianites and Amalekites pitched within its limits (Judg. 6:33). Through all bygone time it has been a battlefield of nations.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:56). It seems to have been from this place that David obtained his wife Ahinoam the Jezreelitess (I Sam. 25:43; 27:3). Probably Khirbet Terräma in the plain of Dibleh.

3. A man of Judah, descended from Hur (I Chron. 4:3).

4. A son of the Prophet Hosea. So named because Jehovah had declared that he would avenge the blood of Jezreel on the house of Jehu (Hos. 1:4, 5).

Jib'sam (jīb'sām). See IBSAM.

Jid'laph (jīd'lāf) [he weeps]. A son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:22). It is not known where he settled.

Jim'na (jīm'ná) and Jim'nah (jīm'ná). See IMNAH.

Jiph'tah (jīf'tá). See IPHTAH.

Jiph'tah-el (jīf'thá-él). See IPHTAH-EL.

Jo'ab (jō'áb) [Jehovah is father]. 1. Son of Seraiah and descendant of Kenaz, who was reckoned with the tribe of Judah. He was the father of the inhabitants of the valley of craftsmen (I Chron. 4:13, 14).

2. A son of Zeruah (II Sam. 8:16), David's half-sister (I Chron. 2:16; cf. II Sam. 17:25). Joab was, therefore, David's nephew. He was the 2d of 3 brothers, Abishai, Joab, and Asahel, all men of heroic type. He first appears in public life at the head of David's soldiers in the war with Ish-bosheth. He commanded at the battle which followed the tournament at Gibeon, and was victorious (II Sam. 2:12-32). Abner, Ish-bosheth's commander-in-chief, after a quarrel with his royal master, had an interview with David. Joab reproved the king for allowing Abner to depart in peace, denounced Abner as a spy, recalled him, and, with the connivance of Abishai (ch. 3:30, 39; cf. ch. 2:24), assassinated him at a nominally friendly interview. Joab committed the murder in vengeance for the death of his younger brother Asahel at the hands of Abner at the battle of Gibeon (ch. 3:30); where, however, Abner had acted reluctantly and strictly in self-defense. Probably, also, a 2d reason was the apprehension of Joab and Abishai that Abner might be given the command of the army. David felt himself politically too weak to bring them to justice, yet he never condoned the crime (II Sam. 3:6-39). In the assault on the Jebusite stronghold on Mount Zion Joab was the first to enter the fortress, and as a reward was made the commander of the armies of all Israel (II Sam. 4:8; I Chron. 11:6). He soon afterward repaired a portion of the city (I Chron. 11:8). After David's conquest of the Edomites (II Sam. 8:13, 14; I Chron. 18:12), Joab remained in Edom with the army for 6 months, cutting off every male (I Kings 11:14-17). He commanded in the war with the confederate Syrians and Ammonites (II Sam. 10:1-14; I Chron. 19:1-19), and he pressed the siege of Rabbah so successfully that he could have taken the town by storm; but instead of doing so he sent for David that the king might have the credit of the victory (II Sam. 11:1; 12:26-29; cf. I Chron. 20:1-3). He obeyed David's order to put Uriah in the forefront of the battle that he might be slain (II Sam. 11:6-27). It was Joab who sent to David the wise woman of Tekoa to induce him to forgive Absalom (ch. 14:1-27); but he did not interfere further in the case until his barley field had been set on fire by the prince (vs. 28-33). When Absalom rebelled Joab remained loyal to David, and led 1 of the 3 divisions of the royal forces which defeated the rebels (ch. 18:1, 2). Then, in defiance of the king's command, he thrust 3 darts through the heart of the revolting prince, terminating his life (vs. 9-17), and afterward he spoke some plain though not unwise words to the king on his extravagant grief at the death of a rebellious son (ch. 19:1-8). David shortly afterward appointed Amasa to be captain of the host in place of Joab (v. 13), and when Sheba rebelled Amasa was employed to lead the forces sent to crush the revolt. Joab was overcome by jealous hate and, at an avowedly friendly interview, stabbed him dead just as he had killed Abner in similar circumstances; but this time there was no pretense of a blood feud between the parties. Then Joab and Abishai put down the rebellion (ch. 20:1-22). Joab thus again became commander-in-chief (II Sam. 20:23; cf. also I Kings 2:34, 35). He was opposed to David's numbering the people, and intentionally did the work imperfectly (II Sam. 24:1-9; I Chron. 21:1-6). When Adonijah set himself up for king, Joab went with him (I Kings 1:7), but, with his other supporters, deserted him on hearing that Solomon had been proclaimed king (vs. 28-49). David on his deathbed indicated his wish that Joab should be brought to justice for the murders of Abner and of Amasa. Solomon carried out the sentence. Joab, clinging to the horns of the altar in the court of the tabernacle, fell by the hand of Benaiah, chief of the bodyguard, and was buried in his own house in the wilderness (I Kings 2:5, 6, 28-34).

3. Founder of a family, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:6; 8:9; Neh. 7:11).

For I Chron. 2:54, A.V., see ATAROTH 4.

Jo'ah (jō'ā) [Jehovah is brother]. 1. A son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:4).

2. A Levite, son of Zimma and a descendant of Gershon (I Chron. 6:21). Perhaps he was the Levite, son of Zimma and descendant of Gershon, who assisted at the religious reformation under King Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:12).

3. A son of Asaph. He was the recorder under King Hezekiah (II Kings 18:18, 26; Isa. 36:3, 11, 22).

4. A son of Joahaz. He was recorder under King Josiah (II Chron. 34:8).

Jo'a-haz (jō'ā-hāz) [Jehovah has laid hold of]. Father of King Josiah's recorder Joah (II Chron. 34:8). For others, see JEHOAHAZ.

Jo'an'an (jō-ā'nān), in A.V. Jo-an'na [Gr. from Heb. Yōhānān, Jehovah has been gracious]. An ancestor of Christ, who lived about 500 B.C. (Luke 3:27).

Jo'an'na (jō-ā'nā) [Gr. fem. of Heb. Yōhānān, Jehovah has been gracious]. The wife of Chuza, steward of Herod the tetrarch. She was one of those women who ministered to Jesus of their substance (Luke 8:3), and one of the party who accompanied Mary Magdalene to the sepulcher of our Lord (ch. 24:10).

For the man called Joanna in A.V., see JOANAN.

Jo-an'nan (jō-ā'nān). See JOHN 2.

Jo'a-rib (jō'ā-rīb). See JOARIB 2.

Jo'ash, I (jō'āsh) and Je-ho'ash [Heb. Yēhō'āsh, Yō'āsh, Jehovah has given; cf. Arab. 'āsa ('awasa), to bestow]. The longer form is used in II Kings only, but the shorter form also occurs there frequently. 1. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (I Chron. 4:22).

2. A man of Manasseh, family of Abiezer and father of Gideon (Judg. 6:11, 15). He lived at Ophrah, and was apparently a man of substance. He had reared an altar to Baal and an Asherah. These Gideon was directed to throw down, and he did so. The idolaters demanded that Joash should surrender his son to be put to death for the sacrifice, but Joash shrewdly said: "If Baal is a god, let him plead for himself" (Judg. 6:11-32).

3. A Benjamite of Gibeah who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

4. A son of Ahab (I Kings 22:26; II Chron. 18:25).

5. Son of Ahaziah, king of Judah. When Athaliah, the mother of Ahaziah, heard that her son had been slain, she massacred all the seed royal except Joash, and ascended the throne. Joash, then only an infant, escaped by the artifice of the late king's sister Jehoshaphat, wife of the high priest. He was hidden with his nurse for 6 years in the Temple. In the 7th year, Jehoiada, the high priest, summoned 5 captains of the royal bodyguard, put them under oath, and showed them the king. Five companies of armed men were arranged for (II Kings 11:5-7), probably consisting of 3 companies of the guard and 2 courses of Levites with spears from the Temple arsenal; on a certain Sabbath these 5 bodies were drawn up across the court of the Temple in front of the altar, representative men of the nation assembled by appointment, and the king was brought into their midst, crowned, and greeted with loud acclaim. Athaliah, hearing the noise, hurried into the Temple; but, by the high priest's orders, she was at once ejected and slain, leaving Joash now without a rival. Then Jehoiada framed 2 covenants: the one that the youthful ruler and his people should serve Jehovah, and the other that they should discharge their mutual duties as king and subjects. Then they proceeded to the house of Baal and broke it down, destroying the images and killing the officiating priest (II Kings 11:1-20; II Chron. 23:10-21). Joash ascended the throne c. 836 B.C., but was the only legitimate king since 842. Joash was 7 years old at his coronation and he reigned 40 years. While a child the character of his rule depended wholly on his advisers. Happily, he was under the direction of the high priest, Jehoiada, and as long as that wise and pious counselor lived, Joash did well, one notable measure of his being the repair of the Temple, though the people still continued generally to worship at the high places (II Kings 12:1-16). But on the death of Jehoiada both the king and his people apostatized from Jehovah and began to set up Asherim and other idols. Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, denounced judgment upon the evildoers, whereupon Joash gave orders for his murder; and the multitude, breaking out into riot, stoned him to death (II Chron. 24:15-22; Matt. 23:35). Soon afterward Hazael, king of Syria, having captured the Philistine city of Gath, threatened Jerusalem, and had to be bought off with the contents of the Temple treasury. When the invaders departed, Joash was suffering from sore diseases. Amaziah, his son, conducted the government; and in the course of 3 years, as it would appear, the servants of Joash slew him in his bed in revenge for the murder of Zechariah (II Kings 12:20; II Chron. 24:25); see CHRONOLOGY, IV. He was buried in the city of David, but not in one of the proper sepulchers of the kings. Joash was an infant in 842 B.C. and was 7 years old in 836 or 835 (II Kings 11:21), and his son Amaziah was 25 years old in c. 799 (ch. 14:2). The son was accordingly born in c. 824. The early marriage of Joash was desirable and was doubtless urged by the high priest Jehoiada, since Joash was the sole survivor of his family and in his offspring lay the only hope that so great a calamity would be averted as the extinction of the direct line of David.

6. Son of Jehoahaz, king of Israel. He began to reign c. 800 B.C., and reigned 16 years. He continued the worship of the 2 calves at Beth-el and Dan. Nevertheless he felt veneration for Elisha and sorrowed when the great prophet lay dying. Elisha told him to open the window e. and shoot out an arrow. He did so. The prophet then bade him take arrows and smite upon the ground. He did so, smiting the ground thrice. The arrows symbolized victories which he was to gain over the Syrians; and had he struck 6 times instead of 3, the number of victories would have been doubled (II Kings 13:14-25). Afterward he furnished 100,000 mercenaries to Amaziah, king of Judah, for an Edomite expedition. A prophet directed them to be sent home. Though they had been paid in advance for the services which they were not allowed to render, yet they departed in a rage and plundered the territory of Judah as they went along (II Chron. 25:6-10, 13). Perhaps on this account Amaziah sent Joash a challenge to fight. Joash remonstrated, but Amaziah would not forbear. A battle took place at Beth-shemesh, in which Joash was victorious; and he followed up his success by breaking down a part of the wall surrounding Jerusalem and carrying off the treasures of the Temple and the palace, with hostages as guarantees against further disturbance of the peace. On the death of Joash, his son, Jeroboam II, ascended the throne (II Kings 14:8-16; II Chron. 25:17-24).

Jo'ash, II (jō'ash) [Heb. Yō'ash, Jehovah has come to help]. 1. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. An officer who had charge of David's oil cellars (I Chron. 27:28).

Job, I (jōb) (Gen. 46:13, A.V.). See JASHUB 1.

Job, II (jōb) [Heb. 'Iyyōb. Ety. uncertain; cf. Arab. 'awwāb, one who comes back to God, a penitent; or one persecuted, i.e., by Satan, his friends, or calamity, from Heb. 'āyab, to be hostile to]. A pious man of the O.T. who dwelt in the land of Uz (Job 1:1). He is mentioned for the 1st time elsewhere by Ezekiel (Ezek. 14:14, 16, 20). He lived under patriarchal conditions, in some district to the e. of Palestine and near the desert, at a time when the Chaldeans made raids in the w. (Job 1:17). There is no reason to doubt that he is a historical personage and that he passed through the remarkable experiences that are described, albeit with poetic license, in the book which bears his name. These experiences brought the question to the forefront, Why does God permit the righteous to suffer? and afforded the material for a magnificent philosophical poem.

The Book of Job, which belongs to wisdom literature, is a poetic book and gives an account of the sufferings of Job, of the argument carried on between himself and his friends concerning the reasons for his sufferings, and of the solution of the problem. The prologue (chs. 1:1 to 3:2), the introductions to the various speeches and especially to Elihu's speech (ch. 32:1-5), and the epilogue narrating the prosperity of Job in his latter days under Jehovah's blessing (ch. 42:7-17), are in prose.

The problem of the book is: Why do the righteous suffer? and the principal aim is to controvert the theory that suffering is a sign of the divine displeasure and that it presupposes sin on the part of the sufferer. The O.T. often observes that righteousness brings prosperity and that wickedness is the forerunner of misfortune (cf. Ex. 23:20 seq.; Lev., ch. 26; Deut., ch. 28; Psalms 1; 37; 73; Isa. 58:7-13; Jer. 7:5-7; 17:5-8, 19-27; 31:29, 30; Ezek., ch. 18). Apparent exceptions to the law of reward and punishment were accordingly a source of great perplexity. In the case of the sufferings of the righteous there was a tendency to conclude that because sin is followed by suffering, therefore all suffering is necessarily a consequence of antecedent sin. Naturally such a conclusion is far from logical, even though all men are born in sin and no one is free from error. Men are furthermore variously bound together in society, and the innocent may suffer through the ill deeds of the unrighteous or the guilty; or wickedness may not be detected, and apparently triumph, at least for a while, unchecked. In the argument Job does not claim sinlessness, but he maintains that his punishment is out of proportion to the magnitude of his sin.

In the opening of the book, Job is represented as being very prosperous, possessing many flocks and herds, a large number of servants, and a numerous family. Satan is permitted to try Job's faith in God, first by causing him to be despoiled of his possessions, and to be bereaved of his family; when this means fails, Satan is further permitted to cause Job much suffering in body. Job's faith triumphs over all difficulties, and he is finally restored to more than his former prosperity.

The book between the introduction and conclusion may be divided into 3 main parts, each of which may be again divided into 3 minor parts. The introduction describes Job's prosperity and happy condition. In part 1, 1st subhead, we find Job's 1st affliction described, the loss of his property and family; under the 2d head comes the 2d stage of the affliction, the attack on Job's person; and under the 3d head, the coming of his 3 friends, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, to condole with him. Part 2 contains the argument between Job and his 3 friends, this being threefold, each friend speaking 3 times (except the 3d, who speaks twice), and Job replying to each. This forms the principal part of the book. The 3 friends argue on the basis that affliction is always and necessarily a result of sin, and as Job accepts this general principle, but denies its application to himself, misunderstandings result, and the speakers are as far from a solution of the situation in the end as in the beginning. First, Eliphaz begins the argument by expressing in general the sinfulness of man and hinting at, rather than boldly asserting, Job's special sinfulness. Job answers, declaring his innocence. Secondly, Bildad continues in the same strain, insisting that the Lord cannot be unjust, therefore man must be at fault. Job answers as before that he is innocent, appealing to God to lighten his burden of affliction. Thirdly, Zophar follows with the same argument, implying more directly that Job must be a sinner. The 2d series of speeches (chs. 12 to 20) now begins. The same arguments are gone over by the speakers in the same order, the friends becoming more vehement and impatient of what they consider Job's obstinacy. In the 3d series (chs. 21 to 31) Eliphaz openly accuses Job of secret sin. After Job's earnest denial, Bildad falls back on the 1st position, and Zophar remains silent.

During the whole course of this argument Job has been profoundly conscious of his own uprightness, yet he cannot understand God's apparent harshness to him. His inward struggle becomes more intense as his outward situation appears more hopeless, but he remains firm in his determination that whatever befall him still will he trust in God. Then the thought bursts upon him that sometime, in God's own pleasure, he will be justified. It may not be in this life, but it will certainly come. That carries with it a conviction of immortality, and with the statement,

"I know that my Redeemer liveth,
And at last he will stand up upon the earth:
And after my skin, even this body, is destroyed,
Then without my flesh shall I see God,"

Job reaches a foundation for which nothing can afterward move him (ch. 19:25, 26).

In the 3d part of the book, Elihu, who until this time has been a silent listener, proposes to argue out the matter upon a different basis. Instead of regarding the afflictions of men as a punishment for sin, he declares that they are often sent as a means of strengthening and purifying the children of God. They are not, then, the expression of an angry and implacable God, but the chastening of a loving father. In this, Elihu appears as the messenger of the Lord, preparing the way for his coming, and offering an argument which Job could dispute or accept. Job accepts this view (chs. 32 to 37). Then Jehovah speaks and shows to Job that man knows far too little to justify him in attempts fully to explain the mysteries of God's rule; and Job humbles himself before the Lord (chs. 38:1 to 42:6). Finally, Job is restored to double his former prosperity, and his family is restored to the same number as before (ch. 42:7-17).

Many critics regard the prose introduction and conclusion of the book as an old source which the poet used as a framework into which to set his poetry. Moreover, the 4 Elihu speeches (chs. 32:6 to 33:33; 34; 35; 36 and 37) have received special consideration from critics, and the majority of scholars hold that they are not an original part of the poem, but were later incorporated into the work. The foreword in prose (ch. 32:1-5) and the introductory poetry (chs. 32:6-22; 33:8-11) are regarded as intended to introduce Elihu and to join these speeches to the dialogue between Job and his 3 friends. If Elihu's appearance on the scene be sufficiently explained by ch. 32:1-5, a difficulty remains in that he receives no consideration at the end of the book (ch. 42:7-9). A further argument produced is that the Elihu speeches seem to disturb the sequence between those of Job (chs. 29 to 31) and those of Jehovah (chs. 38:1 to 40:2; 40:6 to 41:26). At any rate, chs. 38:1, 2 and 40:6 seem to imply that the previous speaker had been Job, not Elihu. It has also been observed that chs. 32 to 37 have more Aramaisms than the rest of the book. Emphasis has been laid upon the teleological explanation of suffering that it should lead to knowledge of oneself on the part of the sufferer and become a source of blessing. This is held by some critics to be in direct contradiction to the view expressed in chs. 38:1 to 42:6: the power and wisdom of God are supreme, and man has to yield to this higher wisdom. On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that a number of first-class critics maintain that the Elihu speeches are original and that they present the only solution of the problem which the poet could give from his O.T. point of view.

Critics have also picked out certain passages in chs. 38 to 41 as from a later hand. Thus the description of behemoth (ch. 40:15-24) and of leviathan (chs. 40:25 to 41:26) are said not to fit well into the context. The genuineness of ch. 38 has also been questioned. Jehovah speaks twice out of the whirlwind (chs. 38:1; 40:6), and Job twice expresses his submission (chs. 40:3-5; 42:1-6). In this case, however, some notable scholars see no conflict or inconsistency; in chs. 38; 39 reference is made to the majesty and wisdom of God in nature, while the parallel passage (ch. 40:6-14) deals with God's rule in human affairs.

It should be noted, however, that the consistent progress of the argument is strong evidence for the literary unity of the book. The assumption of interpolations or supplements is needless so far as the dramatic development is concerned. But whether the poem has been supplemented by the addition of chs. 32 to 37 and 38 to 42, as many students of it contend, or not, these chapters are the work of a master mind and gifted poet, to whom God had spoken, and who with clear insight removed the errors of the popular doctrine that distorted the view of the moral question; also to the primary truths which Job had discovered they added a fuller disclosure of the truth, though not the final one (chs. 32 to 37), and directed attention to the humble position which it behooves ignorant and impotent man to take before God and the mysteries of the divine government (chs. 38 to 41). Behind the seen is the unseen (cf. chs. 1:6-12; 2:1-6), and the disputants had argued in total ignorance of the reasons for God's action and of the compensation for the sufferer which God had in store (as made known to the reader in the closing chapter, ch. 42). In fact this outcome of the argument (chs. 38:1 to 42:6) would seem to have been in the author's thought when he wrote the opening passage to his poem, for it accounts for his introduction of Satan into the plot and his intimation thereby that reasons may exist for God's procedure which lie beyond the ken of man.

According to William Henry Green, the 3 friends of Job "had really inculcated the providence of God by their professed defense of it. By disingenuously covering up and ignoring its enigmas and seeming contradictions, they had cast more discredit upon it than Job by honestly holding them up to the light. Their denial of its apparent inequalities was more untrue and more dishonoring to the divine administration, as it is in fact conducted, than Job's bold affirmation of them. Even his most startling utterances wrung from him in his bewilderment and sore perplexity were less reprehensible than their false statements and false inferences."

The scene of the poem is the steppe e. or s.e. of Palestine, where are located Uz, Teman, Shuah, and Naamah, but this does not prove that the author, whose name is unknown, came from that region. He probably was a native of Palestine. The date of the book cannot be fixed precisely; some critics have suspected the age of Jeremiah. Others maintain that the inner struggle of Job and the conflict between the theory of reward or retribution and actual experience point to a post-exilic period. The language has an Aramaic or Arabic-Aramaic coloring, which also points to a late date. While some scholars say that the book was written during or shortly after the Babylonian Captivity, others more definitely place it in late postexilic times, probably around the 4th century B.C.

Jo'bab (jō'bāb) [cf. Heb. yābāb, to call loudly, shrilly; but cf. also S. Arab. yuhayyib, and Arab. yabāb, desert]. 1. An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:29; I Chron. 1:23). It is not known what district they occupied.

2. A king of Edom. He was the son of Zerah of Bozrah (Gen. 36:33; I Chron. 1:44, 45).

3. A king of Madon, who entered into the n. confederacy against Joshua, but, with his allies, was totally defeated at the waters of Merom (Josh. 11:1; 12:19).

4 and 5. Two Benjamites, a son of Shalaharaim and a remoter descendant (I Chron. 8:9, 18).

Jo'h'e-bed (jō'h'ē-bēd) [Jehovah is glory]. A daughter of Levi, who married her nephew Amram and became the ancestress of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Ex. 6:20; Num. 26:59); see EGYPT, III. 3.

Jod (jōd). See YODH.

Jo'da (jō'dā). An ancestor of Christ, who lived near the time of the Exile (Luke 3:26). A.V., following a different reading, has Juda, i.e., Judah.

Jo'ed (jō'ēd) [Jehovah is witness]. A Benjamite, descended from Jeshaiiah (Neh. 11:7).

Jo'el (jō'ēl) [Jehovah is God]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (cf. I Chron. 6:36 with vs. 34, 38). Probably he is not identical with Shaul (v. 24), but belongs to the collateral line descended through Zephaniah from Tahath.

2. The elder son of Samuel the prophet and father of Heman the singer (I Sam. 8:2; I Chron. 6:33; 15:17). Called once Vashni in the Heb. text, and so in A.V. (I Chron. 6:28). This name the R.V. relegates to the marg., placing Joel in italics in the text.

3. A Gershonite Levite, who with 130 of his brethren, of whom he was the head, aided in bringing up the Ark from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (I Chron. 15:7, 11, 12). He seems to have been the son of Ladan (I Chron. 23:8), and guardian of the treasures dedicated to God (ch. 26:21, 22).

4. A man of Issachar, and a chief of that tribe. He was descended through Uzzi (I Chron. 7:3).

5. One of David's valiant men, a brother of Nathan (I Chron. 11:38); see IGAL 2.

6. Son of Pedaiiah and ruler of w. Manasseh in David's reign (I Chron. 27:20).

7. A chief of the Gadites in Bashan prior to the reigns of Jotham king of Judah and Jeroboam II king of Israel (I Chron. 5:12; cf. v. 17).

8. A Reubenite (I Chron. 5:4), probably he whose family had much cattle in Gilead (vs. 8, 9).

9. A Kohathite Levite, son of Azariah, who aided in cleansing the Temple during Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:12).

10. One of the Simeonite princes who seized pasture land at Gedor (I Chron. 4:35-43).

11. A son of Nebo, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:43).

12. A Benjamite, son of Zichri, overseer at Jerusalem during the government of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:9).

13. Son of Pethuel, and the author of the 2d among the minor prophetic books (Joel 1:1). His history is unknown.

The Book of Joel opens with a description of dire distress caused by a plague of locusts and apparently aggravated by drought (Joel 1:4-12, 17-20; cf. Amos 7:1, 2, 4). Locusts are a natural figure for an invading army (Rev. 9:3-11); and the oldest interpreters of the prophecy regard them in it merely as symbols of Israel's foes. An actual devastation by these insects seems, however, to be intended in Joel, ch. 1; and probably in ch. 2 also, where they are likened to an army, for swarms of locusts occasionally come into Palestine from the n.e., and they quite frequently perish in the sea (cf. ch. 2:20). If locusts were actually wasting the country, the event served the prophet as a type of the dreadful day of the Lord and as an occasion for his message.

The book consists of a sublime address, comprising, 1st, a twice repeated tale of judgment, followed in each instance by a call to repentance and prayer (chs. 1:2 to 2:17), and, 2d, an announcement of the blessings, near and remote, material and spiritual, that follow upon repentance (chs. 2:18 to 3:21 [Heb. text, ch. 4:21]). The prophecy thus falls into 4 parts:

I. The prophet depicts the distress that has occurred or is impending, and calls upon the inhabitants to mourn (ch. 1:2-12) and to repent and cry unto Jehovah (vs. 13, 14).

II. The prophet explains the event. The day of Jehovah is at hand, and shall come as destruction from the Almighty (v. 15). A day of affliction: a people great and strong, like an irresistible army, executing the will of Jehovah (ch. 2:1-11). But even now repentance may avail (vs. 12-17).

III. The result of repentance. Jehovah, jealous for his land, promises to destroy the spoilers, to give seasons of plenty which shall make good the first suffering and loss, and not to allow that his people be again put to shame (vs. 18-27).

IV. This deliverance is the herald of deliverance "afterward." Having poured out the rain to make the earth bring forth abundantly, Jehovah will pour out his Spirit upon all flesh. The sun shall, indeed, be darkened, symbolical of the wrath of God, before the terrible day of Jehovah comes (as described in ch. 3:14-17); and whosoever shall call on the name of Jehovah shall be saved, for in Mount Zion shall be those that escape (ch. 2:28-32). In those days, when Jehovah shall bring back the captivity of Judah, all enemies of the kingdom shall be brought to judgment. In one picture Joel exhibits God's successive judgments of the nations, and the final, universal judgment, culminating in the establishment of Zion forever (ch. 3:1-21 [Heb. text, ch. 4:1-21]).

The book bears no date, and so we have to rely upon internal evidence. The interpretation for an early date is given first.

1. Joel cites earlier prophecy (ch. 2:32). Part of the declaration is found verbally in Obadiah (Obad. 17), and Joel may have quoted from that book. He may, however, be alluding to a previous announcement of his own; or he may have had Isa. 4:2, 3 in mind, where both the thought and the several words occur.

2. The book mentions the scattering of Israel among the nations (ch. 3:2), but the reference is not to the 10 tribes specifically, but to the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, God's people and heritage, and is moreover a prophecy. So, too, the Captivity of Judah and Jerusalem is mentioned (ch. 3:1), but likewise prophetically in the spirit of Deuteronomy (Deut., ch. 28) or Hosea (Hos. 6:11) or Micah (Micah 3:12; 4:10). For the prophet and people are in Judah, Zion exists (Joel 2:1, 15), the Temple is standing (ch. 1:14; 2:17), and the service is regularly conducted, although the meal and drink offerings have been cut off by reason of the destruction of all the vegetation (ch. 1:9-13; cf. ch. 2:14).

3. The reference to past events begins with the last clause of ch. 3:2 [Heb. text, ch. 4:2], as the grammatical construction seems to indicate. Hostile nations had parted Jehovah's land among them, cast lots for the captives, plundered the Temple of its silver and gold, sold children of Judah to the Greeks, and shed innocent blood (vs. 2-6, 19). Some critics maintain that the allusions are not to the period after the Exile, nor to the time between the 1st deportation of the Jews and the fall of the city, nor to the earlier period when the Assyrians were invading the land, for:

(a) Judgment is not pronounced against Assyria or Babylon or later enemies, but only against Judah's foes, Tyre and Sidon, Philistia, Edom, and Egypt (ch. 3:4, 19). Tyre and Sidon had forgotten the brotherly covenant (Joel 3:4; Amos 1:9), and had purchased Jewish captives from the Philistines and sold them to the remote Greeks. Philistia and Edom had done violence to Judah (Joel 3:4, 19; II Chron. 21:16, 17; 28:17, "again").

(b) There is no reference to Syria, from which Judah scarcely suffered before the reign of Ahaz (II Kings 12:17). During and after the reign of Ahaz, the prophets of Judah frequently refer to Syria as a hostile power (Isa. 7:8; 8:4; ch. 17; Jer. 49:23-27; Zech. 9:1).

(c) Nor is any mention made of the Assyrians, who did not come into conflict with Judah until after the time of Ahaz, and who for a half century preceding Ahaz' reign had not been active in w. Asia.

(d) There is reference to the Greeks, not as present in Palestine or as hostile to Judah, but simply as a nation afar off to whom the Phoenicians and Philistines had sold captive children of Judah, and as contrasted with the men of Sheba, a nation at another extremity of the earth, to whom Judah shall sell captives taken from Philistia and Phoenicia (Joel 3:1-8). Accordingly some commentators have come to the conclusion that the prophecy was uttered before the time of Ahaz. The position of the book as 2d among the Minor Prophets indicates that the belief was current at the time of forming the canon that Joel began to prophesy after Hosea had commenced his prophetic labors and before Amos had entered upon his. This factor, however, no longer receives consideration from critics. In fact, attempts have been made to date Joel anywhere from the death of Solomon to the time of Malachi.

There seems no doubt that chs. 1:1 to 2:27 (Heb. text, chs. 1; 2) refer to an actual plague of locusts, which is an omen of the approach of the day of the Lord (cf. chs. 1:15; 2:1, 2, 10, 11). In chs. 2:28 to 3:21 (Heb. text, chs. 3; 4) the theme is the day of the Lord.

The question is whether chs. 1:1 to 2:27 are to be understood in a predictive sense or whether the passage is to be explained either as a narrative of a past event or as a description of a contemporary calamity. If chs. 1:1 to 2:27 refer to a future event, some scholars have no trouble in deriving the whole book from one author. On the other hand, if this section alludes to a past or contemporary happening, these same critics feel that the book falls into 2 parts and so probably is to be ascribed to 2 authors. Yet it is to be observed that the words on the day of the Lord in chs. 1:1 to 2:27 refer to the future; Joel could easily have given future significance to a past or contemporary calamity. One proposed solution of the apparent difficulty is to suppose that chs. 2:28 to 3:21 were appended to the description of the locust plague in chs. 1:1 to 2:27, which was then adapted to the theme of the day of the Lord by the interpolation of chs. 1:15; 2:1b, 2a, 10a, 11b. The question, however, may be raised whether books were composed in that way in antiquity. The addition of the apocalyptic chapters (chs. 2:28 to 3:21) together with the supposed interpolation would be favored by understanding the locusts as a figure of the heathen nations. The locusts are compared to military forces (chs. 1:6; 2:2-9); the expression "the northern army" (ch. 2:20) or "the northern one" (J.V.) would facilitate such an interpretation, since the invasion of the heathen nations was expected from the n. (Ezek., chs. 38; 39). This view assumes that a plague of locusts was the occasion of Joel's calling the people to repentance and his receiving the words of the Lord (Joel 2:12, 13, 19, 20), but this calamity was interpreted in a different light by the addition of chs. 2:28 to 3:21. It should be borne in mind, however, that the acceptance of a late date of composition does not require a division of the book into 2 parts or a denial of authorship to Joel.

Recent scholarship quite generally interprets the evidence of the book as favoring a late date for Joel. Literary parallels with about 24 passages from other prophets (Isaiah, Ezekiel, Amos, Obadiah, Nahum, Zephaniah) may favor a late date. The language of ch. 3:1-3 hardly refers to any calamity less than that of the Babylonian Captivity. Ch. 3:17b seems to have more significance if spoken after the desecration of the Temple by the Chaldeans in 586 B.C. The foes of Judah are the nations collectively who are assembled for a signal defeat outside the walls of Jerusalem (ch. 3); this is a feature prominent in late prophets (cf. Ezek., chs. 38; 39; Zech., ch. 14). Joel mentions Tyre, Sidon, the Philistines, the Greeks, Sabeans, Egypt, and Edom but is silent about the Syrians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans; some consider this as evidence for a late date. There is no attack on the social and moral offenses of the time (except perhaps Joel 1:5) as we find in Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah. The book implies a nation united religiously; there are no denunciations of idolatry such as are found in the earlier prophets and even in Ezekiel. The one altar (ch. 1:13), the significance of the cult for the people and prophet (chs. 1:9; 2:14, 17), and the reference to the reproach of the heathen (ch. 2:17, 19) suggest a post-exilic period. That there is no Northern Kingdom mentioned indicates that there was none, and Israel seems to be synonymous with Judah. No king is mentioned, but there are priests and elders, a condition best explained by the circumstances after the Exile. Edom's hostility to Judah cannot be limited to one particular period, and Egypt may be merely the type of a power hostile to Judah (ch. 3:19). There is no ground for limiting the slave trade to the time of Amos, and the reference to the Greeks may argue for a late date when Syrian slaves were in demand in Greece. The eschatological picture in Joel seems to be based on the work of previous prophets; cf. the calling of the nations to judgment (Zeph. 3:8; Ezek., chs. 38; 39) and the wonders of fire and blood (Ezek. 38:22). For the fertility of the land (Joel 3:18), cf. Amos 9:13; for the fountain coming forth from the house of Jehovah, cf. Ezek. 47:1-12 and Zech. 14:8; for the outpouring of the Spirit, cf. Ezek. 39:29. Judah is dispersed among the nations (Joel 3:1, 2), and this favors a date subsequent to 586 B.C. Furthermore, the apocalyptic character of the book fits better into a postexilic period.

Since we have only internal evidences for dating Joel, it is not possible to give a precise date. Some critics, who divide the book, place the 1st part at c. 500 and the 2d part during the 1st half of the 4th century or even as late as the 3d century B.C. Others, who consider it a unit, date it c. 400 B.C.

Jo'e'lah (jō-ē'lā) [possibly, let him help]. A son of Jeroham of Gedor. He joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:7).

Jo'e'zer (jō-ē'zēr) [Jehovah is help]. A Korahite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

Jog'be'hah (jōg'bē-hā) [lofty]. A town of Gad (Num. 32:35; Judg. 8:11). Its name still lives in Jubeihah, a village 6 miles n.w. of Rabbath Ammon on the road from es-Salt and the Jordan.

Jog'li (jōg'li) [led into exile]. Father of Bukki, of the tribe of Dan (Num. 34:22).

Jo'ha (jō'hā). 1. A Benjamite, son of Be-riah (I Chron. 8:16).

2. A Tizite, son of Shimri and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:45).

Jo-ha'nān (jō-hā'nān) [Jehovah is gracious]. 1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

2. The 8th of the Gadites who joined David. He was made a captain in David's army (I Chron. 12:12, 14).

3. A member of the high-priestly line, who lived about 800 B.C. (I Chron. 6:10).

4. An Ephraimite (II Chron. 28:12).

5. The eldest son of King Josiah (I Chron. 3:15). He seems to have died young.

6. A captain, son of Kareah. He and his men advised their submission to Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar set as governor over Judah (II Kings 25:22, 23; Jer. 40:8, 9). He warned Gedaliah of the plot to murder him (Jer. 40:13, 14); and when the governor, neglecting the warning, was assassinated, he led the force which went to avenge his death (ch. 41:11-15). He afterward counseled and carried out a removal of the Jewish remnant to Egypt, against the advice of Jeremiah (chs. 41:16 to 43:13).

7. A son of Elioenai (I Chron. 3:24).

8. A son of Hakkatan, of the clan of Azgad. With 110 males, he accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:12).

9. Son of Eliashib, but scarcely of the high priest Eliashib. Ezra went to Johanan's chamber and, refusing to eat or drink, mourned over the sin of those who had contracted foreign marriages (Ezra 10:6, in R.V. Jehohanan).

10. Son of Tobiah, the Ammonite, who married a Jewess in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 6:18, in R.V. Jehohanan).

11. A high priest (Neh. 12:22), grandson of Eliashib (v. 23; cf. v. 11). In v. 11, the name appears as Jonathan, doubtless through corruption of the text. The Jews at Elephantine opposite Syene in Egypt, whose temple was destroyed in 411 B.C. by the command of a local official at the instigation of the Egyptian priests, at once sent word of the outrage to Johanan in the hope that he might be able to secure them redress (Elephantine Papyri). Josephus, who correctly calls him John, says that he killed his brother Jesus in the Temple, believing that he was about to supersede him in the high priesthood. This murder was committed in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, 405-362 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xi. 7, 1; cf. 5, 4).

John (jōn) [Gr. Ἰωάννης, from Heb. Yō-hānān, Jehovah has been gracious]. 1. Father of Mattathias, the instigator of the Maccabean revolt (I Macc. 2:1).

2. Eldest son of Mattathias (I Macc. 2:2, in A.V. Joannan). He was surnamed Gaddis (in A.V. Caddis), a word of unknown meaning. He was slain by the children of Jambri, about 160 B.C. (I Macc. 9:36, 38, 42; and II Macc. 8:22, where he is erroneously called Joseph).

3. A man who obtained special privileges for the Jews from Antiochus the Great (II Macc. 4:11). He was son of Accos and father of Eupolemus (I Macc. 8:17).

4. Son of Simon, the Maccabee (I Macc. 13:53; 16:1). He became known as John Hyrcanus. About 142 B.C. he was appointed by his father commander-in-chief of the army (ch. 13:53). He met and defeated Cendebeus in battle near Jamnia (ch. 16:1-10). When his father and two brothers were murdered in 135 B.C., and he himself was marked for destruction, he took the offensive against his adversary and drove him from Judea (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 1). He exercised the office of high priest and civil governor from 135 to 105 B.C. Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, invaded Judea, and in the fall of 134 B.C. laid siege to Jerusalem. After a year, the Syrians took the city and dismantled its fortifications (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 2 and 3). The death of Antiochus afforded John an opportunity to enlarge his domains, and he conquered Samaria and Idumaea. He also renewed the alliance with the Romans and thereby secured the restoration of Joppa and other towns to Jewish authority. He also repaired the walls of Jerusalem (I Macc. 16:23). The civil war which broke out in Syria in 125 B.C. and a succession of Syrian kings from whom, for one reason or another, he had nothing to fear, enabled John to maintain his independence without difficulty. He favored the Pharisees at the first, but when they unreasonably clamored for his resignation of the high priesthood, he went over to the Sadducees. With his death in 105 B.C. the power of the Maccabees and, with it, of Israel rapidly waned. See MACCABEE.

5. John the Baptist. The immediate forerunner of Jesus, whose way he was sent to prepare. John was born of godly parents, and was of full priestly descent, both his father Zacharias and his mother Elisabeth being descendants of Aaron (Luke 1:5). At the same time Elisabeth, the Levite, was cousin to the Virgin Mary, who belonged to the tribe of Judah (v. 36). The residence of John's parents was at a town in the hill country of Judea (v. 39), perhaps Juttah or the priestly city of Hebron. When Zacharias, in the performance of his priestly duties, was burning incense in the Temple at Jerusalem, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, promised that he should become the father of a son, directed that the child should be named John and be brought up as a Nazirite, like Samson and Samuel, and foretold that he should be filled with the Holy Spirit from birth and prepare the people for the Lord (Luke 1:8-17). John was born in the year 5 B.C. He spent his early years in seclusion in the wilderness near his home, w. of the Dead Sea (v. 80). In A.D. 26 he appeared as a preacher in the wilderness adjoining the Jordan. His ministry is believed to have been exercised during a Sabbatic year (ch. 3:1, 2), in which the people were relieved of labor in the fields and had leisure to attend John's preaching. He came to announce a new dispensation, proclaiming the advent of the Kingdom of God and the baptism of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 3:2, 11), to prepare the people in intellect and heart for the reception of Christ (vs. 3, 8), to point out the Christ in the person of Jesus (John 1:15), and to show the union of the 2 dispensations in the Christ, as the Lamb of God (vs. 29, 36). He addressed himself with great earnestness and plainness of speech to the immense multitudes who repaired to him from all quarters. He urged the necessity of immediate and sincere repentance, the special reason assigned being that the Kingdom of heaven was at hand. The penitents, after confessing their sins, were baptized by John in the Jordan; and he became distinguished from others of the name by being called the Baptist. The baptism by water which he administered typified cleansing from sin. He did not regard it as enough, but directed his hearers to One who should come after him, whose shoe-latchet he was not worthy to unloose, and who would baptize them with the Holy Ghost and fire (Matt. 3:5-12). Notwithstanding this confession of inferiority to Jesus, our Lord sought baptism at John's hands. John remonstrated, which shows that he knew Jesus to be the Messiah; but he obeyed, for he recognized his own subordinate position (vs. 13-17). He knew Jesus from the teaching of his parents, and the correctness of this information was confirmed to him by the visible descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus at his baptism. By this sign he was authorized to declare Jesus to be the Christ (John 1:32, 33). Malachi had foretold the appearance of Elijah, the prophet, before the great and terrible day of the Lord, to turn the heart of the fathers to the children and the heart of the children to their fathers. John denied that he was Elijah in person (John 1:21); he defined his own mission and characteristics by simply quoting Isa. 40:3. But John came in the spirit and power of Elijah (cf. Mal. 4:5, 6; Luke 1:17), he was the messenger sent to prepare the way before Christ (cf. Mal. 3:1; Mark 1:2), and Jesus applied these predictions to John (Matt. 11:10, 14; 17:12, 13). There was a resemblance between the 2 men also in their cheap and coarse attire, which they wore to symbolize the renouncement of ease and luxury, and in their blunt manners, which rendered them fitter for the wilderness than for kings' courts (cf. II Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4; 11:8; Mark 1:6). John had said of Jesus, "He must increase, but I must decrease"; and without jealousy he saw the fulfillment of his prediction (John 3:25-30). His public ministry was short, but his popular success was immense. At length, toward the close of A.D. 27 or in the early part of 28, having with his usual fidelity reproved Herod the tetrarch for living in sin with his brother Philip's wife, he was committed to prison (Luke 3:19, 20). While there, perplexed and impatient at Christ's method of developing his work, and perhaps feeling that he was forgotten while others were helped, he sent 2 of his disciples to ask if Jesus were the promised Messiah. In reply Jesus pointed to his works. When the 2 disciples departed, Jesus took the opportunity of passing a high panegyric on John (Matt. 11:2-15). John was the greatest of the prophets in that he was privileged to prepare the people for the Christ's appearance and to point out the Christ to them. The vindictiveness of the adulteress Herodias caused John's death. She persuaded her daughter, who had pleased Herod by her dancing, to ask the head of the Baptist. It was given her, and the headless body was soon afterward removed by John's disciples and buried. Finding their master gone, they remembered his testimony to the Lamb of God, and became disciples of Jesus (Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6:16-29; Luke 3:19, 20). Josephus attributes the death of John the Baptist to Herod's jealousy of his great influence with the people. He says also that the destruction of Herod's army in the war with Aretas, which soon after occurred, was generally considered a divine judgment on the tetrarch for the murder of John. Josephus makes the place of the Baptist's imprisonment and death the fort of Machaerus (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 2). Machaerus, now called Mekaur (Mukawer), is situated in the mountains on the e. side of the Dead Sea, about 5 miles n. of the Arnon, and on the top of a conical hill 3,800 feet above the Dead Sea. The wall of circumvallation of the old stronghold still remains clearly traceable, while inside are a deep well and 2 dungeons. One of the latter may have been the prison in which John was confined.

6. Father of the Apostle Peter (John 1:42; 21:15-17, both R.V.). He is called Jonah in Matt. 16:17, R.V. See JONAH 2.

7. John the apostle. A son of Zebedee, and brother of that James who suffered martyrdom under Herod Agrippa I (Matt. 4:21; Acts 12:1, 2). It is reasonably inferred that he was younger than James, and that his mother was named Salome and was sister to the mother of Jesus; see JAMES 1. His father was a master fisherman on the Sea of Galilee, and his 2 sons aided him in his occupation (Mark 1:19, 20). John had attended the preaching of the Baptist at the Jordan, and was evidently the unnamed disciple with Andrew to whom John the Baptist pointed out Jesus as the Lamb of God (John 1:35-40). He doubtless accompanied Jesus back to Galilee, and attended the wedding at Cana (ch. 2:1-11). But he had not been summoned yet to permanent fellowship with Jesus, and he resumed his work on the lake, sometimes together with his brother in partnership with Peter (Luke 5:10).

From their business Jesus called James and John to follow him (Matt. 4:21, 22; Mark 1:19, 20). Later they were appointed apostles (Matt. 10:2). Jesus named them Boanerges, sons of thunder (Mark 3:17), evidently because of their vehemence. The impetuosity of their natural temperament, not yet fully chastened by grace, was shown when John rebuked one who cast out demons in Christ's name, but did not follow Christ in the company of the disciples (Luke 9:49); and when, finding their Master rejected in a Samaritan village, they wished to call down fire from heaven on the inhabitants (vs. 52-56). They showed selfishness once in joining with their mother to ask for the places of honor beside Jesus in his future kingdom; but at the same time their zeal was manifested, for they declared themselves ready to face death for him (Matt. 20:20-24; Mark 10:35-41). But the natural defects of their character were overcome, and their very vehemence, chastened by grace, became an element of strength and a glory.

John was a man of deep spiritual insight and loving disposition, and in consequence he was the disciple whom Jesus peculiarly loved. He was one of the three apostles whom Jesus chose to be with him at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark 5:37; Luke 8:51), at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:28), and at the agony in the Garden (Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33). At the Last Supper he occupied the place next to Jesus at the table (John 13:23). He followed Jesus from Gethsemane into the palace of the high priest, to whom he was known, and to the place of crucifixion; and on the cross Jesus commended his mother Mary to John's loving care, and he accepted the trust (ch. 18:15; 19:27). When the tomb of Christ was reported to him to be empty, he ran with Peter to the sepulcher to investigate, and learned by what he saw that Christ had risen (ch. 20:1-10). With the other disciples he saw the risen Christ the same evening and again a week later (Luke 24:33-43; John 20:19-30; I Cor. 15:5), and like them John went to Galilee, as Jesus had directed, and again saw the Lord (Matt. 26:32; 28:10, 16; John 21:1-7). While there, through a misunderstanding of an utterance of Jesus, the idea got abroad among the brethren that John was not to die (John 21:22).

After the ascension, he abode for some time with the ten other apostles in an upper room at Jerusalem (Acts 1:13), and after Pentecost he became Peter's colleague in active missionary work (ch. 3:1). Both were imprisoned by the Jewish authorities, and witnessed a good confession (ch. 4:19). Both were sent by their fellow apostles to Samaria to aid in the work begun by Philip (ch. 8:14). John was one of the apostles who remained in Jerusalem during the persecutions that soon assailed the infant Church, and he was still there, a pillar of strength, when Paul visited the city after his First Missionary Journey (Acts 15:6; Gal. 2:9). Five books of the N.T. are ascribed to him—the Fourth Gospel, 3 Epistles, and The Revelation. In the title of the last-named work the author is called John. Tradition fixes on Ephesus as the scene of his later ministrations, and it is probable that the 7 churches of Asia enjoyed his care (Rev. 1:11). When he penned The Revelation, probably c. A.D. 95, he was in the island of Patmos, an exile for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus (Rev. 1:9). The accession of Nerva (96) is said to have freed him from danger and enabled him to return to Ephesus. Polycarp, Papias, and Ignatius were his pupils. Polycarp's disciple Irenaeus states that he continued to reside at Ephesus until his death in the reign of Trajan (98-117).

8. John Mark. Mark the Evangelist. Mark, however, was only the surname; John was the proper, and probably the earlier, name (Acts 12:12, 25). See MARK.

9. A Jewish dignitary who took part with Annas, Caiaphas, Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest, which perhaps he was himself, in calling the Apostles Peter and John to account for their preaching (Acts 4:6).

John (jōn), The Epistles of. THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN is evidently by the author of the Fourth Gospel. For his identity, see JOHN, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. The same characteristic phraseology is found in both works and the same way of constructing sentences. Both were evidently sent primarily to the same churches. This epistle bears none of the usual marks of a Greek letter: it lacks the author's name, its destination, the usual greetings at the end. Accordingly some scholars have called it a homily, but it is essentially a letter which was directed to the congregations of the province of Asia.

The opening words of the epistle suggest at once the Gospel's prologue, and parallels between the 2 books may be found in nearly every verse of the epistle. The epistle, moreover, has in view the world as the antagonist of the Church and the field of its operations (I John 2:2, 15-26; 4:3-5; 5:4, 5, 19), and warns against Antichrist and heresies which struck at the integrity of Christ's person. The writer probably had in mind a Gnostic movement which represented a Docetic Christology, i.e., that Christ had no real material body, but only an apparent body, or phantom. Thus chs. 1:1-3; 2:22; 4:1-3 seem to be a polemic against Docetism. Together with this heresy went an ethical view which divided the firm bond between Christian faith and life, between piety and morality. The epistle seeks to apply to Christian life the truth whose historical revelation is recorded in the Gospel. The writer was one of those who had lived in personal contact with Christ (chs. 1:1-3, 5; 4:14) and writes in an authoritative manner (chs. 1:4; 2:1; 4:6, 14). How deeply he had absorbed the teaching of his Lord is proved by the similarity of phraseology and thought between the epistle and Christ's discourses in the Gospel. The Johannine authorship of the epistle is vouched for by Irenaeus and the Muratori Fragment; while earlier quotations by Polycarp, Papias, etc., prove its use in the Church in the early part of the 2d century.

Its train of thought may be outlined as follows: After the introduction (ch. 1:1-4), in which John declares the purpose of his ministry to be the declaration to men of the manifestation of the life-giving, divine Word, in order that they may have joyful fellowship in Him with the original apostles, he teaches that the character of God, as learned from Christ, must determine the character of the Christian's inward and outward life (chs. 1:5 to 2:6); hence he urges his readers to love the brethren, and warns against love of the world and heretical teaching (ch. 2:7-27). He next insists (chs. 2:28 to 3:24) on the necessity of doing righteousness, and so of abiding in God, in view of the coming Second Advent of Christ; since at its divine sonship will be fully manifested and that sonship is distinguished by obedience and love. Then he reminds his readers (ch. 4) that the test of having the Spirit of God is to be found in the true confession of Christ as the incarnate Son of God, in adherence to apostolic teaching, and in love; and that right faith in Jesus is the condition of the whole spiritual life of love (ch. 5:1-12); I John 5:7, A.V., is a spurious interpolation deriving from Latin authors of the 5th century; no Greek MS. earlier than the 15th century and no independent Greek father has these words. In the conclusion (ch. 5:13-21) he tersely summarizes the purpose of the epistle as intended to confirm them in faith and communion with God, and solemnly recites the historical and spiritual facts on which their eternal life steadfastly reposes.

It can hardly be determined whether the epistle was written before or after the Gospel. It seems certain, however, that the epistle is close to the time and place of the Gospel.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN. This is written in the form of a Hellenistic private letter and contains just the number of words (as does III John likewise) which could conveniently be written on a single sheet of papyrus. Quite in accord with the reserve shown by the Apostle John, the author of the Second Epistle calls himself "the elder," a designation used by Peter of himself (I Peter 5:1) and given by Papias to all the apostles. The author writes to "the elect lady and her children," expressing his joy at the Christian life of her children and warning her against heretical teachers, as in I John. The brevity of the epistle easily explains the paucity of references to it in the earliest writers. In fact, the external evidence is larger than would be expected. The most ancient historical testimony ascribes the epistle to the Apostle John. Clement of Alexandria was acquainted with at least one shorter epistle by the apostle, and Irenaeus quotes II John 11 as coming from John the disciple of the Lord. Moreover, the Johannine authorship is abunddantly proved by the remarkable coincidences of language and thought with I John, and no motive can be imagined for its forgery.

It is generally supposed that by "the elect lady and her children" is meant a church and its spiritual children. Some consider her an individual named Kyria (Gr. for lady). It may perhaps seem strange that the writer feels it necessary to exhort the lady "that we love one another" (v. 5; cf. also 2d person plural in vs. 9, 10). If the lady is the church, the exhortation is natural. The children of the elect sister (v. 13) accordingly would be the members of a sister church.

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN. This too is in the form of a Hellenistic private letter. Another brief letter addressed by "the elder" to Gaius the well-beloved, expressing joy at the hospitality to the brethren which Gaius had shown, and urging his friend to continue to imitate that which is good. Reference is also made to a certain Diotrophes who had opposed the writer; and on the other hand to a Demetrius who is praised. It is impossible to identify this Gaius with any of that name mentioned in the N.T.; see GAIVS 3. He appears to have been a prominent man in one of the churches of Asia, but not an officer of the church. This epistle is remarkably like the first and second in style and thought, and there is no reason to doubt that the three were by the same writer. See JOHN, THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO.

All John's epistles, with those of James, Peter, and Jude, are frequently included in the number of the so-called "catholic" or "general" epistles, i.e., those addressed not to particular churches or persons, but to large or many communities. I John was no doubt sent to the churches of Asia, among which the Fourth Gospel was first issued. To II and III John, however, this title does not apply, nor are they styled "general" in A.V. or R.V. They were probably placed among the "general" epistles simply because, being brief, they were attached to I John. G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

John (jōn), The Rev'e'l'ation of. See REVELATION.

John (jōn), The Gos'pel Ac'cord'ing to. Like the other Gospels the Fourth does not mention the writer's name, but both internal and external considerations lend some support to the traditional belief that the work was written by the Apostle John.

I. Internal evidence. 1. The writer was one of the apostles. This appears from his use of the 1st person plural (ch. 1:14 and perhaps ch. 21:24) and from many items of minute description, especially concerning the impression made on the disciples by events in Christ's life, etc. (chs. 1:37; 2:11, 17; 4:27, 54; 9:2; 11:8-16; 12:4-6, 21, 22; 13:23-26; 18:15; 19:26, 27, 35; 20:8), and from the explicit statement in ch. 21:24. 2. He mentions a "disciple whom Jesus loved" (chs. 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20, 21), who, in ch. 21:24, is said to be the author. All the apostles, however, are mentioned by name in the book except Matthew, James the son of Alphaeus, Simon Zebedee, and the sons of Zebedee. The 3 former did not belong to the narrower circle of intimate disciples, to one of whom this title would alone be applicable, and James the son of Zebedee died early (Acts 12:2). John, therefore, alone remains. 3. That the writer was a Jew is proved incontestably by the strongly Aramaic character of his style in writing Greek. 4. He shows intimate acquaintance with the geography, history, and customs of the Jews during Christ's ministry (e.g., chs. 1:21, 28, 46; 2:6; 3:23; 4:5, 27, R.V.; 5:2, 3; 7:40-52; 9:7; 10:22, 23; 11:18; 18:28; 19:31), and his book gives more personal details than the Gospels. The internal evidence thus harmonizes strikingly with the tradition of Johannine authorship.

II. External evidence is of two kinds: (a) explicit mention of authorship and (b) implicit high regard for the Fourth Gospel shown by the use made of it in early documents. Irenaeus (bishop of Lyons c. 185), a disciple of Polycarp, who in turn had been a disciple of John, is explicit in his statement that John wrote this Gospel in Ephesus after the other Gospels had been issued. At the end of the 2d century and beginning of the 3d, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen bear witness to the same tradition.

The 2d type of external evidence attests the existence of the Fourth Gospel and the high regard in which it was held. The Didache (c. 110) seems to be indebted for some of its phrases to Johannine terminology. The Ignatian epistles (not later than 117) show that the Gospel was familiar and authoritative to Ignatius and probably as well to the churches of Asia Minor at the beginning of the 2d century. The earliest known fragment of any part of the N.T. is part of a leaf of a papyrus codex (dated paleographically c. 125), which bears a few verses of John, ch. 18. Inasmuch as the fragment was found in Egypt, it furnishes tangible evidence to the early and widespread dissemination of the Fourth Gospel. In addition, another papyrus fragment (dating from c. 150), relating incidents in the life of Jesus, uses the Fourth Gospel as one of its sources. Justin Martyr (c. 150) very likely alludes to it, and evidently considered it one of "the memoirs of the apostles," which he says were called Gospels and were written by the apostles and their companions. The apocryphal Gospel of Peter and Acts of John (both c. 150) show clear traces of the Johannine thought forms. Tatian's Diatessaron (c. 170) was a harmony of the same 4 Gospels that are recognized as canonical today. The Sinaitic MS. of the Old Syriac Gospels indicates that in the 2d century the Syrian Church accepted our four Gospels. Finally, it is certain that even the earliest Gnostic heretics of the 2d century (e.g. Basilides c. 120-140, Heracleon c. 160-180, and perhaps Valentinus c. 140-160) quoted and even commented upon the Fourth Gospel. Thus external evidence seems to confirm the impression given by internal evidence regarding the Apostle John as the author, and it indicates furthermore over how wide a geographic area the Fourth Gospel was received as authoritative in the early postapostolic Church.

It must be stated, however, that many scholars today do not feel the cogency of the above reasoning. They believe that the author of the Fourth Gospel was distinct from John the apostle, who was the witness to whose testimony the author and his followers appeal (John 19:35; 21:24). The Evangelist (the author proper) was, according to these scholars, a disciple and follower of John the son of Zebedee (the apostle), and wrote from the reminiscences and teaching of his master, an eyewitness. His name is either unknown to us or, more likely, was John the Presbyter or Elder (cf. II John 1 and III John 1). Thus, though the Apostle John was responsible for the Gospel, it was actually written by the pen of another; it is according to this view "the Gospel of John the Elder according to John the apostle."

No more likely explanation of the Fourth Gospel has been found than that it emanated from the Apostle John. Whether the Fourth Gospel was written directly or indirectly by John the apostle, evidence points to its composition in Asia Minor (tradition says Ephesus) in the last quarter of the 1st century. The opponents of Jesus are called simply the Jews (chs. 1:19; 2:18; 5:10; 7:15, etc.), explanations are given about the Jewish feasts (chs. 6:4; 7:2; 11:55; 19:31), the Sea of Galilee is explained by its Gentile name, Sea of Tiberias (ch. 6:1), and the designation in the prologue of Christ as the Word of God points to a period when Christianity was confronted with such philosophical tendencies as we know existed in Asia Minor. This explains also the apparent purpose of the book. It was to give Christ's testimony to himself as the incarnate Son of God and Saviour of the world (ch. 20:30, 31). The author assumes that his readers are acquainted with many of the incidents that are recorded in the Synoptic Gospels; see GOSPEL. They had not given those great discourses of the Lord, in which he had replied to the attacks of the Jews upon his divine claims or had unfolded to his disciples the mysteries of his being and their spiritual relations to himself. This self-testimony of Jesus John determined to set down, especially since heresies had risen which denied some aspects of the person of Christ. With this he combined also, as was natural, many items of personal reminiscence. The result was to provide the Church with a complete portrayal of her divine-human Lord.

John's Gospel begins with a prologue (ch. 1:1-18), in which the apostle summarizes the great truth about to be shown in the life of Christ, viz. the existence of a 2d divine Person whose office it is to reveal God and who is, therefore, called the Word, who, besides being the universal source of life and light to creation, became incarnate as Jesus Christ, and thus to those who believed revealed God and imparted salvation. He then relates: 1. The opening testimonies to Jesus given by John the Baptist and by Jesus himself to his first disciples (chs. 1:19 to 2:11). 2. Christ's revelation of himself in a series of acts and, still more, of discourses addressed to inquirers or to his adversaries (chs. 2:12 to 12:50). This includes (a) his testimony at his first pass-over (ch. 2:12-25), and the discourse with Nicodemus (ch. 3:1-21), together with the renewed testimony of the Baptist (vs. 22-36); (b) the conversation with the woman of Samaria (ch. 4:1-42); (c) the 2d miracle in Galilee (vs. 43-54); (d) Christ's defense to the Jews of his divine dignity and authority (ch. 5); (e) his presentation of himself as the bread of life (ch. 6); (f) his renewed defense of his authority and dignity at the feast of tabernacles (chs. 7; 8) [NOTE: In all but one of the oldest MSS. chs. 7:53 to 8:11 is omitted and in others it is marked as doubtful, or assigned to a different place or to another Gospel altogether. It is to be regarded as a stray fragment of trustworthy tradition which the Church was unwilling to lose.]; (g) the healing of the blind man and parable of the Good Shepherd (chs. 9:1 to 10:21); (h) Christ's final testimony to the Jews (vs. 22-42); (i) the raising of Lazarus and its consequences (ch. 11); (k) the testimony given at Bethany, in the triumphal entry, and at the visit of the Greeks (ch. 12). 3. Christ's revelation of himself in connection with his death and resurrection (chs. 13:1 to 21:25). This includes (a) his last discourses with his disciples (chs. 13 to 17); (b) his arrest, trial, and crucifixion, in which he bore witness, particularly before Pilate, to his person and work (chs. 18; 19); (c) his resurrection and certain testimonies connected with it (chs. 20; 21; ch. 21 is evidently an addition by the author to his work, which was originally intended to close with ch. 20). The result is to show that in the human Jesus there was the eternal Son of God, who by his person, teaching, and redeeming work has revealed God and secured eternal life to those who receive him. John thus represents the mission of Jesus as the climax of God's self-revelation and as the procurement for believers of that light which consists in knowledge of the highest truth and of that life which consists in spiritual union with God, which together constitute the perfect good and the everlasting salvation. "These [things]," he says, "are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name" (ch. 20:31).

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Joi'a-da (joi'a-dā) [Jehovah has known].

1. A son of Paseah, who repaired a gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6; in A.V. Jehoiada).

2. A high priest, great-grandson of Jeshua (Neh. 12:10). One of his sons married a daughter of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and for thus defiling the priesthood was expelled, probably from Jerusalem, by Nehemiah (ch. 13:28).

Joi'a-kim (joi'a-kīm) [Jehovah raises up, establishes]. A high priest, son of Jeshua (Neh. 12:10, 12, 21-26), in the reign of [Artaxerxes (Jos. Antiq. xi. 5, 1).

Joi'a-rib (joi'a-rib) or Jehoi'a-rib [Jehovah pleads, contends]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. See JEHOIARIB.

2. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6, 7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (v. 19; cf. I Macc. 2:1, Joarib being the Greek form).

3. A man of understanding who was returning from Babylon with Ezra and was sent with others from the encampment on the river of Ahava to secure Levites and Nethinim for the service of the Temple (Ezra 8:16, 17).

4. A man of Judah, descended from a certain Zechariah (Neh. 11:5).

Jok'de'am (jōk'dē-ām). A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:56). It may be Khirbet Raka', between Yafta and Tell Zif.

Jo'kim (jō'kīm) [see JOIAKIM]. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (I Chron. 4:22).

Jok'me'am (jōk'mē-ām) [let the people arise]. A town of Ephraim (I Chron. 6:68), apparently near Abel-meholah (I Kings 4:12, where A.V., contrary to the Hebrew text, calls it Jokneam). The Kohathite Levites were given residence in it (I Chron. 6:66, 68). Instead of this town, Kibzaim is given in Josh. 21:22, and is commonly believed to be another name of the same place.

Jok'ne'am (jōk'nē-ām) [perhaps, let the people acquire]. 1. A town on or near Mount Carmel (Josh. 12:22). The boundary line of the tribe of Zebulun extended to the river that is before Jokneam (ch. 19:11). It was given with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (ch. 21:34). It is identified with Tell Ka'imūn, probably the Cyamon of Judith 7:3, on the s. margin of the Plain of Esdraelon, on the slopes of Carmel, a little s. of the Kishon, and about 15 miles n.w. by w. of Jezreel; it lies on the modern route from Jenin to Haifa.

2. A place mentioned in A.V. of I Kings 4:12; but see JOKMEAM.

Jok'shan (jōk'shān). A tribe and its progenitor descended from Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:1, 2). From Jokshan sprang Sheba and Dedan (v. 3). Exact place of settlement unknown.

Jok'tan (jōk'tān) [cf. Arab. wakaṭa, to beat unmercifully]. A person or rather tribe descended from Shem through Eber and from whom 13 tribes of Arabia sprang (Gen. 10:25, 29; I Chron. 1:19-23).

Jok'the-el (jōk'thē-ēl). 1. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:33, 38).

2. A name given by Amaziah, king of Judah, to Sela, now Petra, when he had taken it in war (II Kings 14:7, R.V.).

Jon'a-dab (jōn'á-dāb) and Jehon'a-dab [Jehovah is bounteous]. 1. Son of David's brother Shimeah (II Sam. 13:3).

2. A son of Rechab, the Kenite (Jer. 35:6; cf. I Chron. 2:55). He became head of the tribe and gave character to it by his rule requiring his people to dwell in tents, refrain from agriculture, and abstain from wine (Jer. 35:6, 7) in order to preserve primitive simplicity of manners. Jehu, finding that Jonadab sympathized with his work of suppressing Baal worship, took him to Samaria, where he aided Jehu in putting out of Baal's temple all who were not priests of that god, in preparation for the massacre which was to ensue (II Kings 10:15, 23).

Jo'nah (jō'ná), in A.V. of N.T. Jo'nas, twice Jo'na, the Greek genitive case (Matt. 16:17; John 1:42) [a dove]. 1. A prophet of Israel, a son of Amittai, and citizen of Gath-hepher in Galilee, who before the close of the reign of Jeroboam II foretold Israel's recovery of its borders from the entering of Hamath to the sea of the plain (II Kings 14:25; Jonah 1:1).

The Book of Jonah is the 5th in order of the Minor Prophets. It differs from the other prophetic books in stressing the biographical element. It may be divided into 3 sections:

I. Jonah's disobedience (ch. 1). He was bidden to go to Nineveh and cry against it, but he was unwilling to go. Accordingly he took ship at Joppa to flee to Tarshish. A great storm arose. The ship was in danger. At length the sailors cast lots to ascertain on whose account the storm had been sent. The lot fell upon Jonah. He told them that he was a worshiper of Jehovah and that, if they would cast him overboard, the sea would become calm. They reluctantly obeyed. The sea became quiet, and the prophet, who had disappeared in the depths, was swallowed by a great fish which the Lord had prepared.

II. Jonah's prayer (ch. 2). Surprised at finding himself alive in the midst of the sea, the prophet gave thanks to God for his present escape from death and gratefully expressed the hope of ultimate deliverance. The fish at length vomited him upon the dry land.

III. Jonah's message and its results (chs. 3; 4). Bidden a 2d time to go to Nineveh, he obeyed and delivered his message. The Ninevites publicly repented and God spared the city. At this Jonah was displeased; not that his prophecy had been nullified by the repentance of the people, for he and his hearers expected that it would be (chs. 3:9; 4:2), but probably because he felt that with the sparing of Nineveh the doom of his own country was sealed. By the withering of a gourd, however, the Lord taught him the lesson of divine compassion on man and beast generally, irrespective of man's relation to the Church.

The motive that led Jonah to flee was probably a narrow and mistaken patriotism. He feared that Nineveh would repent and that God in his mercy would spare the city. Jonah wished Nineveh to perish (ch. 4:2, 4, 11); for it was a powerful foe of Israel and, if it were not destroyed, the doom of Israel was sealed.

The purpose of the book is primarily to teach that God's purposes of grace are not limited to the children of Abraham, but the Gentiles can receive mercy while still outside the pale of Israel's law. But besides this great lesson the Book of Jonah affords illustrations of truth, which from their nature may perhaps even be regarded as types teaching truth.

a. Nineveh repented at the preaching of one prophet; whereas Israel repented not, although many prophets were sent to it (cf. Matt. 12:41). This seems to be a type, to be related to and look forward to a general truth—that the Gentiles yield a readier acquiescence to the doctrines of God than Israel had done, acquiescing not more readily to the moral law indeed, but to the revelation of God as a whole; for example, to his method of salvation as outlined in Hosea, ch. 14 (cf. Isa. 2:2-4 with v. 5).

b. Jonah, an Israelite and God's servant sent to preach to the Gentiles, is an evidence of God's will that the people of God's kingdom shall lead the Gentiles to repentance and to God. Jonah was not the only Israelite in whom this truth was exemplified: Elijah was sent to a woman of Zarephath (I Kings, ch. 17), Elisha cured Naaman the Syrian (II

Flowers and Huge Leaves of the Palma Christi (Ricinus communis), Believed by Many to Be the "Gourd" of Jonah 4: 6

Kings, ch. 5), Christ talked to a woman of Samaria about the things of God and healed the daughter of a Syrophenician woman (Mark, ch. 7; John, ch. 4).

c. Jonah, an Israelite and God's servant fleeing from duty, is cast into the sea, but is delivered in order that he may fulfill his mission. This incident accordingly received an allegorical interpretation: Jonah symbolizes the nation Israel. Israel, as a nation, had been chosen to be a witness and upholder of divine truth, but Israel often apostatized and failed to execute its mission. It was in consequence swallowed up in the Exile by Babylon (cf. Jer. 51:34) as was Jonah by the fish. In exile, however, the nation like Jonah (Jonah, ch. 2) sought the Lord. There followed a return from the Exile; in other words, the nation was disgorged (cf. Jer. 51:44) as was Jonah (ch. 2:10). Upon the Return from Babylon, many Jews were disappointed that the judgment uttered by the prophets did not at once take effect, just as Jonah was displeased that God spared Nineveh. But God's purposes will be carried out, and the remnant survived to fulfill Israel's mission to the world (Isa. 42:1-4; 49:1-13; cf. ch. 2:2-4; 11:10).

d. Jonah, an Israelite and God's servant cast into the depths of Sheol and yet brought up alive out of the pit (Jonah 2:2, 6), as a type illustrates the death for sins not his own, and the burial and the resurrection of the Messiah, the representative Israelite and perfect servant of the Lord (Matt. 12:40).

e. The book may be regarded as a great work on foreign missions. It has been observed that The Book of Jonah nowhere claims to have been written by that prophet. It is further urged by critics that the book was written long after Jonah's time, because: 1. In the prayer ascribed to him are some quotations from late psalms (cf. Jonah 2:3 with Ps. 42:7; Jonah 2:5 with Ps. 69:1; Jonah 2:9 with Ps. 50:14). 2. The language contains Aramaic elements and grammatical constructions which are found in the late books. Some of these linguistic features might be compatible with a pre-exilic origin in N. Israel; but taken as a whole, they can be most consistently explained by the supposition that the book is a work of the postexilic period. 3. The failure to give the name of the Assyrian king indicates that it was unknown to the author, but the reference is merely to the ruler as such. Ordinarily, however, the Hebrews spoke of the king who ruled at Nineveh as the king of Assyria, but here he is singularly called the king of Nineveh. 4. From Jonah 3:3b it has been inferred that Nineveh was a thing of the past (the city was destroyed 612 B.C.). 5. It has been assumed that ch. 3:10 reflects the conditional nature of prophecy as taught by Jer. 18:5-12. When a divinely inspired judgment has been proclaimed by a prophet, repentance may avert its fulfillment, but God's mercy in such a case does not make his word of none effect. 6. It has also been suggested that the world-wide point of view of the book and the all-embracing fatherly love of God which has no respect for person or nation reflect the time of a writer who lived in postexilic times.

In view of all these considerations a post-exilic date for the writer of The Book of Jonah seems the more probable. The date of composition has nothing to do with the historicity of Jonah the son of Amittai who prophesied in the reign of Jeroboam II. There is no evidence that Jonah wrote the book which bears his name.

The narrative has been variously regarded as myth, legend, parable, history. The chief interpretations are: 1. The allegorical or parabolical, which was discussed above. This conception of the prophecy is much in vogue, for it avoids the miracle or, if no miracle was involved in the escape of Jonah, the extraordinary nature of the event. 2. The historical. Modern instances have been quoted where a man was saved alive from the stomach of a whale or large fish, but such examples are not in themselves evidence of the historicity of Jonah's adventure. It should also be borne in mind that the spiritual lessons to be derived from the book are far more important than the question whether a large fish could have swallowed Jonah and whether he could have survived 3 days and 3 nights in the belly of the fish. The miraculous element is magnified or minimized according to individual judgment and knowledge. The conception of the narrative as historical has these supports: 1. The form of the book is historical and has left this impression on its readers. 2. Jonah himself was unquestionably a historical personage. 3. While it is conceivable that the words of Christ regarding Jonah in the belly of the fish and at Nineveh do not imply his belief in the events, it is highly probable that they do, especially since Jonah was a real person (Matt. 12:39, 40; Luke 11:29, 30). 4. The narrative was regarded by the Jews as historical (Jos. Antiq. ix. 10, 2). 5. The repentance of the Ninevites is credible. National distress and a low state of the empire would dispose them to listen to a warning from God; the arrival from a foreign country of a strange prophet, of whose peculiar history they may have heard, was calculated to affect them; the Spirit of God works when and where he will. It is urged, indeed, against the historical character of the book that (a) permanent conversion of the Ninevites did not take place. That is quite true, but it is nowhere asserted that it did. The statement merely is that the men of that generation repented under the lead of their king. So the men of Judah in Hezekiah's and Josiah's reigns sanctified themselves under the leadership of those kings. (b) Against the historical character of the book is also urged the size ascribed to Nineveh (Jonah 3:3; 4:11). But see NINEVEH. (c) Also the rapid growth of the gourd or ricinus has been regarded with suspicion (ch. 4:10). Probably the words describe merely the ephemeral character of the plant. From the narrative itself, vs. 6-8, it does not appear that the growth was supernaturally rapid.

There are parallels to Jonah in Buddhist literature. Thus a certain Mittavindaka (Jātaka, 41) was upon a ship, which, after having sailed for 7 days, stood immovable upon the waters. The sailors cast lots, and for 7 successive times Mittavindaka was found guilty; thereupon the crew gave him a raft of reeds upon which he reached land. Another Mittavindaka's guilt (Jātaka, 439) was determined in 3 lots, and in his case the mariners gave him a board on which he reached an island. In both instances, the boat proceeded on its course. According to the Peta-Vatthu (IV, 11) a certain lady journeyed on a ship to Suvannabhūmi. A peta (departed spirit), who lived in a vimāna (a magical palace that floated in the air from place to place at the will of the occupant) stopped the boat on the ocean in order to gain possession of the woman. Three successive lots showed that the lady was the cause of the ship's failure to move, and so she was placed adrift upon a bundle of bamboo rods. The peta took her into his vimāna and in due time left her with her kinsfolk in Pataliputra. Although these tales have a superficial resemblance to the story of Jonah, no connection or borrowing is evident; they merely show community of feeling and action, under similar circumstances, of Hindu and Phoenician mariners.

2. Father of Simon Peter (Matt. 16:17; John 1:42 A.V.; 21:15 A.V.). In R.V. of John Simon's father is called John on the authority of manuscripts. See BAR-JONAH.

Jo'nam (jō'nām), in A.V. Jo'nán (jō'nān) [perhaps a modification of Heb. Yōhānān, Jehovah has been, or is, gracious]. An ancestor of Christ, who lived about two hundred years after David (Luke 3:30).

Jo'nas (jō'nás). See JONAH.

Jōn'a-than (jōn'a-thān) [Jehovah has given]. 1. A Levite, son or remoter descendant of Gershon, son of Moses (Judg. 18:30, R.V.). He was doubtless the Levite who had sojourned at Bethlehem-judah, but had left that town to seek another residence, and, when passing through Ephraim, was hired by Micah to officiate as priest before an image of Jehovah (ch. 17:7-13). But Danites, on their way to found a settlement on the upper Jordan, seized Micah's idol and persuaded the mercenary priest to go with them, promising that he should be the priest, not of a single household, but of a tribe. Thus Jonathan became the first of a line of priests who officiated at the shrine of the stolen idol all the time that the tabernacle was in Shiloh, till the captivity of the land or district (ch. 18:3-6, 14-31). Jonathan had dishonored his descent from Moses, and accordingly the letter nun (n) was inserted in the Hebrew word for Moses, changing it to Manasseh (ch. 18:30, A.V., J.V., R.V. marg.). The inserted letter was not incorporated into the text, but was suspended above the line.

2. Eldest son of King Saul (I Sam. 14:49; cf. 20:31). His father gathered an army of 3,000 men and placed 1,000 of them at Geba under the command of Jonathan, who presently smote the Philistine garrison or deputy at Geba and thus provoked war (ch. 13:3). During its course, attended only by his armor-bearer, he climbed the steep side of the gorge of Michmash to an outpost of the Philistines on its northern brink, and falling boldly upon them slew twenty men. The tumult at the outpost started a panic in the camp, and when Saul came to attack he found Philistines confusedly fighting each other. A rout ensued. Saul pronounced a curse on any who should eat food during the pursuit. Ignorant of the oath, Jonathan, seeing wild honey, ate a little, and for this act his father would have given him up to death. But the people intervened (I Sam. ch. 14). At the time of Goliath's defiance of Israel Jonathan discerned the nobility of David's soul, and loved him forthwith and remained steadfast in friendship for him, even when Saul suggested that David would someday be king in their stead. He kept David informed of the king's moods and purposes, till at length Saul, angered by what he considered Jonathan's unfilial conduct, threw a javelin at him, as he had more than once done at David (chs. 18 to 20). On this occasion Jonathan was seeking to discover whether a reconciliation of Saul with David was possible. David was lying in concealment in the fields waiting for word. The two friends anticipated the difficulty Jonathan might have in conveying this information to David, especially if Saul should show himself of evil mind toward the son of Jesse, for Saul and the party opposed to David would watch Jonathan to prevent him from communicating with David and again frustrating their plans. Accordingly, to disarm suspicion, Jonathan arranged to go out with company, and as though to hunt, and by means of arrows to give a sign to David. He did so, and then, finding that suspicion had been allayed and that he was no longer observed, he sent the boy back to the town with the bow and arrows, and remained for a final interview with David. The two friends met once after this in the wood of Ziph (I Sam. 23:16-18). Jonathan was killed, with two of his brothers and their father, at the battle of Gilboa, and his bones, like theirs, were affixed to the wall of Beth-shean, till the men of Jabesh-gilead removed them and gave them honorable burial (I Sam. 31:1, 11-13; I Chron. 10:2, 8-12). David deeply lamented his death (II Sam. 1:17-27). Jonathan left one son, called Mephibosheth and Merib-baal, who was lame (II Sam. 4:4). David showed him kindness for Jonathan's sake, and the line of his descendants is traceable for several generations in increasing numbers, as if all danger of its extinction had passed away (II Sam., ch. 9; I Chron. 8:33-40; 9:39-44).

3. Uncle of King David. He was a counselor, a man of understanding, and a scribe (I Chron. 27:32). Some expositors believe that in this passage the Hebrew word for uncle is used in a general sense for relation, and they identify this counselor with David's nephew Jonathan (R.V. marg.).

4. Son of the high priest Abiathar. He was one of two young men who concealed themselves at En-rogel, near Jerusalem, during Absalom's rebellion, and sent David information of everything passing in the city (II Sam. 15:36; 17:15-22). When Adonijah attempted to usurp the throne and was celebrating a feast, Jonathan brought the news that Solomon had been proclaimed king, a piece of intelligence which led to the breaking up of the assemblage (I Kings 1:41-49).

5. A son of David's brother Shimej, and distinguished as the slayer of one of the gigantic men of Gath (II Sam. 21:21, 22).

6. One of David's mighty men, son of Shagee or, rather, Shammah the Hararite (I Chron. 11:34; cf. II Sam. 23:11). The text of II Sam. 23:32, 33 is to be emended by comparison with Chronicles.

7. An official under David (I Chron. 27:25). See JEHOANATHAN.

8. A son of Kareah. After the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, he placed himself under the protection of Gedaliah (Jer. 40:8). The name is not found in the corresponding passage (II Kings 25:23).

9. A scribe, in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer. 37:15, 20).

10. A son of Jada (I Chron. 2:32).

11. A descendant of Adin (Ezra 8:6).

12. An opponent of Ezra's proposal that foreign wives should be put away (Ezra. 10:15, R.V.).

13. A Levite of the lineage of Asaph (Neh. 12:35; cf. ch. 11:15, 17).

14. A priest, head of a father's house in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

15. A high priest, son of Joiada (Neh. 12:11). See JOHANAN 11.

16. Youngest son of the priest Mattathias (I Macc. 2:5). When his brother Judas Macabaeus was slain in battle in 161 B.C., Jonathan was chosen his successor (ch. 9:23-31). The forces at his disposal were, however, too few for offensive operations against the Syrians, and he withdrew into the wilderness of Tekoa (v. 33). He was surnamed Apphus (ch. 2:5), which is thought by some to mean Dissembler, and to have been given him on account of his first exploit, in which he laid an ambush for the children of Jambri and slew them because they had killed his brother John (ch. 9:37-41). On a Sabbath Day in c. 161 B.C. he repulsed an attack of the Syrians under Bacchides on the Jordan, probably on the e. bank; but after the victory he and his followers leaped into the river and swam to the other side (ch. 9:43-48), where they remained (v. 58), outwitting the attempts which were made to assassinate their leader (vs. 60, 61). Jonathan and Simon afterward fortified themselves at Bethbasi in the wilderness, probably of Tekoa; and when Bacchides besieged the fortress, Jonathan left Simon to defend the place, while he himself ravaged the surrounding country (vs. 62, 66). Bacchides was so straitened that he made peace with Jonathan and withdrew from Judea (vs. 67-72). Jonathan took up his residence at Michmash, and began to judge the people (v. 73). When Alexander Balas revolted against Demetrius, king of Syria, the latter hastened to secure Jonathan as an ally, and gave him authority to gather troops. The Syrians who were still in the strongholds of Judea fled, and Jonathan entered Jerusalem in 153 B.C. (ch. 10:1-14). Alexander, equally desirous to have the support of Jonathan, appointed him high priest of the Jews and king's friend, and Jonathan put on the pontifical robes at the feast of tabernacles in 153 B.C. (vs. 15-21). Upon hearing of this event, Demetrius hastened to make further concessions to the Jews (vs. 22-45). Jonathan, however, gave no credence to the words of Demetrius; and Alexander, when he secured the throne of Syria in 150 B.C., appointed him governor of Judea (vs. 46, 59-66). In 148-147 B.C. Demetrius II raised the standard of revolt against Alexander. Demetrius was assisted by Apollonius, who sent a threatening message to Jonathan. Jonathan seized Joppa and defeated Apollonius in the neighboring plain (vs. 67-87). When Alexander's father-in-law, Ptolemy, intervened in the war, Jonathan showed his friendship and accompanied him to the borders of Syria (ch. 11:1-7). Ptolemy proved treacherous to Alexander and placed Demetrius on the throne. Jonathan was able to secure the friendship of the new king, and rendered him great service by a contingent of 3,000 Jewish soldiers, who quelled an insurrection against Demetrius in Antioch. Demetrius proved false, and Jonathan sided with the young Antiochus and fought successfully with the troops of Demetrius near Kadesh in Galilee. Jonathan now sought the aid of the Romans and Spartans (ch. 12:1, 2); he also undertook aggressive operations against Demetrius, and defeated his troops and allies in the vicinity of Hamath (vs. 24-35). But Tryphon, who had championed the cause of the young Antiochus, now lifted up his hand against his master and sought to destroy Jonathan also. He persuaded the Jewish leader to come with but a small bodyguard to Ptolemais. When Jonathan entered, the gates of the city were closed, Jonathan's escort was put to the sword, he himself was seized and kept for a time a prisoner and finally slain in Gilead in 143 B.C. (chs. 12:39-48; 13:12-23). The bones of Jonathan were recovered and buried in the family sepulcher at Modin (ch. 13:25-27).

17. A general who, at the command of Simon Maccabaeus, took possession of Joppa. He was a son of Absalom (I Macc. 13:11).

Jo'nath e'lem re-ho'kim (jō'nāth ē'lēm rē-hō'kim), in A.V. Jo'nath-e'lem-re-cho'kim (jō'nāth-ē'lēm-rē-kō'kim) [the silent dove of them that are afar off or, by reading the middle word, in Heb. 'ēlīm instead of 'elem, the dove of the distant terebinths]. Probably the tune to which Psalm 56 was to be set (Psalm 56, title).

Jop'pa (jōp'pā), in A.V. once Ja'pho (Josh. 19:46), and so twice in R.V. marg. of O.T., this being the Heb. form, while Joppa is derived from the Greek [beauty]. An ancient walled town (mentioned in the list of Thutmose III and in the Amarna letters), assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:46); about 35 miles from Jerusalem, of which it was the seaport, to which timber cut on Lebanon for the building of Solomon's Temple was floated from Tyre (II Chron. 2:16). Jonah embarked at Joppa in a ship about to sail to Tarshish, when he sought to flee from Jehovah (Jonah 1:3). When the Temple was being rebuilt, after the return of the Jews from Babylon, rafts of cedar trees were again floated from Tyre to Joppa (Ezra 3:7, R.V.). In Maccabean times Joppa was garrisoned by the Syrians (I Macc. 10:75). The Jews of the town were induced to go aboard ships, and 200 of them were treacherously drowned. In retribution Judas set fire by night to the docks and boats in the harbor and slew the fugitives (II Macc. 12:3-6). Eventually Simon captured the town, garrisoned it, completed the harbor, and restored the fortifications (I Macc. 12:33, 34; 14:5, 34). The disciple Tabitha, a woman full of good deeds, lived at Joppa. Having died, she was raised to life at the prayer and word of Peter. As a result many believed (Acts 9:36-42). Peter remained at Joppa for some time, lodging with Simon a tanner (v. 43); and thither the servants of Cornelius came to invite Peter to Caesarea (ch. 10:5-48). Joppa, now called Jaffa, is built on a rocky mound 116 feet high at the edge of the sea. A small harbor is formed by a ledge of rocks lying parallel to the shore, but entrance to it from the s. is barred by rocks. The n. end is open but shallow, and the one passage through the reef is but 10 feet wide.

Jo'rah (jō'rā). See HARIPH.

Jo'ra'i (jō'rā-ī). A Gadite (I Chron. 5:13).

Jo'ram (jō'rām), Jeho'ram, the forms interchangeable in Heb. [Jehovah is high]. 1. A son of Toi, king of Hamath, who was sent by his father to congratulate David on his victory over Hadadezer (II Sam. 8:10). Called in I Chron. 18:10 Hadoram, which in this case probably means "the god Addu (Adad) or Hadad is exalted."

A View of Modern Jaffa (Joppa) from the Air

2. A Levite, descended from Moses' son Eliezer (I Chron. 26:25; cf. ch. 23:15, 17).

3. Son of Ahab, king of Israel. He succeeded his elder brother, Ahaziah and reigned till 842 B.C. He put away the image of Baal which his father had made, but adhered to the calf worship instituted by Jeroboam. On the death of Ahab, Mesha, king of Moab, had rebelled and withheld tribute. To recover his dominion over Moab, Joram obtained the assistance of King Jehoshaphat of Judah, and of the Edomite ruler. As the confederates were marching around the s. portion of the Dead Sea, they were nearly perishing with thirst, but Elisha bade them dig trenches, and on the following morning water came rushing down the wadi and filled the trenches. Not only did the water supply the needs of the Israelites, but, looking ruddy under the rays of the morning sun, was mistaken by the Moabites for blood; and, supposing that the Israelites had fallen out among themselves, they rushed to the spoil. Joram and his allies rose against them when they were thus off their guard, and put them to flight, and then overran Moab, but without being able permanently to reduce it to subjection (II Kings 3:1-27); see MOABITE STONE. Joram was without doubt the king to whom the king of Syria sent Naaman to be cured of his leprosy (ch. 5:1-27); and to whom Elisha made known every movement of the Syrian invaders, and who had them in his power at Samaria, and by Elisha's advice sent them home unmolested (ch. 6:8-23); and who, during the famine, when Ben-hadad was besieging Samaria, vowed vengeance against Elisha for the distress (vs. 24-31; called in v. 32 the son of a murderer). His end was tragic. He was at Jezreel, seeking cure from wounds received at Ramoth-gilead, when a watchman announced the approach of Jehu. Mounting his chariot and accompanied by his nephew Ahaziah, the king of Judah, in another chariot, Joram drove forth to meet Jehu. They came up to him at the field which Joram's mother had got for his father by having its owner, Naboth, slain. Jehu shot Joram through the heart with an arrow and, recalling a prophecy to mind, had the body thrown from the chariot into the field of Naboth (ch. 9:14-26). With Joram the dynasty of Omri ceased, and that of Jehu began.

4. One of the priests sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people (II Chron. 17:8).

5. Son of Jehoshaphat. From c. 854 B.C. he was associated with his father in the government, and in 849 B.C., in the 5th year of Jehoram, king of Israel, the reins of government were transferred entirely to his hands (II Kings 8:16; cf. chs. 1:17; 3:1). No sooner did he feel himself secure on his throne than he murdered all his brothers and some other princes of Judah (II Chron. 21:1-4). He had for his wife a daughter of Ahab, who led him into gross forms of heathenism, as Jezebel had seduced Ahab (II Kings 8:18; II Chron. 21:6, 11). As in other cases, his departure from Jehovah brought with it adversity. The Edomites rose in rebellion, and though he gained a victory over them, yet this did not prevent their achieving their independence. Libnah also revolted, and successfully (II Kings 8:20-22; II Chron. 21:8-10). Philistine and Arab marauders entered Judah and plundered the palace, carrying off the king's wives and children, with the single exception of Jehoahaz, or Ahaziah, the youngest boy (II Chron. 21:16, 17; 22:1). A writing from the Prophet Elijah was handed to the king, denouncing his apostasy and his wickedness, and threatening him with painful disease and death; see ELIJAH 2. He was soon afterward seized with dysentery, which became chronic and continued for 2 years (II Chron. 21:18, 19). During this sickness Ahaziah acted as regent (cf. II Kings 9:29 with ch. 8:25, 26). There was no pretense at lamentation when his death occurred. His sole reign, beginning in the 5th year of Jehoram of Israel, was 8 years. He died in 842 B.C., leaving his 1 surviving son Ahaziah to ascend the throne (II Kings 8:24; II Chron. 21:12 to 22:1).

Jor'dan (jôr'dân) [descender]. The most important river in Palestine. It rises from various sources. The e. source is at Bāniās, the ancient Caesarea Philippi, where a copious stream, the Bāniās, issues from a cave in a lofty cliff. The central and largest source is at Tell el-Kādi, probably the ancient Dan, where from 2 great springs the abundant Leddān takes its rise. The 3d source, the most n. and highest perennial one, is the fountain, below Haṣbaya, from which the river Haṣbāny flows. Thomson says that the Haṣbāny is the longest by 40 miles, the Leddān much the largest, and the Bāniās the most beautiful. From the source of the river at Bāniās to Lake Hūleh the distance is 12 miles; the junction of the Bāniās and the Leddān taking place about midway between these points, and the confluence with the Haṣbāny a fraction of a mile lower. The lake itself is 4 miles long. The Jordan, emerging from it at its s. side, next makes its way 10½ miles more to the Sea of Galilee, which is 12½ miles long. After passing through this lake, it pursues a tortuous course, till it enters the Dead Sea, at a point 65 miles in a straight line from the s. part of the Sea of Galilee. Including the 2 lakes, and taking no note of the windings, the river from Bāniās to the Dead Sea is 104 miles long. As far as is known, it stands absolutely alone among the rivers of the world in the fact that throughout the greater part of its course it runs below the level of the ocean. When it issues from the cave at Bāniās it is 1,000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. By the time it enters Lake Hūleh it has fallen to within 7 feet of sea level. At the Sea of Galilee it is 682 feet below the sea level, and when entering the Dead Sea 1,292 feet. The stream was appropriately named Jordan, the descender, and is tortuous also. Lieut. Lynch, of the U.S. Navy, who in 1848 sailed from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, wrote: "In a space of 60 miles of latitude and 4 miles of longitude the Jordan traverses at least 200 miles. . . . We have plunged down 27 threatening rapids, besides a great many of lesser magnitude."

The Biblical associations with the river proper attach mainly to the stretch from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. The river was fringed, as it is now, with a thicket of trees and shrubs, principally tamarisks, oleanders, and willows, among which lions lurked (Jer. 49:19; Zech. 11:3). The valley in its s. part, where the depression below sea level is greatest, is virtually a tropical country, and under irrigation produced crops of tropical luxuriance (Jos. War iv. 8, 3). On account of its fertility Lot, forgetful of moral considerations, chose it as the place of his residence (Gen. 13:8-13). The river was not bridged until Roman times, but was forded. The fords are frequent and easy in the upper stream and as far down as the mouth of the Jabbok, where Jacob crossed (Gen. 32:10; 33:18). Below that point the river is rarely fordable, and then only at certain seasons of the year. The current of the river is so rapid near Jericho that the numerous pilgrims who go thither to bathe are always in danger, and not infrequently are swept away.

For the Israelites to cross the Jordan under Joshua's leadership required the miracle or extraordinary providence of the checked waters (Josh. 3:1-17; 4:1-24; Ps. 114:3, 5). Adam or Adamah (modern Dāmīeh) is 16 miles up the river from Jericho or Shittim. Its location is marked by a small Bronze Age tell, about ½ mile e. of the best ford of the middle Jordan. The river near this ford is liable to be blocked at intervals by great landslides, of which several important instances are on record. In A.D. 1266 Sultan Baybars ordered a bridge to be built over the Jordan near Dāmīeh, but the task was found to be difficult on account of the rising of the waters. But in the night preceding December 8, 1267, a lofty mound, which overlooked the river on the w., fell into it and dammed up the waters, which were held back for 16 hours. A similar case occurred in 1906. In 1927 a section of a cliff fell bodily across the river and completely dammed it. No water flowed down the river bed for 21½ hours, and people crossed and recrossed the bed of the river on foot. It may be that in Joshua's time a similar landslide made it possible for the Israelites to cross the Jordan from the e. into Palestine. If such be the case, it means that God uses the forces of nature to accomplish his purposes, and such an explanation is no attempt to explain away the miraculous element. The fullness of the Jordan, with the overflow of its water over its banks, during the time of harvest (March or April in that warm valley) is produced by the melting of the snow on Mount Hermon (Josh. 3:15). The fleeing Midianites, pursued by Gideon, crossed by the fords at and above the mouth of the Jabbok (Judg. 7:24; 8:4, 5). David, when fleeing from Absalom and on returning to his kingdom, crossed twice somewhere between Jericho and the Jabbok (II Sam. 17:22, 24; 19:15-18). Elijah and Elisha, amidst the wonderful events at the close of Elijah's career, crossed at Jericho (II Kings 2:5-8, 13-15). Naaman the Syrian, as directed by the prophet, washed 7 times in the Jordan, somewhere in its upper reaches, either n. or s. of the Sea of Galilee, and was cured of his leprosy (II Kings 5:14). John the Baptist administered the special rite which gave him his designation, in the Jordan, and it was there that our Lord was baptized (Matt. 3:6, 13-17).

Jō'rim (jō'rīm) [Gr. for Aram. Yēhōrīm or Yōrīm, Jehovah is high]. An ancestor of Christ, who lived about 350 years after David (Luke 3:29).

Jor'ke-ām (jōr'kē-ām), in A.V. Jor'ko-ām (jōr'kō-ām). A place peopled by members of the family of Hezron and house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:44). Some suppose it to be for Jok-deam (q.v.).

Jos'a-bad (jōs'ā-bād). See JOZABAD.

Jos'aphat (jōs'ā-fāt). See JEHOSEPHAT.

Jō'se (jō'sē). See JESUS 2.

Jō'sech (jō'sēch) [Gr. for Aram. Yōsē, contraction of Joseph]. An ancestor of Christ, who probably lived after the Exile (Luke 3:26). The A.V., following a different reading, calls him Joseph.

Jos'e-dech (jōs'ē-dēk). See JOZADAK.

Jō'seph (jō'sēf) [may be (Jehovah) add, from Heb. root yāsaph]. The name has also the sound of a verb form of the root āsaph, meaning "he taketh away"; the Hebrew writer in Gen. 30:23, 24 plays upon the sound and upon both etymologies when he explains, not what the root of the word is, but the reason for bestowing the name.

1. The 11th of Jacob's 12 sons, and the elder son of Rachel, who, when she gave him birth, said, "The Lord add to me another son," and therefore called his name Joseph (Gen. 30:22-24). He was born in Paddanaram, about 6 years before the return of Jacob to Canaan (v. 25; cf. ch. 31:41), when Jacob was 90 or 91 years old. He was his father's favorite child, because he was the son of his old age and Rachel's child; and he made him a coat such as was worn by young people of the better class (ch. 37:3). The father's favoritism aroused the envy of the elder brethren; and their ill will was increased by 2 dreams that Joseph related which foreshadowed the time when his father, his mother, and his brethren should bow down and do him obeisance. When Joseph was 17 years old (ch. 37:2), Jacob sent him to Shechem, where his brothers were feeding their flocks, to ask after their welfare. On reaching Shechem, he found that they had gone on to Dothan, and he followed them thither. As he was seen approaching, the brothers proposed to slay him and report to his father that a wild beast had devoured him. Reuben, however, prevailed upon them not to take Joseph's life, but to cast him alive into a pit, intending eventually to take the youth out and restore him to his father. In Reuben's absence a caravan of Ishmaelites, traveling on the great highway that led down into Egypt, drew near. To Midianite merchantmen of the company Joseph was sold. A kid of the goats being killed, Joseph's coat was dipped in the blood and the besmeared garment was sent to Jacob, who concluded that his son had been torn to pieces by some wild beast (Gen. 37:1-35).

Meanwhile the slave dealers took Joseph down into Egypt, and sold him to Potiphar, the captain of Pharaoh's guard. The young slave's ability was soon discovered, and Potiphar gave him charge of all his house. But on false accusations he was committed to prison, where he was confined for years. There he so gained the confidence of the jailer that all the prisoners were committed to his charge. God enabled him to interpret prophetic dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh, who were confined with him in prison, and his interpretation in each instance was found correct. Two years later Pharaoh dreamed 2 prophetic dreams, which no one could interpret, and the chief butler, who had been restored to his royal master's favor, remembered Joseph and told of the occurrences in the prison. Joseph was immediately sent for, and interpreted the dreams, both of which had the same meaning. Seven years of great plenty were to be succeeded by 7 years of grievous famine. He ventured to recommend that someone should be appointed to collect the surplus produce during the 7 years of plenty, and store it against the years of famine. Pharaoh approved the plan; and, having had evidence of the wisdom of Joseph (ch. 41:9-13, 25-36), he appointed him superintendent of the royal granaries and as such the head of a department of the state and one of the officials next in rank to the king (ch. 41:39-44). Joseph was now 30 years of age (ch. 41:46). He had been chastened and humbled by the sufferings of 13 years. Pharaoh gave him Ase-nath, daughter of a priestly family at On, to wife; and before the famine began 2 sons were born to him, Manasseh and Ephraim (ch. 41:50-52). The famine came as predicted (see NILE), and affected all the known world, especially the w. part of it around the Mediterranean (ch. 41:54, 56, 57). In Egypt, however, there was a store of food, and Joseph's brothers went thither to buy grain. They did not recognize Joseph, but he knew them; and as they did obeisance to him, he saw that the dreams which brought him into such trouble had come to be verified. After testing their character in various ways, on their 2d visit he revealed himself to them, forgave them the wrong they had done him, and persuaded them and their father to settle in Egypt. The Pharaoh who welcomed them was doubtless of the Hyksos dynasty, and being himself a Semite, was the more ready to welcome men of a race identical with his own. With this agrees the fact that the Israelites were settled around the Hyksos capital of Egypt in the "plain of Tanis" (Zoan, I's. 78:12, 43). The king who knew not Joseph (Ex. 1:8) and who oppressed the Israelites represents a Pharaoh who reigned after the expulsion of the Hyksos. Joseph died at the age of 110 years, and his body, in accordance with Egyptian custom, was embalmed and put in a coffin; but he had left strict injunctions that when the Exodus took place his remains should be removed to Canaan (Gen., chs. 42 to 50; Heb. 11:22). His wishes were carried out, and his remains were ultimately buried near Shechem in the very center of the Promised Land (Ex. 13:19; Josh. 24:32).

and a member of the priestly class, which kept apart from the laity. The Egyptians ate by themselves, for Egyptians held aloof from foreigners; the priests ate and drank nothing that was imported (Porphyrus, De Abstinencia ab Esu Animalium iv. 7), and the people generally considered it an abomination to use Greek knives and cooking utensils (Herod. ii. 41), and ostracized shepherds, swineherds, and cowherds, even when native Egyptians, because the occupation of tending cattle was incompatible with the refinement and cleanliness demanded by Egyptian standards (Gen. 46:34; Herod. ii. 47; cf. 164). This objection to herdsmen was probably the cause of Joseph's settling his kindred in the land of Goshen, where they would not come in contact with the natives of the land.

Egyptian I'k'bir in the lists of Palestinian place names of Thutmose III and Ramesses II is equivalent to Jacob-el (God supplants). Egyptian I's'pir from the same list of Thutmose

Migration of Asiatics Into Egypt

The particulars of Joseph's life, which involve Egyptian customs, are borne out by the monuments and the papyri. It is known from the Rosetta stone that at least in the Ptolemaic period it was the habit of the king to release prisoners at his birthday feast and on other great occasions. References to magicians and soothsayers are frequent, and great stress is laid on dreams as messages from the gods. When Joseph was sent for in the prison, although there is express mention of haste, yet he stayed to shave himself and put on clean raiment (Gen. 41:14). Shaving was particularly practiced and among the priests was a religious rite. The investiture of an official of high rank is frequently depicted and agrees with the description in Genesis, the signet ring, the linen vesture, and the chain about the neck being prominent. An economic change, whereby the land came to be owned entirely by the king and priests, took place some time before the rise of the Empire; see EGYPT, II. 3.

There is reference to Egyptian conceptions of propriety in the separate setting of bread for Joseph, for his brethren, and for the Egyptians present (Gen. 43:32). Joseph ate by himself, because he was a man of highest rank

III is by some regarded as representing Joseph-el (may God add, or God takes away); others interpret it as Jesheb-el (where God dwells). Whatever philological equivalence there be, with our present knowledge we cannot say whether they stand in any relation to the patriarch Jacob and his son Joseph. They may be names like Jiphthah-el or Iphtah-el, a valley in the territory of Zebulun (Josh. 19:14).

An Egyptian story, known as the Tale of the Two Brothers, recounts the temptation of a young man in the home of his elder brother, similar to the experience of Joseph in the house of Potiphar (Gen., ch. 39). The younger brother is saved from the wrath of the elder by the interposition of the sun-god, who makes a river full of crocodiles to flow as a barrier between the two. The further adventures of the twain, at length reconciled to each other, are equally fabulous. The story was transcribed in the reign of Sethi II, of Dyn. XIX, centuries after the time of Joseph; but when the tale was composed is not known. A similar incident is told in Greek mythology: Bellerophon, having rejected the advances of Antaea, wife of Proetus, king of Argos, was falsely accused by her to her husband of an attempt on her virtue (Homer Iliad vi. 155 ff.).

The 2 tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim descended from Joseph's 2 sons. The blessings pronounced on Joseph by the dying Jacob were designed for these tribes as well as for Joseph himself (Gen. 48:8-22; 49:22-26). In Ps. 80:1 Joseph is a poetic designation of the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim.

2. Father of the spy from the tribe of Issachar (Num. 13:7).

3. A son of Asaph and head of a course of musicians in the reign of David (I Chron. 25:2, 9).

4. An ancestor of Christ, who lived between the time of David and the Exile (Luke 3:30).

5. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:42).

6. A priest, head of the family of Shebaniah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

7. An ancestor of Christ who lived after the Exile (Luke 3:26, in R.V. Joseph).

8. Son of Mattathias, in the ancestry of Christ (Luke 3:24, 25).

9. Son of Zacharias. When Judas Macabaeus sent Simon to aid the Jews in Galilee and himself went to fight in Gilead, he left Joseph and Azarias in charge of the forces in Judea. They engaged in battle, contrary to the orders given by Judas, and were defeated (I Macc. 5:18, 55-62).

10. The husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Matt. 1:16; Luke 3:23). For his ancestry see GENEALOGY. When Mary was found with child before marriage, Joseph was minded to put her away without public exposure, for he was a just man. But an angel informed him in a dream that the child to be born had been miraculously conceived by the Holy Spirit. Thereupon he had no hesitation in carrying out his contract with her, and he made her his wife (Matt. 1:18-25). Being a descendant of David, he had to go to Bethlehem, the early home of his ancestors, for enrollment, according to the decree of the emperor Augustus, and was there with Mary when Jesus was born (Luke 2:4, 16). He was with Mary when, at the presentation of Jesus in the Temple, Simeon and Anna gave forth their prophetic utterances (v. 33). Warned by an angel in a dream that Herod plotted the murder of the Child, Joseph conducted the flight into Egypt (Matt. 2:13, 19). He returned to Nazareth when Herod was dead (vs. 22, 23). He was accustomed to go with Mary annually to the passover at Jerusalem, and he took Jesus also to the feast when our Lord was 12 years old (Luke 2:43), and he also safely reached Nazareth on the return journey (v. 51). He was a carpenter (Matt. 13:55), and was assisted in his work by the young man Jesus (Mark 6:3). Apparently Joseph was alive when Jesus' ministry had well begun (Matt. 13:55), but as we do not hear of him in connection with the crucifixion, it may be inferred that he died previously to that event. This was the reason why Jesus, when on the cross, commended Mary to the kindness of the Apostle John, which he would scarcely have done had her natural guardian still been alive (John 19:26, 27).

11. The same as Joses 1 (Matt. 13:55, R.V.). See BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

12. A Jew of Arimathaea, a member of the sanhedrin, a counselor of honorable estate, who looked for the Kingdom of God (Mark 15:43). He had not consented to the resolution of the sanhedrin to put Jesus to death, for he was a disciple of Jesus, although secretly, for, like Nicodemus, the only other member of the governing body who believed on our Lord, he was fearful of publicly committing himself. Both became more courageous when they saw the crucifixion. Joseph went boldly to Pilate, begged the body of Jesus, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewed out in a rock (Matt. 27:57-60; Luke 23:50-53; John 19:38).

13. A Christian called Barsabbas or son of Sabbas, and Justus. He had companied with Jesus and the disciples from the time of Jesus' baptism, and was one of 2 who were considered worthy to fill the vacancy among the apostolic 12 produced by the apostasy of Judas; but the lot fell upon Matthias (Acts 1:21, 26). He was probably a brother of Judas, called Barsabbas (Acts 15:22).

14. The personal name of Barnabas (Acts 4:36; in A.V. Joses).

Jo'ses (jō'sēz) [a Gr. form of Joseph]. 1. One of the brethren of the Lord (Mark 6:3). In Matt. 13:55, R.V. prefers the manuscripts which gave the name as Joseph.

2. The personal name of Barnabas, for a time the missionary colleague of Paul (Acts 4:36, in R.V. Joseph).

Jo'shah (jō'shā). A Simeonite, son of Amaziah (I Chron. 4:34).

Josh'aphat (jōsh'ā-fāt) [Jehovah has judged]. 1. A Mithnite, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:43).

2. A priest, one of the trumpeters before the Ark during its removal to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:24, in A.V. Jehoshaphat).

Josh'a-vi'ah (jōsh'ā-vi'ā). One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:46).

Josh'be'ka'shah (jōsh'bē-kā'shā) [perhaps, he (God) brings back hard fate]. A singer, son of Heman (I Chron. 25:4), and head of the 17th course of singers (v. 24).

Jo'sheb-bas'she'beth (jō'shēb-bās-shē'bēth), in A.V. marg. Jo'sheb-bas'se'bet (jō'shēb-bās-sē'bēt). A textual corruption in II Sam. 23:8, apparently for Ish-baal (man of Baal). Baal was altered, as was often done after it had acquired idolatrous associations, to bōsheth, shame. Apparently Ish-bosheth became Yish-bosheth. The last Hebrew word in v. 7 is bashshābēth, which may have caught the eye of a copyist. Through an error of transcription b apparently was added to Yish- and the consonants of bashshābēth written instead of b-sh-th (bōsheth). With a change of vocalization the result was Josheb-basshebeth. His identity with Jashobeam is fairly established by comparison of this verse with I Chron. 11:11 and vs. 8, 9 with I Chron. 27:2, 4. This latter form is perhaps another mode of avoiding the name Baal.

Josh'i-bi'ah (jōsh'i-bi'ā), in A.V. Jos'i-bi'ah [Jehovah causes to dwell (in peace and security)]. A Simeonite, family of Asiel (I Chron. 4:35).

Josh'u'a (jōsh'ū-ā), in A.V. once Je-hosh'u'a (Num. 13:16), and once Je-hosh'u'ah (I Chron. 7:27). Jehoshua developed into Jesh'u'a (Neh. 8:17), and this form was Hellenized and appears as Je'sus (Acts 7:45) [Jehovah is salvation]. 1. An Ephraimite, the son of Nun (Num. 13:8, 16). He commanded the Israelites in their successful conflict with the Amalekites at Rephidim (Ex. 17:8-16). A personal attendant on Moses, he was with him on Mount Sinai when the golden calf was made, and mistook the noise of idolatrous revelry in the camp for the shouting of hostile combatants (Ex. 24:13; 32:17, 18). He had charge of the first tent of meeting (Ex. 33:11). At the age of 40, as prince of Ephraim, he was a member of the commission of 12 sent to report on the Land of Canaan and its assailability, and he joined Caleb in seeking to persuade the people to go and possess the land (Josh. 14:7; Num. 13:8; 14:6-9). For this the two narrowly escaped being stoned to death (Num.

14:10), but God rewarded them for their fidelity and trust in Jehovah by keeping them alive to enter the Promised Land (vs. 30, 38). At the end of the 40 years' sojourn in the wilderness by divine direction Moses placed Joshua before the high priest and the congregation in Shittim and publicly ordained him to be his successor (Num. 27:18-23; Deut. 1:38), and just before death the lawgiver took Joshua to the tabernacle to receive his charge from the Lord (Deut. 31:14, 23). On the death of Moses, Joshua began immediate preparations for crossing the Jordan. The people were allowed 3 days in which to prepare victuals (Josh. 1:10, 11), the 2½ tribes were reminded of their obligation to render their brethren armed assistance (vs. 12-18), and spies were dispatched to search out Jericho (ch. 2:1). The camp was then moved to the river and the people carefully instructed as to the order of march (ch. 3:1-6). Joshua showed his military skill in the plan of campaign which he adopted for the conquest of Canaan: a central camp, advantageously situated; the capture of the towns which commanded the approaches to his camp; great campaigns following up victories; see CANAAN 2. He blundered, however, in making a treaty with the Gibeonites and in not garrisoning the citadel of the Jebusites. By these two mistakes Judah was to a degree isolated from the n. tribes. He carried out the injunction to assemble the people on Ebal and Gerizim to hear the blessings and the cursings (ch. 8:30-35). His campaigns had broken the power of the Canaanites, but not exterminated them (see CANAAN 2). But, although the prospect of further fighting remained, the time had come to plan for the settlement of the country. Aided by the high priest and a commission, he superintended the allotment of the conquered country, beginning the distribution while the camp was at Gilgal (chs. 14:6 to 17:18), and completing it and assigning cities of refuge and the Levitical towns after he had removed the tabernacle to Shiloh (chs. 18 to 21). For himself he asked and obtained a town, Timnath-serah, in Mount Ephraim (ch. 19:50). When old, he convoked an assembly of the people at Shechem, because it was the place of Abraham's first altar on entering Canaan and the locality where the tribes had invoked blessings and cursings upon themselves. There he made them a powerful address, urging them not to forsake Jehovah (ch. 24:1-28). Soon afterward he died, at the age of 110, and was buried at the place of his choice, Timnath-serah (vs. 29, 30).

The Book of Joshua properly follows Deuteronomy in the Hebrew Scriptures and in the English Bible, for it continues the history from the death of Moses, which was the last event recorded in Deuteronomy. It is more intimately connected with the Pentateuch than with the books which follow it, for the spirit of the Mosaic times was still active in the history which it recounts and it is the sequel of Genesis in that it records the possession of the Promised Land for which Abraham waited, as related in Genesis. In scientific studies critics generally regard the Pentateuch and The Book of Joshua as forming a unit, which they call the Hexateuch. In the Hebrew Scriptures it is the first of the Prophets, and begins that division of them called the Former Prophets, which embraces all the books of the English Bible between Joshua and II Kings inclusive, except Ruth; see CANON. The book may be divided into 3 sections:

I. The conquest of Canaan (chs. 1 to 12), including: the preparation for crossing the Jordan and the passage of the river (chs. 1:1 to 4:18); the establishment of the camp and celebration of the passover (chs. 4:19 to 5:

12); the capture of Jericho and Ai, the confirmation of the covenant on Ebal, and the treaty with the Gibeonites (chs. 5:13 to 9:27); the s. and n. campaigns (chs. 10; 11); and the summary (ch. 12).

II. The distribution of Canaan (chs. 13 to 22), including: a description of the land which remained to be divided (ch. 13); its allotment, with the assignment of cities of refuge and the allotment of towns to the tribe of Levi (chs. 14 to 21); and the temporary misunderstanding about the altar on the Jordan, as though it were intended to divide the nation (ch. 22).

III. Joshua's farewell address and death (chs. 23; 24).

It is expressly stated that Joshua wrote "these words," including at least the account of the proceedings at Shechem (chs. 23:1 to 24:25) in the book of the law of God (ch. 24:26). The concluding verses of the book (ch. 24:29-33) were written after the death of Joshua, Eleazar, and the men of that generation. The conquest of Hebron, Debir, and Anab by Caleb (ch. 15:13-20) took place after the death of Joshua and is inserted in this place for the sake of completeness (cf. Judg. 1:10-20; see HEBRON 2). In ch. 12:14 Zephath is called by its later name Hormah (Judg. 1:17; see HORMAH). Apparently Josh. 19:47 records the migration of the Danites in the days of the Judges. It seems reasonable to conclude from the general character of the documents and casual statements in them that large portions of the book were in writing in the time of Joshua. At any rate, it may be concluded that such records were in final form while the town of Ai was still in ruins (ch. 8:28), before the reign of Solomon, while the Canaanites still dwelt in Gezer (cf. ch. 16:10 with I Kings 9:16), and before the reign of David, at a time when the Jebusites still occupied the stronghold of Jerusalem (ch. 15:63).

2. A native of Beth-shemesh, the owner of a field to which the kine drawing the cart which carried the Ark from the Philistine country made their way (I Sam. 6:14).

3. The governor of Jerusalem during the reign of Josiah (II Kings 23:8).

4. The high priest while Zerubbabel was governor of Judah (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2-4; Zech. 3:1-9). Called in Ezra and Nehemiah Jeshua (q.v.).

Jō-si'ah (jō-si'ā), in A.V. of N.T. Jō-si'as (jō-si'ās) [Jehovah heals; cf. Arab. 'asā, to nurse, cure]. 1. Son and successor of Amon as king of Judah. He came to the throne c. 638 B.C., when 8 years old. In his youth his adviser seems to have been the high priest Hilkiah, and Josiah hearkened to him. In the 8th year of his reign he began the attempt to conform his own conduct as king, and the life of the court, to the laws of God. In his 12th regnal year he commenced to suppress idolatry and other unlawful worship, a work which he prosecuted for years, not only in Judah and Jerusalem, but after his 18th year in Israel also (II Kings 22:1, 2; II Chron. 34:1-7, 33). In his 18th year (621 B.C.) he took energetic steps to repair and adorn the Temple, and the workmen, entering with enthusiasm into his plans, acted with exemplary fidelity in using the money entrusted to them for the purpose. While the repairs of the Temple were being executed, Hilkiah, the high priest, found the book of the law in the house of the Lord, and handed it over to Shaphan, the scribe, who read it to the king. Josiah was deeply impressed by the prophecy that if the people departed from Jehovah dreadful consequences would ensue. He rent his clothes and humbled himself before God, who was pleased to give him the gracious assurance that the threatened calamity should not come in his time (II Kings 22:8-20; II Chron. 34:15-28).

The prophecy which so affected Josiah was Deut., chs. 28 to 30, especially ch. 29:25-28. The book found by Hilkiah must thus have contained Deuteronomy at least, and it may have been a copy of the Pentateuch. The sacred books had, doubtless, been generally destroyed and lost sight of during the apostasy and persecution in the long reign of Manasseh (II Kings 21:16; II Chron. 33:9), and the book found by Hilkiah was probably the Temple copy of the law, which had been hidden or thrown aside during the profanation of the sanctuary (Deut. 31:9, 26); or possibly it was a law book that had been placed in the wall, according to an ancient custom, when the Temple was first built. That Deuteronomy, or at any rate its basic document, was an old book at the time may be argued from the fact that it reflects the condition of Israel in early times and not in the reign of Josiah. It enjoins upon the people the extermination of the Canaanites and Amalekites (chs. 20:16-18; 25:17-19), but in Josiah's day there was no occasion for such a law. It contemplates foreign conquest on the part of the Israelites (ch. 20:10-15); but in Josiah's day and for nearly a century previously the question was not of conquest, but whether Judah could maintain its existence at all. It vests the supreme authority under Jehovah in a judge and the priesthood, but makes provision for a time when the Israelites should desire a king (chs. 17:8-20; 19:17); but in Josiah's day the Israelites had been ruled by kings for centuries. It discriminates against Ammon and Moab in favor of Edom (ch. 23:3-8); but in Josiah's day and for a long time previously Egypt was the representative foe of the people of God (Isa. 63:6; Joel 3:19; Obad.), and Jeremiah promises future restoration to Moab and Ammon, but denies it to Edom (Jer. 48:47; 49:6, 17, 18). The legislation of Deuteronomy was in force long before the time of Josiah; it was observed at the coronation of Joash c. 836 B.C. (II Kings 11:12), and was followed by Joash's son and successor, Amaziah (II Kings 14:6; cf. Deut. 24:16). The reading of the book to the people affected them as it had the king. So deep was the impression produced that a 2d assault upon idolatry was begun, more sweeping than the first. After the king and his subjects had together covenanted to worship Jehovah only, they proceeded to take the vessels of Baal, of the Asherim, and of the heavenly bodies, burn them, and cast the ashes into the brook Kidron. The Asherah in the house of the Lord was similarly burned, the residences of the sodomites were broken down, and the high places were destroyed, not merely through the Kingdom of Judah, but through the former territory of the n. tribes, now largely empty of its Israelitish inhabitants. The Valley of Hinnom and the shrine of Topheth, in which children had been made to pass through the fire to Molech, were defiled, and other sweeping reforms effected. When at Beth-el, Josiah took the bones of the idolatrous priests from their graves, and burned them on the altar, thus fulfilling the prophecy of a man of God in Jeroboam's time (I Kings 13:2). Nor did he scruple to slay the living idolatrous priests themselves on the altars on which they had been accustomed to sacrifice. Then he concluded by holding a passover, so well attended and so solemn that nothing like it had been celebrated since the time of Samuel (II Kings 23:1-25; II Chron. 34:29 to 35:19).

Thirteen years afterward Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, marched an army along the maritime portion of Palestine on his way to the Euphrates, where he designed to try his strength against the great Assyrian power. Situated as the small and comparatively feeble Kingdom of Judah was between the Assyrian and Egyptian Empires, then in mutual hostility, it was difficult for it to maintain neutrality; indeed, Josiah seems to have looked on himself as a vassal of the Assyrian king, legally and morally bound to give him military aid in war; and he gave battle to Pharaoh-necho at Megiddo in the plain of Jezreel, and in the fight was mortally wounded by an arrow. His attendants removed him from his war chariot to a second conveyance, which brought him to Jerusalem. He had, however, only reached that capital when he died. Great lamentations were made for him by Jeremiah, the singing men and the singing women, and the people generally. His loss to his country was irreparable. The religious reforms which he had commenced were assailed, and the partial independence which his country had enjoyed under his rule passed away. He had reigned 31 years, but was only 39 when he died, about 608 B.C. (II Kings 22:1; 23:29, 30; II Chron. 35:20-27; cf. Zech. 12:11). Jeremiah and Zephaniah prophesied during the latter part of his reign (Jer. 1:2; 3:6; Zeph. 1:1).

2. A son of Zephaniah, in Zechariah's days (Zech. 6:10). Perhaps the same as Hen of v. 14; but see HEN.

Jos'ib'iah (jōs'ī-bī'ā). See JOSHIBIAH.

Jos'ī-phi'ah (jōs'ī-fi'ā) [Jehovah will add, increase]. Head of the house of Shelomith, who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:10).

Jot [Lat. iota, from Gr. iōta=i; cf. Heb. yōd, yōdh=y]. The discourse of which Matt. 5:18 forms a part undoubtedly was spoken in Aramaic, and jot accordingly refers to the Hebrew letter yōd, yōdh (y). In the Aramaic-Hebrew writing in vogue in the time of our Lord, yōd (yōdh) was already the smallest letter in the alphabet. Hence, figuratively, jot signifies a matter that seems to be of small moment.

Jot'bah (jōt'bā) [pleasantness, goodness]. The town of King Amon's grandfather (II Kings 21:19), probably same as Jotapata, which is identified with Khirbet Jefāt about 7 miles n. of Sepphoris.

Jot'ba-thah (jōt'bā-thā), in A.V. once Jot' bath (jōt'bāth) (Deut. 10:7) [goodness, pleasantness]. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness, apparently near Ezion-geber (Num. 33:33). The place abounded in brooks of water (Deut. 10:7), and is probably to be identified with eṭ-Ṭāba, about 22 miles n. of 'Akabāh.

Joth'am (jōth'ām), in A.V. once Jo'a-tham (Matt. 1:9), in imitation of the Gr. form [Jehovah is perfect, sincere]. 1. Youngest son of Gideon. He escaped when his 70 brothers (the offspring of polygamy) were massacred by their half brother Abimelech; and afterward, in contempt of the usurpation, standing on Mount Gerizim, he uttered the parable, audible to the Shechemites in the valley below, of the trees anointing a king (Judg. 9:1-21).

2. A king of Judah, who began to reign as regent of his father, Uzziah, while the latter was a leper (II Kings 15:5). His regency began while Jeroboam II was still king of Israel (I Chron. 5:17). Further evidence of the partial contemporaneousness of the regency of Jotham and the reign of Jeroboam exists, if the earthquake took place while Uzziah and Jeroboam were reigning (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5) and occurred coincidentally with or shortly after Uzziah's invasion of the priest's office (Jos. Antiq. ix. 10, 4). He followed Jehovah, but did not interfere with the high places at which the people worshiped other gods. He built the high gate of the Temple and worked on the wall on the hill of Ophel, s. of the holy house. He erected cities in the uplands of Judah and castles and towers in the forests. He gained a victory over the Ammonites and made them tributary. During his reign of 16 years Isaiah and Hosea continued to prophesy (Isa. 1:1; Hos. 1:1). At the close of his reign the allied Israelites and Syrians began their invasion of Judah. He died at the age of 41, surviving his father scarcely a year it seems. He left his son Ahaz to ascend the throne (II Kings 15:32-38; II Chron. 27:1-9). With Jotham, Hoshea is connected by a strange synchronism: "Hoshea . . . reigned . . . in the twentieth year of Jotham" (II Kings 15:30). This reference has been explained as meaning the 20th year since Jotham began to reign, his accession having been recorded (v. 5), but his reign and death not having been yet described by the author of Kings. Whatever be the true explanation, this strange synchronism goes far to bring the data of the Hebrew record into harmony with the Assyrian chronology.

3. A son of Jahdai (I Chron. 2:47).

Jour'neys of the Is'ra-el-ites (Iz'rî-êl-îts). See WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Joz'a-bad (jöz'â-bäd), in A.V. once Jos'a-bad (I Chron. 12:4) [Jehovah has bestowed]. A Gederathite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:4).

2 and 3. Two Manassites who assisted David to pursue the Amalekites after their capture of Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

4. A Levite, one of the overseers of the tithes in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:13).

5. A chief of the Levites in the time of Josiah (II Chron. 35:9).

6. A Levite, son of Jeshua (Ezra 8:33). Perhaps he was the Jozabad who by order of Ezra took part in teaching the people the law (Neh. 8:7), and was the Levitical chief who had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God (Neh. 11:16); he may have been the Levite of the name, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (ch. 10:23).

7. A priest, a son of Pashhur, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).

Joz'a-car (jöz'â-kär), in A.V. Joz'a-char (jöz'â-kär) [Jehovah has remembered]. Son of an Ammonitess and one of the 2 assassins of Joash, king of Judah (II Kings 12:21). Some Hebrew MSS. read Jozabad (Heb. Yözâ-bäd), which is probably reflected in Zabab (II Chron. 24:26). This confusion of consonants was easy, since kaph (k) and beth (b) resemble each other; so also do resh (r) and daleth (d).

Joz'a-dak (jöz'â-däk) and Je-hoz'a-dak, in A.V. Jos'e-dech in Haggai and Zechariah [Jehovah is just]. Father of Jeshua, the high priest (Ezra 3:2, 8). He was carried captive to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar (I Chron. 6:15).

Ju'bal (jöö'bäl). The younger son of Lamech, by his wife Adah. Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and pipe (Gen. 4:21).

Ju'bi-lee, Ju'bi-le [Late Lat. jubilaeus, from Gr. iôbelaïos, from Heb. yôbêl, ram's horn, trumpet]. The 50th year occurring after 7 times 7 years had been counted from the institution of the festival or from the last jubilee (Lev. 25:8-10); cf. the calculation of Pentecost. It derived its name from the custom of proclaiming it by a blast on the trumpet. As every 7th year was a Sabbatical year, the jubilee followed immediately after one of this character. On the 10th day of the 7th month (the great Day of Atonement), in the 50th year, the trumpet of the jubilee was sounded. It proclaimed liberty to all Israelites who were in bondage to any of their countrymen, and the return to their ancestral possessions of any who had been compelled through poverty to sell them. Even the ground for that year was allowed to remain fallow, though it had been so in the previous Sabbatical year. To prevent injustice to one who having purchased land could retain it only to the first jubilee, the practice (thoroughly in conformity with the principles of political economy) was to give for the purchased possession only the worth of the temporary occupation till the jubilee year. But one purchasing from another a house in a walled city retained it permanently; it did not revert to the original owner at the jubilee, since city lots were apparently not bound up with the several portions of Canaan as originally allotted to families. Those of the unwalled villages were regarded as belonging to the field and did so return; so also did the houses of Levites wheresoever situated (Lev. 25:3-55; 27:17, 18; Num. 36:4). There appears to be an allusion to the jubilee in Isa. 61:1-3 and Ezek. 46:17; cf. also Neh. 5:1-13.

There are considerable difficulties entailed in carrying out the regulations of the Sabbatical year; an abundant harvest, however, is promised for the 6th year, which will be ample until that of the 9th is gathered in (Lev. 25:20-22). Some scholars suppose that perhaps not all the land lay fallow simultaneously every 7 years, but that various portions had their Sabbatical year at different times; thus a serious interruption in agriculture would be avoided. A more difficult problem arises when the 7th Sabbatical year and the year of jubilee fall together, since that involves having the land lie fallow for 2 successive years. In that case, since nothing could be sown in the 49th and 50th years, only some summer fruits could be obtained in the 51st. The 7th Sabbatical year and the year of jubilee, however, cannot be identified. Historical evidence is lacking that the year of jubilee was ever strictly observed in actual practice. But even if it remained ideal legislation, its social values lay in teaching personal liberty, restitution of property, and the simple life.

Ju'al (jöö'käl). See JEHUCAL.

Ju'da (jöö'dä). See JUDAH, JUDAS, JODA.

Ju-da'ca (jöö-dë'ä) in A.V. in canonical books once Jude'a (jöö-dë'ä) (Ezra 5:8), and thrice Jew'ry (jöö'ri) (Dan. 5:13; Luke 23:5; John 7:1) [Lat. from Gr. Ioudaia, from Heb. Yehüdāh]. A geographical term first introduced in the Bible in Ezra 5:8, A.V., to designate a province of the Persian Empire. It is there the rendering of the Aramaic Yehūd. The R.V. translates it "the province of Judah." The land of Judea is mentioned in I Esdras 1:39, and the kings of Judea in v. 33. The land of Judea is also spoken of in Maccabaeen times after the Persian had given place to the Macedonian-Greek dominion (I Macc. 5:45; 7:10, A.V.). On the banishment of Archelaus Judea was annexed to the Roman province of Syria; but it was governed by procurators appointed by the Roman emperor. The succession of procurators was interrupted for a brief period by the reign of Herod Agrippa I, A.D. 41-44. The procurator resided at Caesarea. His immediate superior was the proconsul, or president, of Syria, ruling from Antioch (Luke 3:1; Jos. Antiq. xvii. 13, 5; xviii. 1, 1). This arrangement obtained when our Lord carried out his ministry on earth, and Judea is often mentioned in the N.T. (Luke 23:5-7; John 4:3; 7:3; Acts 1:8). Its n. boundary may be considered as extending from Joppa on the Mediterranean to a point on the Jordan about 10 miles n. of the Dead Sea. Its s. boundary may be drawn from the wadi Ghuzzeh, about 7 miles s.w. of Gaza, through Beer-sheba, to the s. portion of the Dead Sea. The length from n. to s. is about 55 miles, and that from e. to w. the same. See HISTORY.

Ju'dah (jōō'dā), Hellenized Ju'das, Ju'da, once Anglicized Jude (Jude 1) [let him (God) be praised]. 1. The 4th son of Jacob and of Leah. He was not associated with his brothers Simeon and Levi, when by treachery and murder they avenged the wrong done to Dinah, who was the full sister of all 3 (Gen., ch. 34). He married a Canaanite, a daughter of Shua of Adullam, and had 2 sons, Er and Onan, who were slain by divine judgment for their sins (ch. 38:1-10). Prior to this he had had a 3d son, Shelah (v. 5). Afterward, by Tamar, the deceased Er's widow, Judah became the father of twin sons, Perez and Zerah (vs. 11-30; ch. 46:12; Num. 26:19). It was through Perez that Judah became the ancestor of David (Ruth 4:18-22), and when the fullness of time was come, of our Lord (Matt. 1:3-16). Judah saved Joseph's life by proposing that he should be sold instead of murdered (Gen. 37:26-28). When Joseph, whose relationship to his brother was not suspected, proposed to detain Benjamin in Egypt, Judah made a plea in a speech marked by great natural eloquence, and ended by offering himself to remain a prisoner provided Benjamin were set free (ch. 44:33, 34). The result of this splendid advocacy was that Joseph, without further delay, revealed himself to his brethren (ch. 45:1). When Jacob was on his way to Egypt he chose Judah, though not the eldest son, to go before him to Joseph, to show the way before him unto Goshen (ch. 46:28). On account of the sins of Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, they were passed over, and the blessing of the birthright was bestowed by Jacob on Judah (ch. 49:3-10).

2. A tribe sprung from Judah. It was divided into 5 tribal families which proceeded from his 3 sons and 2 grandsons (Num. 26:19-21; I Chron. 2:3-6). The prince of the tribe of Judah in the early period of the wanderings was Nahshon, the son of Amminadab (Num. 1:7; 2:3; 7:12-17; 10:14). Another prince was Caleb, son of Jephunneh (chs. 13:6; 34:19). At the 1st census in the wilderness it numbered 74,600 (ch. 1:26, 27); and at the 2d census, taken at Shittim on the eve of entering Canaan, 76,500 (ch. 26:22). It was one of the tribes that stood on Mount Gerizim to bless the people (Deut. 27:12). Achan, who brought trouble upon all Israel by his greed, belonged to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 7:1, 17, 18). After the death of Joshua, this tribe was the first one sent to take possession of its allotted territory; and its fighting men, with the aid of the Simeonites, captured such towns as were found occupied by the Canaanites, and drove out the inhabitants of the hill country (Judg. 1:1-20).

The tribe of Judah occupied the greater part of s. Palestine. The boundary drawn for it by Joshua commenced at the extreme s. point of the Dead Sea, passed thence, probably by Wadi el-Fikrah, s. of the ascent of Akabbim, to the wilderness of Zin, thence by the s. of Kadesh-barnea and the brook of Egypt to the Mediterranean Sea. The e. border was the Dead Sea. The n. boundary started from the n. end of the sea, at the mouth of the Jordan, and passing by Beth-hoglah and near Jericho, went up by the ascent of Adummim, by En-shemesh, to En-rogel and the valley of the son of Hinnom, s. of Jerusalem, passed on to Kirjath-jearim, and thence by Beth-shemesh and Timnah, n. of Ekron, to Jabneel, and on to the Mediterranean. That sea itself constituted the w. boundary, but a portion of the area was almost always in the hands of the Philistines (Josh. 15:1-12; cf. also vs. 13-63; ch. 18:11-20). The length of the territory of the tribe of Judah from n. to s. was about 50 miles where most thickly inhabited, but about 95 miles from Jerusalem to Kadesh-barnea; and its breadth from the Jordan to the Philistine plain was about 45 miles. As to its physical features, it is naturally divided into 3 regions: the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:48; Luke 1:39); the lowland or Shephelah (Josh. 15:33), and the plain near the Mediterranean Sea. The country about Beer-sheba was known as the Negeb or South. A great part of Judah is rocky and barren, but it is admirably adapted for the culture of the vine and for pasture (cf. Gen. 49:11, 12). The artificially terraced hills (now neglected) were once the scene of extensive cultivation. Parts of the territory were regarded as a wilderness, especially the region s. of Arad (Judg. 1:16) and that immediately w. of the Dead Sea (Psalm 63, title). The city of Judah (II Chron. 25:28) is the city of David (II Kings 14:20).

Soon after their conquest of Canaan the Israelites were oppressed by the king of Mesopotamia, but Othniel, of the tribe of Judah, delivered the nation from the foreign domination (Judg. 3:8-11). In the troublous times which now came upon the Israelites, due to their neglect of God, to tribal jealousies, and to failure to dispossess all the heathen, Judah, Dan, and Simeon became a group by themselves, separated from the other tribes to the n. by a strip of country several miles broad which was traversed with inconvenience, in part by reason of its Canaanite inhabitants, Amorites, Gibeonites, and Jebusites, and in part on account of its natural roughness and wildness, being cleft by deep transverse valleys between Jerusalem and Jericho. It was also separated from Gad and Reuben by the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The tribe had its own difficulties to contend with, being beset by the Philistines (Judg. 3:31; 10:7; 13:1), and took little part in the wars of the other tribes against oppressors. Boaz and Ruth lived in Bethlehem at this time. Judah, however, united with the other tribes to punish Benjamin (ch. 20:1, 18). In the time of Eli and Samuel, when the Philistines oppressed both Judah and Benjamin, intercourse with the n. tribes became closer, and Judah was included in the kingdom of Saul. After the death of Saul, the men of Judah supported the claims of their tribesman David to the throne, and for 7 years warred in his behalf. When his cause triumphed, Jerusalem on the border of Judah and Benjamin was made the capital of all Israel. The promise had been given to David that his posterity should forever occupy his throne (II Sam. 7:13-16; I Chron. 17:12, 14, 23), though chastisement would be inflicted if there were a departure from Jehovah. The promise was not intended to do away with the necessity for wisdom in the king, and when Rehoboam showed his ignorance of the first principles of democratic government, 10 tribes were lost to the house of David. See ISRAEL 3.

Judah and a large part of Benjamin remained loyal to David's line, and constituted the main elements of the Kingdom of Judah. This kingdom lasted from c. 935 B.C. until the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. During this time 19 kings of David's line, exclusive of the usurping Queen Athaliah, occupied the throne; see CHRONOLOGY, IV. Its territory was nearly coincident with that of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, save that the n. boundary fluctuated, Beth-el being sometimes held by Judah, especially after the fall of Samaria. An event which exercised the most powerful influence on the history and ultimate fate of the rival kingdoms was the construction of the 2 golden calves by Jeroboam, that the people of the Northern Kingdom might have local sanctuaries, and not have to visit Jerusalem for worship, and perhaps be there won over to their old allegiance. One effect this had was to make all who were faithful to Jehovah emigrate to the Kingdom of Judah, bringing it no mean accession of spiritual and even of political strength (I Kings 12:26-33; 13:33; II Chron. 10:16, 17). The first relations of the 2 rival kingdoms were naturally those of mutual hostility. This, doubtless, emboldened the neighboring nations to intermeddle in Jewish affairs, and in the 5th year of Rehoboam's reign Shishak, king of Egypt, plundered Jerusalem (I Kings 14:25-28; II Chron. 12:1-12). War between Judah and Israel went on intermittently during the first 60 years of their separate existence (I Kings 14:30; 15:7, 16; II Chron. 12:15; 13:2-20); after which, under Ahab and Jehoshaphat, not merely peace, but a political and family alliance took place between the 2 reigning houses. In consequence, the worship of Baal was introduced into Judah, and at last became a potent factor in the destruction of the kingdom. Two great parties were formed, the one attached to the worship of Jehovah, the other in favor of Baal and other foreign divinities. During the subsequent period of the Kingdom of Judah these parties were in continual conflict with each other, first one and then the other becoming temporarily dominant, according as the reigning monarch was its friend or its opponent. As at other periods of the theocracy, fidelity to Jehovah brought temporal as well as spiritual prosperity, while apostasy from him was attended by disaster. Among the good kings were Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, while Ahaz, Manasseh, and some others were conspicuously the opposite.

The foreign relations of the kingdom were important. Egypt was Judah's neighbor on the s.w., and was frequently involved in the affairs of Judah. The Egyptian kings Shishak and Zerah and, after a long interval, Necho warred with Judah. On the other hand, Egypt was regarded as a valuable ally against the great empires on the Tigris and Euphrates; yet the glorious past of Egypt rather gave false hopes to Judah, and the pro-Egyptian party in Jerusalem thus contributed to the fall of the nation. Egypt in the period of its decadence is aptly described by Rabshakeh (Isa. 36:6) as a bruised reed which will pierce the hand of him who leans upon it. In the final attack upon Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, the siege was temporarily raised, but resumed upon the defeat of an approaching Egyptian army. On the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, a large body of Jews found refuge in the country of the Nile (Jer., chs. 42 to 44).

In respect to the powerful nations on the Tigris and Euphrates, there was, of course, an Assyrian and a Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean period. The Assyrian period began in 734 B.C., when Ahaz invoked the aid of Tiglath-pileser against the allied kings of Israel and Syria, and afterward did homage to him at Damascus. After the Assyrian conquest of the Northern Kingdom in 722, Judah was exposed for nearly a century and a quarter to the greed and fury of the Assyrians, until Nineveh was overthrown in 612 B.C. Sargon, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal, 4 successors on the Assyrian throne, mention more or less extensive conquests of Judah. Three of these 4 kings are mentioned in the Hebrew records (Isa. 20:1; 36:1; 37:38), and apparently the 4th also (see OSNAPPAR). The Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean period began in 605, when Jehoiakim was subjugated by Nebuchadnezzar. In less than a score of years Jerusalem was in ruins and the people of Judah were deported to Babylonia. The divine promise to David did not preclude the temporary loss of the throne by his descendants.

The causes which led to the fall of Jerusalem and the Exile were: 1. Those causes which issued in the disruption of the kingdom and the fall of Samaria and left Judah solitary. See ISRAEL 3. 2. The neglect of God's command to exterminate the Canaanites. When the Israelites could not, or would not, utterly destroy the Canaanites, they preserved the leaven of corruption in their midst. 3. Social and political alliances with idolatrous peoples. 4. The loss of moral strength by apostasy and the loss of enthusiasm for a great cause on earth, the establishment of God's Kingdom. 5. Refusal to repent at the call of the prophets. 6. These agencies had wrought ruin to the state and to manhood; and when it was time for Judah to yield, the persistent resistance to the dominant empire made with the help of petty alliances was a short-sighted policy, and a mistaken estimate of the coming imperial power. Little Judah should not have been submissive to Assyria, but should have yielded to Babylon toward the last. Such was the exhortation of Jeremiah. From the very beginning of their national existence the Hebrew people needed to husband all their resources, physical and political, moral and spiritual, if their kingdom was to stand amidst the empires of the world. On the return from exile, Zerubbabel, a descendant of David, was the civil ruler; but he was only a local governor under the Persians. He was followed after a time by Nehemiah, also of the tribe of Judah. Except during the administration of these 2 men, the governor of the Persian province Beyond-the-river, of which Judah formed a part, was the responsible head. After the disruption of the empire of Alexander the Great, Judea belonged to Egypt and Syria in turn. The successful revolt of the Maccabees against the Syrians led to the establishment of a dynasty of priest-kings, who sprang from the tribe of Levi, but occupied the throne of David. See MACCABEES. They were succeeded by an Idumaeen dynasty, beginning with Herod the Great, ruling under the authority of the Romans. See HEROD 1, HISTORY, III. 4 (2), JERUSALEM, III. 2. When the scepter reverted to the house of David the kingdom was no longer temporal but spiritual, and the sovereign no earthly potentate, but the Son of God.

3. A Levite, among whose descendants was Kadmiel (Ezra 3:9). See HODAVIAH 4.

4. A Levite who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8).

5. A Levite, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23).

6. A Benjamite, son of Hassenuah, and second in command over the city of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9).

7. One who took part in the dedication of the wall, probably a prince of Judah (Neh. 12:34).

Ju'das (jōō'dàs), Ju'da; Gr. form of Heb. Judah. 1. Judah, son of Jacob (Matt. 1:2, 3, A.V.).

2. An ancestor of Jesus, who lived before the Exile (Luke 3:30, in A.V. Juda).

3. Judas Maccabaeus, 3d of the 5 sons of the priest Mattathias (I Macc. 2:1-5). His father, driven to desperation by the determination of Antiochus Epiphanes to force idolatry upon the Jews, began the struggle for religious liberty. On the death of Mattathias, in 166 B.C., Judas, in compliance with his father's wish, assumed the military leadership of the faithful Jews (chs. 2:66; 3:1). He entered immediately upon a career of victory. A combined Syrian and Samaritan army, under the command of Apollonius, advanced against him. He routed it, slew Apollonius, and took his sword (vs. 10, 11). Judas fought with this sword during the remainder of his life (v. 12). He defeated another Syrian army under Seron near Beth-horon (vs. 13-24), and, in 165 B.C., won a decisive battle with Gorgias near Emmaus (v. 27 to ch. 4:25). In the following year Antiochus sent a large army into Judea under the command of Lysias, but it was defeated by Judas at Beth-zur (Bethsura, ch. 4:26-34). In consequence of these successes, the Jews recovered control of the Temple (164 B.C.), purified it, and consecrated it anew (vs. 36-53). This event was celebrated by the annual feast of dedication (John 10:22). This Syrian war was followed by offensive operations under Judas and his brother Simon against hostile neighboring nations (I Macc. 5:9-54). Antiochus Eupator succeeded his father Antiochus Epiphanes on the throne of Syria, and reigned from 163 to 162 B.C. Under the guidance of Lysias he renewed the war with the Jews. Lysias defeated Judas at Beth-zacharias (ch. 6:23-47), and laid siege to Jerusalem (vs. 48-54), but was compelled by complications at home to conclude a peace with Judas and return to Antioch. The Jews acknowledged the suzerainty of Syria, but were promised the free exercise of their religion (vs. 55-61). Demetrius Soter, who reigned from 162 to 150 B.C., again favored the Grecian party among the Jews, and put the Hellenizer Alcimus into the high-priesthood (ch. 7:1-20). Judas resisted the efforts of this high priest (vs. 23, 24), and Demetrius sent an army under Nicanor to support Alcimus; but Nicanor was defeated at Capharsalama and again at Adasa near Beth-horon (vs. 26-50). During the brief peace which ensued Judas began negotiations with the Romans, and obtained from them assurances of friendship and assistance (ch. 8); but probably before the answer of the senate was returned, Demetrius sent another army under Bacchides into Judea in 160 B.C. Judas offered valiant resistance to the invaders at Elasa, but his troops were worsted and he himself was slain (ch. 9:1-18). His body was recovered by his brothers, and buried in the family sepulcher at Modin (v. 19). It was some time before the patriotic party recovered from the demoralization caused by their defeat and the death of their leader, but at length they offered the command to Judas' brother Jonathan (vs. 23-31).

4. Son of Chalphi and one of the 2 captains who stood by Jonathan Maccabaeus at Hazor when all the rest had fled, and enabled him to retrieve the day (I Macc. 11:70).

5. A son of Simon Maccabaeus (I Macc. 16:2). His father devolved the command of the army upon him and his brother John, and sent them against Cendebaeus. The 2 brothers gained a great victory over the Syrian general near Kidron, not far from Ashdod (vs. 2-10). Judas was wounded in the battle (v. 9). In 134 B.C., about 3 years later, he and his brother Mattathias were treacherously murdered in the castle of Dok by a kinsman by marriage, either at a feast at the same time that their father Simon was assassinated (vs. 14-17) or a little later (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 7; 8, 1).

6. Judas of Galilee, who, in the days of the enrollment, raised a revolt; but he perished, and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered abroad (Acts 5:37; cf. Luke 2:2). Josephus calls him several times a Galilean, but once a Gaulonite, of the city of Gamala, implying that he was from Gaulonitis, e. of the Jordan. It appears that, with the support of a Pharisee called Sadduc, Judas imbued his countrymen with the belief that the enrollment under Quirinius was the commencement of their reduction to a state of servitude. He founded a philosophic sect whose chief tenet was that their only ruler and lord was God (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 1 and 6; War ii. 8, 1). Josephus states that Judas succeeded in making some of the Jews revolt, and implies, but does not directly mention, that he lost his life. He expressly states, however, that his sons were slain (Antiq. xx. 5, 2). The indirect consequence of this attempt was the rise of the party of zealots, who largely contributed to the disturbances which provoked the Jewish war of A.D. 66-70.

7. Judas Iscariot, son of Simon Iscariot (John 6:71, R.V.), and the apostle who betrayed his divine Lord. By being surnamed Iscariot he is distinguished from another of the Twelve who was named Judas (Luke 6:16; John 14:22). The surname is generally interpreted as signifying that he came originally from Kerioth (see ISCARIOT), and may thus indicate that he was not a Galilean. Judged by his character, he followed Jesus probably because he expected to derive earthly advantage from the establishment of Christ's Kingdom. Jesus, without naming any person, early referred to the future act of treason which one of the Twelve would commit (John 6:70). Judas was appointed to keep the bag, but he yielded to dishonesty, and appropriated part of the money to himself. When Mary of Bethany in her affection for Jesus broke the alabaster box of precious ointment and anointed him, Judas was the spokesman of himself and others in denouncing what he considered extravagance, not that he cared for the poor, but that he wished the price of the ointment to be put into the bag, whence he could help himself as he had done before (John 12:5, 6). Jesus mildly reproved him; but the rebuke aroused his resentment, and he went to the chief priests and offered to betray Jesus to them for a price. They agreed with him on 30 pieces of silver, about $19.50, an ordinary price for a slave. From that time Judas sought an opportunity to deliver Jesus to them (Matt. 26:14-16; Mark 14:10, 11; cf. Ex. 21:32; Zech. 11:12, 13). At the passover supper Jesus, in order to carry out his design of being crucified at the feast, pointed out the traitor. The Devil had already put into the heart of Judas to betray his Master (John 13:2). When Jesus solemnly said, "One of you shall betray me," each disciple asked, "Is it I, Lord?" Peter beckoned to John to ask Christ who it was. Jesus replied enigmatically that it was one of those that were dipping with him in the dish* (Matt. 26:23; Mark 14:20), one to whom he would give the sop (John 13:26, R.V.): in other words, his own familiar friend, one who ate bread with him (v. 18; cf. Ps. 41:9). Jesus and Judas, it would seem, were dipping together in the dish, and Jesus dipped the sop that he then held in his hand and gave it to Judas (John 13:26). After the sop Satan entered into Judas (v. 27). He also asked* "Is it I, Rabbi?" Jesus answered: "Thou hast said," which was the equivalent of "yes" (Matt. 26:21-25, R.V.). Even yet the disciples did not know just what Jesus meant, and when he added, "What thou doest, do quickly," they supposed that this was a direction to the treasurer to lose no time in buying some articles of which they had need. The traitor went at once to the chief priests.* He was present at the supper and partook of it with the Twelve (Matt. 26:20); but he went out immediately after receiving the sop (John 13:30). The Eucharist was instituted after the supper (Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:19, 20). Luke in narrating the events of the supper, changes the actual order that he may place the spirit of Christ and the spirit of the disciples in contrast (ch. 22:15-20 and vs. 21-24). After the departure of Judas the tone of Jesus' conversation changes. When supper was ended he led the Eleven to the Garden of Gethsemane. Thither Judas came, accompanied by a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders. In accordance with a sign that had been agreed upon, in order to point out Jesus to the soldiers, Judas advanced and saluted Jesus with a kiss, and Jesus was seized (Matt. 26: 47-50). The next morning, when Judas, now in calmer mood, saw that Jesus was condemned and was likely to be put to death, he awoke to the enormity of his guilt and went to the chief priests with the confession, "I have sinned in that I betrayed innocent blood," and offered to return the money.*His conscience was not so seared as the consciences of the chief priests, who, having seduced the erring apostle into his great sin, then turned round on him and said, "What is that to us? see thou to it." On which he cast down the silver pieces in the Temple, and went and hanged himself. (Matt. 27:3-5), "and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out" (Acts 1:18). Acts 1:20 quotes Ps. 69:25 and 109:8; Judas was the antitype of the man who requited love with treachery; the quotation from Scripture is the sanction for filling his office by the election of another apostle.

8. One of the 12 apostles, carefully distinguished from Judas Iscariot (John 14:22). He was son or perhaps brother of James (Luke 6:16; Acts 1:13; see R.V. text and margin). He was also called Thaddaeus, for this name is found in other lists in the place corresponding to his (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18). The received text of Matt. 10:3 has 'Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus.'

9. One of the 4 brethren of the Lord (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3, in A.V. Juda), and probably the author of The Epistle of Jude. See BRETHREN OF THE LORD, JUDE.

10. A man who lived at Damascus, in the street called Straight, and with whom Paul lodged just after his conversion (Acts 9:11).

11. Judas, surnamed Barsabbas. He was a leading man in the church at Jerusalem, and was chosen with Silas to accompany Barnabas and Paul to Antioch, bearing the letter from the council at Jerusalem to the churches of Syria and Cilicia. He had prophetic gifts. His subsequent history is unknown (Acts 15:22, 27, 32). He bears the same surname as the disciple Joseph, who was proposed for the apostleship, and may have been his brother (ch. 1:23).

Jude (jōōd). An English form of the name Judas, given to the writer of The Epistle of Jude (v. 1). He describes himself simply as "brother of James," by whom the author of The Epistle of James and leader of the church in Jerusalem seems to be meant. In this case Jude should be a brother of the Lord, and not an apostle; and these inferences seem borne out by the presence of a Judas in the lists of our Lord's brethren (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3), and by the apparent implication of v. 17 of his epistle that its writer was not an apostle. Except his bare name, nothing is recorded of him beyond what we may infer from the facts that the brethren of the Lord did not believe on him during his life on earth (John 7:5) and that after his resurrection they were his followers (Acts 1:14). According to Hegesippus (c. 110-c. 180), who is quoted by Eusebius (H.E. iii. 20), 2 grandsons of Jude, the brother of the Lord, were brought before Domitian as descendants of David, but they were dismissed as harmless peasants. This story confirms the possible inference from I Cor. 9:5 that Jude was married, and implies that he was dead before A.D. 80.

The Epistle of Jude names its author as Judas, a bondservant of Jesus Christ and brother of James (v. 1); that is probably Judas, the brother of the Lord (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3). Its address is quite general: "To them that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ" (Jude 1). In the vocabulary of Jude there is the obvious Christian element; certain words, largely through the teaching and writings of Paul, had acquired a fixed and recognized meaning among Greek-speaking Christians. The author also knew the language of the LXX. A remarkable feature of this book is the use made of pseudepigraphical literature. Thus vs. 14 and 15 are an almost exact quotation from the Book of Enoch (ch. 1:9). In v. 9 Jude refers to an incident recorded in the Assumption of Moses. Certain parallels in thought also suggest an acquaintance with the Testament of Moses.

According to the generally accepted view, the letter was largely used by II Peter, ch. 2; vs. 4-18, with the exceptions of vs. 14 and 15, are represented in II Peter, chs. 2:1 to 3:3. So it must have been written before II Peter, but probably not much before, and it seems natural to date it about A.D. 66. Those scholars who hold the genuineness of II Peter, but contend for its priority to Jude, are apt to date The Epistle of Jude between the death of Peter, c. A.D. 68, and the accession of the Roman emperor Domitian in A.D. 81. The reason for fixing upon A.D. 81 as the limit is found in the ancient tradition, quoted above from Hegesippus, from which it appears that Jude, the Lord's brother, had died before or at latest early in the reign of Domitian.

The epistle was called out by the outbreak among Jude's readers of an alarming heresy with immoral tendencies, probably something like the incipient Gnosticism rebuked in the Pastoral Epistles and the Apocalypse (vs. 3, 4, 10, 15, 16, 18), and was designed to save the churches addressed from its inroads. Jude attempts to encourage Christians to hold the faith once for all delivered to them against those who, though appearing to be Christians, have in practice denied the Lord. After the address (vs. 1, 2) the letter assigns the reason for its writing (vs. 3, 4) and then announces the condemnation in store for the false teachers (vs. 5-16); afterward it divulges the duty of true Christians in the circumstances (vs. 17-23), concluding with a rich and appropriate doxology (vs. 24, 25). Owing doubtless to its brevity, there are no very clear traces of the use of Jude in the very earliest fathers of the Church. In the latter part of the 2d century, however, it is found in full use in the Greek and Latin churches alike. It is included in the Old Latin version, listed in the Muratorian fragment, quoted and referred to as Jude's by Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian and later by Origen, and was clearly from the beginning a part of the Christian canon.

Judge. 1. A civil magistrate (Ex. 21:22; Deut. 16:18). On the advice of his father-in-law, and in order to relieve himself of overwork, Moses organized the judiciary of Israel; henceforth he himself acted only in matters of great importance, and for the adjudication of cases of less moment he assigned a judge to each 1,000, to each 100, to each 50, and to each 10 (Ex. 18:13-26). All the tribal subdivision heads already existed, and were known as princes and elders, who possessed civil and religious authority. In the judicial system which he organized Moses included these officials, and they retained under the new regulations their hereditary function of judging (Deut. 1:15-17; cf. 21:2, and see THOUSAND). Before his death Moses gave directions that the Israelites, on settling in Canaan, should appoint judges and officers in all their towns, with instructions to refer matters too difficult for these magistrates to the priests (chs. 16:18-20; 17:2-13; 19:15-20; cf. Josh. 8:33; 23:2; 24:1; I Sam. 8:1). With the establishment of the kingdom the king became the supreme judge in civil matters (II Sam. 15:2; I Kings 3:9, 28; 7:7; cf. I Sam. 8:5). David assigned Levites to the judicial office, and appointed 6,000 as officers and judges (I Chron. 23:4; 26:29). Jehoshaphat organized the judiciary in Judah still further, setting judges in the fortified cities, with a supreme court at Jerusalem, consisting of Levites, priests, and the heads of fathers' houses under the presidency of the high priest in religious matters and of the prince of Judah in civil matters (II Chron. 19:5-8).

The judges' activities, however, were not limited to judicial functions. The word judges is often parallel to kings (cf. Ps. 2:10; 148:11; Prov. 8:15, 16; Isa. 33:22; 40:23; Amos 2:3). The chief magistrate of the Carthaginians, who corresponded to the Roman consul, was called in Latin sufes (pl. sufetes), which is cognate with Hebrew shôphêṭ, judge. This usage explains the meaning of JUDGE 2.

2. A man whom God raised up to lead a revolt against foreign oppressors and who, having freed the nation and shown thereby his call of God, was looked to by the people to maintain their rights. The judges numbered 12, not including Abimelech, who was a petty king (ch. 9). They were Othniel of Judah, deliverer of Israel from the king of Mesopotamia; Ehud, who expelled the Moabites and Ammonites; Shamgar, smiter of 600 Philistines and savior of Israel; Deborah, associated with Barak, who led Naphtali and Zebulun to victory against the n. Canaanites; Gideon, who drove the Midianites from the territory of Israel; Tola and Jair; Jephthah, subduer of the Ammonites; Izan, Elon, Abdon, and Samson, the troubler of the Philistines. Eli and Samuel also judged Israel (I Sam. 4:18; 7:15), but the former acted in his official capacity as high priest and the latter as a prophet of Jehovah. These judges did not form an unbroken succession of rulers, but appeared sporadically. They were often local heroes, discharging their duties in restricted districts. According to the chronology of The Book of Judges, the total of years listed amounts to 410. Obviously this is too high and is inconsistent with I Kings 6:1, which reckons 480 years from the Exodus to the 4th year of Solomon. It must be borne in mind that some of the oppressions and not a few of the judges were evidently contemporaneous and overlapped. Shamgar, for example, was contemporary with Ehud, for the account of his exploit is inserted in the midst of the narrative of Ehud's work (Judg. 3:31); and a Philistine oppression of Judah was coeval with the Ammonite domination e. of Jordan and attack on Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim (ch. 10:7). See CHRONOLOGY, III.

These facts throw light on the distracted state of the nation during the period of the Judges. The political districts, moreover, are found to be those that were separated by the Jordan and by the heathen barrier between Judah and the n. The song of Deborah and the history of Jephthah show the laxity of the bonds which united the tribes, and make known what tribes were able and willing to join forces and fortunes (cf. chs. 6; 8:1-9; 12:1-6). The isolation of Judah is remarkable; see JUDAH. But there were centralizing influences at work. National feeling existed, for the war of extermination waged against Benjamin shows the sense of national guilt and national responsibility. There was one Ark for all the tribes in the national tabernacle at Shiloh (Josh. 18:1; Judg. 21:19; cf. Ex. 23:14-17). It was carried to Beth-el, where the tribes had gathered for battle and would worship the Lord and ask counsel of him (Judg. 20:18-29). Great oppressions united the people in common misery and called for united action; great deliverers united the hearts of the people in loyalty and pride about one head; and great deliverances, obtained by united action, bound tribes together in common glory.

The period of the Judges has been called Israel's iron age. It was a cruel, barbarous, and bloody epoch. In fact a state of anarchy is suggested (chs. 17:6; 21:25) in the statement: "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes." The people frequently lapsed into idolatry, and worship at the sanctuary was rendered difficult by the distracted state of the country. Ruthlessness and cruelty were displayed in Jael's murder of Sisera, in Jephthah's foolish vow and sacrifice of his daughter, in Gideon's treatment of the men of Succoth, in the sin of the men of Gibeah. Against these shadows, however, there stand out brightly the trust and filial piety of Jephthah's daughter, the fidelity of Ruth to Naomi, and the kindly and upright character of Boaz.

Judg'es, The Book of. A historical book of the O.T. following The Book of Joshua. It continues the narrative from his death, and consists of 3 parts:

I. Introduction: departure of the tribes to occupy the districts allotted to them (see Josh., chs. 15 to 21), and a list of the towns left by them in the possession of the Canaanite idolaters (Judg., chs. 1 to 2:5).

II. History of the judges as saviors of Israel, from the death of Joshua to that of Samson (chs. 2:6 to 16:31). This section has its own introduction, which, in forming a connection with The Book of Joshua, summarizes the events of the period and points out the religious lesson (chs. 2:6 to 3:6); then follows the more or less detailed accounts of 6 judges and brief mention of other 6. The assumption of kingship by Abimelech, son of Gideon, is recorded as an integral part of the history, although he was a petty king rather than a judge, and was not a savior of Israel.

III. An appendix giving 2 incidents of the period, viz., Micah's image worship and its establishment among the Danites who migrated to the n. (chs. 17; 18), and the outrage of Gibeah and the consequent war of the Israelites against Benjamin for its punishment (chs. 19 to 21).

The date of the composition of The Book of Judges is difficult to determine. At any rate, the following facts must be considered. All schools of criticism at present acknowledge the great antiquity of the song of Deborah, and that it is practically contemporary with the event which it celebrates. This section, the 2d and main portion of the book, could not have been written until after the death of Samson (ch. 16:30, 31). In the appendix, the recurring expression, "In those days there was no king in Israel," points to the composition of these chapters at least after the establishment of the kingdom. The tabernacle was no longer at Shiloh (ch. 18:31) when they were written. The mention of the "captivity of the land" (ch. 18:30) has been interpreted as a reference to the ravages of Tiglath-pileser in the n. (II Kings 15:29), or to the deportation of the 10 tribes after the fall of Samaria. There arises a difficulty, however, in the parallel statement (Judg. 18:31), "All the time that the house of God was in Shiloh," and so from the time of David Kimchi (c. A.D. 1160-1235) many interpreters have understood the captivity of the land to refer to the capture of the Ark by the Philistines, when Jehovah forsook Shiloh. Several expositors have adopted the conjecture of Houbigant (1777) that the last letter in the phrase, "Captivity of the land," has become corrupt, and that the Hebrew text originally had nun (n) instead of sādē (s), which would then read, "Captivity of the Ark." Keil thinks that the reference is to a conquest of the land of the n. Danites and enslavement of its population by the neighboring Syrians of Damascus. Any of these suppositions is beset by fewer difficulties than the assumption that Micah's image worship continued until the fall of Samaria. The expression, "From Dan even to Beer-sheba" (Judg. 20:1), was appropriate even in the times of the Judges. The indications of time found in the appendix point to the period before David's reign over all Israel. The general introduction to the book, or at any rate some of its source material, was written while the Jebusites still occupied the stronghold at Jerusalem (Judg. 1:21; cf. II Sam. 5:6, 7). According to Jewish tradition, the book was written by Samuel, but this view is not held by critical scholars. The 3 parts, as outlined above, represent clear divisions and indicate that documents were used by a redactor in compiling the present work or an earlier form of it. These documents, it is believed, were based on older oral and written sources, and thus the history of that period was preserved. It is generally held by critics that the editor of the 2d section was influenced by the teachings of Deuteronomy. It is not known who the final editor was that united the 3 parts into one book.

As the analysis of the work shows, these histories were gathered and placed in their present framework in order to exhibit their religious teaching and serve as an admonition to subsequent ages. In this book we learn that the various nationalities, who lived in Canaan, were not exterminated, but continued to live with the Israelites in the land. In consequence of pagan influences the worship of Jehovah was endangered, but enough Israelites remained loyal to God to preserve the true religion (ch. 10:10-16; for the neighboring peoples cf. chs. 1:19-36; 3:13, 31; 6:3-33). The song of Deborah and the national uprising to punish the perpetrators and abettors of the crime of Gibeah reveal the consciousness of the participants that they were engaged in sacred warfare. The book shows by stern precept and example the consequences of forsaking the true worship of God.

Judg'ment Hall. See PRAETORIUM.

Ju'dith (jōō'dīth) [Heb., fem. of Y'hūdī, Judean, Jew]. 1. A wife of Esau and daughter of Beeri, the Hittite (Gen. 26:34). She was also called Oholibamah (ch. 36:2; see ANAH 1).

2. Heroine of the book of Judith; see APOC-RYPHA 4.

Ju'l'ia (jōō'l'yá) [Lat., fem. of Julius]. A Christian woman at Rome (Rom. 16:15), not unlikely the wife of Philologus.

Jul'ius (jōō'l'yūs) [Lat., name of a Roman clan]. A centurion of the Augustan band, employed to conduct Paul and other prisoners to Rome (Acts 27:1). He showed courtesy to the apostle, allowing him to visit his friends at Sidon (v. 3). At Crete he did not believe Paul's prediction of the coming storm (v. 11), but after the tempest broke he heeded Paul's advice and kept the sailors from forsaking the ship (v. 31). When the vessel was wrecked, the guard wanted to kill the prisoners lest any should escape; but he forbade the butchery, desiring to save Paul (vs. 42, 43).

Ju'n'ias (jōō'nī-ās), in A.V. Ju'n'ia (jōō'nī-á). A Jewish Christian at Rome, a kinsman and fellow prisoner of Paul, and in Christ before him (Rom. 16:7).

Ju'n'iper. Not the coniferous tree of the genus Juniperus, of which several species occur in Lebanon, Galilee, and Bashan, but a leguminous plant (Retama raetam), an almost leafless broom (I Kings 19:4, 5; Job 30:4; Ps. 120:4); cf. J.V. and R.V. marg. See BROOM.

Ju'pi-ter (jōō'pī-tēr). The supreme god of the Romans. He corresponded to the Zeus of the Greeks, and in the only part of the N.T. in which the name is introduced (Acts 14:12, 13) the Greek text has Zeus. Zeus had a noted temple at Olympia in Elis (Herod. ii. 7), from which he derived his designation of Olympius. Antiochus Epiphanes erected a temple to him under that title at Athens and dedicated the temple at Jerusalem to Jupiter Olympius. According to Josephus, at the request of the Samaritans he called the sanctuary on Gerizim by the name of Jupiter, the Protector of strangers (II Macc. 6:2; Jos. Antiq. xii. 5, 5). The worship of Jupiter, which Paul and Barnabas met with at Lystra, existed at the time over the whole Greek and Roman world. He had temples and a priesthood; garlands were presented to him, as were also offerings of other kinds, and oxen and sheep were sacrificed to propitiate his favor.

Ju'shab-he'sed (jōō'shāb-hē'sēd) [loving-kindness is returned or requited]. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

Jus'tus (jūs'tūs) [Lat., just, righteous]. 1. A surname of Joseph, the unsuccessful candidate for the apostleship rendered vacant by the fall of the unworthy Judas (Acts 1:23).

2. A godly man of Corinth, whose house adjoined the synagogue, and with whom Paul lodged (Acts 18:7). His fuller name was Titus Justus (R.V.).

3. The surname of a Jew called Jesus, who joined Paul in sending salutations to the Colossians (Col. 4:11).

Ju'tah (jōō'tá) and Ju'tah (jūt'á) [extended, inclined]. A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, and doubtless in their vicinity (Josh. 15:55). With its suburbs it was assigned to the priests (ch. 21:16). It is now called Yattā (Yut'tā), and stands on a low eminence, about 5½ miles s. by w. of Hebron. It has been suggested that Jutah was the city of Judah in the hill country to which Mary went to visit Elisabeth (Luke 1:39), and that Judah (Iouda) has been substituted for Jutah (Iouta). The more common conjecture, however, is that Hebron was the city of Elisabeth, but we do not know the birthplace of John the Baptist.

K

Kab (kāb), in A.V. Cab [a hollow vessel]. A Heb. dry and liquid measure (II Kings 6:25). It held ⅓ of a seah or ⅓ of a homer and was equal to about 2 quarts. See MEASURE, III.

Kab'ze-el (kāb'zē-ēl) [(whom) God gathers]. A city in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:21). It was the home of David's heroic supporter Benaiah (II Sam. 23:20; I Chron. 11:22). The town was inhabited after the Exile (Neh. 11:25; where it is once called by the synonymous name of Jekabzeel). Probably to be identified with Khirbet Hōra.

Ka'desh (kā'dēsh) [consecrated], including Ka'desh-bar'nea (kā'dēsh-bār'nē-ā). 1. A fountain, city or town, and wilderness on the s. frontier of Judah and of Palestine (Num. 20:16; 34:4; Josh. 15:3; Ps. 29:8; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28); distinguished as Kadesh-barnea from other places bearing the name Kadesh (cf. Num. 13:26 with ch. 32:8; cf. Deut. 1:19 with ch. 46). At an early period it was called En-mishpat or Fountain of Judgment (Gen. 14:7). It was in the wilderness of Paran (Num. 13:3, 26), in the wilderness of Zin (ch. 20:1; 27:14), 11 days' journey from Sinai by way of Mount Seir (Deut. 1:2), in the uttermost of the border of Edom (Num. 20:16). It appears to have been not a great distance from the highway between Palestine and Egypt, for Hagar's well was situated between Kadesh and Bered, and on the road to Egypt (Gen. 16:7, 14; cf. ch. 20:1). The place was overrun by Chedorlaomer (ch. 14:7). Into the region adjacent Hagar fled (ch. 16:7, 14), and Abraham sojourned there for a time (ch. 20:1). The Israelites, during their wanderings, twice encamped at Kadesh. They arrived in the neighborhood in the 2d year about the 5th month (Num. 13:20; cf. 10:11), sent thence the spies into Canaan, received the discouraging report there about the difficulties of conquest (Gen. 13:26), refused to advance, and were condemned to remain in the wilderness, and abode at Kadesh many days (Deut. 1:46). They returned to Kadesh in the 1st month (Num. 20:1) of the 40th year (ch. 33:36, 38; cf. Deut. 2:7, 14). Here Miriam died and was buried (Num. 20:1); and here Moses smote the rock that water might gush out, as, in similar circumstances, it had done at Rephidim (ch. 20:1-13); see MERIBAH 1. But he and Aaron sinned in acting in their own name. From Kadesh ambassadors were sent to the king of Edom to ask permission for the Israelites to pass through his territory (ch. 20:14, 16, 22; Judg. 11:16, 17). The place has been identified with 'Ain Kādīs, which is about 77 miles to the s. of Hebron and 51 miles s. of Beer-sheba. The spring, which is of sweet water, issues from under a rugged spur of rock belonging to the n.e. mountain range w. of the 'Arabah. The stream is copious and is intercepted in its course by 2 or 3 wells built round with masonry. Then after traversing the oasis which it has created, it is finally lost in the desert beyond. See KEDESH 1.

2. The name is perhaps contained in "the land of Tahtim-hodshi" (II Sam. 24:6), corrected by means of Lucian's text (Greek) to "the land of the Hittites, toward Kadesh."

Kad'miel (kā'd-mī-ēl) [God is in front (as leader)]. A Levite, head of a tribal house, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43; 12:8). He helped to oversee the workmen engaged in rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 3:9). The representative of the house sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:9), perhaps being the same person who had previously assisted in the public confession (Neh. 9:4, 5).

Kad'mon-ites (kā'd-mōn-its) [people of the east]. A tribe dwelling somewhere between Egypt and the Euphrates (Gen. 15:19), probably in the Syrian desert.

Kain (kān) [smith]. 1. The tribal name from which the more familiar Gentile adjective Kenite is derived (R.V. of Num. 24:22; Judg. 4:11 marg.). See KENITE.

2. A village in Judah, in A.V. spelled Cain (Josh. 15:57); perhaps it was an old settlement of the Kenites. See CAIN 3.

Ka'lai (kā'lā-i) [swift]. A priest, head of the father's house of Sallai in the time of Joiakim, the high priest (Neh. 12:20).

Ka'mon (kā'mōn); in A.V. Ca'mon. The place where the judge Jair the Gileadite was buried (Judg. 10:5), probably Kamm in Gilead. Eusebius and Jerome locate it in the Plain of Esdraelon, between Megiddo and Acre; but presumably it was in Gilead, as Josephus states (Jos. Antig. v. 7, 6). Polybius mentions a town Kamous which was taken by Antiochus in his war with Ptolemy Philopator, immediately after he had captured Scythopolis and at the same time that he took Pella, Abila, Gadara, and other places in Gilead (Polybius Hist. v. 70, 12).

Ka'nah (kā'nā) [place of reeds]. 1. A brook which formed part of the boundary line between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:8; 17:9). Robinson identified it with the wadi Kānah, which rises s. of Shechem and joins the 'Aujah, the combined streams falling into the Mediterranean 4 miles n. of Joppa. This seems too far s., but the identity of the ancient and modern names is in its favor.

2. A town on the boundary of Asher (Josh. 19:28), probably modern Kānā, about 7 miles s.e. of Tyre.

Kaph (kāf). See CAPH.

Ka-re'ah (kā-rē-ā), in A.V. once Ca-re'ah [bald]. Father of the captains Johanan and Jonathan, who came to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor of Judah (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

Kar'ka (kār'ká), in A.V. Kar'ka-a (kār'-kā-ā), retaining the final syllable which denotes direction [floor, ground, bottom]. A place on the s. boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:3).

Kar'kor (kār'kōr) [cf. Arab. karḳar, soft, even ground]. A place e. of the Jordan, where Zebah and Zalmunna encamped with their army (Judg. 8:10).

Kar'tah (kār'tā) [city]. A town of Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:34); identified with 'Athlit, on the seacoast about 9 miles s. of the headland of Carmel.

Kar'tan (kār'tān) [town, city]. A town of Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:32). Called in I Chron. 6:76 Kirjathaim, A.V. Kirjathaim. Identified with Khirbet el-Kureiyeh, n.e. of 'Ain Ibl.

Kat'tath (kāt'āth). A town of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15); identified sometimes with Kitron of Judg. 1:30, and sometimes with Kartah.

Ke'dar (kē'dēr) [probably, mighty; cf. Arab. ḳadara (to be able), but also to be considered is Heb. ḳādar (to be dark)]. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:13), children of the e., dwelling in black tents, possessing flocks and camels (S. of Sol. 1:5; Isa. 60:7; Jer. 49:28, 29), and having villages also in the wilderness (Isa. 42:11). They were an Arabian tribe (Isa. 21:13, 16; Ezek. 27:21). They were ruled by princes (ibid.), and were skillful in archery (Isa. 21:16, 17). They dwelt between Arabia Petraea and Babylonia, and are called the Cedrei by Pliny.

Ked'e-mah (kē'dē-mā) [toward the east]. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chron. 1:31).

Ked'e-moth (kē'dē-mōth) [ancient places or eastern parts]. A city e. of the Jordan, near the wilderness (Deut. 2:26), allotted to the Reubenites (Josh. 13:18) and assigned to the Merarite Levites for residence (ch. 21:37; I Chron. 6:79). The preferred location is Kaṣr ez-Za'ferān, about 2½ miles n.w. of el-Medeiyeh, but consideration is also given to Khirbet er-Remeil, 2½ miles w.s.w. of el-Medeiyeh.

Ke'desh (kē'dēsh) [sacred place, sanctuary]. 1. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:23), possibly Kadesh-barnea (v. 3), but Dillmann identifies it with Kādūs, s. of Hebron, 1 day's journey by caravan.

2. A town of the Canaanites taken by Thothmes III, later by Joshua after the defeat of its king (Josh. 11:12; 12:22), allotted to the tribe of Naphtali (ch. 19:37) and, to distinguish it from other towns of the name, called Kedesh-naphtali (Judg. 4:6; Tobit 1:2) and Kedesh in Galilee (Josh. 20:7), given to the Gershonite Levites for their residence, and made a city of refuge (Josh. 21:32). It was the residence of Barak (Judg. 4:6). Its inhabitants were removed to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 15:29). Jonathan defeated the army of Demetrius there (I Macc. 11:63, 73; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 6). Identified with Kades in Upper Galilee, about 4½ miles n.w. of Lake of Hüleh and 26 miles e. of Tyre.

3. A city of Issachar given to the Gershonite Levites (I Chron. 6:72; in Josh. 21:28 Kishon, A.V. Kishon); identified with Tell Abū Kedeis, 2½ miles s.e. of Megiddo. See KISHION.

Ke'he'la'thah (kê'hê-lā'thā) [an assembly]. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:22, 23), probably at Kuntilet Krayeh, also called 'Ajrūd, near Bir el-Māyen.

Ke'l'lah (kê-l'ld). A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:44; I Chron. 4:19). The Philistines fought against it, but David attacked them and delivered the town. Nevertheless he did not remain in the town when Saul approached, lest the men of Kellah should surrender him to Saul (I Sam. 23:1-13). The town was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 3:17, 18). Probably to be identified with Khirbet Kīlā, 8½ miles n.w. of Hebron.

Ke-la'iah (kê-lā'yā). See KELITA.

Kel'ita (kêl'i-tā) [perhaps, dwarf; cf. Arab. ḥulāf]. A Levite, called also Kelailah, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23). He was employed with others by him to read and interpret the law to the people (Neh. 8:7), and with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (ch. 10:10).

Kem'u-el (kēm'ū-ēl) [perhaps, congregation of God]. 1. Son of Nahor and Milcah, and head of a younger branch of the Aramaeans (Gen. 22:21).

2. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim and a commissioner for the allotment of Canaan (Num. 34:24).

3. A Levite, father of Hashabiah (I Chron. 27:17).

Ke'nan (kē'nān), in R.V. of O.T. and once in A.V. (I Chron. 1:2); in A.V., and R.V. of N.T., Ca'i'nan (Cai'nan). 1. Son of Enos (Gen. 5:9-14; I Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37, 38).

2. Son of Arphaxad, and father of Shelah (Luke 3:36, R.V.). The corresponding genealogy of Gen. 10:24; 11:12 has no Cainan; the LXX, however, has, and Luke quotes from it.

Ke'nath (kē'nāth) [possession]. A town on the w. slope of the Jebel Hauran, on the extreme n.e. border of Israelitish territory. It was the most easterly of the 10 cities of the Decapolis, and is generally identified with Kanawāt, 16 miles n.e. of Bostra (Bozrah). It was taken by Nobah, probably a Manassite, who called it after his own name (Num. 32:42). The new name, however, did not permanently supplant the old one. The town passed again into Gentile hands (I Chron. 2:23). Herod the Great was defeated here by the Arabians (Jos. War i. 19, 2).

Ke'naz (kē'nāz). 1. A descendant of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen. 36:9, 11). He became a chieftain in Mount Seir (v. 15), probably taking his title from the clan which he ruled (vs. 40-43). The reference in Josh. 15:17; I Chron. 4:13 is probably likewise to the tribe. See KENIZZITE.

2. A descendant of Caleb, son of Jephunneh (I Chron. 4:15).

Ke'nez-ite (kē'nēz-īt). See KENIZZITE.

Ke'nite (kē'nīt) [smith]. A tribe of which a branch dwelt in Canaan or vicinity in the time of Abraham, apparently closely allied to the Kenizzites and the Amalekites (Gen. 15:19; Num. 24:20-22); another portion of the same people was in Midian, and by the time of Moses had become incorporated with the Midianites (Judg. 1:16; 4:11; cf. Num. 10:29). Long before the advent of the Israelites, the presence of the mineral deposits in the wadi 'Arabah was known, and the mines in all probability were exploited by the Kenites and Edomites. As their name implies, the Kenites were smiths by occupation. Balaam's parable implies that the Kenites were at home in Edom and in the wadi 'Arabah (Num. 24:20-22). Apparently before the conquest of Canaan the Kenites dwelt in the rugged, rocky country n.e. of the Amalekites and to the e. and s.e. of Hebron. Hobab the Midianite, of the family of the Kenites, accompanied the Israelites on their march from Mount Sinai to Canaan to aid them with his knowledge of the country (Num. 10:29-32). When the Israelites crossed the Jordan, encamped at Gilgal, and took Jericho, Hobab's family pitched their tents at Jericho; but after the conquest of Canaan they cast in their lot with the tribe of Judah, and settled in the wilderness of Judah, s. of Arad and s.e. of Hebron (Judg. 1:16). This choice perhaps indicates that they were indeed a branch of the old Kenite tribe of Canaan and sought the home of their forefathers. One Kenite, however, did not care to dwell with his brethren in the s., but took up his abode near Kedesh in Naphtali (Judg. 4:11). The Kenites who settled in the s. of Judah were still there in friendly relations with the Israelites in the time of Saul and David (I Sam. 15:6; 27:10; 30:29). They had their registry with Judah (I Chron. 2:55). The presence of individual Kenites in Judah and Israel may be explained on the supposition that they were itinerant smiths. See AMALEKITES, KENIZZITE.

Ken'izzite (kē'niz-īt), in A.V. Ke'nezite, save once (Gen. 15:19). One of the tribes in or near Canaan in the time of Abraham (Gen. 15:19). Found settled in Mount Seir, it became subject to the victorious descendants of Esau, when they took possession of the country (Deut. 2:12), amalgamated with the conquerors, and looked to one of Esau's descendants as its head. This chieftain was known as Kenaz from the tribe which he ruled (Gen. 36:11, 15, 40-42). The name of one of the descendants of Kenaz, Ge-harashim (I Chron. 4:14), suggests that the Kenizzites lived in the Valley of Smiths, which may be identified with the wadi 'Arabah. See IR-NAHASH. Individuals of the tribe united with the sons of Jacob, Jephunneh the Kenizzite apparently taking to wife a woman of the tribe of Judah, and Othniel the Kenizzite becoming the first judge of Israel after the Conquest. See CALEB 2.

Ke're' (kê-rā', kê-rē') [Aram. passive participle, ḥere' (what is to be) read]. A variant or official reading of a Hebrew word appearing in the margin of a MS. or an edition of the Hebrew Bible, which in the opinion of the Jewish critics (Masoretes) is to be substituted or read for what is in the text (the kethib q.v.).

Ker'en-hap'puch (kēr'ēn-hāp'ūk) [the horn of antimony (eye paint)]. The youngest of Job's 3 daughters born after his great trial (Job. 42:14).

Ke'ri-oth (kêr'i-ôth), in A.V. once Kir'i-oth (Amos 2:2) [cities]. 1. A town in the extreme s. of Judah, Kerieth-hezron (Josh. 15:25). The same as Hazor 3 (q.v.).

2. A town of Moab (Moabite Stone, 13, see MOABITE STONE; Jer. 48:24), apparently fortified (v. 41). It possessed palaces (Amos 2:2). It is supposed to be a synonym of Ar, the ancient capital of Moab, because it seems to be referred to as the capital (ibid.), and because in enumerations of the towns of Moab when Kerieth is cited Ar is omitted (Jer., ch. 48; Moabite Stone) and vice versa (Isa., chs. 15; 16; cf. Josh. 13:16 21). See AR. An identification with Kir of Moab has also been suggested.

Ke'ros (kê'rôs). Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

Ke-thib' (kê-thêv'), Ke-thiv' (kê-thêv') [Aram. passive participle, kêhib, written]. The word actually written or appearing in the text of the Hebrew Bible, for which according to the Masoretes the kere is to be substituted. The kethib, however, cannot always be rejected, since in some cases it represents an old tradition, may have the support of ancient versions, and may be the better reading. In many cases the differences between the kethib and the kere are not very serious, but in Biblical studies both must receive careful consideration.

Ke'tle. See POR.

Ke-tu'rah (kê-tû'râ) [incense]. Abraham's 2d wife (Gen. 25:1; 26:3). She became the ancestress of the tribes of Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah (Gen. 25:1, 2; I Chron. 1:32). Her sons were not regarded as on the same level with Isaac, and their father gave them gifts and sent them away during his lifetime to the e. country (Gen. 25:6). A tribe Kâtûrâ is mentioned in late Arabian genealogies as dwelling near Mecca.

Ke-veh' (kê-vâ'). See LINEN 6.

Key. An Oriental key (Judg. 3:25) consists of a piece of wood with pegs fastened on it corresponding to small holes in a wooden bar or bolt within. The action of such a key was rather to lift and push the bar inside the door; it was not turned like a modern key. See LOCK. It is generally carried in the girdle, but occasionally it is fastened to something else and borne over the shoulder (cf. Isa. 22:22). The key is the symbol of authority (ibid.; Matt. 16:19; Rev. 1:18; 3:7; 9:1; 20:1). It is also the symbol of access to that from which one would otherwise be shut out (Luke 11:52).

Ke-zî'ah (kê-zî'â), in A.V. Ke-zî'a (kê-zî'â) [cassia]. The 2d of Job's daughters born after his great trial (Job 42:14).

Ke'ziz (kê'zîz). See EMEK-KEZIZ.

Kib'roth-hat-ta'n-vah (Kib'rôth-hâ-tâ'a-vâ) [the graves of lust]. A place in the Sinaitic peninsula, between Mount Sinai and Hazeroth, where the Israelites were buried who were slain by a plague for lust after the flesh-pots of Egypt (Num. 11:33-35; 33:16, 17; Deut. 9:22). Identified with a caravan station, Ruis el-Ebeirig, which is a hill about 10 hours by foot n.e. of Jebel Mûsa in the wide plain formed by the crossing of Wadis Sa'al, Khalif, Metûra, and Elleiga.

Kib-za'im (kib-zâ'im) [two heaps]. See JOKMEAM.

Kid. A young goat. It was highly esteemed as an article of food (Luke 15:29). The flesh was boiled and eaten (Judg. 6:19). It was forbidden to cook a kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 23:19), since that may have been a heathen fertility rite. A kid might be used as a burnt offering (Judg. 13:15, 19). The Hebrew words, sâ'ir, he-goat, and se'irah, she-goat, modified by 'izzim, she-goats, are rendered "kid of the goats" in A.V., but translated by "goat" with the proper indication of gender in R.V. (Gen. 37:31; and wherever kid occurs in Leviticus, Numbers, and Ezekiel). See GOAT.

Kid'ron (kîd'rôn), in A.V. of I Maccabees and N.T. Ced'ron [perhaps, dark, turbid]. 1. A valley known today as the wadi Sitti Maryam, which lies between the e. walls of Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives. It is nearly 3 miles in length, commencing about 1½ miles n. of the n.w. corner of the city as a wide open valley. It trends for a mile and a half toward the s.e. under the name of Wadi el-Jauz; then turns sharply to the s. and continues in this direction past the city as far as the Valley of Hinnom and En-rogel. Opposite St. Stephen's gate the depth is fully 100 feet and the width not more than 400 feet. Here it bends again to the s.e. and pursues a tortuous course to the Dead Sea. No stream flows in it except during continuous heavy rains in winter, and there is no evidence that its bed was ever occupied by a perennial brook. The word brook used with it in the English version represents Heb. nahal, torrent, wadi, which either means a ravine occupied by the channel of a torrent dry during the hot season or denotes the winter torrent itself. By writers who use Greek, the Kidron is expressly called winter brook (John 18:1, R.V. marg.; I Macc. 12:37, LXX). The name may be derived from the turbid water of the winter torrents or from the gloominess of the valley, especially in its lower part. To speakers of the Greek language, the Greek form of the name suggested the word for cedar and the rivulet came to be frequently called the brook of the cedars (John 18:1, R.V. marg.; II Sam. 15:23, Codex Vaticanus). It separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives and had to be crossed by those going from the city to Bethany or Jericho (II Sam. 15:23). It was regarded as the e. boundary of the city (I Kings 2:37; Jer. 31:40). The portion of the valley lying near the s. part of the city was early used as a common burying ground (II Kings 23:6); and godly kings, who from time to time found it necessary to cleanse the Temple of idolatrous symbols, made the Kidron valley the dumping place for the ashes of these abominations (I Kings 15:13; II Kings 23:4; II Chron. 29:16; 30:14). Athaliah is reported to have been led away to the Kidron for execution that the Temple might not be defiled by her blood (Jos. Antiq. ix. 7, 3). See JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF.

2. A town near Jamnia and Ashdod (I Macc. 15:39; 16:9, 10), fortified by Cendebeus and occupied by a detachment of his Syrian army because it commanded several roads into Judea (ch. 15:41). See GEDEROTH.

Kî'nah (kî'nâ) [dirge, lamentation]. A village in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:22), at the head of Wadi el-Keini, near Khirbet Samra.

Kine. See COW.

King. A male sovereign invested with supreme authority over a nation usually for life and by hereditary succession; he rules over that form of state which is specifically called a kingdom. Deep religious fervor was regarded as an essential characteristic of Baby-ionian and Assyrian kings. The ideal priest-king may be traced back to Sumerian times. Sovereignty upon earth included submission to the gods and loyalty to righteousness as well as support of justice and punishment of evil. Kings were deified in Sumerian times. Nimrod ruled over a kingdom in Babylonia containing several cities (Gen. 10:10). Chedorlaomer was king of Elam and head of a confederacy of kings (ch. 14:1, 5). Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon and Artaxerxes the Persian were each a king over kings (Ezra 7:12; Dan. 2:37; cf. II Kings 24:17). In Canaan in the time of Abraham the rule of a king was often over one town only (Gen. 14:2, 18; 20:2), as was the case of the early Sumerian city-states. Some centuries later Joshua enumerated 31 kings whom he had conquered within the bounds of Canaan (Josh. 12:7-24). It was not until centuries after the tribes and nations adjacent to Palestine had been ruled by kings that the Israelites demanded a visible monarch. Although the demand when made was prompted by unbelief and insofar was rebellion against Jehovah, yet it was not in itself at variance with the theocracy and the invisible rule of Jehovah; for the theocracy in its very institution contemplated the administration of the several offices of government by human agents; see THEOCRACY. Moses foresaw the need that would arise for a visible king and he provided for the event (Deut. 17:14-20), just as provision was made for prophets and priests to make known the will or legislation of Jehovah and for judges to represent the unseen Judge. When the king was chosen the theocracy was not abolished. The nominally uncontrolled sovereign was required to be the vicergerent of Jehovah; and when Saul, mistaking his position, sought to act independently, another was chosen to supersede him and his posterity on the throne. The same rule obtained with all Saul's successors; when they gave up fidelity to Jehovah, they forfeited their title to the kingdom (I Kings 11:31-36). For the succession of kings who ruled in Judah and Israel, see CHRONOLOGY, IV.

A man became king of a nation through appointment to the office by one higher in authority (I Sam. 9:16; 16:1, 13; II Kings 23:33, 34; 24:17), by the choice of the people (I Sam. 13:8; II Sam. 5:1-3; I Kings 12:20; II Kings 23:30), by usurping a throne (I Kings 15:27, 28), or by inheritance (ch. 11:36). The choice of a king by the people shows that the foundations of democracy are found in Israel and Judah. The ceremony of coronation among the Israelites consisted regularly in placing on the throne, putting the crown upon the head, anointing with oil, and proclamation (II Kings 11:12; cf. I Sam. 10:24; II Sam. 2:4; 5:3; I Kings 1:34; II Kings 23:30). It was doubtless regularly accompanied by sacrifice, and sometimes also by a solemn procession (I Sam. 16:2, 5; I Kings 1:25, 43-46). The king often led the army to battle in person (Gen. 14:5; Num. 21:23; I Sam. 8:20; 14:20), made treaties in behalf of himself and his people (Gen. 21:22-32; I Kings 15:19), enacted laws and executed them (Esth. 3:12, 13; 8:7-12; Dan. 3:1-6, 29; 6:6-9), exercised judicial functions (II Sam. 15:2; Isa. 33:22), and had the power of life and death (II Sam. 14:1-11; I Kings 1:51, 52; 2:24-34; Esth. 4:11; 7:9, 10). The restraints upon the king were the fear of God and man. The popular will might not always be ignored (I Sam. 14:45; 15:24). The endurance of the people might not be overtaxed with impunity (I Kings 12:4). There were officers of religion, both priests and prophets, who in religious matters were independent of the king and did not hesitate to rebuke misdemeanors (I Sam. 13:10-14; 15:10-31; II Sam. 12:1-15; I Kings 18:17, 18; 21:17-22; II Chron. 26:16-21). But a despotic king sometimes broke through these restraints (I Sam. 22:17-19; I Kings 12:12-16; Jer. 26:20-23). In view of the royal duties and prerogatives, the king required physical, mental, and moral qualities of a high order to rule well. Physical superiority is appreciated the moment it becomes visible. Thus, when Saul was presented to his future subjects, and they saw him tower head and shoulders above all the multitude present, they raised the shout, "God save the king" (I Sam. 10:23, 24; cf. ch. 16:7). In order to be an able judge the king must be a man of penetration, able to disentangle truth from falsehood, and punish, not the innocent, but the guilty. This is the reason why there was such emotion among the Israelites when Solomon, trying his first case, that of the 2 women and the child, so signally detected where the truth and where the falsehood lay (I Kings 3:28). But penetration was not enough; the moral element was requisite to make the sovereign give, without fear or favor, the verdict which he considered just. For the protection of his person and assistance in the discharge of his duties the king had a bodyguard, the captain of which generally acted as executioner (cf. II Sam. 15:18; 20:23 with I Kings 1:43, 44; 2:25, 29); see GUARD. Wealthy kings had magnificent palaces, surrounded themselves with luxury, and lived in state (I Kings, ch. 10).

God is compared to a king possessed of unlimited power, and using it under the influence of supreme beneficence (Ps. 5:2; 10:16). He is the King of kings (I Tim. 6:15). Christ is a King. He called himself so, but explained that his Kingdom is not of this world (John 18:33-37). He also is the King of kings (Rev. 19:16).

King'dom. 1. The territory or the people ruled over by a king (II Kings 15:19).

2. The sovereign rule of God over the universe (I Chron. 29:11; Ps. 22:28; 145:13; Matt. 6:13).

3. On the basis of the conception of God as the Creator rests the doctrine of his unlimited dominion in the natural and the spiritual realm. In consequence of the sinful state of humanity God's moral Kingdom will be brought into existence by grace. In the history of O.T. revelation is found the history of the development of the Kingdom of God. David is the type of the ideal King or Messiah, who will rule the Kingdom in strict subordination to the will and law of God. The Messiah, however, is not always mentioned in connection with the future Kingdom of perfection (cf. Isa. 2:2-4; Micah 4:1-5). The Book of Daniel gave definite shape and direction to the sovereignty which God will establish on earth, and which, when once set up, will remain forever. In distinction from the kingdoms of this world, which are exhibited under the figure of beasts, the Kingdom of God has for its representative a person "like unto a son of man" (Dan. 7:13, 14, R.V.). John the Baptist and our Lord declared that it was at hand (Matt. 3:2; 4:17). Jesus taught his disciples to pray for its coming (Matt. 6:10), instructed his apostles on their first mission to say that it was at hand (ch. 10:7), spoke of it afterward as having come (ch. 12:28), and illustrated its nature by parables. It is called the Kingdom of heaven and the Kingdom of God. Matthew prefers the former and Mark and Luke the latter designation (cf. Matt. 13:24, 31, 33, 44, 45 with Mark 4:11, 26, 30; Luke 14:15; 17:20, etc.). The Kingdom is spiritual in character, and no carnal weapons may be used in its establishment (John 18:33-37). Commened on earth with the royal ministry of Christ, it shall be consummated amid the bliss of the eternal world (Matt. 25:31-46; Luke 23:42, 43). The Kingdom of God is thus the "invisible Church." It is the whole spiritual commonwealth of God's children, the true company of all faithful people. It is represented by the organized or visible Church, but is more comprehensive and greater than the visible Church in any age or all ages.

King's Gar'den. See POOL.

King's High'way'. An ancient highway which led through Trans-Jordan from 'Akabah to Syria. Its entire length can be traced by the ruins of sites which may be dated approximately between the 23d and 20th centuries B.C. Probably the invasion of Chedorlaomer and his allies went down this road to El-paran, which may possibly be located on the n. shore of the Gulf of 'Akabah. In their request to pass through the land of Edom and that of Sihon, king of the Amorites, the Israelites promised to keep to the king's highway (Num. 20:17; 21:22). Trajan's Road followed the same course, which in modern times has become Emir Abdullah's Road.

Kings, The Books of the. The 2 Books of the Kings were originally one book, but were divided in the LXX into 2. They are placed among the Prophets in the Hebrew canon, in that group of Scriptures which, because standing first among the Prophets, were known as Former Prophets. The writings of the Former Prophets form a continuous narrative which begins at the death of Moses and ends with the Exile. Joshua is the 1st book in the series and The Books of the Kings are the last. These latter were written to point out the religious teaching of the national history during the period of the kingdom from the accession of Solomon. The author or redactor, who was strongly influenced by Deuteronomy, shows the growth and decay of the kingdom, indicates the causes which worked to effect these results, and draws attention to the large part played by forces of a moral and religious character (cf. II Kings, ch. 17). His narrative covers a period of more than 400 years, and he is consequently dependent on former historians for his facts.

The Books of the Kings differ from the preceding historical books in the fact that the compiler refers habitually to certain sources for particulars not contained in his own work. These authorities are: (1) for the reign of Solomon, the "book of the acts of Solomon" (I Kings 11:41); (2) for the Northern Kingdom to the death of Pekah, the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel" (ch. 14:19); (3) for the Southern Kingdom to the death of Jehoiakim, "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (v. 29). These chronicles were originally, as the titles suggest, 2 separate works. Probably they were ultimately united into one and constituted the work quoted by the Chronicler as the "book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (II Chron. 16:11). These 2 chronicles contained more than the present Books of the Kings, for the writer of Kings refers his readers to them for further details (I Kings 14:19, 29), and the Chronicler quotes portions which the writer of Kings does not (II Chron. 27:7; 33:18). It is commonly held that these 2 chronicles were not the original public annals, but 2 independent historical works based upon them. This opinion is based on the fact that writings of various prophets are mentioned as having been inserted in the book of the kings of Israel (II Chron. 20:34; cf. ch. 32:32), which could not have been done if the book were the state annals to which additions were made from day to day by the royal scribe. The double chronicles were written before the fall of Jerusalem; for the phrase "unto this day" refers, so far as can be determined, invariably to the time when the city and Temple were in existence (I Kings 8:8); at any rate it shows that the writer of the book which is quoted lived before the Exile. Whether the writer of the present Books of the Kings began the work before the destruction of Jerusalem or not, he did not complete it until after the middle years of the Babylonian Exile (II Kings 25:27). He perhaps finished it before the close of the Exile, since the work contains no allusion to the deliverance of the people from Babylon.

The author is chiefly concerned with the history of the Davidic monarchy, and accordingly he records events relating to Israel before giving the contemporaneous history of Judah. This leads him sometimes to narrate the same event in connection with both the Northern and the Southern Kingdoms (cf. I Kings 15:16 with v. 32; cf. II Kings 17:5, 6 with ch. 18:9).

The work is divided into 3 parts: I. The reign of Solomon (I Kings, chs. 1 to 11). II. A synchronistic account of the Kingdoms of Judah and Israel until the Captivity of Israel (ch. 12 to II Kings, ch. 17). III. The Kingdom of Judah until the Babylonian Exile (chs. 18 to 25).

Kir (kîr) [Heb., wall; Moabite, city]. 1. The place from which the Aramaeans migrated to Syria (Amos 9:7), and to which those of them living in Damascus were carried on being conquered by the Assyrians (II Kings 16:9; Amos 1:5). Its inhabitants are represented as arrayed with Elam against Judah (Isa. 22:6), and while its location is very uncertain, it may probably be identified with the plain between the Tigris and the highland of Elam.

Kir of Mo'ab. (kîr of mō'āb). A fortified city of S. Moab (Isa. 15:1), identified with Kir-harseth and Kir-heres (ch. 16:7, 11; Jer. 48:31, 36; in A.V. sometimes Kir-harseth and Kir-harsh). It was strong enough to resist the combined forces of Israel, Judah, and Edom (II Kings 3:25). Its modern name, traceable back to the Targum, is Kerak. It is 11 miles e. from the s. bay of the Dead Sea, s. of the Lisan or tongue, and 18 s. of the Arnon River. It stands on an elevation of 3,370 feet above the Mediterranean, on a rocky platform which rises at its s. extremity to 3,720 feet. Except at one or two spots, the hill is isolated from the neighboring hills by precipices falling sheer down to the deep valleys below. Its weak point for military purposes is that it is commanded by adjacent hills 4,050 feet high. Kerak constitutes a triangle from 2,400 to 3,000 feet on each side. It is entered by 2 arched tunnels, probably of Roman age. It dominated the great caravan road connecting Syria with Egypt and Arabia. Under King Fulco of Jerusalem a castle was built here in A.D. 1131, and the crusaders held the place from 1167 to 1188, when it was captured by Saladin. The Greek bishop of Petra has had his seat at Kerak since the time of the crusades.

Kir'-har'a'-seth (kîr'hār'ā-sēth), Kir'-har'ē-seth (kîr'hār'ē-sēth), Kir'-har'esh (kîr'hār'ēsh), Kir'hē'res (kîr'hē'rēs) [interpreted by Aquila, Symmachus, and the Vulgate as city of pottery; but in Isaiah the readings of LXX suggest that -d- was read instead of -r-, which would make it mean new city]. See KIR OF MOAB.

Kir'ī-ath (kir'ī-āth), in A.V. Kir'jath [city]. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28), probably to be identified with Kiriath-jearim, as in Codex Alexandrinus.

Kir'ī-a-tha'im (kir'ī-ā-thā'im), in A.V. sometimes Kir'ja-tha'im (kir'jā-thā'im) [twin cities]. 1. An ancient city of the Emim (Gen. 14:5), rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19), which afterward fell into the hands of the Moabites (Moabite Stone, 10, see MOABITE STONE; Jer. 48:1, 23; Ezek. 25:9). Its site was at Khirbet el-Kureiyā, n. of the Arnon, and 2½ miles s. by e. of Ataroth. The ruins are on 2 hills.

2. The same as Kartan (q.v.) (I Chron. 6:76).

Kir'ī-ath-ar'ba (kir'ī-āth-ār'bā), in A.V. Kir'jath-ar'ba [city of Arba, or 4-fold city, tetrapolis]. An old name for the city of Hebron, pointing to the fact that it was the city of Arba, or the Arba, father of Anak. Perhaps he was its founder (Gen. 23:2; Josh. 14:15; 15:13, 54; 20:7; 21:11; Judg. 1:10). The old name was not obsolete even in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:25). See HEBRON 2.

Kir'ī-ath-a'rim (kir'ī-āth-ā'rim), in A.V. Kir'jath-a'rim (kir'jāth-ā'rim). See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

Kir'ī-ath-ba'al (kir'ī-āth-bā'āl), in A.V. Kir'jath-ba'al (kir'jāth-bā'āl) [city of Baal]. See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

Kir'ī-ath-hu'zoth (kir'ī-āth-hū'zōth), in A.V. Kir'jath-hu'zoth (kir'jāth-hū'zōth) [city of streets]. A Moabite town near Bamoth-baal (Num. 22:39, 41). Location uncertain; Kiriathaim and Kerioth 2 have been suggested.

Kir'ī-ath-je'a'rim (kir'ī-āth-jē'ā-rim), in A.V. Kir'jath-je'a'rim (kir'jāth-jē'ā-rim) [city of woods]. A town belonging originally to the Gibeonites (Josh. 9:17). It was on the w. part of the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:9; 18:14, 15), but pertained to Judah, being considered a town belonging to the hill country of the latter tribe (Josh. 15:48, 60; Judg. 18:12). After the Ark had been returned to the Israelites by the Philistines, it remained in safe custody in Kiriath-jearim for the next 20 years, until the 2d battle of Ebenezer, and longer (I Sam. 6:19 to 7:2). Some of its population returned from captivity (Neh. 7:29; in Ezra 2:25 the name appears as Kiriath-arim). It was called also Kiriath-baal (Josh. 15:60; 18:14), Baalah (Josh. 15:9, 11), or Baale (II Sam. 6:2; cf. I Chron. 13:6). Eusebius states that it was situated 9 or 10 Roman miles from Jerusalem on the road to Diospolis (Lydda), and accordingly it is commonly identified with Karyat el-Inab (also known as Abū Ghōsh, after a brigand of the 19th century A.D. who is buried there), about 8½ miles w. by n. of Jerusalem.

Kir'ī-ath-san'nah (kir'ī-āth-sān'ā), in A.V. Kir'jath-san'nah (kir'jāth-sān'ā). See DEBIR 2.

Kir'ī-ath-se'pher (kir'ī-āth-sē'fēr), in A.V. Kir'jath-se'pher (kir'jāth-sē'fēr). See DEBIR 2.

Kir'ī-oth (kir'ī-ōth). See KERIOTH.

Kir'jath (kir'jāth). See KIRIATH.

Kir'jath-ar'ba (kir'jāth-ār'bā), etc. See KIRIATH-ARBA, etc.

Kish (kish), in A.V. of N.T. Cis, from Greek. 1. A Benjamite, son of Jeiel (I Chron. 8:30; 9:35, 36).

2. A Benjamite, father of King Saul and son of Abiel (I Sam. 9:1), but also registered as a son of Ner and a descendant of Jeiel of Gibeon (I Chron. 8:33; 9:36, 39). This latter genealogy may indeed merely register the fact that Kish was a descendant of Ner, without implying that he was his immediate son; and allow of the insertion of Abiel and others between Kish and Ner.

But perhaps only one Kish and one Ner descended from Jeiel. If so, the explanation of the genealogy is that Ner's descendants became 2 tribal houses, those of Kish and Ner. The former, the important royal family of Saul, looked to Ner's son Kish as its founder; but it was merely a younger branch of the older but less distinguished line of Ner. Both houses belonged to the family of Jeiel, and hence Kish as well as Ner is registered, according to the familiar principle, among Jeiel's sons (ch. 9:36). Saul's father, Kish, and Abner's father, Ner, are mentioned as sons of Abiel also (I Sam. 9:1; 14:51), and either Ner or Abner is stated to have been Saul's uncle (ch. 14:50). Abiel may be, as some expositors suppose, or may not be, another name or the uncorrupted form of Jeiel.

3. A Levite, in David's time, of the family of Merari, house of Mahli (I Chron. 23:21, 22; 24:29).

4. A Levite, family of Merari and son of Abdi, who aided in the revival under Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:12).

5. A Benjamite, an ancestor of Mordecai (Esth. 2:5).

Kish'i (kish'i). See KUSHIAH.

Kish'ōn (kish'ōn), in A.V. once Ki'shon (Josh. 21:28) [hardness]. A border town of Issachar (Josh. 19:20), given to the Gershonite Levites (ch. 21:28). In I Chron. 6:72 Kedesh appears in its stead, probably by a copyist's error. Conder identified it with Tell Abū Kedeis, but Père Abel locates it at Tell el-Ajjūl, about 12½ miles n.e. of Megiddo and almost 5 s.s.w. of Tabor. See KEDESH 3.

Ki'shon (ki'shōn), in A.V. once Ki'sōn (ki'sōn) (Ps. 83:9) [bending, curving; cf. Arab. kawisa, to be crookbacked]. 1. The most important river of Palestine next to the Jordan; now known as the Nahr el-Mukatta'. Its n. arm rises in springs w. of Mount Tabor, and its s. arm near Mount Gilboa; the two meet in the plain n.n.e. of Megiddo. "That ancient river, the river Kishon" swept away the soldiers of Sisera's beaten army when they fled n. from Taanach and attempted to cross the stream (Judg. 5:19-21; Ps. 83:9). The priests of Baal who had the contest with Elijah were slain on its s. bank (I Kings 18:40). As the name Kishon implies, the river is tortuous, making great curves as it proceeds in a generally n.w. direction through the Plain of Esdraelon. It looks an insignificant stream, of 15 or 18 feet across, but has treacherous banks and a muddy bottom, so much so that when the Turks and Arabs were defeated by the French in the battle of Mount Tabor, on April 16, 1799, the fate of the vanquished host was the same as that of Sisera's army. Toward Harosheth of the Gentiles, Jabin's city, the Kishon runs through a narrow gorge under the cliffs which constitute the n. side of Mount Carmel, the water at one place being nearly hidden by oleander bushes. Then the stream enters the Plain of Acre. Sand dunes, dotted with palm trees, interfere with it in the latter part of its course, and it is only when full of water that it can overcome the obstacle and make a proper entrance into the Mediterranean.

2. A town, so spelled in A.V. See KISHION.

Kiss. A salutation, common in the Orient from patriarchal times onward, between persons of the same sex and to a limited extent between individuals of different sexes. Fathers and mothers kissed their children and descendants (Gen. 31:28, 55; 48:10; II Sam. 14:33, etc.), and children their parents (Gen. 27:26, 27; 50:1; I Kings 19:20). Brother and sister kissed each other (S. of Sol. 8:1), and brother kissed brother (Gen. 45:15; Ex. 4:27). So did other relatives and kinsfolk (Gen. 29:11; Ex. 18:7; Ruth 1:9). Comrades kissed each other; so did friends (I Sam. 20:41; II Sam. 19:39; 20:9; Acts 20:37). In the time of our Lord, a guest invited to a house expected a kiss of welcome from his entertainer (Luke 7:45). It was in these circumstances that Christians were enjoined to salute each other with a holy kiss (Rom. 16:16; I Cor. 16:20; II Cor. 13:12; I Thess. 5:26), or with a kiss of love (I Peter 5:14), symbolical of Christian brotherhood. As kissing between friends, guests, and entertainers lapsed, the salutation enjoined by the apostle fell also into desuetude. In all the foregoing cases a kiss was, or at least professed to be, an expression of love. It therefore added to the baseness of Judas' treachery that he had not merely betrayed his Lord, but did so by means of a kiss (Matt. 26:48, 49; Luke 22:47, 48; cf. Prov. 27:6). The feet of kings were kissed in token of great respect and to offer allegiance (Ps. 2:12), and the same idea was involved in the kiss given to idols (I Kings 19:18; Hos. 13:2). A kiss was sometimes thrown by the hand (Job 31:27). When women kissed the feet of our Lord, it indicated the unbounded respect and affection which they felt for his character and work (Luke 7:38, 45).

Kite. A bird of prey of the falcon family, with long, pointed wings and usually long, forked tail. The word is used in R.V. to render Heb. dā'ah and dayyāh (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; Isa. 34:15; in A.V. vulture) and twice in A.V. to render 'ayyāh (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; in R.V. falcon). Both birds were ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:14). Kites are of various kinds (Deut. 14:13). The black kite (Milvus migrans or ater) is found in central and s. Europe, n. Africa, and w. Asia. It appears in Palestine in March, gliding noiselessly in the air, looking down for its food, which consists of offal, for, being a somewhat cowardly bird, it does not molest poultry. It breeds in trees, ornamenting its nest with rags of different colors. The black-winged kite (Elanus caeruleus) also occurs in Palestine, but is rare.

Kith'lish (kith'lish), in R.V. Chith'lish. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:40); identified with Khirbet el-Mak-haz, e. of Tell en-Nejileh. See DILEAN.

Kit'ron (kit'rōn). A town in the territory of Zebulun, but from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judg. 1:30). Identified by Alt with Tell el-Fār, which is 1 mile n. of Tell Harbaj, which in turn is on the wadi el-Melek, about 7½ miles s.e. of Haifa. See KAT-TATH.

Kit'tim (kīt'im) or Chit'tim, the latter being the more consistent, and in A.V. more frequent spelling. Descendants of Javan, who inhabited Cyprus and other islands and coasts of the e. Mediterranean (Gen. 10:4; Num. 24:24; I Chron. 1:7; Isa. 23:1, 12; Jer. 2:10; Ezek. 27:6; Dan. 11:30; Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 1). The name is connected definitely with Cyprus, chiefly through Kition, an ancient town on the s. coast of the island, but it was eventually greatly extended. In I Macc. 1:1 Alexander the Great is said to have come out of the land of Chittim, and in ch. 8:5 Perseus is called king of Chittim, meaning Macedonia.

Knead'ing Trough. A shallow vessel, usually of wood and portable, in which dough is worked into a well-mixed mass preparatory to baking (Ex. 12:34). The Egyptians kneaded the dough with their feet (Herod. ii. 36) or with their hands.

Knife. The Hebrews used a knife which they called ma'akeleth, eating instrument, for slaughtering animals for food or sacrifice, and for cutting up the carcass (Gen. 22:6; Judg. 19:29; cf. Lev. 8:20; 9:13). Another word, herēb, which commonly signifies a sword, denotes a knife made of flint (Josh. 5:2), and perhaps a knife for shaving (Ezek. 5:1; in R.V. sword); see FLINT. The Egyptians also, when embalming a corpse, used a sharp stone knife for making an incision in the body (Herod. ii. 86). The Hebrew scribes sharpened the stylus with a small knife (Jer. 36:23). Herod the Great was accustomed to use a knife for paring fruit, and attempted to kill himself with it (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 7, 1).

Knop. 1. The rendering of Heb. kaphtōr in Ex. 25:33-36; 37:17-22, where it constitutes a part of the candlestick used in the tabernacle. In other passages the Hebrew word apparently denotes the capital of a column (Amos 9:1; Zeph. 2:14; cf. R.V. and A.V. marg.). It seems to have been some projecting support for the branches of the candlestick, and for the corollas of the ornamental flowers; but its precise nature is unknown; cf. Jos. Antiq. iii. 6, 7.

2. The rendering of Heb. peškā'im (I Kings 6:18; 7:24), an ornament cut in cedar and associated with open flowers in the woodwork of Solomon's Temple. Since paḥkū'ōth denotes gourds or colocynths, the R.V. places gourds in the margin of the first passage, as if the ornament was shaped like a gourd.

Ko'a (kō'á). A people (Ezek. 23:23) identified with Kutū or Ku, located e. of the Tigris, s. of the lower Zab.

Ko'hath (kō'hāth). A son of Levi and founder of the great Kohathite family (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16, 18).

Ko'hath-ite (kō'hāth-it). A member of the great Levite family founded by Kohath. This was subdivided into the families or houses of the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites (Ex. 6:18; Num. 3:27). Moses and Aaron were of the Kohathite family (Ex. 6:20). The Kohathites pitched on the s. side of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Num. 3:29). When the priests had covered the sanctuary and its vessels, the Kohathites carried the latter, but were not to touch any holy thing, lest they should die (Num. 4:15, 17-20; II Chron. 34:12). At the 1st census in the wilderness, the Kohathite males from a month old and upward were 8,600 (Num. 3:28), and those from 30 to 50 years old 2,750 (ch. 4:34-37). In the subsequent allotment of cities to the family, the priests, the descendants of Aaron, had shares with the other Kohathites, the former obtaining 13 cities out of the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, and the latter 10 cities out of the tribes of Ephraim, Dan, and Manasseh (Josh. 21:4, 5; I Chron. 6:61, 66-70).

Ko-hel'eth (kō-hēl'ēth). See ECCLESIASTES.

Ko-la'iah (kō-lā'yā) [perhaps, voice of Jehovah]. 1. Father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer. 29:21).

2. A Benjamite (Neh. 11:7).

Koph (kōf), in A.R.V. Qoph. The 19th letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English Q comes from the same source; but in Anglicized Hebrew names C or K represents it, as in Cain and Korah. It heads the 19th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Ko'rah (kō'rā), in A.V. once Ko're (I Chron. 26:19) and once Co're (Jude 11) [bald]. 1. A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah, born in Canaan (Gen. 36:5, 14), who founded a tribe that dwelt in Edom and was ruled by a chieftain (v. 18).

2. A son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gen. 36:16). But the name apparently has crept into the text erroneously, not being found in Gen. 36:11, 12 or I Chron. 1:36.

3. A son of Hebron (I Chron. 2:43). See MARESHAH 2.

4. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (Num. 16:1). In conjunction with the Reubenites Dathan, Abiram, and On, he rebelled against Moses and Aaron. He was jealous that Aaron, a Levite of the same family as he and only his equal in rank, should have the office of priest for all Israel. The Reubenites were discontented because the leadership in Israel, which belonged to Reuben as the first-born of Jacob, was possessed by the tribe of Levi, represented by Moses and Aaron. At length Korah and his company, sons of Levi (v. 7), who formed a large portion of the conspirators, but not all of them, for at least Dathan and Abiram were absent (v. 12), assembled against Moses and Aaron, publicly charged them with usurping the supremacy over the tribes, and claimed that all the congregation was holy and that anyone might officiate as a priest (v. 3). Moses replied that God would himself decide the matter, and he bade Korah and his company provide themselves with censers and be ready to offer incense on the morrow (vs. 6-11). Moses sent word to Dathan and Abiram to appear likewise on the morrow, but they refused on the ground that Moses had no right to summon them (vs. 12-15). Moses then turned to Korah, saying: "Be thou and all thy company before Jehovah, thou, and they, and Aaron, to-morrow: and take ye every man his censer and put incense upon them, and bring ye before Jehovah every man his censer, two hundred and fifty censers; thou also, and Aaron, each his censer" (vs. 16, 17). They did so, assembling at the tabernacle (v. 18). Korah gathered also the whole congregation of Israel there and incited them against Moses and Aaron (v. 19). God directed Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the multitude that it might be destroyed, but Moses interceded for the people (vs. 20-22). Moses was then directed to bid the congregation remove from the district in the camp occupied by Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (v. 24). The division of the Levites to which Korah belonged was accustomed to pitch on the s. of the tabernacle in immediate proximity to the tribe of Reuben; see CAMP. Accordingly, followed by the elders of Israel, and certainly also by Korah, Moses went to the locality where the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were pitched and warned the congregation to leave the district (vs. 25, 26). The people obeyed. Dathan and Abiram, together with their families, appeared at the door of their tents (v. 27). The earth opened and swallowed them up with their households and Korah with his servants (vs. 32, 33; ch. 26:10). The sons of Korah, however, were not destroyed (v. 11). After the earthquake fire devoured the 250 men that offered incense (chs. 16:35; cf. v. 40). See KORAHITE.

Ko'rah-ite (kō'rā-it) and Ko'rath-ite (kō'rāth-it). A descendant of that Korah who was swallowed up in the wilderness as a punishment for his rebellion. The Korahites constituted a father's house among the Kohathites.

Heman the singer and Samuel the prophet were Korahites (I Chron. 6:33-38). The descendants of Heman were organized by David as singers (I Chron. 15:17; 16:41, 42; 25:4, 5). Psalms 42 (which probably once included 43); 44 to 49; 84; 85; 87; 88 bear the name of the family in the title. Korahites were gatekeepers (I Chron. 9:19; 26:19) and bakers for the sanctuary, preparing the showbread and sacrificial cakes (ch. 9:31, 32).

Ko're (kō'rē) [a partridge]. 1. The rebellious Levite, founder of a house (I Chron. 26:19); see KORAH 4.

2. A Levite of the house of Korah (I Chron. 9:19; 26:11).

3. A Levite, son of Imnah, appointed over the freewill offerings during the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:14).

Kor'hite (kōr'hīt). See KORAHITE.

Koz (kōz). See HAKKOZ.

Ku-sha'iah (kū-shā'yā). A Levite of the family of Merari, house of Mushi (I Chron. 15:17), in ch. 6:44 called Kishi.

L

La'a-dah (lā'ā-dā) [perhaps, having a fat neck; cf. Arab. luḡdā, the flesh at the throat and under the chin and ear]. A man of Judah, family of Shelah. He was the father of the inhabitants of Mareshah (I Chron. 4:21).

La'a-dan (lā'ā-dān). See LADAN.

La'ban (lā'bān) [white]. 1. Son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother. He lived at Haran in Paddan-aram (Gen. 24:10, 15; 28:5, 10; 29:4, 5). He was the brother of Rebekah. When he saw the valuable presents which Abraham's servant had given Rebekah, he readily allowed her to go to Canaan to become Isaac's wife (ch. 24). When Jacob fled from the vengeance of Esau he went to Laban his uncle. He found him the head of a household, father of several sons (chs. 30:35; 31:1) and at least 2 daughters (ch. 29:16), owner of slaves (vs. 24, 29), and the possessor of a flock of sheep and goats (v. 9; ch. 31:38). Jacob remained with him at least 20 years, serving him 7 for his daughter Rachel, and then, having Leah handed over to him in a fraudulent way, a 2d 7 to obtain the daughter for whom he really cared, and then 6 more for cattle. At the end of the 20 years, Jacob, perceiving that his prosperity had excited the enmity of Laban and his sons, fled with his wives, his children, and his cattle, in the direction of Canaan. He was overtaken by Laban in Mount Gilead; but the pursuer, warned by God not to molest Jacob, made a covenant with him, and the two parted to meet no more (Gen., chs. 29 to 31). Laban worshipped the God of his fathers, the God of Nahor (ch. 31:53), Jehovah (chs. 24:50; 30:27); but he combined idolatry with his worship, making use of household gods called teraphim (ch. 31:30; cf. 35:4) and practicing divination (ch. 30:27, R.V.).

2. An unidentified place in the Sinaitic peninsula (Deut. 1:1). It is mentioned with Hazeroth; hence some have thought that it may have been the same as Libnah, the 2d station from Hazeroth (Num. 33:20).

La'chish (lā'kīsh). A fortified city in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:33, 39), formerly identified with Tell el-Hesi, 16 miles e. by n.

Part of a Lachish Letter Written on Pottery in the Time of Jeremiah of Gaza and 11 miles s.w. of Beit Jibrin, but now more appropriately located at Tell ed-Duweir, 5 miles s.w. of Beit Jibrin.

It seems that between the 27th and 24th centuries B.C. people were living in caves around the edge of the mound at Tell ed-Duweir. Here the Hyksos built a rectangular enclosure of earth which served both as a protection and as a place to keep horses and chariots. Of special importance in the history of the alphabet are an inscribed dagger of c. 1600 B.C., and a ewer and bowl with inscriptions of c. the 14-13th century B.C., all found at Tell ed-Duweir.

At the time of the conquest of Palestine, its king was defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh. 10:3-35; 12:11). Rehoboam strengthened its defenses (II Chron. 11:9); a double wall encircled the mound, buttressed at intervals by towers. Amaziah, king of Judah, having fled thither from conspirators at Jerusalem, was pursued and slain in the town (II Kings 14:19; II Chron. 25:27). Lachish was besieged by Sennacherib, king of Assyria (701 or perhaps 700), and it was from the camp in front of it that the rabshakeh was dispatched to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (II Kings 18:14, 17; cf. ch. 19:3, and II Chron. 32:9; Isa. 36:2; 37:8). Lachish is charged with being the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion, for the transgressions of Israel were found in her (Micah 1:13). Nebuchadnezzar besieged Lachish, with other fenced cities of Judah (Jer. 34:7). The archaeological evidence indicates that the city suffered 2 terrific destructions in the early 6th century, which may be connected with the sieges of Jerusalem (II Kings 24:10 seq.; 25:1 seq.). At the time of the 1st attack (597), the city was crowded with houses and very strongly fortified, but the Chaldeans razed it more or less completely. The inhabitants who remained were never able to rebuild it entirely. In both destructions the whole city seems to have been set on fire, and great portions of the city wall and gate towers collapsed. So hot was the fire that much of the mud-brick work was burned a bright red throughout. With the Exile Lachish never regained its former importance, but it was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:30).

In 1935 there were found at Tell ed-Duweir the Lachish letters, which are written in Hebrew and belong to the time of Jeremiah. They reflect the disturbed condition of the country just before the final destruction of Lachish at the end of Zedekiah's reign.

La'dan (lā'dān), in A.V. La'a'dan [cf. Laadah]. 1. An Ephraimite in the ancestry of Joshua (I Chron. 7:26).

2. A Gershonite in whom several fathers' houses had their origin (I Chron. 28:7-9; 26:21).

La'el (lā'el) [belonging to God]. A Gershonite, father of Ellasaph (Num. 3:24).

La'had (lā'hād) [cf. Arab. lahada, to overburden, press down]. A son of Jahath, a man of Judah (I Chron. 4:2).

La-hai'-roi (lā-hī'roi). See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

La'hām (lā'mām), in R.V. marg., Lah'mas (lāmās). A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:40), probably Khirbet el-Lahm, 2½ miles s. of Beit Jibrin.

La'mi (lā'mi). The brother of Goliath the Gittite. He was slain by Elhanan the son of Jair (I Chron. 20:5). The word Lahmi, however, corresponds to the last part of Bethlehemite (Heb. Bēth hallahmī) in II Sam. 21:19. See ELHANAN 1.

La'ish (lā'ish) [lion]. 1. A man of Gallim, father of Palti (I Sam. 25:44).

2. A Canaanite city in the extreme n. of Palestine, "in the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob." The Danites captured the city and rebuilt it, altering the name to Dan (Judg. 18:7-29). See DAN 3.

3. A village (Isa. 10:30, A.V.). See LAISHAH.

La'ishah (lā'ī-shā), in A.V. La'ish [lion]. A village in Benjamin between Gallim and Anathoth (Isa. 10:30), el-'Isāwīyeh, n.n.e. of the Mount of Olives.

Lak'kum (lāk'ūm), in A.V. La'kum (lākūm) [obstruction; cf. Arab. laḳama, to obstruct a road]. A town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), probably to be located at Maṣūra, near Tay-yaret ed-Delekeh, at the head of Wadi Fejjās.

Lamb. The flesh of lambs was early used as food (cf. Lev. 3:7 with ch. 7:15; II Sam. 12:4; Amos 6:4); and lambs and kids were largely offered in sacrifice even before the promulgation of the Mosaic Law (Gen. 4:4; 22:7). When the passover was instituted in Egypt, a lamb or a kid of the 1st year was sacrificed and eaten (Ex. 12:3, 5). Under the Mosaic Law a male lamb of the 1st year was offered for a burnt offering every morning and another every evening, while on the Sabbath there were 2 (Ex. 29:39-41; Num. 28:4). On the 1st day of each month (Num. 28:11), during the 7 days of the passover (vs. 16, 19), at the feast of weeks (vs. 26, 27), on the day of blowing of trumpets (ch. 29:1, 2), and on the Day of Atonement (vs. 7, 8), 7 male lambs of the 1st year formed part of the special burnt offering; while at the feast of tabernacles the lambs numbered 14 during each of the 1st 7 days and 7 on the 8th day (vs. 13-36). For all the principal sacrifices of ordinary occasions a lamb might be used, as: a male lamb for a burnt offering (Lev. 9:3; 23:12, 18; Num. 6:14; 7:15), a ewe lamb for a sin offering for others than the nation or rulers (Lev. 4:27, 32; Num. 6:14), and a male or female lamb for a guilt offering (Lev. 5:6; 14:12, 21; Num. 6:12) or for a peace offering (Lev. 3:6, 7; 23:19; Num. 7:17). In every case the lamb must be without blemish. All this points to our Lord. He resembled a lamb in his spotless purity (I Peter 1:19). He was like a lamb also in his gentleness and in his submission to unmerited suffering without murmur or complaint (cf. Isa. 53:7 with Luke 23:25; Acts 8:32; I Peter 2:21-23). Finally, he, like a lamb, was sacrificed for guilt not his own. Hence he is called the Lamb of God, "that taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1:29, 36), the Lamb slain "from the foundation of the world" (Rev. 13:8), or simply the Lamb (chs. 5:6, 8, 12; 7:14, 17; 14:1, 4). Both in the O.T. and in the N.T. the term lamb is at times used figuratively for child (Isa. 40:11; John 21:15).

La'mech (lā'mēk). 1. A son of Methusael, of the race of Cain. He had 2 wives, Adah and Zillah. By Adah he was the father of Jabal and Jubal, and by Zillah he had a son, Tubal-cain, and a daughter, Naamah. His address to his wives is a fine specimen of Hebrew poetry. There are two principal interpretations of Gen. 4:23: 1. Lamech declares himself a murderer, saying, "I have slain a man." Stung by remorse, he confesses the rebuke of conscience. He had slain another to his own wounding and hurt. Or else he excuses himself for a murder committed in self-defense, having slain a man for wounding him. 2. Lamech utters a threat, "I will slay any man who wounds me," his words being a song of exultation on the invention of the sword by his son Tubal-cain, sung in anticipation of the advantage he would have in avenging wrongs done to him. The attempt has been made to explain the poem as simply an expression of Lamech's determination to put the new weapon to its lawful use; but expositors quite generally agree that Lamech is vaunting himself. If Cain, who slew a man, is under God's protection and shall be avenged sevenfold should one dare to slay him, surely Lamech with the new weapon, a visible and surer defense, shall be avenged seventy and sevenfold (Gen. 4:18-24).

2. An antediluvian patriarch of the race of Seth. He was son of Methuselah and father of Noah. He feared the Lord, rested in God's promise for the removal of the curse of sin, and on the birth of his son Noah gave expression to the hope that this child would lead men to a better and a happier life under God's blessing, saying, "This same shall comfort us in our work and in the toil of our hands, which cometh because of the ground which Jehovah hath cursed" (Gen. 5:25, 28-31).

La'med (lā'mēd), in A.R.V. La'medh (lā'mēd) [oxgoad]. The 12th letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from which comes Gr. lambda (λ), to which corresponds Latin and English l. It stands at the head of the 12th section of Ps. 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Lamen-ta'tions. Mournful speeches or compositions, elegies such as the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan (II Sam. 1:17-27).

The Lamentations of Jeremiah are an O.T. book placed in the English Bible between Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but in the Hebrew Scriptures among the Hagiographa or Sacred Writings, between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. It should be noted that of the 5 chapters of The Lamentations, chs. 1; 2; 4; and 5 have each 22 verses, and ch. 3 has 22×3=66. There are 22 distinct letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and in chs. 1; 2; and 4 the verses are arranged alphabetically, v. 1 beginning with aleph, v. 2 with beth, v. 3 with gimel, and v. 4 with daleth, and so on to the end. In ch. 3 the 1st 3 verses begin with aleph, the 2d 3 with beth, and so on to the end. However, in chs. 2 to 4 the order of the letters ayin (ain) and pe is not the same as in ch. 1 and Ps. 119, but is reversed, pe preceding ayin (ain). The 5th chapter has not an alphabetical arrangement. The theme of the whole 5 elegies or lamentations is the capture and destruction of the Jewish capital, with dreadful suffering to its defenders by famine, the sword, and outrage of every kind. The catastrophe, it is admitted, was brought on by the sins of the people, not omitting even the prophets and the priests. In various places the Jewish state is personified, and bemoans its hard fate (chs. 1:9, 11, 12-22; 2:18-22), or the prophet, as representing the nation, speaks in the 1st person (chs. 2:11; 3:1-51, and also vs. 52-66). In the Hebrew this book is anonymous, being named only by its first word, "how," and is placed among the Hagiographa. In the LXX the following statement is prefixed to the book: "And it came to pass after Israel was led into captivity and Jerusalem laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said." The ascription of the book to the prophet is thus ancient. This view is accepted by the Vulgate, the Targum, and the Talmud, and traditional scholarship accordingly has assigned the authorship to Jeremiah. Critical scholars, while not holding that Jeremiah is the author, believe that these elegies were written in his time, between 586 B.C. (the destruction of Jerusalem) and 538 B.C. (the Return from the Exile), but they do not pretend to know who was the author or authors. Some scholars would grant that Jeremiah wrote at least chs. 2 to 4. Although The Book of Jeremiah and The Lamentations have the same sensitive temper and sympathy in national sorrow and use many similar expressions, critics feel that the differences between the two books have greater weight than the resemblances. The prophet lamented for Josiah (II Chron. 35:25), but this has no connection with our present book of The Lamentations.

Lamp. A vessel designed to contain an inflammable liquid, to be burned for illuminating purposes, and a wick to lift the liquid by capillary attraction to feed the flame (Herod. ii. 62). The 7 lamps of the golden candlestick of the tabernacle and Temple were made of gold (Ex. 37:23; I Kings 7:49) and burned olive oil (Ex. 27:20). Tongs were used to trim the wick, and dishes to receive the snuff (Ex. 25:38). The ordinary lamp for domestic use was made of earthenware. It might have a cover which was either removable or made of one piece with the rest of the lamp. Near the center of the cover or top was a hole for introducing the oil. There was another opening at the margin of the cover, or else a spout for the wick.

The Hebrew word regularly rendered lamp is ner. It is translated light in II Sam. 21:17, A.V., and candle in A.V. of Jer. 25:10 and Zeph. 1:12. In the latter passage, E.R.V. places lamp in the margin, while A.R.V. has lamp in these passages; and everywhere else in both O. and N.T. A.R.V. substitutes the word lamp in the text where A.V. has candle. Heb. lappid is also often rendered lamp in O.T.; for example, Judg. 7:16, 20, A.V., and Isa. 62:1; Dan. 10:6, A.V. But it is of more general meaning. It is translated firebrand in Judg. 15:4; and torch in Nah. 2:4; Zech. 12:6; and in R.V. of Gen. 15:17; Judg. 7:16, 20; and lightning in Ex. 20:18. The Greek word rendered lamp in Matt. 25:1 and Rev. 4:5 is translated lights in Acts 20:8, and torches in John 18:3 and marg. of R.V. of Matt. 25:1.

Ancient Lamps

The extinction of the lamp of anyone means figuratively the destruction of his family (Prov. 13:9).

La'cet. See SPEAR.

La'guage. See TONGUE.

La'tern. Lanterns were carried by the band of Roman soldiers who were sent with Judas to arrest Jesus (John 18:3); it is possible that the reference here is to some form of torch. The Romans, however, made the sides of lanterns out of bladder or plates of translucent horn.

La-od'ice'a (lā-ōd'ī-sē'ā). A city founded probably by Antiochus II (261-247 B.C.), and named by him Laodicea, after his wife Laodice. It was the chief city of Phrygia Pacatiana, in Asia Minor, and was situated a little s. of Colossae and Hierapolis, on the River Lycos, a tributary of the Meander. It manufactured cloth and garments from the black wool produced by a breed of sheep in its vicinity; and it was the seat of a medical school, whose physicians prepared the Phrygian powder for the cure of ophthalmia. It numbered many Jews among its inhabitants (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 10, 20). Epaphras labored there (Col. 4:12, 13), and is regarded as the founder of its Christian church. Paul felt greatly desirous of spiritually benefiting the Laodiceans (Col. 2:1). He sent them salutations, and he wrote a letter of which perhaps a copy only was left at Laodicea (Col. 4:15, 16). It is believed to be the letter known as the Epistle to the Ephesians. Laodicea was one of the 7 churches in Asia addressed in the book of Revelation. It is sharply rebuked (Rev. 1:11; 3:14-22), and the words in which the rebuke is couched contain allusions to the products and the wealth for which the city was noted. About the year 65 of the Christian era, Laodicea, Colossae, and Hierapolis were destroyed by an earthquake. The citizens rebuilt Laodicea out of their own resources, without the customary aid from Rome. Its ruins still exist at a place called Eski Hissar, near Denizli, about 56 miles e.s.e. of Smyrna.

La'pi-doth (lāp'ī-dōth), in A.V. La'p'ī-doth (lāp'ī-dōth) [torches]. Husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg. 4:4).

La'wing. The rendering of Heb. dūkiphath in A.V. of Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18. The lapwing (Vanellus cristatus), a member of the subfamily Charadriidae, or true plovers, is found in flocks in winter in Palestine. R.V., following the LXX and Vulgate, substitutes hoopoe (Upupa epops), the type of the Upupidae, a family of birds with deeply cleft bills. The hoopoe is a bird about a foot long, grayish-brown above, with the wings and shoulders black, barred with white, and a large crest of feathers upon the head. It is found in central and s. Europe, in Asia, and in n. and central Africa. Tristram says that it appears in Palestine in March, spreading in small parties over the whole country. On the approach of winter it makes a short migration to Egypt and the Sahara.

La'se'a (lā-sē'ā). A seaport of Crete, about 5 miles e. of the Fair Havens, passed by the vessel which carried Paul (Acts 27:8).

La'sha (lā'shā). A place mentioned with the cities of the plain (Gen. 10:19). Jerome says it was at Callirrhoe, a ravine e. of the Dead Sea, notable for its hot springs, which were visited by Herod the Great during his last illness. The stream from Callirrhoe, now called the Zerka Ma'in, enters the Dead Sea at the e. side, about 11 miles in a direct line from the mouth of the Jordan. The springs are about 3 miles up the stream.

La'sha'ron (lā-shā'rōn), in A.V. La'sha'ron (lā-shā'rōn) [probably, of, or to, Sharon]. A town whose king was one of those slain by Joshua (Josh. 12:18). The Hebrew text may, however, be read "king over Sharon." The indications of the LXX are that the original text of the verse was "the king of Aphek [which belongs] to Sharon."

La'sthene's (lās'thē-nēs). A Cretan who raised an army of mercenary soldiers for Demetrius II, by which the latter effected a landing in Cilicia and set up the standard of revolt against Alexander Balas (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 3). He was rewarded with high office, perhaps the governorship of Coele Syria. Demetrius calls him kinsman and father (I Macc. 11:31, in A.V. cousin; v. 32). The latter title implies that he was a man of considerable age; the former means either that he was related to Demetrius or that he held a high position at court. He was notified by letter of the terms of peace agreed upon between Demetrius and Jonathan Maccabaeus, and of the concessions made to the Jews (I Macc. 11:32-37).

Last Sup'per. See LORD'S SUPPER.

Lath'et. The thong with which the sandal was bound to the foot (Isa. 5:27; Mark 1:7; cf. Gen. 14:23).

Lat'in (lāt'in). The language spoken by the Romans. Though from the 1st century B.C. on for some hundred years the supreme power in Palestine was in the hands of the Romans, whose language was Latin, yet it did not root itself in that country. Only a few words were adopted, as praetorium and centurio, which are written in Greek letters in Mark 15:16, 39, 45. But since Latin was the language of the Roman officials, the inscription over the cross of Christ was written in Latin as well as in Greek and Aramaic (John 19:20).

Lat'ice. A network formed of crossed laths and covering a window (Judg. 5:28; Prov. 7:6, in A.V. casement; II Kings 1:2; S. of Sol. 2:9).

La'ver. A basin or trough in which to wash. A laver of brass or copper was used in connection with the tabernacle services. It stood upon a base of brass in the court between the altar and the door of the tabernacle. Both laver and base were made of the mirrors given by the women who assembled to minister at the door of the tent of meeting (Ex.

38:8; cf. ch. 33:7). Women served at the door of the tabernacle (I Sam. 2:22, R.V.), as did the Levites (Num. 4:23; 8:24). They probably came at stated intervals, as did the Levites and priests (Deut. 18:6; Luke 1:8, 23), to render various kinds of service, such as the performance of sacred dances and instrumental and vocal music (Ex. 15:20; Judg. 21:21; Ps. 68:25). The priests washed their hands and their feet in the laver before ministering at the altar or entering the sanctuary (Ex. 30:17-21; Lev. 8:11). This ceremony symbolized the holiness that is required in the service of God. In Solomon's Temple there were a molten sea and 10 lavers instead of 1 (I Kings 7:23-26, 38-40, 43). Some of the arrangements were afterward altered by Ahaz (II Kings 16:17).

Law. Of the several meanings which the word law possesses, 2 are employed in Scripture:

1. A uniformly acting force which determines the regular sequence of events; any uniformly acting influence or motive which controls the will (Rom. 7:23).

2. A rule of conduct enjoined by a competent authority and, if need be, enforced by penalties. This is the principal meaning of the word in Scripture. Many laws have commenced as customs, which, arising naturally in the intercourse between members of the same society, ultimately gained such acceptance that the community finally resolved to enforce them as laws. But a law may be imposed by a ruler, human or divine, without any reference to previous custom or legislation. In the English version law is mainly the rendering of Heb. tōrah, instruction, Aram. dāth, decree, law, and Gr. nomos, custom, law; and it denotes, except as noted under 1, an authoritative rule of conduct whether revealed from within or from without. It may be imposed by the constituted authorities of the state, which are ordained of God (Ezra 7:26; Esth. 1:19; Dan. 6:8), or proceed immediately from God, being revealed audibly in a supernatural manner as at Sinai or through the Spirit to prophets (Zech. 7:12) or made known in the constitution of our nature (Rom. 2:14, 15). They who fear God and keep his commandments are wise; and the godly wisdom which they have acquired from the study of the written law, from observation of the human heart, and from a life of holiness, when given forth in instruction is "the law of the wise" which is "a fountain of life" (Prov. 13:14), and when taught by parents to children is the law of father and mother which to them that obey is "a chaplet of grace" about the head (Prov. 1:8, 9).

The term "the law" with the definite article, but without any other qualifying word, occasionally refers to the whole O.T. in general (John 12:34; I Cor. 14:21; cf. John 10:34; 15:25), but it is employed much more frequently as the title of the Pentateuch (Josh. 1:8; Neh. 8:2, 3, 14; Matt. 5:17; 7:12; Luke 16:16; John 1:17). The Law of Moses was given by God through Moses (Ex. 20:19-22; Matt. 15:4; John 1:17). It is the law of God (Josh. 24:26; II Chron. 31:3). It was written in a book (Josh 1:7, 8), included the legislation contained in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy (cf. Mark 12:26 with Ex. 3:6; Mark 7:10 with Ex. 20:12; 21:17; Luke 2:22 and John 7:22, 23 with Lev. 12:2, 3; Matt. 8:4 with Lev. 14:3; Matt. 19:8; 22:24 with Deut. 24:1; 25:5), and was the title of the Pentateuch, constituting the 1st division of the canon (Luke 24:44); see PENTATEUCH. The legal portion, consisting of the Ten Commandments, which form the fundamental law of the theocracy, and statutes based on them, was given at Sinai. The fundamental law was uttered within the hearing of the whole congregation. The body of statutes controlled the general form of worship, protected human rights, regulated personal conduct, and prescribed sacred seasons and sacrifice. It was given at the same time as the Ten Commandments, but through Moses. See THEOCRACY. When the tabernacle was erected, the legislation was enacted which in detail regulated approach to God. See LEVITICUS. Thirty-eight years later Moses rehearsed the Law publicly before the new generation, and introduced modifications which the prospective change in the circumstances of the people rendered necessary. See DEUTERONOMY. It is generally held that when all that is local and temporary is put away the remaining portion of the Commandments, constituting the essential part, was designed for the Christian as well as the Jewish dispensation, and will not become obsolete at any future time (cf. Ex. 20:12 or Deut. 5:16 with Eph. 6:2, 3). The Ten Commandments, being the fundamental law and a summary of the whole moral code, endure. They are founded in the immutable nature of God and in the permanent relations of men on earth. Of the Fourth Commandment Christ said: "The sabbath was made for man," hence its principles remain in force while man continues on earth. Regarding the Fifth Commandment, the Apostle Paul evidently considers both the precept and the essential part of the promise still in force, though the local or temporary portion, "the land" of Canaan, disappears, and "the earth" takes its place (Eph. 6:2, 3). The ceremonial law apparently referred to in Heb. 8:7 as the first covenant is there described as decaying and waxing old, and being ready to vanish away (v. 13; cf. also chs. 8 to 10). Hence the apostles declined to impose it on the Gentile converts (Acts 15:23-29, etc.). Its function has been to point, by means of its priesthood, its sacrifices, its ceremonies, and its symbols to Christ, our great High Priest, and his atoning sacrifice for sin. When the antitype came, the types were no longer needful, though the memory of what they had been rendered them objects of interest, and will do so through all future ages. The enactments constituting the civil and criminal code of the Israelites were admirably adapted to the state of civilization which the people had then reached; but these laws were freely modified as the circumstances contemplated by them changed.

Documents from Nuzu (Nuzi) in e. Mesopotamia of the 15th century B.C. show that the customs of the patriarchs in Genesis have important correspondences to Nuzian laws and social practice. There are also many resemblances between the Code of Moses and that of Hammurabi (q.v.). See PUNISHMENT.

Law'yer. One versed in the Law of Moses, of which he was the professional interpreter, a scribe (cf. Matt. 22:35 with Mark 12:28); see SCRIBE 3. In Luke 11:44 the words "scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites!" (A.V.) are omitted in R.V., and there is no contrast between scribes and lawyers (v. 45). The lawyers joined the Pharisees in rejecting the preaching of John the Baptist (Luke 7:30). They considered themselves above the need of instruction from Jesus; and when one of them did condescend to hold communication with him, it was to try to puzzle him by means of a difficult question (Matt. 22:35; Luke 10:25; cf. Luke 14:3). Jesus denounced them at last in severe language for laying heavy burdens on the people, and keeping back from them the key of knowledge (Luke 11:45-52).

Laying On of Hands. An act symbolizing dedication to a special purpose. The Israelites placed their hands on the heads of the Levites, dedicating them to the service of the Lord at the tabernacle in the stead of the first-born of all the tribes. They pressed down their hands upon the heads of the Levites, doubtless with the intention of signifying thereby that, with God's permission and by his authority, they transferred their own obligation to service to the Levites (Num. 8:5-20). The Israelite, who brought an animal to the sacrificial altar, placed his hands upon the victim's head, thereby dedicating it to God and making it his own representative and substitute (Lev. 1:4; 16:21). The aged Jacob laid his hands on the heads of Joseph's sons, giving them a place among his own sons, and bestowing upon them the covenant blessing, transferring it from himself as its past possessor to them (Gen. 48:5-20). The hands of presbytery were laid upon the head of Timothy. The young man was thereby set apart to official service and grace was bestowed (I Tim. 4:14). Imposition of the hands of presbytery denoted not only commission, but also the bestowal, by those divinely authorized, of official spiritual grace; or at least it signified the authoritative recommendation of the candidate to God as a recipient of grace.

Laz'a-rus (lāz'ā-rūs) [Lat. from Gr., for Heb. Eleazar, q.v.]. 1. The name of the beggar in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. He was laid at the gate of the rich man, desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the sumptuously furnished table. He was also afflicted with ulcers, and the dogs licked his sores. Nothing is said of his and nothing of the rich man's character; but when they died Lazarus was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom, while the rich man went to Hades. At first sight it might appear that the one was rewarded simply for being poor, and the other punished for being rich; but the hint that the rich man's brothers, who evidently lived exactly as he had done, did not believe Moses and the prophets, and needed repentance, shows that a moral element entered into the case, and that conduct, not position, decided their ultimate destiny (Luke 16:19-31).

2. A member of the family of Bethany, and brother of Martha and Mary. He was an object of deep affection not only to his sisters, but to Jesus, which speaks well for his character. He was chosen for the signal honor of being raised from the dead. When he had fallen sick with a grievous disease the sisters sent word to Jesus, who was beyond the Jordan, but he did not respond at once. Two days later, when Lazarus was dead, Jesus went to Bethany. Being met by Martha outside the village, he had an important conversation with her in which he called forth an expression of her faith in the resurrection and in his power to do all things, and declared himself to be the resurrection and the life. When Mary had come, Jesus went with the sisters and their friends to the sepulcher, which was of the usual kind then in use among the Jews—a cave, either natural or artificial, in the face of a rock. After the stone had been rolled away, Jesus prayed to the Father. He did this for the sake of the people that stood by, that in the miracle they might discern proof that the Father had sent him. Then he said in the hearing of all present, "Lazarus, come forth," and the dead awoke to life and came forth (John 11:1-44). The effect of this miracle was profound. It was the cause of the enthusiastic reception of Jesus at Jerusalem. It also brought the sanhedrin to their decision to put him to death; for the people were hailing him as king, and if they should accept him and his undisguised doctrine of the spiritual nature of Christ's Kingdom, all hope of their rising against the Romans and endeavoring to restore the theocracy would vanish. The rulers decided that it was better for one man to perish, whether he were guilty or not, rather than for the whole nation to be lost (John 11:45-53; 12:9-19). Lazarus was present at a supper given in honor of his great Benefactor by Simon the leper at Bethany 6 days before the pass-over (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3; John 12:1, 2). The extent to which his restoration to life tended to bring new followers to Jesus so irritated the Jewish authorities that they plotted to put him also to death (John 12:10, 11). This is the last mention of Lazarus in Scripture. The plot to take his life does not seem to have been carried out, and in due time he doubtless died a second death, the time, the place, and the circumstances of which are all unknown.

Lead. One of the metals known to the ancients. It was taken as spoil from the Midianites (Num. 31:22), was used by the Egyptians (Jos. Apion i. 34), was obtained in large quantities in the peninsula of Sinai, was found in Egypt, and was imported from Tarshish (Ezek. 27:12). It was used for weights (Zech. 5:7), for sinkers on fish lines (Homer Iliad xxiv. 80), and for tablets on which inscriptions were written (Tacitus Ann. ii. 69; Pliny Hist. Nat. xiii. 21; Pausanias ix. 31, 4). Job 19:24 has been understood to refer to such tablets; but the words rather mean that, since a book (v. 23) is liable to perish, Job desires the letters to be cut in the rock and then, to render them more distinct and durable, to be filled with molten lead.

Leaf. 1. Foliage of a tree (Gen. 3:7; 8:11). 2. Part of the wing of a folding door, when each of the 2 wings was divided either lengthwise or crosswise (I Kings 6:34; Ezek. 41:24). In the former passage, the door of the Holy Place in Solomon's Temple is referred to. It was the 4th part of the wall (I Kings 6:33); and was probably oblong like the wall itself, and measured 5 cubits in width by 7½ in height (cf. v. 2). The measurement presumably includes the 2 doorposts and the lintel, leaving an opening at least 4 cubits wide by 7 high. This was closed by 2 doors, each of which was divided perpendicularly or horizontally into halves. If divided horizontally through the middle, the leaf measured 2 by 3½ cubits, or 3 by 5½ feet, and was quite ample to afford ingress and egress to the priests in their daily ministrations, without requiring the entire door to be opened. The interpretation of the Hebrew text of I Kings 6:33, however, is difficult, and the words translated "out of a fourth part of the wall" should probably on the basis of the LXX and Vulgate be rendered "door-posts foursquare."

3. The page or column of a roll (Jer. 36:23; cf. v. 2).

Le'ah (lē'ā) [probably, wild cow, as in Arab.]. The elder daughter of Laban. She was less attractive than her younger sister, Rachel, one chief defect being that her eyes were tender (weak, delicate). By a trick she was passed off on Jacob as his bride, when he had served 7 years for Rachel. Leah became the mother of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and their sister Dinah (Gen. 29:16-35; 30:17-21).

Leas'ing. Lying, falsehood (Ps. 4:2; 5:6, A.V.). As the word is now obsolete, R.V. substitutes "falsehood" and "lies."

Leath'er. The art of tanning and dyeing skins was understood by the Hebrews (Ex. 25:5; Acts 9:43). Leather was used by them and other nations of antiquity for numerous purposes: for articles of clothing (Lev. 13:48; Num. 31:20), coverings of tents (Ex. 26:14), bottles (Judith 10:5), shields. The leather of the shield was oiled to keep it soft and shining (II Sam. 1:21; Isa. 21:5). Seal or porpoise skin was used for making a superior kind of sandal (Ezek. 16:10; in A.V. badgers' skin). Elijah and John the Baptist wore leather girdles (II Kings 1:8; Matt. 3:4).

Leav'en. A substance used to produce fermentation in dough and make it rise (Ex. 12:15, 19; 13:7). In Scripture times leaven generally consisted of a little old dough in a high state of fermentation. Its disadvantages were that the bread thus produced had a disagreeably sour taste and smell. To obviate these defects yeast or barm is now employed as leaven. The use of leaven was forbidden in all offerings made by fire to the Lord (Lev. 2:11). But when the offering was to be consumed by man, leaven might be used (Lev. 7:13; 23:17). The principal reason for the prohibition was that fermentation is incipient corruption, and was emblematic of corruption. It is used for corrupt doctrine (Matt. 16:11; Mark 8:15) and for wickedness in the heart (I Cor. 5:6-8; Gal. 5:9). The Israelites were forbidden to eat leavened bread or to have any leaven in their houses during the pass-over festival. The absence of leaven symbolized the incorruptness of life which God's service requires, reminded them of the haste in which they had fled out of Egypt, and suggested the affliction of Egypt by the insipidity of the bread (Ex. 12:39; Deut. 16:3; I Cor. 5:7, 8). The word is used, however, in a good sense in the parable of the leaven, where its hidden but pervasive action is taken as a symbol of the growth of the Kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:33; Luke 13:20, 21).

Le-ba'na (lê-bā'nā) and Le-ba'nah (lê-bā'nā) [white]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48).

Leb'a-non (lêb'ā-nōn) [white]. A snow-clad mountain range (Jer. 18:14), with hills of less elevation running from it in every direction (Hos. 14:5). Its streams rendered the rich soil of the valleys extremely productive. The lower zone was covered with vines (Hos. 14:6, 7), but the mountains were most noted for their forests of gigantic cedars. Fir trees or cypresses also abounded (I Kings 5:6-10; II Kings 19:23; Isa. 60:13; Zech. 11:1). Lions and leopards roamed in the woods (II Kings 14:9; S. of Sol. 4:8). The trees were felled, and the timber was used not only in the construction of palaces and temples, but also by the Phoenicians for the masts of ships (Ezra 3:7; Ezek. 27:5). Lebanon was the n.w. boundary of the Promised Land (Deut. 1:7; 11:24; Josh. 1:4; 11:17; 12:7; 13:5). It is of limestone formation. The mountains consist of 2 ranges, running n. and s., separated by the valley of the Litany and the Orontes. In the Greek period the name Lebanon became restricted to the w. range, while the e. received the name Anti-Lebanon. This distinction still exists. The intervening valley is called Coelesyria, that is, Hollow Syria, or the Bekā'. The chain may be considered to commence about 15 miles s.e. of Sidon, and to run to about 12 miles n.e. by n. of Tripoli, a distance of about 100 miles. The greatest elevation of Lebanon is at its n. end; of Anti-Lebanon, at its s. end in Mount Hermon. 'For 10 miles the n. end of this ridge [of Lebanon] is over 10,000 feet above the sea. For another 10 miles it is between 7,500 and 8,000 feet. Then for 20 miles it sinks to an average of from 6,500 to 7,000 feet. Then it rises in the grand truncated cone of Jebel Sunnin to over 8,500 feet. Again it sinks to the plateau between Sunnin and Keniseh, to about 6,000 feet. The highest peak of Keniseh rises again to nearly 7,000 feet. Then comes the pass of the Damascus road at Khan Muzhir, 5,022 feet. Then the ridge of Jebel Barūk and Jebel Niha, over 40 miles long, about 6,500 feet, the latter ending in the picturesque Twins (Tomāt Niha). Finally, Jebel Rihān, which sinks gradually to the level of the plateau of Merj 'Ayūn. Jebel Keniseh, and Jebel Sunnin, at the center of the chain, although not the highest, are from their isolation far the most imposing peaks" (Post). The highest peaks are Jebel Makmal and Kurnat es-Sauda, each about 10,200 feet.

Le-ba'oth (lê-bā'ōth) [lionesse]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:32). See BETH-LEBAOTH.

Leb-bae'us (lê-bē'ūs). See JUDAS 8.

Leb'-ka'mai (lêb'kā'mi). An artificial name (Jer. 51:1, R.V.), which, when the consonants are exchanged according to the system called Athbash, yields KSDIM, that is, Chaldeans. The method is explained, and another instance is cited, in the article SHESHACH.

Le-bō'nah (lê-bō'nā) [incense, frankincense]. A town n. of Siloh (Judg. 21:19), identified with Lubban, on the road between Shechem and Jerusalem, 3 miles w. by n. of Siloh.

Le'cah (lê'kā). A village of Judah (I Chron. 4:21), to judge from the context. Site unknown.

Leek. The rendering in Num. 11:5, of Hebrew hāsūr, which commonly denotes grass. The leek (Allium porrum) is probably intended in this passage, for it is mentioned, along with onions and garlic, as eaten in Egypt; the word is so rendered by the Targum of Onkelos, the LXX, Vulgate, and Peshitta.

Lees. Dregs or sediment deposited from wine or other liquor (Isa. 25:6). The liquor was allowed to stand on the lees that its color and body might be better preserved.

To settle on one's lees is to settle down in contentment with one's character and circumstances (Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12). To drink the lees of the cup of wrath means to drain the cup, enduring the punishment to the utmost (Ps. 75:8, rendered "dregs").

Le'gion. 1. The chief subdivision of the Roman army (Jos. War iii. 4, 2). It originally contained 3,000 foot soldiers with a contingent of cavalry of 300 men in 10 squadrons. From 100 B.C. to the fall of the empire the number varied from 5,000 to 6,200, while from Augustus to Hadrian or during the N.T. period 6,000 seems to have been the normal size besides the cavalry. At this time the legion consisted of 10 cohorts, each cohort of 3 maniples, and each manipulus of 2 centuries (cf. Matt. 27:27, R.V. marg.); and was officered by tribunes and centurions (Jos. War iii. 5, 3; Acts 21:31, 32, R.V. marg.; 23:23), numbering 10 and 60 respectively. In Scripture legion is used to denote any large host (Matt. 26:53; Mark 5:9).

The military standard of the Romans was at first a bunch of straw attached to a pole. Later an eagle and 4 other animals formed the standards of a legion, but after 104 B.C. the eagle alone was employed (Pliny Hist. Nat. x. 4). It was committed to the custody of the chief centurion. In addition to the eagle, the standard also commonly bore a small image of the emperor, and the introduction of these images into Jerusalem by Pontius Pilate caused an insurrection of the Jews (Jos.

Antiq. xviii. 3, 1; War ii. 9, 2). But while the great standard of the whole legion was the eagle, each cohort and century had its own standard, and these minor ensigns assumed a variety of forms.

2. The name of an unclean spirit, or spirits (Mark 5:9, 15; Luke 8:30), so called in comparison with the multitude of men in a Roman legion.

Roman Soldier, from a Bas-relief of the First Century A.D.

Le'ha-bīm (lē-hā'bīm). A tribe sprung from or incorporated with the Egyptians (Gen. 10:13; I Chron. 1:11), probably the same as the Lubim (q.v.).

Le'hi (lē'hi) [jawbone, cheek]. A place in Judah (Judg. 15:9), elevated (vs. 11, 13), where the Philistines spread themselves when they advanced into Judah to seize Samson. It may have been a ridge. It received its name either from a series of jagged crags resembling a jawbone, or from Samson's exploit with the jawbone of an ass. At any rate, that part of it where Samson beat down the Philistines, who seem to have been fleeing, and cast aside the jawbone that had served him as a weapon, was remembered, and it was pointed out as Ramath-lehi, height of the jawbone (v. 17). Guérin locates Lehi at 'Ain el-Lehi, n.w. of Bethlehem, about 2 miles s.w. of Málhah, and hence not far from E am (cf. v. 11), on the high plateau. But the existence of 'Ain el-Lehi appears doubtful. It may have been in Wadi eš-Šarār, not far from Zorah and Timnath.

Lem'u-el (lēm'û-ēl) [devoted to God]. The royal author of Prov., ch. 31, who reproduces what was taught him by his mother (v. 1).

Len'til. A plant (II Sam. 23:11), boiled as pottage (Gen. 25:29, 34) and in times of scarcity made into bread (Ezek. 4:9). The lentil (Errum lens) is a papilionaceous plant, allied to the vetches. It has compound leaves, with 5 to 6 pairs of oblong leaflets, white flowers striped with violet, and small broad legumes. Pottage made from it is red. It was this which was given to Esau when he was famishing, and it was from it (Gen. 25:30) that his 2d name Edom was derived (but cf. ch. 25:25). The plant is wild in Moab and is cultivated in all parts of Palestine. The seeds when boiled are thoroughly wholesome. It is from them that revalenta Arabica is made.

Leop'ard [Lat. leopardus, from Gr. leopardos, from leōn, lion, and pardos, pard]. A large and ferocious spotted (Jer. 13:23) cat of Africa and s. Asia. It was very swift (Hab. 1:8). Its appropriate food was the kid (Isa. 11:6), but it sometimes attacked man (Hos. 13:7, 8); lurking for the purpose in the vicinity of cities or villages (Jer. 5:6), though its ordinary habitation was among the mountains (S. of Sol. 4:8). The leopard (Felis pardus or Leopardus) was believed by the ancients and some moderns to be a hybrid between the lion and the panther; hence its name, as in the etymology above. In Palestine it now occurs chiefly in the region e. of the Jordan; but it was evidently more common in Scripture times than at present, in the country w. of the river.

In Dan. 7:6 it symbolizes a fierce nation and its king, doubtless the Persian Empire; in Rev. 13:2 the composite creature, which combines the four beasts of Daniel and typifies the united powers of this world, has the body of a leopard.

Lep'er. See LEPROSY 1.

Lep'rosy. 1. A dreadful disease, in Heb. šār'a'ath (literally, scourge); the person afflicted with it is called a leper. The homiletic use of leprosy as a type of sin is not Biblical; Ps. 51:7 might approach this sense, but it may refer to Num. 19:18 instead of to the cleansing of a leper. The symptoms are described in Lev. 13:1-46. It was not a superficial, but a deep-seated malady. It often began as a rising, or a scab, or a bright spot, which tended to spread, turning white the hair covering the parts affected (Lev. 13:2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 24, 25, 27, 35, 36). Raw flesh tended to appear (vs. 10, 14-16, 24). Among the parts of the body specially liable to attack were the scalp of the head, the beard, the top of the head, or the forehead, after these had become bald; also any spot which had been accidentally injured by fire (vs. 24, 29, 30, 42). A leper was to be excluded from the camp; was required to let the hair of his head go loose and his clothes be rent; was to cover his upper lip, and cry, "Unclean! Unclean!" (vs. 45, 46); cf. II Kings 7:3-15; Luke 17:12 seq. He had to appear repeatedly before the priest, who was to pronounce on the character of the disease (Lev. 13:1-44); and in the event of the malady's departing, he was to go through an elaborate process of cleansing and sacrifice (Lev. 14:1-32). While the leprosy was spreading, the sufferer was unclean, but if it overspread the whole body, he was adjudged clean (Lev. 13:6, 12 seq.). In the description of the disease given in Lev., ch. 13, there is no mention of the leper's hue changing to a snowy white, as was the case with Miriam (Num. 12:10) and Gehazi (II Kings 5:27), and momentarily with Moses (Ex. 4:6). Not even those whose circumstances were comfortable were exempt from this disease. Thus, it affected Naaman, when commander in chief of the army of Syria (II Kings 5:1-14), and Uzziah during the later years of his reign over Judah (II Kings 15:5; II Chron. 26:21). In the cases of Miriam, Gehazi, and Uzziah the sudden infliction of leprosy was a divine judgment. The regulations about excluding the leper from society were carried out among the Hebrews (Num. 5:1-4; 12:10, 15; II Kings 7:3, 8, 10; 15:5; II Chron. 26:21; cf. also Luke 17:12); but the fact that the king of Syria seems to have depended on Naaman, even when he was a leper, and that Naaman dwelt with his family and was accompanied by servants, shows that leprosy, though loathsome, was not actually contagious (II Kings 5:2, 13).

The disease to which the English word leprosy is now confined is a formidable malady, technically called Elephantiasis Graecorum, elephant disease of the Greeks. It appears under 2 forms: the tubercular or nodular or black leprosy is at present the more common, and the name is restricted to it by some authorities. It affects primarily the skin and mucous membranes. The anesthetic or white leprosy affects the peripheral nerves principally and produces numbness. The symptoms of the 2 forms are often united, and one form frequently passes into the other. The coming of the disease is preceded by lassitude for months or years. Then circular spots or blotches of irregular form and varying extent appear on the forehead, the limbs, and the body. After a time, the central portion of the spots and blotches becomes white, and the parts affected contract a certain numbness. In the worst cases the joints of the fingers and toes fall off one by one, and injuries to the other parts produce mutilation and deformity. Thomson says: "The 'scab' comes on by degrees in different parts of the body; the hair falls from the head and eyebrows; the nails loosen, decay, and drop off; joint after joint of the fingers and toes shrink up and slowly fall away. The gums are absorbed, and the teeth disappear. The nose, the eyes, the tongue, and the palate are slowly consumed." Again, he says that when approaching the Jaffa Gate of Jerusalem he was startled by the sudden apparition of a crowd of beggars, without eyes, nose, or hair. They held up handless arms, and unearthly sounds gurgled through throats without palates. This loathsome and fatal disease is popularly believed to be identical with that of Leviticus and the other books of the Bible (cf. Num. 12:12).

But the disease mentioned in Scripture seems to have been curable (Lev. 14:3), whereas Elephantiasis Graecorum is not, except in the early stages. Sir Risdon Bennett and others believe that probably Lepra vulgaris, now merged in the genus Psoriasis, and called Psoriasis vulgaris, the dry tetter, is the Biblical leprosy. It is a noncontagious, scaly disease, generally commencing about the elbows and knees, as small circular patches of silvery-white scales, which spread till they become the size of a quarter or a half dollar, by which time the scales have fallen from the central portion of the circle, leaving it red; other circles arising coalesce. Afterward the abdomen, the chest, and the back become affected, and in rare cases the disease extends at last also to the head, face, and hands. The constitutional disturbance is trifling, and while the disease is apparently curable, it is liable to recur. It is simply a skin disease, in no way endangering life. Or, the white leprosy of the O.T. may have been Psoriasis guttata, in which the scattered patches are said to give an appearance to the skin as if it had been splashed with mortar. Perhaps Heb. šāra'ath was a generic term, and the elephantiasis and the psoriasis two of its species; and it is quite possible that different varieties prevailed at different times. If the leprosy of the Old and that of the New Testament were identical, then confirmation is given to the opinion that the former was psoriasis, for Luke (ch. 5:12, 13), himself a physician, employs Gr. lepra, which was technically used of psoriasis. With this Josephus' description of leprosy agrees, for (Jos. Antiq. iii. 11, 4) he defines a leper to be a man who has a misfortune in the color of his skin and makes no allusion to graver symptoms. He mentions also that among the Gentiles lepers were not excluded from society, but were competent to discharge important functions in the body politic.

2. The same word šāra'ath was applied to a greenish or reddish appearance in a garment and to hollow greenish or reddish streaks in the wall of a house (Lev. 13:47-59; 14:33-37). The leprosy in garments may be mildew; that of houses, mold or dry rot, or any fungus growth.

Le'shem (lē'shēm. See DAN 3.

Le'tu'shim (lē-tū'shīm). A tribe descended from Dedan (Gen. 25:3). They doubtless settled in Arabia.

Le-um'mim (lē-ūm'īm) [peoples, nations]. A tribe descended from Dedan (Gen. 25:3). They doubtless settled in Arabia.

Le'vi (lē'vī) [joined, attached; following]. 1. Third son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 29:34). He took part with Simeon, Leah's second son, in massacring Hamor, Shechem, and the men of their city, in revenge for the injury done by Shechem to their sister Dinah (Gen. 34:25-31). Jacob on his deathbed remembered with fresh abhorrence this deed of blood, and, referring to Simeon and Levi, said, "Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel" (Gen. 49:7). Levi had 3 sons: Gershon or Gershom, Kohath, and Merari (Gen. 46:11), and died in Egypt at the age of 137 (Ex. 6:16). See LEVITES.

2 and 3. Two ancestors of Christ, one the son of Symeon, and the other a son of Melchi (Luke 3:24, 29, 30).

4. Another name for the Apostle Matthew (cf. Matt. 9:9-13; Mark 2:14-17; Luke 5:27-32).

Levi'a'than [one spirally wound]. A great aquatic animal mentioned only in poetic passages. He was formed by God to play in the sea (Ps. 104:26). He has limbs, head, neck, eyes, nose, jaw, mouth, teeth, and tongue (Job 41:1, 2, 7, 12, 14, 18, 19, 22), and is covered with scales and an impenetrable hide (vs. 7, 15-17, 26-29). He lies upon the mire or makes the sea to boil like a pot (vs. 30, 31). He is too large to be taken by fishhook or harpoon (vs. 1, 26), is terrible of aspect (v. 9), and mighty in strength, but comely of proportion (v. 12). He is poetically described as breathing fire and smoke (vs. 19-21). When God worked salvation by dividing the sea, he destroyed the sea monsters which inhabited it, broke the heads of leviathan, and left his carcass to be eaten by the people of the desert (Ps. 74:14). As the sea is the type of the restless, surging nations of the earth, so leviathan which dwells therein, leviathan the flying serpent, leviathan the swift serpent, leviathan the crooked serpent, and the dragon symbolize the fierce and terrible powers of the world that have afflicted the people of God, but whom God will ultimately destroy (Isa. 27:1). Leviathan is commonly regarded as the crocodile (Job 41:1, R.V. marg.). Accordingly the imagery is apt. Egypt, his habitat, was the typical oppressor of the Kingdom of God, and Egypt's power was broken and its king thwarted when God divided the Red Sea for the deliverance of his people. Leviathan may, however, be merely a creation of the fancy, an imaginary sea monster, the inspired poets and prophets of Israel employing popular material to serve in the illustration of truth. In Job 3:8 leviathan may be a fabulous dragon which caused eclipses by swallowing sun and moon, and the cursers of the day may be conjurers who claimed the power to produce eclipses by his aid. Or in this passage leviathan may be the untamable, terrible crocodile which only conjurers of highest skill claimed ability to summon to their aid.

Le'vites (lā'vīts). 1. The descendants of Levi, the son of Jacob. He had 3 sons: Gershon or Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, each of whom founded a tribal family (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16; Num. 3:17; I Chron. 6:16-48). Moses and Aaron were Levites of the house of Amram and family of Kohath (Ex. 6:16-26).

2. The men of the tribe of Levi charged with the care of the sanctuary. It has been suggested that the Hebrew term Lewi (Levite) is derived from **lawiyu*, a person pledged for a debt or a vow. Thus Samuel was vowed by his mother at Shiloh before he was born. Aaron and his sons were set apart for the priesthood and the office was made hereditary. But the tabernacle and its service had been projected on a noble scale. The care and transportation of the costly sanctuary and the preparation of materials for the elaborate service entailed labors which no one man or no one family was equal to. Helpers were needed. The charge of the tabernacle was an honorable work. Who should undertake it? The first-born belonged to God. This conviction was deepened by the circumstances connected with the deliverance from Egypt. When the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, blood on the lintel and side doorposts was needed to protect the Israelite first-born males from a similar fate. They had then become the special property of Jehovah and henceforth were consecrated to him as a memorial (Ex. 13:11-16). But instead of the first-born of all the tribes, the Levites were chosen for service in connection with the sanctuary; and the choice was made because, when the people had broken the covenant with Jehovah by making the golden calf, the Levites alone had voluntarily returned to their allegiance and shown zeal for God's honor (Ex. 32:26-29; Num. 3:9, 11-13, 40, 41, 45 seq.; 8:16-18). The first-born males of Israel, exclusive of the Levites, numbered 22,273 in the census taken at Sinai (Num. 3:43, 46). There were 22,000 Levites (v. 39); but the items given in vs. 22, 28, and 34 total 22,300. Either an error has occurred somewhere in the transcription, or else 300 of these Levites were themselves first-born and therefore could not serve as substitutes for the first-born of the other tribes. The 22,000 were substituted. The remaining 273 first-born of Israel were redeemed by the payment of 5 shekels apiece (Num. 3:46-51).

It was the duty of the Levites to transport the tabernacle and its furniture when the camp moved; and when the camp rested to erect the tent, have care of it, and assist the priests in their varied work (Num. 1:50-53; 3:6-9, 25-37; 4:1-33; I Sam. 6:15; II Sam. 15:24). As the sons of Aaron were Levites as well as priests, they are frequently included under the designation Levite (Deut. 33:8-10; Josh. 14:3; 21:1, 4; Mal. 3:3); and also, either as higher officials or as Levites, they might, if they saw fit, discharge any service that pertained to the Levites.

The age at which the obligation of service began was 30 years (Num. 4:3; I Chron. 23:3-5, and 25 years (Num. 8:24), and 20 years (I Chron. 23:24, 27). The divergent practice at different periods of the history explains the peculiarity in part. It is even conceivable that a reduction in the age for entrance and a lengthening of the term of service was made by Moses himself sometime during the course of 40 years, and such a change is expressly stated to have been made by David. But it is noticeable that both in the book of Numbers and in the books of Chronicles the age of 30 years is forthwith followed by an earlier age. Also in Num., ch. 4, the service of the Levites who were 30 years old is defined by an explanatory clause: "Every one that entered in to do the work of service, and the work of bearing burdens in the tent of meeting" (vs. 47, 49); and, in fact, the particular service is defined by the specifications of the entire chapter. It is, therefore, not at all improbable that at 30 years of age the Levites became eligible to full service of every sort that pertained to Levites at the sanctuary, including the high and honorable offices of bearing the tabernacle and its sacred furniture in public procession and, at a later period, of serving in positions that brought distinction and called for wisdom and discretion (Num. 4:1-33; I Chron. 23:3-5); but the Levites began general service at first at 25 years of age, and performed the various duties belonging to their calling with the exceptions that have been noted; at least the higher duties are not mentioned in connection with the more youthful age (Num. 8:24-26; I Chron. 23:25-32). David, however, saw fit to make a further reduction in the age at which the simpler duties should be undertaken; he directed that the Levites should enter upon service at the same time of life as that at which the other Israelites became liable to military service, namely, at 20 years, seeing that the need of transporting the Ark no longer existed and the service of the sanctuary had become a routine, and a sort of apprenticeship was a useful preparation for the regular ecclesiastical duties. Twenty years was henceforth the legal age for the Levites to enter upon service (II Chron. 31:17; Ezra 3:8). At this age they commenced as assistants to the priests and chief Levites (I Chron. 23:28-31; cf. II Chron. 29:34; 35:11), but probably not until they reached 30 years were they regarded as experts or eligible for the higher offices of doorkeeper or member of the Temple orchestra or administrator or judge (I Chron. 23:3-5). They retired from active service at 50, but were free to render assistance to the Levites who succeeded them in the work at the sanctuary (Num. 8:25, 26).

An official dress was prescribed for the Levites, but on great occasions they drew on festal raiment (I Chron. 15:27; II Chron. 5:12). It was an innovation when the Levitical singers in the 1st century A.D. obtained permission from King Agrippa, with the sanction of the sanhedrin, to wear linen garments as constantly as did the priests (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 6). They were not required to devote their entire time to the sanctuary or to dwell continually near it; but on the allotment of Canaan they were distributed to various towns (Josh. 21:20-40). Exclusive of the towns allotted to the Levites who were priests, all of which were in Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, the Levitical towns numbered 35 and were situated among the remaining tribes on the n. and e. (Josh. 21:5-7). Since the Levites as a tribe were "wholly given unto the Lord in behalf of the children of Israel," and were appointed to service at the tabernacle, it was natural that in the n. districts, where no Levitical priests dwelt, the lower order of the Levites should be drawn upon by the idolater Micah and after him by the idolatrous migrating Danites to furnish a man for priestly services (Judg. 17:8-13; 18:18-20, 30, 31). In David's reign the Levites were divided into 4 classes: 1. assistants to the priests in the work of the sanctuary; 2. judges and scribes; 3. gate keepers; 4. musicians. Each of these classes, with the possible exception of the 2d, was subdivided into 24 courses or families to serve in rotation (I Chron., chs. 24 to 26; cf. ch. 15:16-24; II Chron. 19:8-11; 30:16, 17; Ezra 6:18; Neh. 13:5). On the disruption of the monarchy, many Levites and priests left the Northern Kingdom and came to Judah and Jerusalem (II Chron. 11:13-15).

Leviti'cus (lê-vî't'i-kûs) [Lat. from Gr., relating to the Levites]. The 3d book of the Pentateuch. When the tabernacle had been erected and a priest appointed to minister at the altar, the next step was to regulate access to God. This is the object of the ordinances contained in Leviticus. In approach to Jehovah, sacrifices and a priesthood were needed, and intercourse with God requires the attainment and maintenance of purity, both ceremonial and moral. To exercise a proper control over these matters several manuals were prepared, which were placed together and form the book of Leviticus: 1. A directory of procedure to be followed by the worshiper and the priest at the offering of the various kinds of sacrifice (Lev. 1:1 to 6:7), and a book on the disposal of the sacrifice (chs. 6:8 to 7:36). The directory of procedure was drawn up at Sinai after the tabernacle had been erected, and the book on the disposal of the sacrifice was written at the same general time, when "he commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto Jehovah" (ch. 1:1; cf. ch. 7:38 with ch. 1:2). 2. A record of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priestly office (chs. 8; 9), an official act prescribed during Moses' first sojourn in Sinai (Ex., ch. 29), which established the priesthood and was the precedent for future ordinations. To this record an account of the punishment of Nadab and Abihu for illegal approach was appended, together with legislation which was enacted to meet deficiencies revealed in the laws on this occasion (Lev., ch. 10). 3. A directory of ceremonial purity (chs. 11 to 16), containing laws concerning foods that defile, diseases or natural functions that render unclean, and the ceremonial national purification (already prescribed, Ex. 30:10). This directory is ascribed to Moses as the representative of Jehovah (Lev. 11:1, etc.), when Israel was in the wilderness (chs. 14:34; 16:1). 4. The law of holiness (chs. 17 to 26), statutes concerning holiness of life, given by Moses (ch. 17:1, etc.), at Sinai (chs. 25:1; 26:46; cf. 24:10). These several collections are followed by an appendix on vows, tithes, and things devoted (ch. 27). Occasionally a law is repeated in a new connection and for a different purpose. At times also the legislation is interrupted by the narrative of events that led to enactments (chs. 10:1-7, 12-20; 21:24; 24:10-23). Possibly some laws that were framed after the departure from Sinai were inserted for the sake of convenience in their proper place among the laws relating to the same subject. See PENTATEUCH.

Throughout the book but one sanctuary (ch. 19:21 et passim) and one altar for all Israel are recognized (chs. 1:3; 8:3; 17:8, 9), and the sons of Aaron are the sole priests (ch. 1:5). The Levites are only incidentally mentioned (ch. 25:32, 33). Variations in the laws or their statement as found in Leviticus and Deuteronomy are intelligible when it is remembered that: 1. Leviticus is a manual for the priests, to guide them through the technicalities of the ritual; while Deuteronomy is primarily not a law book at all, but a popular address to instruct the people in their own duties and to exhort them to fidelity. Deuteronomy omits matters of detail which concern priests only. 2. The laws of Leviticus are dated at Sinai an entire generation before the addresses contained in Deuteronomy were delivered at Shittim. Accordingly the legislation of Leviticus is presupposed in Deuteronomy. This is the standpoint of the Pentateuch.

The essentials of the legislation of Leviticus are reflected in the history in the early recognition of the Aaronic priesthood. So far as the evidence reaches, the priests were sons of Aaron exclusively (Deut. 10:6; Josh. 14:1; cf. ch. 21:4, 18 with I Kings 2:26; Judg. 20:27, 28; I Sam. 1:3; 2:27, 28; cf. I Sam. 21:6 with I Chron. 24:3; I Sam. 22:11; and II Sam. 8:17 with Ezra 7:3 and I Chron. 24:3). The Levites are sojourners and subordinate (Judg. 17:7-9; 19:1; I Sam. 6:15; II Sam. 15:24). Compare also the one house of the Lord (Judg. 18:31; 19:18; I Sam. 1:7, 24; 3:3; 4:3), and the feast of the Lord, at the tabernacle visited by all Israel (Judg. 21:19; I Sam. 1:3); see further the articles PRIEST, HIGH PRIEST, LEVITES, ALTAR, DEUTERONOMY.

Lib'er-tines [Lat., freedmen]. A section of the Jewish community which had a synagogue at Jerusalem and were among the foes of the first martyr, Stephen (Acts 6:9). They were probably Jews, who, having been taken prisoners in battle by Pompey and other Roman generals, had been bondsmen at Rome, but were afterward restored to liberty.

Lib'nah (lîb'nâ) [whiteness]. 1. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:20). See LABAN 2.

2. A city in the lowland between Makkedah and Lachish (Josh. 10:29-31), captured by Joshua (vs. 30, 39; ch. 12:15). It was situated in the territory allotted to Judah (ch. 15:42), and was subsequently assigned to the descendants of Aaron (ch. 21:13; I Chron. 6:57). When Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, was king, Libnah revolted against Judah (II Kings 8:22; II Chron. 21:10). Sennacherib, king of Assyria, warred against it (II Kings 19:8; Isa. 37:8). The father of Hamutal, the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, was from this place (II Kings 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1). Probably to be located at Tell Bornât, about 2 miles n.w. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin); Tell esh Şâfi (or Şâfiyeh) has also been suggested.

Lib'ni (lîb'nî) [white, pure]. 1. Son of Gershon, and grandson of Levi. He was founder of a minor tribal family or father's house (Ex. 6:17; Num. 3:18, 21; 26:58).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli (I Chron. 6:29).

Lib'ya (lib'i-á), Lib'yans (lib'i-ânz). A rendering of Pūt (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 30:5; 38:5, A.V.) and Libim (Dan. 11:43). A country and its inhabitants in the w. part of Lower Egypt or on its borders. The Greeks first applied Libya to all Africa w. of Egypt; later the name was restricted to the part between Egypt and the Roman province of Africa, the w. frontier being at Philaenorum Arae in the middle of the Greater Syrtis. The Romans divided the country into 2 parts, calling the e. district Libya Inferior (Marmarica) and the w., Libya Superior (Cyrenaica). The s. limit at the desert was undefined. Cyrenaica consisted of the Pentapolis of Cyrene, Barca with its port Ptolemais, Euesperides, Apollonia, and Teuchira or Arsinoë. Cyrenaica was formed with Crete into a province in 67 B.C. Its capital was Cyrene, and it was from this w. province that representatives were present at Jerusalem on Pentecost (Acts 2:10; cf. Jos. Antiq. xvi. 6, 1).

Lice. The rendering of Heb. kinnām or kinnim (Ex. 8:16-18; Ps. 105:31), referring to some small insect noxious to man. Josephus understood the word to mean lice (Jos. Antiq. ii. 14, 3). R.V. marg. translates it sandflies or fleas.

Lic'tor. See PRAETOR.

Lieu'ten'ant. See SATRAP.

Lign'al'oes. See ALOES.

Lig'ure. The rendering of Heb. leshem, a gem, the 1st stone in the 3d row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:19). This translation is derived from the LXX, Vulgate, and Josephus (Jos. War v. 5, 7); but it is impossible to identify the ligurius of the ancients with any known gem. The R.V. renders the Hebrew word by jacinth or amber.

Lik'hi (lik'hi). A Manassite, family of Shemida (I Chron. 7:19).

Lil'y. The rendering of the Hebrew words shūshan, shōshān (in pause), and shōshannāh. The plant so designated is found in pastures where sheep and gazelles feed (S. of Sol. 2:16; 4:5; 6:3), and among thorns (ch. 2:2), besides being cultivated in gardens (ch. 6:2). It was so much at home in valleys that it was designated the lily of the valleys (ch. 2:1). It was a sweet-scented plant, dropping a myrrhlike perfume (ch. 5:13). The Hebrew word was rendered krinon by the Greek translators. The krinon is a plant which grows beside the water (Ecclus. 50:8) and among the grass of the field (Matt. 6:28). It is often mentioned in connection with frankincense and the rose (Ecclus. 39:13, 14). It is the type of a life of beautiful deeds. The high priest, coming forth from the sanctuary is compared with it (ch. 50:8). It excels Solomon in his glorious array (Matt. 6:28 seq.; Luke 12:27 seq.).

The words shūshan and krinon were not always used with reference to the lily in its modern scientific sense, but included with the true lily various plants that resemble the lily. The lotus was known to the ancient Egyptians as sshshn, sshn, sshun (cf. Bohairic Coptic shōshen, lily), and is called by Herodotus krinon (Herod. ii. 92). The ordinary word for a lily in Arabic is still sausan, sūsan; but it is used generically rather than specifically, including the tulip and even the anemone and ranunculus. What varieties of lily were anciently cultivated in the gardens of Palestine is not known. Besides the true lily, other genera of the order Liliaceae, as hyacinths and tulips, grow in profusion in the spring. A fine, dark-violet flower, known as sūsan, is found far and wide in the Hauran. Thomson describes a splendid iris, which he calls the Huleh lily, growing among the oak woods around the n. base of Tabor and on the hills of Nazareth. The flower is dark purple and white. He believes that it is the lily referred to by Jesus. Red anemones are so marked a feature of the valleys of Palestine in the spring that various travelers, Tristram included, have suggested that Anemone coronaria, the red variety of which is very common, was probably the lily of the N.T. G. E. Post thinks that Christ referred to some plant of the Liliaceae, Iridaceae, or Amaryllidaceae, all of which could popularly be called lilies. Various species of Gladiolus grow among the grain, often overtopping it and decorating the fields with various shades of pinkish purple to deep violet-purple and blue; the beautiful racemes of these flowers peer up in every direction above the standing grain. Beautiful irises are also found in swamps and pasture lands. It is doubtful whether our Lord had any particular lilies in mind, but more likely he refers to all the splendid colors and beautiful shapes of the numerous wild flowers included under the general designation of lily. See ROSE.

Lime. A material prepared by burning limestone, shells, and other calcareous substances (Isa. 33:12; Amos 2:1), and used for making mortar and plaster, and for whitewashing walls (Deut. 27:2; Matt. 23:27; Acts 23:3). See MORTAR, II.

Lin'en. 1. Fine linen is the rendering of Heb. shēsh, applied to a stuff of which vestments were made; it is a loan word from Egypt. shš. It was in it that Joseph was arrayed by Pharaoh's order (Gen. 41:42). Of this material also were made the curtains, veil, and door hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. 26:1, 31, 36), and the hangings for the gate of the court and for the court itself (ch. 27:9, 16, 18). The distinguishing attire of the high priest consisted of the ephod, breastplate, robe of blue, and the gold plate on the miter; and of these the ephod and breastplate contained fine linen (ch. 28:6, 15). Other official garments were common to the high priest and the ordinary priest—the tunic, girdle, breeches, and headdress (Ex. 28:40-42; 39:27-29; cf. Lev. 16:4). The headdress, however, of the high priest was a miter or turban, while a simple cap appears to have been worn by the ordinary priest. Of these 4 articles of priestly dress, the girdle was embroidered, consisting largely of linen (Ex.

39:29). The 3 other garments were made of fine white linen exclusively (chs. 28:39; 39:27, 28). In the margin of Gen. 41:42 and of Ex. 25:4 the R.V. substitutes cotton. In the margin of Ex. 28:39 the R.V., referring to the coat and miter of the high priest, substitutes silk.

2. Hebrew bad is a synonym for shēsh, but is more general in its meaning, hence it is rendered merely linen (cf. Ex. 28:42 with 39:28). It sufficiently described the material of the priest's raiment, when there was no need to state explicitly the quality of the stuff (ibid.; Lev. 6:10; 16:4). Of it was made the plain ephod worn by the boy Samuel, by the priests at Nob, and by David on the occasion of removing the Ark (I Sam. 2:18; 22:18; II Sam. 6:14). In it the man with the inkhorn in Ezekiel's vision and Daniel's heavenly comforter were clothed (Ezek. 9:2; Dan. 10:5).

3. The rendering of Heb. pishteh, flax, which here denotes the material of which the goods are made (Jer. 13:1). It is used in contrast to woolen clothing (Lev. 13:47; Deut. 22:11). It describes the material of the priestly garments, the headties, breeches, and girdles (Ezek. 44:17, 18).

4. The rendering of Heb. būš, which occurs only in the later books, and of Gr. byssos. Of this material were made the robe, not the ephod, which David wore at the removal of the Ark (I Chron. 15:27), the veil of the Temple in part, the other stuffs employed being blue, purple, and crimson (II Chron. 3:14), the clothing of the Levites who were musicians at the dedication of the Temple (ch. 5:12), the cords which fastened the hangings in Ahasuerus' palace (Esth. 1:6), the state dress of Mordecai (ch. 8:15), the garments of the rich man at whose gate Lazarus sat (Luke 16:19), and of the luxurious city of Babylon (Rev. 18:16), and the bright and pure raiment of the Lamb's wife (ch. 19:8).

Whether the words denote linen or fine cotton cloth, or comprehend both, is much debated. Linen and cotton were employed in Egypt from the earliest times for mummy cloths.

5. The rendering of Heb. 'ēṭūn (Prov. 7:16; in R.V. yarn). It was imported from Egypt, where the most skillful manufacturers of linen lived.

6. Linen yarn is the rendering of Heb. mikweh in A.V. of I Kings 10:28; II Chron. 1:16. R.V. renders it "a drove." The LXX in Kings, "ek Thekoue" (from Thekoue) and the Vulgate in both passages, "de Coa" (from Coa) suggest a place name. Eusebius in the Onomasticon mentions Kod, which Jerome renders as Coa, which is near Egypt. Akkadian Kue, however, is Cilicia, or the region around the Gulf of Alexandretta. If this place be referred to, it may suggest the Hittite country as a source of horses. J.V. renders, "Out of Keveh" (Keve).

7, 8. The rendering of Gr. sindōn, a fine Indian cloth, muslin, later linen. A tunic or perhaps a sheet might be made of it (Mark 14:51), and in this material the body of Jesus was wrapped for burial (Matt. 27:59). It is a synonym of othouion, though more special in meaning (cf. Luke 23:53 with ch. 24:12; John 19:40; 20:5, 7). In classical Greek the latter word means linen and also sailcloth and bandage, lint for wounds.

9. The rendering of Gr. linon, linen (Rev. 15:6, A.V. and margin of R.V.). The text of R.V. has "precious stones," from another reading lithon.

Lin'tel. The transverse piece of wood or other material constituting the upper part of a doorway or casement (Ex. 12:22), called in Heb. mashkōph. 1. Lintel is also the rendering of Heb. 'ayil, a ram, in I Kings 6:31. It may denote a projecting lintel or post. The Hebrew word occurs 18 times in an architectural sense in Ezek., chs. 40; 41, where it is rendered post (v. 9, etc.), with jamb in the margin of R.V.

2. The rendering of Heb. kaphtor, in A.V. of Amos 9:1 and Zeph. 2:14, which is translated capital in R.V. In Ex., chs. 25 and 37, where it occurs 14 times, it is rendered "knop" in both versions.

Li'nus. (Li'nūs). A Christian at Rome who joined Paul in sending salutations to Timothy (II Tim. 4:21). According to Irenaeus and Eusebius, he was the first bishop of Rome. See BISHOP. No lofty pre-eminence was attached to the office, for he is mentioned without distinction between 2 other members of the church at Rome.

Li'on. The Felis leo of naturalists. The lion is diffused over the whole of Africa and portions of s. Asia, as far e. as the province of Gujarat in India. It was formerly found in Greece, but does not now occur wild in that country or anywhere in Europe. In Biblical times it was common in Palestine. The Hebrews had no fewer than 6 words to designate it in different states or at successive stages of growth. The ordinary words are 'aryēh and 'āri, which occur 80 times in the O.T. Allusion is made to the lion's strength (II Sam. 1:23; Prov. 30:30) and courage (II Sam. 17:10; Prov. 28:1), to his teeth (Joel 1:6), to his tendency to crouch before springing on his victim (Gen. 49:9), to prey on sheep, calves, and other beasts (I Sam. 17:34; Isa. 11:6, 7), or upon man (I Kings 13:24; Jer. 2:30), and to his roaring (Job 4:14; Prov. 20:2; I Peter 5:8). He is represented as lurking in thickets (Jer. 4:7), forests (ch. 5:6), or other coverts (ch. 25:38). A special haunt of his appears to have been among the trees and bushes fringing the Jordan (ch. 49:19). Of the living creatures seen by Ezekiel in his vision each one had the face of a lion on the right side of the head (Ezek. 1:10; 10:14). The 1st of the 4 living creatures seen by John was like a lion (Rev. 4:7). Our Lord is called the Lion of the tribe of Judah (ch. 5:5; cf. Gen. 49:9).

Liz'ard. Any small lacertilian reptile. It was called l'ṭā'āh in Hebrew, and was regarded as unclean (Lev. 11:30). The R.V. understands the 4 animals associated with it to be the gecko, the land crocodile, the sand lizard, and the chameleon; but states in the margin that the words are of uncertain meaning, but probably denote 4 kinds of lizards. Lizards abound in Palestine and the adjacent countries. The number of species is very great. In the woods and on cultivated ground the green lizards are the most beautiful, especially Lacerta viridis and L. laevis. Of the same family (Lacertidae) are the wall lizards, which appear in warm weather in multitudes, crawling over walls, rocks, and stony ground. Other families of eriglossate lacertilians are represented in Palestine, as the Scincidae, Zonuridae, Agamidae, and Montitoridae. The first of these contains the skinks or sand lizards (Lev. 11:30; A.V., snail). They chiefly inhabit desert districts, are generally small and of the yellowish color of the desert, are as common as the true lizard, but unlike it do not climb, and hide themselves under stones or by burrowing rapidly in the ground. The family of Zonuridae is represented by the glass snake (Pseudopus palasi). Its hind legs are rudimentary, so that it looks much like a snake. It is black, and attains a length of 2 or 2½ feet, of which the tail forms two thirds. Closely related to this family are the Agamidae, containing Uro- mastix spinipes. This reptile inhabits the sandy deserts of Africa and Arabia, and is common in the wilderness of Judea. It attains a length of 2 feet. Its body is green in color, spotted with brown. It has a powerful tail, encircled with rows of strong spines, which it uses as a weapon of defense. The Hebrew name, šāb, is rendered "great lizard" (Lev. 11:29; A.V., tortoise). The family of Monitoridae or Varanidae contains the monitors, of which the land crocodile of the ancients (Lev. 11:30; A.V., chameleon), commonly known as the land monitor, the waran el-'ard of the Arabs (Psammosaurus scincus), is common in s. Judea, the peninsula of Sinai, and the sandy parts of Egypt. It attains a length of 4 or 5 feet, and has a long snout, sharp, pointed teeth, and a long, tapering tail. The water monitor, waran el-bahr (Hydro-saurus niloticus), is slightly larger than its congener of the land, and is readily distinguished from it by the high keel along the whole length of its tail. Both reptiles are extremely rapid in their movements. They feed on small lizards and jerboas, and devour the eggs and young of the crocodile with avidity. They are eaten by the natives.

Loaf. A mass of bread. It was made of the flour of barley (II Kings 4:42; John 6:9) or wheat (cf. Lev. 23:17 with Ex. 34:22), round in shape (Ex. 29:23; Judg. 8:5, in Heb. kikkār, disk), and of a size convenient for baking and carrying with one (I Sam. 10:3; Matt. 14:17; John 6:9). See BREAD and SHOWBREAD.

Lo-am'mi (lō-ām'ī) [not my people]. The symbolic name of the Prophet Hosea's 2d son by his wife Gomer (Hos. 1:8, 9).

Loan. Anything, especially money, that is lent. In the early ages of the Hebrew nation loans were not sought for the purpose of obtaining capital, but for the necessities of life. The Israelites were commanded to open their hearts to their brother, who had fallen into poverty, and to lend him sufficient for his need (Deut. 15:7-11). They were forbidden to charge interest for any loan to a poor Israelite (Ex. 22:25; Lev. 25:35-37). But to a foreigner they might lend on interest (Deut. 23:20), and the poor Israelite might sell himself as a servant (Lev. 25:39; II Kings 4:1). If a pledge was asked from a poor Israelite for a loan, the creditor was not to go into the debtor's house to obtain it, but to remain outside and allow it to be brought out to him. If the pledge was a garment, it was to be returned to the owner before the evening, as probably it might be part of his sleeping attire (Ex. 22:26, 27). No one was to take the upper or nether millstone as a pledge, thus preventing the debtor and his family from grinding corn for their daily food (Deut. 24:6). Nor could anyone take a widow's garment (v. 17). Finally, when the 7th year, called the year of release, came, the debt was to be forgiven (ch. 15:1-11). The practice of suretyship, however, unfortunately grew up (Prov. 6:1; Eccles. 8:13), and in later times interest was sometimes exacted for loans, although the practice was condemned by the prophets (Jer. 15:10; Ezek. 18:13). The beneficent regulations of the Law were systematically ignored after the Exile, and Nehemiah took vigorous measures to terminate the abuse (Neh. 5:1-13). The Roman law was a marked contrast in its severity to that of Moses. By a law of the 12 tables a creditor could put his insolvent debtor in fetters and cords. Doubtless with allusion to the ordinary procedure Jesus describes the lord of a debtor as commanding that he, his wife, his children, and all that he had, be sold in liquidation of the debt (Matt. 18:25), and, when he had abused leniency which was shown him on his appeal for mercy, be delivered to the torturers till he should pay all that was due (v. 34). In the time of Christ banking was a regular institution (ch. 25:27; Luke 19:23). A public building was provided in Jerusalem, where documents relating to loans, whether interest-bearing or not, might be deposited (Jos. War ii. 17, 6). See BANK.

Lock. A fastening for a door (Judg. 3:23), evidently consisting of a short bolt of wood, which slid through a groove in an upright piece attached to the door and entered a socket in the doorpost. Above the groove in the upright were holes containing small iron or wooden pins. When the bolt was thrust into the socket, these pins dropped into corresponding holes in the bolt and held it in place. The key is furnished with a like number of projections, and, when introduced into a hollow in the bolt underneath the pins, raised them and allowed the bolt to be shoved back.

Lo'cust. The rendering of Heb. 'arbeh and Gr. akris. The insect referred to is evidently the migratory locust (Oedipoda migratoria), or in some cases possibly an allied insect, Oedipoda cinerescens, Acridium peregrinum, or other species. The locust is 2 inches or more in length. It is a winged, creeping thing. Like other insects of the order Orthoptera, it has 4 wings. Those of the anterior pair are narrow, while those of the posterior pair are broader, folded up when not in use, and transparent. It has 6 legs, on 4 of which it walks, while the hindmost pair, which are much longer than the others and equal to the body in length, it uses for springing. The mouth is furnished with cutting jaws, by means of which it nips off leaves and blades of grass. Locusts were clean insects (Lev. 11:21, 22), and John the Baptist ate them, as many Orientals did before him and still do (Matt. 3:4). They are prepared by being slightly roasted, dried in the sun, and salted. When used the head, wings, legs, and intestines are commonly removed, and only the fleshy portion is eaten. The locust is exceedingly destructive to vegetation, and locusts blown into the valley of the Nile by the e. wind constituted the 8th Egyptian plague (Ex. 10:4, 5, 12, 15, 19). In some passages, as Judg. 7:12 and Jer. 46:23, the A.V. renders 'arbeh "grasshopper"; the R.V. uniformly translates it "locust." The locust is distinguished from the grasshopper by the shortness of its antennae. It must not be confounded with the seventeen-year locust (Cicada septendecim), which is commonly called locust in the United States.

Many other words refer to different species of locusts difficult to identify, or some of them may mean the migratory locust in different stages of development (Lev. 11:22; Joel 1:4). The eggs of the various species of locust are deposited in April or May, in a cylindrical hole excavated in the ground by the female. They are hatched in June. The young insect emerges from the egg a wingless larva. It enters the pupa state, when it has rudimentary wings enclosed in cases. It is more voracious in this stage of its development than at any other period. In another month it casts the pupa or nymph skin, and has become the imago or perfect insect.

Lod (lōd). A town of Benjamin, built by the sons of Elpaal, a man of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:12), and generally mentioned in connection with Ono (Neh. 11:35). It was inhabited after the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37), and is believed to have been the Lydda of the Greek period (I Macc. 11:34); see LYDDA. It still exists as Ludd, about 11 miles s.e. of Joppa. In it are the remains of the church of St. George, the Christian martyr of Nicomedia and adopted in the 14th century as the patron saint of England, who was said to have been a native of the place.

Lo'de'bar (lō'dē'bār) [perhaps, without pasture]. A place in Gilead (II Sam. 9:4, 5; 17:27), probably the same as Lidebir (Josh. 13:26, R.V. marg.). Identified with Umm ed-Dabar, s. of Wadi el-'Arab, e. of the Jordan. See DEIR 4.

Lodge. A shelter erected for the watchman of a garden for occupation during the time of ripe fruit (Isa. 1:8; in ch. 24:20, A.V. cottage, R.V. hammock). Not improbably the structure intended is the kind built among the branches of a tree or, where trees are lacking, upon posts, and consisting of a rude floor, a roof of mats or branches, and sides of branches.

Log [cf. Arab. lujj, depth]. A Hebrew measure of capacity used specially for oil (Lev. 14:10, 12, 15, 21, 24). See MEASURE, III.

Lo's (lō's). Timothy's grandmother, a woman of unfeigned faith (II Tim. 1:5).

Look'ing Glass. See MIRROR.

Lord. When used of God and printed in small letters with only the initial a capital, it is usually the rendering of Heb. 'ādōn, master (Ex. 23:17; Ps. 114:7), much more frequently of 'ādōnāy, properly, my master (Ex. 4:10; Isa. 40:10), or of Gr. Kyrios, master, lord (Matt. 1:20). When printed in A.V. in small capitals, it represents the Hebrew יְהוָה, Yehovah, the most sacred and incommunicable name of God, used of himself alone (Gen. 2:4). See JEHOVAH.

Lord of Hosts. See HOST.

Lord's Day. The day specially associated with the Lord Jesus Christ. The expression occurs but once in the N.T., where John says, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day" (Rev. 1:10). Various interpretations have been offered: 1. John, it is said, is speaking of the Sabbath or 7th day of the week, which God himself has called, "My holy day" (Isa. 58:13). But if he intended the 7th day, it is strange that he did not use the customary designation. 2. It is contended that the expression Lord's Day is the same as the "day of the Lord" in II Peter 3:10, where it undoubtedly means the day of the Second Advent, and John would state that he was rapt, in vision, to the Day of Judgment. But John is apparently dating his vision. 3. John (Rev. 1:9) mentions the place where he was at the time he received the revelation, the Isle of Patmos, and declares the cause of his being on that island. In this sentence he states the day when he had the vision. It is also to be noticed that he does not speak of the day of the Lord, which is the constant designation of the day of the Second Advent (II Peter 3:10), but uses the adjective kyriakē, a distinction which was observed ever afterward between the day of the Second Advent and the first day of the week when Christ rose from the dead. 4. A special honor, however, was reserved by the apostles for Sunday or resurrection day. On the resurrection day itself our Lord appeared to his disciples (Luke 24:13-49; John 20:1-26). After 8 days, which in ordinary usage meant a week, Jesus a 2d time honored the first day of the week.

Since Pentecost occurred 50 days after the 2d day of unleavened bread (Lev. 23:11, 15; see WEEKS, FEAST OF), it probably fell on the first day of the week in the year of Christ's crucifixion; and so the effusion of the Holy Spirit took place on the first day of the week (Acts 2:1). The Christians at Troas in Paul's time seem to have regarded that day as the stated one on which they were to assemble to break bread (ch. 20:7). On the same day of the week the Christians were to lay by them in store the money which they designed to give in charity (I Cor. 16:2). These passages, aided by more general principles, have led the great majority of Christians to consider the Lord's Day a day set apart by the example of our Lord and his apostles for sacred purposes. The weekly observance of Sunday points back of Corinth to Jewish-Christian soil, but we cannot say when the custom began. The use of Sunday as the one distinctive day for worship was a matter of gradual development. At first Jewish Christians observed both the Sabbath and the Lord's Day, but the Gentile Christians were not bound to observe the Jewish Sabbath. Even though the Sabbath was not observed by the Gentile Christians, they were not ignorant of its deeper meaning, and gradually the essential principles of the Sabbath passed into the Christian sacred day of rest and worship. See SABBATH.

It may be added that some members of the primitive Church made no distinction between days, including Jewish festivals and Sabbaths and possibly the 1st day, rightly or wrongly esteeming every day alike. They were not to be harshly judged; they were acting out of the fear of God (Rom. 14:5). Some of the Jewish converts continued to keep the 7th day and the Jewish festivals. It was a matter of liberty (Col. 2:16), so long as the convert did not regard the observance as necessary to salvation (Gal. 4:10).

Lord's Prayer, The. The prayer which Christ taught his disciples. It is so called because it comes from our Lord. The form in Matthew (ch. 6:9-13) has been more influential in the later history of The Lord's Prayer, but Luke (ch. 11:1-4) seems to give it a more historical setting. The doxology which concludes the prayer (Matt. 16:13b, A.V.) is omitted in R.V., because it does not appear in the oldest and best MSS.; it seems not to have been an original part of the prayer, but represents a liturgical addition.

Lord's Supper. The name given by Paul to the commemorative ordinance instituted by our Lord on the evening preceding his crucifixion (I Cor. 11:20). Paul's account is the earliest record of the institution of the supper by at least 2 or 3 years. It was written probably early in A.D. 57, just 27 years after the supper was instituted. The apostle had introduced it 5 years earlier, when he organized the Corinthian church and "delivered" to them the ordinance (v. 23). He pledges his own truthfulness and authority for the correctness of his account by saying, "I received" and "I delivered"; and he refers to the source of his information: he had not been an eyewitness of the event, he had not been present at the institution of the supper, but he had received from the Lord what he had delivered to them. These words are capable of 2 interpretations: either Paul had been granted a special communication direct from the risen Lord or else he had received the account from the Lord through the Lord's apostles, participants in the first supper. Matthew, an eyewitness, and Mark, the companion of Peter who was present at the institution of the supper, also record the circumstances; and so does Paul's companion, Luke. Wishing to fulfill all righteousness and to honor the ceremonial law while it continued, Jesus made arrangements to eat the passover with his disciples (Matt. 26:17-19). Since the paschal lamb was killed in the evening, and its flesh eaten the same evening, the paschal feast necessarily took place in the evening (Matt. 26:20). Wine mixed with water had come into use on such occasions; the Greeks and Romans drank their wine diluted with water (cf. II Macc. 15:39). When, therefore, our Lord was about to follow up the supper by the Communion, there was wine mixed with water on the table. So also was there unleavened bread. He and his disciples were sitting (Matt. 26:20), by which is meant that, after the custom of that time, they half sat, half reclined on couches (Mark 14:18, R.V. marg.). When the paschal feast was finished, Jesus took bread and blessed it, at the same time rendering thanks for it, and, giving it to the disciples, said: "This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me." And the cup in like manner after supper, saying: "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, even that which is poured out for you" (Luke 22:19, 20, R.V.), "which is shed for many unto remission of sins" (Matt. 26:28, R.V.). The object for which the Lord's Supper was instituted was to keep him in remembrance (Luke 22:19). It was to show forth "the Lord's death till he come" (I Cor. 11:25, 26). The feast was not confined to the apostles or to the Jewish Christians, but was celebrated in the churches of the Gentiles also, for instance at Corinth (I Cor. 10:15-21). It was understood to be the privilege of the Church for all time. The table on which the bread was placed was known as the Lord's table (ch. 10:21); the cup of wine retained the old name which it bore at the Jewish passover, cup of blessing (v. 16), and was also called the cup of the Lord (chs. 10:21; 11:27).

Lo'-ru'ha'mah (lō'rōō-hā'mā) [that has not been compassionated]. The symbolic name of the Prophet Hosea's daughter by his wife Gomer (Hos. 1:6, 8).

Lot, I (lōt). The use of the lot to determine doubtful questions was much in vogue among the nations of antiquity (Esth. 3:7; Jonah 1:7; Matt. 27:35). Stones or inscribed tablets or the like were put into a vessel and, having been shaken, were drawn out or cast forth. The act was commonly preceded by prayer, and was an appeal to God to decide the matter (Acts 1:23-26; Homer Iliad iii. 316-325; vii. 174-181). In the early history of the Jewish people God was pleased to use the lot as a method of making known his will, so that the weighty statement was made in Prov. 16:33,

"The lot is cast into the lap;

But the whole disposing thereof is of Jehovah."

The Land of Canaan was divided among the twelve tribes by lot (Josh. 14:2; 18:6); for the method, see CANAAN. On one occasion Saul and Jonathan stood on one side and Jonathan cast lots against the people. The king and his son being thus singled out, they cast lots with each other, Jonathan being finally pointed out by this method of inquiry (I Sam. 14:40-45). The courses of the priests, etc., were settled by lot (I Chron. 24:5 seq.). By casting lots after prayer the question was decided whether Joseph Barsabbas or Matthias should be Judas Iscariot's successor in the apostleship (Acts 1:15-26). This method of selection was not repeated by the apostles after the descent of the Holy Spirit.

Lot, II (lōt). Son of Haran, Abraham's brother, and consequently nephew to the patriarch himself, whom he accompanied from Mesopotamia to Canaan (Gen. 11:31; 12:5), and to and from Egypt (ch. 13:1). Like his uncle, he acquired much cattle; and his herdsmen and those of Abraham quarreled over the pasturage. Abraham proposed that he and Lot separate, and generously invited Lot to choose first. Lot, seeing that the hills were less fertile than the valley of the Jordan, chose the latter, and became a resident in Sodom. He did not take into account the character of the people among whom he was going to settle and the probable effect of their evil example on his family, though he maintained his own integrity among them and was distressed from day to day by the sight and the story of lawless deeds (II Peter 2:8). During the invasion of Chedorlaomer and his confederate kings, Lot was made prisoner, and owed his release to the courage and skill of Abraham (Gen. 13:2 to 14:16). When two angels were sent to Sodom to warn him of its approaching destruction, the conduct of the mob toward these strangers showed how ripe the city was for destruction. Lot was saved from its overthrow; but his wife, looking back, became a pillar of salt. In looking back with regretful longings for the possessions left behind, she proved herself unworthy of the salvation offered her (cf. Luke 17:32). His sons-in-law, probably prospective ones (Gen. 19:14, R.V. margin; cf. v. 8), remained behind and perished (ch. 19:1-29; Wisd. of Sol. 10:6-9). Soon afterward, under the influence of wine, Lot unconsciously became guilty of incest. The Moabites and Ammonites were his descendants (Gen. 19:30-38).

Lo'tan (lō'tān). A tribe of Horites, dwelling in Mount Seir (Gen. 36:20) and governed by a chieftain (v. 29).

Love Feasts. The rendering of Gr. agapai (cf. II Peter 2:13, R.V., marg.); the translation, deceivings, of A.V. and R.V. text is based upon a different Greek reading (apatai). In Jude 12 "feasts of charity" of A.V. is "love-feasts" in R.V. They were social meals held in churches in connection with the Lord's Supper (cf. Acts 2:46; 6:1; 20:7, 11). It seems that originally the sacrament of the Lord's Supper or Eucharist took place at the end of the agapē or love feast (cf. Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:14-20; I Cor. 11:25). Apparently there were cases at Corinth where the meal was desecrated: instead of being an expression of brotherhood, it became an ordinary meal and an occasion for display and gluttony (I Cor. 11:17-34). Chrysostom states that after the early community of goods had ceased, the wealthier members brought contributions of food and drink to the church, of which, at the conclusion of the services and after the celebration of the Lord's Supper, all partook, the poorest not excepted, by this means helping to promote the principle of love among Christians. In putting the Lord's Supper first, Chrysostom may reflect the custom of his own time. As the purity of the Church declined and ceremony increased, scandals arose in connection with these feasts. The council of Laodicea, (date uncertain; A.D. 320 or somewhere between 343 and 381), and that of Carthage, A.D. 397, forbade them to be held in churches; so did the council of Orleans, A.D. 541, that of Trullo, A.D. 692, and that of Aix-la-Chapelle, A.D. 816; but all these councils together did not quite succeed in extinguishing the love feasts' excessive tenacity of life in the Western Church, while in the Greek Church they still continue to exist. Of more modern religious denominations, love feasts were revived by the Moravians and the Dunkers. They exist also among the Sandemanians.

Low'land or She-phe'lah; variously rendered in A.V. by the vale, the valley, the low country, the plain. The region of low hills between the plain of Philistia and the high central range of Palestine. It is described by Eusebius (in his Onomasticon under Sephela) as "all the low country about Eleutheropolis [modern Beit Jibrin] toward the n. and w."; but in O.T. times the term comprehended the low, hilly country lying to the e. and s. as well. The hills rise to a height of from 500 to 800 feet, with a few higher summits. On their slopes the olive flourishes. The district is separated from the central Judean range by a series of valleys which run n. and s. from Ajalon to near Beer-sheba; and it is itself cut by several wide, fertile valleys which lead from the Judean ridge to the sea. It was assigned, as part of their inheritance, to the tribe of Judah; and when they found that they had too much territory, a small portion of it in the n. was allotted to Dan (Josh. 15:33 seq.; 19:40 seq.). It included such notable places as Adullam, Beth-shemesh, Gezer, Eglon, Lachish, and part of the valleys of Ajalon, Sorek, and Elah (ch. 19:33 seq.; I Sam. 17:1, 2; II Chron. 28:18).

Lu'bim. (lū'bīm). An African people, the Libyans, from whom Shishak, king of Egypt, drew part of his army for the invasion of Palestine (II Chron. 12:3; 16:3; cf. Dan. 11:43; Nahum 3:9).

Lu'cas (lū'kās). See LUKE.

Lu'ci-fer (lū'si-fēr) [Lat., light bearer]. The planet Venus, as the morning star. With the exception of the sun and moon, Venus is the brightest object in the sky. It appears as a morning or an evening star according as it is w. or e. of the sun, returning to the same position about every 19 months. As the former, Venus is the harbinger of daylight. The prophet likened the splendor of the king of Babylon to Lucifer, son of the morning (Isa. 14:12; in R.V. day-star), and Jesus calls himself "the bright, the morning star" (Rev. 22:16; cf. II Peter 1:19). The application of the name Lucifer to Satan, the rebel angel hurled from heaven, has existed since the 3d century, especially among poets. It is based on the erroneous supposition that Luke 10:18 is an explanation of Isa. 14:12; cf. also Rev. 9:1; 12:7-10.

Lu'ci-us (lū'shī-ūs). 1. A Roman official who in the year 174 of the Seleucid era, 139-138 B.C., issued letters in favor of the Jews to various kings subject to Rome (I Macc. 15:16). He is entitled a consul, which identifies him with Lucius Calpurnius Piso, one of the consuls for the year 139 B.C. It is possible, however, that he was the praetor Lucius Valerius who conducted the proceedings in the Roman senate which led to their making a league of friendship with the Jews, to the issuance of the aforementioned letters, and, in the days of Hyrcanus II, to action favorable to the Jews (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 8, 5).

2. A Christian from Cyrene, who was a teacher in the church at Antioch (Acts 13:1). He is commonly supposed to have been the kinsman of Paul who at Corinth joined with the apostle in sending salutations to the brethren at Rome (Rom. 16:21).

Lud (lūd), Lu'dim (lū'dīm) (pl.). 1. A people classed among the Semites (Gen. 10:22); believed to be the Lydians (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 4; compare order of enumeration in Genesis), occupying, however, a wider territory than Lydia in w. Asia Minor. In the 20th century B.C. colonies were established in e. Asia Minor by a dynasty of Akkadian princes of Asshur which rose to power after the fall of Ur (c. 2000 B.C.). From the descendants of these colonists have come the Cappadocian tablets (c. 1920-1870). According to Herodotus (i. 7), their 1st king was a son of Ninus and grandson of Belus, that is, he was descended from the Assyrians.

2. A people connected with the Egyptians (Gen. 10:13), also the country which they inhabited. They are mentioned as bowmen in the armies of Egypt and Tyre (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 27:10; 30:5). They may be Lydians as above (1), for there were Lydian troops in the army of Psamtik I of Egypt (663-609 B.C.). The Ludim may perhaps be sought in n. Africa, w. of the Nile, but there is no authority to emend the word to Lubim.

Lu'hith (lū'hith) [of tablets or planks]. A Moabite town approached by an ascent (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:5); according to Eusebius and Jerome, Loueitha, between Areopolis, that is, Rabbath of Moab, and Zoar; situated at Khirbet Fās or Khirbet Medint er Rās, between Ghōr eš-Šāfiyeh and Khanzireh.

Lu'ke (lūk), in A.V. once Lu'cas (Philemon 24) [Lat. Lucas, from N.T. Gr. Loukas, probably a pet name for Lat. Lucanus or Lucius]. A friend and companion of Paul, who joined him in sending from Rome salutations to the Colossian church (Col. 4:14) and to Philemon (Philemon 24). In the former place he is described as "the beloved physician" and in the latter place as one of the apostle's fellow laborers. He was also with Paul in Rome at a later time when II Timothy was written (II Tim. 4:11), and then the apostle gives a touching tribute to his friend's fidelity in the words, "Only Luke is with me." These are all the notices of Luke by name in the N.T., for he must not be identified with the Lucius of Acts 13:1 or with the one mentioned in Rom. 16:21; see LUCIUS 2.

We find in the 2d century the tradition already established that Luke was the author of the Third Gospel and of The Acts, both of which were certainly written by the same hand (Acts 1:1). Accordingly we may learn more of him from The Acts, in which he intimates his presence with Paul during certain portions of the latter's Missionary Journeys by the use of "we" or "us" in the narrative (Acts 16:10-17; 20:5 to 21:18; 27:1 to 28:16). From these passages it appears that Luke joined Paul on the Second Missionary Journey at Troas and went with him to Philippi. Again on the Third Journey Luke rejoined the apostle at Philippi and went with him to Jerusalem. He appears to have remained in Palestine during the 2 years in which Paul was imprisoned at Caesarea, for he sailed with the apostle from Caesarea to Rome; see ACTS, THE. In Col. 4:14 Luke is plainly distinguished from Paul's Jewish companions (cf. v. 11). He was therefore a Gentile. Early tradition made him a native of Antioch in Syria, and this is quite probable. At any rate, his interest in and familiarity with the Church of Antioch is evident (Acts 6:5; 11:19-27; 13:1-3; 14:26-28; 15:1, 2, 30-40; 18:22, 23). The time and manner of his death are unknown.

The Gospel According to Luke is addressed to a certain Theophilus, probably a Gentile Christian; claims to be based upon careful investigation of the apostolic testimony; and was intended to furnish Theophilus, as well as other readers, with assured knowledge of the truth in which he had been instructed. Its material is doubtless derived both from earlier documents and from information obtained by Luke personally from the actors in the history. The narrative may be divided as follows: 1. Introductory verses (ch. 1:1-4). 2.

The immediate preparation for the appearance of Jesus, consisting of the annunciations and births of John the Baptist and Jesus, with some significant events from the latter's infancy and boyhood (chs. 1:5 to 2:52). 3. The inauguration of Christ's ministry, including (a) the ministry of John the Baptist, (b) the baptism of Jesus, to which is appended his genealogy, and (c) the temptation of Jesus (chs. 3:1 to 4:13). 4. The Lord's ministry in Galilee (chs. 4:14 to 9:50). In this part of his Gospel Luke often follows the same order as Mark, but not always. He also introduces more of the teaching of Jesus than Mark does, in this often corresponding with Matthew. Luke, moreover, has some material peculiar to himself in these chapters. The following analysis will bring out the progress of this portion of his narrative: (a) Introductory description (ch. 4:14, 15). (b) Opening of the Galilean work, including the first visit to Nazareth, miracles in Capernaum and tour through Galilee, the call of 4 disciples and the healing of the leper (chs. 4:16 to 5:16). (c) Rise of opposition, in the face of which Christ vindicated his teaching, including the cure of the paralytic, Levi's call and feast, discourse about fasting, and the Sabbath controversy (chs. 5:17 to 6:12). (d) Organization of the disciples, including the appointment of the Twelve and Christ's discourse on the characteristics of true discipleship (Sermon on the Mount) (ch. 6:13-49). (e) Incidents illustrative of the gracious ministry of Jesus, including the healing of the centurion's servant, the raising of the son of the widow of Nain, the inquiry of John the Baptist, and Christ's reply and discourse concerning John, the anointing of Jesus by a sinful woman (ch. 7:1-50). (f) The extension of Christ's work, including his tours through Galilee with a company of disciples; his teaching by parables; the visit of his mother and brethren; the four great miracles of stilling the tempest, healing the Gadarene demoniac and the woman with the issue of blood, and raising Jairus' daughter; the sending out of the apostles; Herod's desire to see Jesus and the latter's subsequent retirement, followed by the feeding of the 5,000 (chs. 8:1 to 9:17). (g) Christ's instructions to his disciples in view of the close of the Galilean ministry and his coming death, including Peter's confession, Christ's prediction of his death and resurrection, his transfiguration and the cure of the demoniac boy, warnings against pride (ch. 9:18-50). 5. The journeys of Jesus to Jerusalem (ch. 9:51 to 19:48). This part of Luke contains a large amount of material peculiar to him. It is probably not arranged in exact chronological order, but rather in accordance with certain topics. Some of the material given here really belongs in the Galilean ministry (chs. 9:57-60; 13:18-21; probably chs. 11:14 to 13:5). But the section describes in the main a series of journeys toward Jerusalem, ending in the final ascent, with discourses appropriate to the situation. It may be subdivided as follows: (a) The departure from Galilee and instructions concerning the true spirit of disciples, including Christ's rejection by a Samaritan village, his replies to three inquirers, the mission of the Seventy and their return, the lawyer's question and the parable of the Good Samaritan, Christ in the house of Martha and Mary, instructions about prayer (chs. 9:51 to 11:13). (b) Denunciation of the Pharisees and instructions concerning the duty of confessing him, against covetousness, and concerning watchfulness, etc. (chs. 11:14 to 13:5). (c) Discourses illustrative of the true Israel and of the true service: the former including the parable of the Barren Fig Tree, the woman with the spirit of infirmity, the parables of the Mustard Seed and Leaven, the warning against self-deception and the lamentation over Jerusalem; the latter including the healing of the dropsical man, and the beautiful parables of the Wedding Feast, the Great Supper, the Lost Sheep, the Lost Coin, the Lost Son, the Unjust Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Importunate Widow, interspersed with incidents and teachings on the same general subject (chs. 13:6 to 18:30). (d) The final ascent to Jerusalem, including a renewed prediction of death and resurrection, the healing of Bartimaeus, the conversion of Zacchaeus, the parable of the Pounds, and the triumphal entry (chs. 18:31 to 19:48). 6. The last week in Jerusalem, including the final teachings of Jesus in the Temple and to his disciples, his arrest, trials, crucifixion, and burial (chs. 20:1 to 23:56). 7. Appearances of Jesus after his resurrection, his last directions to his disciples to preach his gospel, and his final departure (ascension) from them (ch. 24).

Luke states (ch. 1:3) that his narrative is written "in order." This use of this phrase elsewhere (Acts 11:4; 18:23; and Greek text of Luke 8:1 and Acts 3:24) shows that he does not necessarily mean exact chronological order. While chronological in general outline, his arrangement is often topical. The book, however, is, like The Acts, a careful and systematic presentation of the life of the Founder of Christianity. Luke also expressly disclaims personal acquaintance with Jesus, and bases his work on the testimony of eyewitnesses (apostles) whose reports he had accurately studied. His Gospel shows a truly historical spirit. This appears, e.g., in the personal account of the origin of John the Baptist and of Jesus, in his dating by secular events the birth of Jesus and the public appearance of John (Luke 2:1, 2; 3:1, 2), and his presentation of the ministry of Christ in such a manner as to bring out its leading religious ideas, its triumph over opposition, and the historical foundation which it laid for Christianity (see the analysis above). It shows also the Evangelist's fondness for those aspects of the Lord's teaching and work, whereby he revealed himself as the divine-human Saviour of men. Christ's gospel is here described as universal in its mission (Luke 2:32; 3:6; 4:24-27; 24:47, etc.), a gospel for the lost and the lowly (chs. 7:36-50; 15; 19:1-9, etc.), a message of salvation to the poor and distressed (chs. 6:20-26; 7:11-18; 12:32, etc.). It delineates the graciousness of Christ's personal character—his pity, compassion, charity, prayerfulness, holiness, tenderness. In recording the Lord's utterances about the rich, Luke uses more unqualified language than the other Evangelists do (chs. 6:24, 25; 16:25, etc.), though he also makes it clear that he did not understand Christ to denounce rich men as such, but only so far as they put trust in riches and were not rich toward God (ch. 12:21). In what he reports about Samaritans also (chs. 10:33; 17:16) he doubtless wished to illustrate the destruction of national prejudices by the gospel. In short this Gospel presents Christ as establishing a religion which seeks to uplift and save suffering and sinful humanity.

From Paul's statement in Col. 4:14 we learn that Luke was a physician. It was natural, therefore, for scholars to examine minutely the style and language of Luke's writings to determine whether they supply evidence of his profession. These investigations have shown that it is unwise to attempt to prove by linguistic comparisons alone that Luke was a physician. But, given the knowledge that Luke was a physician, a few statements in his Gospel, when compared with parallel passages in Matthew and Mark, may be fairly interpreted as indicating a physician's point of view (cf.

Luke 4:38 with Matt. 8:14 and Mark 1:30; Luke 5:12 with Matt. 8:2 and Mark 1:40; Luke 8:43 with Mark 5:26).

The material in Luke is derived from written and oral sources of Jesus' life and teaching. Luke certainly knew and used Mark's Gospel. It is likely that he also utilized a second source, available as well to the author of the present Gospel of Matthew, composed chiefly of sayings, which scholars designate by the symbol Q (for German Quelle, source). There is, in addition to these sources, a large body of material peculiar to the Third Gospel (e.g., 14 parables, and various sayings and narratives). Some scholars believe that Luke composed a preliminary book, designated as Proto-Luke (which they suppose began with the chronological data in ch. 3:1), from this material and Q. It is believed that later Luke learned of Mark's Gospel and incorporated considerable portions from it; then he added the material in chs. 1 and 2, so markedly Semitic in expression and sentiment. The result was our Third Gospel.

Scholars have suggested 3 dates for the composition of Luke's Gospel—before 63, 75–85, and after 94. The last date is highly improbable. It is held only by those who think that Acts 5:36 seq. is based on Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 1, which appeared in 93–94, but this dependence has not been proved. Of the other 2 dates, the period 75–85 is urged by those who believe that an earlier date will not allow sufficient time for the writing of the many narratives of which Luke speaks in his preface (ch. 1:1). In addition, these scholars also regard Luke's report of Christ's prediction of the Fall of Jerusalem (chs. 19:43 seq.; 21:20 seq.) as manifesting a knowledge on the part of Luke of the occurrence of that event in A.D. 70. But Luke's language is more likely only an interpretation of Christ's words designed to make their meaning clear to Gentile readers (cf. Luke 21:20 with Matt. 24:15 and Mark 13:14) and therefore does not presuppose that the event had happened before Luke's writing.

The early date, before 63, is maintained by those who hold that if Luke had known the outcome of Paul's trial in Rome and of the apostle's martyrdom, he would surely have mentioned them; Acts therefore must have been written very shortly after the last events it recounts (c. A.D. 63). That Acts evidences no knowledge of the Pauline Epistles and makes no allusion to the Neronian persecution is confirmatory evidence for its early date. Since Acts presupposes the Third Gospel, this latter must have been written still earlier. Furthermore, there is a slight possibility that I Tim. 5:18 may contain a quotation from this Gospel (Luke 10:7); if so, this is evidence for the early date.

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Lu'na-tic [Lat., insane, with lucid intervals]. The Greek word is derived from selēnē, moon, as the English word is from the Latin luna, moon, for it was believed that the disease is affected by the light or by the periodic changes of the moon. Lunacy is distinguished from demoniacal possession (Matt. 4:24), for it was often due to other causes. Yet possession by a demon might give rise to lunacy (cf. Matt. 17:15 with Mark 9:17). A comparison of these 2 passages has led to the opinion that the Greek word denotes epilepsy. Hence R.V. uses epileptic instead of lunatic.

Lute. See PSALTERY.

Luz (lüz) [almond tree]. 1. A Canaanite town, afterward Beth-el (Gen. 28:19; 35:6; 48:3; Josh. 18:13; Judg. 1:23). In Josh. 16:2 it is distinguished from Beth-el and located to the w. See BETH-EL 1.

2. A town in the Hittite country, built by an inhabitant of Luz in Mount Ephraim, who betrayed that town to the Israelites and was allowed by them to depart with his family uninjured (Judg. 1:22–26). About 4½ miles w. by n. of Bāniās is the ruin Luweiziyyeh, which is proposed as the site by Conder.

Lyc'a-o'n'ia (līk'ā-ō'n'ī-ā). An elevated, rugged, inland district of Asia Minor, bounded on the n. by Galatia, on the s. by Cilicia and Isauria, on the e. by Cappadocia, and on the w. by Phrygia and Isauria. It was mainly suitable for pasturage only. Its peculiar dialect was still spoken when Paul visited the district and preached in 3 of its cities, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra (Acts 13:51 to 14:23, especially v. 11).

Lyc'i'a (līsh'ī-ā). A province of Asia Minor, jutting s. into the Mediterranean Sea, and bounded on the n. by Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. Paul on his last voyage to Jerusalem passed Rhodes, an island off its w. coast, and landed at Patara, within its limits, where he took ship for Phoenicia (Acts 21:1, 2). On his voyage to Rome he landed at Myra, another city of Lycia, whence he sailed in an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy (ch. 27:5, 6).

Lyd'da (līd'ā). A town about 11 miles s.e. of Joppa (Acts 9:38; Jos. Antiq. xx. 6, 2); probably the Lod of the O.T. The gospel early took root in it (Acts 9:32). Shortly before 153 B.C. the town with the district about it formed a distinct government in connection with Samaria, but in 145 B.C. it was transferred to Judea (I Macc. 11:34; cf. v. 28; 10:30, 38). Peter visited it, and his cure of Aeneas through the name of Jesus resulted in a large increase of disciples (Acts 9:33–35). It was burned by Cestius in the time of Nero, but was soon rebuilt (Jos. War ii. 19, 1). See Lod.

Lyd'i'a (līd'ī-ā). 1. A region on the w. coast of Asia Minor, with Sardis for its capital. Thyatira and Philadelphia were within its limits. It was very fertile and had a mild climate, and consequently it was densely populated. The state rose to power about 689 B.C., under Gyges, when the Greeks on the coast and the tribes of Asia Minor were subdued. In 549 B.C. Croesus, the last king, was defeated by Cyrus, and Lydia became a Persian province. It never regained independence. Antiochus III, of Syria, was forced to cede it to the Romans (cf. I Macc. 8:8). Many Jews dwelt there (Jos. Antiq. xii. 3, 4), and Christian churches were founded (Rev. 1:11).

2. A woman of Thyatira, a town of Lydia, though it is not known whether this was the origin of her name. Thyatira was noted for its dyeing, and Lydia made her living in Philippi, to which she had removed, by selling purple dyes or dyed goods. She was a worshiper of God before Paul arrived at Philippi. She received the gospel of Christ gladly, and became Paul's first convert in Macedonia and Europe. At her urgent invitation Paul and his missionary associates took up their abode with her; and when Paul and Silas were released from prison, to which they had been consigned after a riot of which they were the innocent cause, they returned to her house (Acts 16:14, 15, 40).

Ly'sa-ni'as (lī-sā'nī-ās) [Gr., ending sadness]. A tetrarch of Abilene in the 15th year of Tiberius (Luke 3:1). Some critics have thought that Lysanias, son of Ptolemy, who ruled Chalcis in Coelestria during the years 40 to 34 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 13, 3; xv. 4, 1), gave name to this tetrarchy, and that Luke is in error. The facts, however, should be presented as follows: Lysanias who ruled Chalcis is never called tetrarch, and Abila nowhere appears in his dominions. From Jos. Antiq. xv. 10, 1-3, it appears that the house or territory of Lysanias was hired by Zenodorus about 25 B.C., became known as the country of Zenodorus, lay between Trachonitis and Galilee, chiefly about Paneas and Ullatha, and hence apparently did not include Chalcis in Coele Syria, and strictly speaking was distinct from Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. These districts were bestowed on Herod the Great and passed to his son Philip the tetrarch, Augustus confirming to him Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and part of the house of Zenodorus (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4) which included Paneas (8, 1). In A.D. 37 the emperor Caligula made Herod Agrippa king of the tetrarchy of Philip and added the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 10). This latter tetrarchy had its capital at Abila, some 18 miles n.w. of Damascus, and was distinct from the kingdom of Chalcis (Jos. Antiq. xix. 5, 1; xx. 7, 1; War ii. 11, 5). In the reign of the emperor Tiberius the region about Abila was ruled by a tetrarch named Lysanias (see ABILENE), in exact agreement with Luke's statement. Although far n., it may have been the remaining part of the country of Zenodorus, which after his death and the division of his land, as before mentioned, had been formed into a tetrarchy or kingdom under a younger Lysanias, perhaps of the same line as the former ruler of Chalcis.

Lys'ias (līs'īās). 1. A general of the army of Syria during the reigns of Antiochus Epiphanes and Antiochus Eupator. When Antiochus Epiphanes went to Persia about 165 B.C., he appointed Lysias, who was of royal blood, viceroy during his absence, with the duty of quelling the Jewish insurrection under the Maccabees (I Macc. 3:32-37). After operating through others, Lysias found it necessary to take the field himself; but he was defeated by Judas with great loss (chs. 3:33-40; 4:1-22, 28-35). When the news of Antiochus' death arrived in 163 B.C., Lysias seized the reins of government and ruled in the name of the young Antiochus, although the late king had named Philip for regent during the minority of the heir to the throne (ch. 6:14-17). In this capacity Lysias undertook another campaign against the Jews. He gained a victory over Judas and laid siege to Jerusalem; but the news that Philip was on his way from Persia to claim the regency, compelled him to make terms of peace with the Jews and return to Antioch (ch. 6:28-63). He maintained himself successfully against Philip, but was put to death in 162 B.C. by Demetrius I (ch. 7:1-4).

2. Roman commandant at Jerusalem, who rescued Paul from the mob of Jews (Acts 22:24). See CLAUDIUS LYSIAS.

Lys'tra (līs'trá). A city of Lycaonia and a Roman colony, where Paul cured a man crippled from birth, and would have been worshiped as a god had he not refused. It was there also that he was stoned and left for dead (Acts 14:6-21; II Tim. 3:11). Either at Lystra or Derbe he first met Timothy (Acts 16:1, 2). The colony was located on a hill, about 1 mile n.w. of Khatyn Serai, which is 18 miles s.s.w. of Iconium.

Ma'acah (mā'ā-kā), in A.V. often Ma'acah, and in R.V. of Josh. 13:13 Ma'acath (mā'ā-kāth) [oppression; but cf. Arab. ma'ik, stupid]. 1. A place in Syria (II Sam. 10:6, 8), sometimes called Aram-maacah or Syria-maacah (I Chron. 19:6, 7; see ARAM 2 (4).

Its inhabitants were descended from Nahor (Gen. 22:24).

2. Wife of Machir, the son of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:15, 16).

3. A concubine of Caleb, the son of Hezron (I Chron. 2:48).

4. Wife of Jehiel and ancestress of King Saul (I Chron. 8:29; 9:35).

5. Daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur. She became one of David's wives and mother of Absalom (II Sam. 3:3).

6. Father of Hanan, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:43).

7. Father of the ruler of the Simeonites in David's reign (I Chron. 27:16).

8. Father of Solomon's royal contemporary Achish of Gath (I Kings 2:39; see ACHISH).

9. Wife of Rehoboam, and daughter, or in view of II Chron. 13:2 perhaps the granddaughter, of Absalom (I Kings 15:2; II Chron. 11:20-22), and mother of King Abijah. After the death of the latter, she remained queen mother (gēbirāh); but her grandson Asa took this position from her because she had made an abominable image for an Asherah (II Chron. 15:16, R.V.). She is called Micaiah (A.V., Michaiiah) in II Chron. 13:2; but this is probably a textual corruption, for in the 7 other places where her name occurs it is Maacah.

Ma'acah'thite (mā-āk'ā-thīt), in A.V. Ma'ach'athite (mā-āk'ā-thīt), but in Deut. 3:14 Ma'ach'athi, the Hebrew form. A descendant of a person named Maacah, or a native or inhabitant of the Syrian kingdom of Maacah or of the town of Beth-maacah in Naphtali (Josh. 12:5; II Sam. 23:34).

Ma'a'chah (mā'ā-kā). See MAACAH.

Ma'ach'athi (mā-āk'ā-thī). See MAACATHITE.

Ma'a'da'i (mā'ā-dā'i) [see MAADIAH]. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:34).

Ma'a'di'ah (mā'ā-dī'ā) [Jehovah is an ornament]. A chief of the priests who returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Neh. 12:5, 7). In the next generation, a father's house among the priests, which occupies the same position in the corresponding catalogue, bears the name Moadiah (v. 17), apparently a variation.

Ma'a'i (mā-ā'i). A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the second Temple (Neh. 12:36).

Ma'a'leh-a'erab'bin (mā'ā-lē-ā-krāb'īm) [ascend of Akabbim, R.V.]. See AKRABBIM.

Ma'a'rath (mā'ā-rāth) [a place bare of trees]. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:59). It may be Beit Ummar, almost 7 miles n. of Hebron.

Ma'a'reh-ge'ba (mā'ā-rē-gē'bā) [place destitute of trees at Geba]. A place adjacent to Geba (Judg. 20:33, R.V.). In the margin it is translated the meadow of Geba or Gibeah; in the text of A.V., the meadows of Gibeah. The correct reading probably is in Greek MS. A, "from the w. of Geba."

Ma'a'sai (mā'ā-sī), in A.V. Ma-as'i-ai [work of Jehovah]. A priest of the family of Immer (I Chron. 9:12). The name may be an abbreviation of Maaseiah or another form of that word; or perhaps it is an accidental transposition of the letters of Amasai (q.v.). See AMASHAI.

Ma'a'si'ah (mā'ā-sē'yā) [work of Jehovah]. 1. A Levite of the 2d degree, who acted as porter in the reign of David (I Chron. 15:18), and played a psaltery (v. 20).

2. One of the captains of hundreds, who co-operated with the high priest Jehoiada in overthrowing Athaliah and placing Joash on the throne of Judah (II Chron. 23:1).

3. An officer who seems to have acted with Jeiel the Levite in keeping a list of the military men in Uzziah's reign (II Chron. 26:11).

4. A prince of the royal house, a son of Jotham more probably than of Ahaz, since the latter was too young to have adult children. He was slain during Pekah's invasion of Judah (II Chron. 28:7).

5. The governor of Jerusalem in Josiah's reign (II Chron. 34:8).

6. Ancestor of Seraiah and Baruch (Jer. 32:12; 51:59, A.V.). R.V.'s spelling Maheiah indicates that the root is not the same as that of the other occurrences of Maaseiah. See MAHEIAH.

7. Father of the false prophet Zedekiah (Jer. 29:21).

8. A priest, father of the Temple official Zephaniah (Jer. 21:1; 29:25).

9. Son of Shallum and doorkeeper of the Temple (Jer. 35:4). He was doubtless a Levite (I Chron. 26:1). See SHALLUM 4.

10. A man of Judah, family of Shelah. He lived at Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 11:5); see ASALAH 3.

11. A Benjamite, whose descendants lived at Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 11:7).

12-15. A man of the house of Pahath-moab and 3 priests, one a member of the house of the high priest Jeshua, one of the house of Harim, and the 3d of the house of Pashhur, each of whom put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:18, 21, 22, 30).

16. Father of that Azariah who repaired the wall of Jerusalem beside his house (Neh. 3:23).

17. A chief of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:25).

18. A priest who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41), perhaps one of the 6 who stood by Ezra when he read the law to the people (ch. 8:4).

19. A Levite, probably, who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:42), perhaps one of the 13 who expounded the law as it was read to the people (ch. 8:7).

Ma-as'i-ai (mā-ās'i-i). See MAASAI.

Ma'ath (mā'āth). An ancestor of Christ, who lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:26).

Ma'az (mā'āz) [anger; cf. Arab. ma'ida, to be angry]. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:27).

Ma'a'zi'ah (mā'ā-zī'd)[Jehovah is a refuge].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house by the time of David and was made the last of the 24 courses into which the priests were divided (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 18).

2. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8).

Mac'ca-bee (māk'ā-bē).* A family, also called Hasmonaeen (Asmonaeen) from one of its ancestors, which ruled Judea from 166 B.C. to 37 B.C.; see HASMONAEAN. The title Macca-baeus, in A. V. Maccabeus, was first given to Judas, 3d son of Mattathias (I Macc. 2:4), but at an early date it was transferred to the entire family and to others who had a part in the same events. The origin and meaning of the term are uncertain. It is usually derived from Heb. makkebeth, Aram. makkābā, a hammer, probably in allusion to the crushing blows inflicted by Judas and his successors upon their enemies. It has also been explained as composed of the initials of the Hebrew words in the sentence, "Who is like to thee among the gods, Jehovah?" (Ex. 15:11), or in the sentence, "What is like my father?" Another derivation is from Heb. makkebay, a contraction of makḳabyāhū (the naming of Jehovah), based upon Isa. 62:2, where is found the root nākab. The 1st of the family mentioned is Mattathias, an aged priest, who, driven to desperation by the outrages of Antiochus Epiphanes, raised a revolt against him and fled to the mountains, followed by those who were zealous for the faith of Israel. Mattathias died about 2 years afterward, but the revolt was carried on by his 5 sons. Judas, the 3d son, was the 1st military leader, 166 B.C. By avoiding pitched battles, and harassing the Syrians by vigorous and persistent guerilla warfare, he and his devoted band defeated and routed every detachment of the Syrian army sent against them. He retook Jerusalem, purified the Temple, and restored the daily sacrifice. A feast to celebrate this restoration was instituted and was kept annually thereafter. This was the winter feast of dedication alluded to in John 10:22. Judas fell in battle in 160 B.C., whereupon his younger brother Jonathan, who was already high priest, assumed command of the army. About this time John, the eldest brother, was captured and killed by the children of Jambri (I Macc. 9:36); and shortly before this another brother, Eleazar, had been crushed to death underneath an elephant which he had wounded in battle. During the leadership of Jonathan the Syrians were occupied with civil war, so that not only was Judea left in peace, but the favor of the Jews was sued for, and Jonathan was able to strengthen his position. He made a treaty with the Romans and also with the Spartans. He was treacherously slain by Tryphon, a Syrian general, in 143 B.C. On his death the leadership fell to Simon, the last remaining son of Mattathias. The most important event that fell under his rule was the granting of Jewish independence by the Syrian king Demetrius II. Coins were struck bearing the name of Simon, and contracts were dated "in the first year of Simon high priest and governor." Simon and 2 of his sons were treacherously slain by his son-in-law Ptolemy, in Dok near Jericho, 135 B.C. The one son who escaped, John, assumed the power and was known as John Hyrcanus. He was a shrewd and vigorous ruler and enlarged his province. He conquered the Edomites and merged them in the Jewish people. After a long and prosperous reign he died a natural death, and was succeeded by his son Aristobulus, a cruel and unprincipled man who killed his mother and brother. He changed the theocracy into a kingdom, calling himself king, but retained at the same time the high priesthood. After a reign of 1 year he was succeeded by a brother, Alexander Jannaeus, during whose reign the country was torn by the dissensions of the Sadducees and Pharisees. He had a troubled reign of 27 years, and was followed by his widow Alexandra, who reigned for 9 years. She left 2 sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who quarreled about the succession. Hyrcanus was established as high priest while Aristobulus seized the civil authority. Civil war broke out. The Romans interfered, and at first upheld Aristobulus, but later deposed him and carried him to Rome. Hyrcanus was nominally king, but the real ruler was Antipas, or Antipater, an Idumaean, who had been appointed procurator of Judea under Hyrcanus by the Romans. A period of quarrels and dissensions among the members of the reigning family followed, during which time Antipater steadily grew in influence and power with the Romans, until, the Maccabaeans falling into disfavor, the crown of Judea was given to Antipater's son, Herod, who married Mariamne and thus united the family of the Herods with the Hasmonaeans.

For I, II, III, and IV Maccabees, see APOC-RYPHA.

Mac'e-do'n'i-a (mās'ē-dō'nī-ā). A country lying immediately to the n. of Greece. Little is known of it prior to 560 B.C., and for more than 200 years afterward it possessed no special interest. But under Philip of Macedon (359-336 B.C.) and his yet more celebrated son Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.), it rose to world-wide power and imperial importance; see PHILIP 1 and ALEXANDER 1. Under his successors the empire was divided, and the country declined, until in 168 B.C. it was conquered by the Romans, and in 142 B.C. became a Roman province. Macedonia is not mentioned by name in the O.T.; but the Macedonian empire is referred to in Dan. 8:5-8. In I Macc. 1:1 Chittim is Macedonia. Paul, summoned in a vision by a man of Macedonia, on his Second Journey, passed from Asia into Europe, and preached the gospel in that continent first on Macedonian soil. At this time he passed through the Macedonian towns of Neapolis, Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, and Berea (Acts 16:9 to 17:14). When Paul departed, Silas and Timothy continued the work (Acts 17:14, 15; 18:5). Paul revisited the region (Acts 19:21, 22; 20:1-3; cf. II Cor. 2:13; 7:5; I Tim. 1:3). Galus and Aristarchus, Macedonians, were Paul's companions in travel, and were in danger on his account during the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:29). Secundus, also a Macedonian, was one of those who waited for him at Troas, when for the last time he was to leave Philippi on his way to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Paul's converts in Macedonia made a collection for the poor Christians of the Jewish capital (Rom. 15:26). They also ministered to the wants of the apostle himself (II Cor. 8:1-5), the Philippians being the most prominent in the work of charity (Phil. 4:15).

Mach'ban-nal (māk'bā-nī), in A.V. Mach'ba-nal (māk'bā-nī). One of the Gadite heroes who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:13).

Mach-be'na (māk-bē'nā), in A.V. Mach-be'nah (māk-bē'nā). A town of Judah, to judge from the context (I Chron. 2:49). See CAB-BON.

Ma'chi (māk'kī). Father of the spy from the tribe of Gad (Num. 13:15).

Ma'chir (māk'kīr) [sold]. 1. The first-born and only son of Manasseh (Gen. 50:23; Josh. 17:1). His mother was an Aramite (I Chron. 7:14). He was the founder of the family of the Machirites, which would have been the sole family of Manasseh. But as posterity increased, new families were set apart from the main line through the first-born; and thus Machir became one among the families of Manasseh (Num. 26:29). The family, collectively called Machir, was warlike, and subjugated Gilead. This district was accordingly assigned to the family for its inheritance (Num. 32:39, 40; Josh. 17:1) and was given by Moses. The name of Machir was once used poetically for the whole tribe of Manasseh, w. as well as e. of the Jordan (Judg. 5:14).

2. A son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar, e. of the Jordan (II Sam. 9:4, 5), who brought provisions to David during the rebellion of Absalom (ch. 17:27).

Mach'mas (māk'mās). See MICHMASH.

Mach-nad'e-bal (māk-nād'ē-bī). A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

Mach-pe'lah (māk-pē'lā) [probably, double]. A place before Mamre, where was a field with trees and a cave belonging to Ephron, a Hittite (Gen. 23:9, 17, 19). The place was purchased by Abraham for 400 shekels of silver in order to use the cave as a sepulcher for Sarah, his wife. He himself was buried there by his sons, Isaac and Ishmael (ch. 25:9, 10). There also Isaac and Rebekah were buried; so likewise were Leah and Jacob (chs. 49:29-33; 50:12, 13), and perhaps others of whom we have no record. There were monuments to the patriarchs at Hebron in the time of Christ (Jos. War iv. 9, 7). The cave is probably correctly identified as the one which undoubtedly lies beneath the great mosque at Hebron. Christians have all along been excluded from the mosque and the cavern beneath; but the Prince of Wales on April 7, 1862, the Crown Prince of Prussia in November, 1869, and the 2 sons of the Prince of Wales, one of whom later became King George V, on April 5, 1882, were permitted to make an imperfect examination. On the slope of the hill looking toward the w. stands the Haram, a sacred enclosure, in form an oblong lying n.w. and s.e., surrounded by walls of similar masonry to those of early date around the Temple area at Jerusalem, and measuring externally about 197 feet in length and 111 feet in breadth. The ancient Christian church, which completely filled the s.e. end of the enclosure, has been converted into a mosque. In the mosque, close to its n.w. wall and about 10 feet s.w. of the main entrance, is a round opening, about a foot in diameter, through the stone flooring. Through this hole a glimpse is had into a shaft about 12 feet square and 15 feet deep, with a door in the s.e. wall. This chamber is supposed to be an anteroom to the double cave situated immediately to the s.e. under the floor of the mosque. Two entrances to the cave are marked in the flagging of the mosque, but they cannot be opened without tearing up the pavement. Their position would indicate that they afforded access to the cave through its roof of rock. The floor of the mosque and the courtyard in front are 15 feet higher than the street which skirts the Haram on the long s.w. side. In the n.w. corner of the enclosure is a shrine sacred to Joseph, but he was buried at Shechem (Josh. 24:32).

Mad'a-i (măd'ă-i). A people descended from Japheth (Gen. 10:2; I Chron. 1:5), doubtless the inhabitants of Media.

Ma'di-an (mă'di-ăn). See MIDIAN.

Mad-man'nah (măd-măn'ă) [dunghill]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:31; I Chron. 2:49); perhaps identical with Bethmarcaboth (q.v.), Umm Deimneh, about 13 miles n.e. of Beer-sheba.

Mad'men (măd'měn) [dunghill]. A town in Moab (Jer. 48:12), Khirbet Dimneh, 2½ miles n.w. of Rabba, at the head of Wadi Beni Hammad.

Mad-me'nah (măd-mē'nă) [dunghill]. A town near Jerusalem and on the n. (Isa. 10:31), probably near Sha'fât.

Mad'ness. 1. Disorder of the mind which renders a person void of right reason (Deut. 28:28). David, when feigning to be mad, made marks on the doors of the gate and let the spittle fall down upon his beard (I Sam. 21:13, 14, where the 2 principal Hebrew synonyms are used). It may manifest itself in hallucinations (Acts 12:15), or in wild raving (I Cor. 14:23), or even in violence, such as hurling about firebrands and arrows (Prov. 26:18). Its symptoms are temporarily produced by drink (Jer. 25:16; 51:7).

2. A state of uncontrollable emotion, as infatuation (Jer. 50:38) or fury (Ps. 102:8; Luke 6:11; Acts 26:11).

Ma'don (mă'dôn) [contention, strife]. A town of n. Canaan, whose king was in confederacy with the king of Hazor (Josh. 11:1-12; 12:19); probably Khirbet Madin, about ½ mile s. of Hattin.

Mag'a-dan (măg'ă-dăn). A locality into the borders of which Jesus went after crossing the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 15:39, in A.V. Magdala). It seems to have been on the w. shore of the lake and may have included Magdala (cf. Mark 8:10). See DALMANUTHA.

Mag'bish (măg'bish) [cf. Akkad. gabshu, massive, strong]. A town (Ezra 2:30). Père Abel identifies it with Khirbet el-Mahbiyeh, 3 miles s.w. of Adullam.

Mag'da-la (măg'dă-lă) [Heb. migdāl, Aram. migdālā, tower]. A town which, according to the Talmud, stood on the w. shore of the Sea of Galilee, near Tiberias and Hammath, and within less than a Sabbath-day's journey of the water. It exists in the wretched village el-Mejdel, scarcely 3 miles n. of Tiberias. In Matt. 15:39 the R.V., following the best manuscripts, substitutes Magadan (q.v.). See also MAGDALENE.

Mag'da-lene (măg'dă-lēn; măg'dă-lē'nē) [Gr., of Magdala]. Mag-da-le'ne has the accent as in Latin, which follows the Greek in having long e; Mag'da-lene is the more frequent English pronunciation. A designation of one of the Marys, implying that she came from some Magdala, probably from the village now called el-Mejdel, on the w. shore of the Sea of Galilee, about 3 miles n.n.w. of Tiberias. For modern use of magdalen see MARY 3.

Mag'di-el (măg'di-ēl) [God is excellence, glory]. A duke descended from Esau (Gen. 36:43; I Chron. 1:54).

Magi (mă'ji) [Gr. Magoi, pl. of Magos, from Old Pers. magav]. The religious caste to which the Wise Men belonged who came from the e. to worship the Infant Jesus (Matt. 2:1, R.V. marg.). The Magi were a priestly caste, numerous enough to be regarded as one of the 6 tribes of Media (Herod. i. 101). When the Persians conquered the Medes, the Magi retained their influence in the new empire. An attempt on their part to seize the crown led to a dreadful slaughter of them, notwithstanding which their power soon revived (Herod. iii. 79). They worshiped the elements, fire, air, earth, and water, especially the first. The only temples they had were fire temples, generally on housetops, where they kept the sacred element burning night and day. What to do with the dead was a question which, with their views, involved much perplexity. The corpse could not be burned, buried, cast into water, or left to decay in the air without defiling an element. It was therefore exposed to be devoured by carrion-loving birds or beasts (cf. Herod. i. 140; Strabo xv. 3, 20). To do this in the least offensive manner they erected towers called towers of silence, with transverse bars at the top, on which vultures and ravens might stand while they did their melancholy work. The Magi wore as sacerdotal vestments a white robe, with a headdress consisting of a tall felt cap, with lappets at the side which concealed the jaws. They claimed to be mediators between God and man, intervening in all sacrifices (Herod. i. 132; vii. 43). They interpreted dreams and omens and claimed the gift of prophecy (Herod. i. 107, 120; vii. 19, 37, 113). They were diligent in killing such animals as were regarded as belonging to the bad creation (Herod. i. 140). The foreigner was apt to observe the religious doctrine and priestly functions of the Magi less attentively than their incantations, and in process of time the Greeks bestowed the epithet Magos on any sorcerer who employed the methods and enchantments of the East. The Jew Bar-Jesus was a Magus (Acts 13:6, R.V. marg.), and so was Simon, often called Magus, of Samaria (ch. 8:9).

Ma-gi'cian. A man who pretends to have preternatural powers, which he has obtained by the study of an occult science or the practice of a black art in connivance with evil spirits, and which he calls magic (cf. Acts 19:19); see SORCERER. In the Bible magician is the rendering of ḥarṭôm, one of the class of sacred scribes, who were skilled in writing and acquired vast information (Dan. 1:20), and who often claimed occult knowledge, practiced magic (Ex. 7:11), and undertook to interpret dreams (Gen. 41:8; Dan. 2:10). The Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses were 2 in number, and their names were Jannes and Jambres (II Tim. 3:8).

Ma'gog (mā'gōg). A people descended from Japheth (Gen. 10:2), at one period inhabiting a n. land (Ezek. 38:2, 15). Josephus identified them with the Scythians (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 1), and his identification is commonly accepted, but it may be a comprehensive term for n. barbarous peoples. The final struggle of heathenism with the Kingdom of God is prophetically portrayed by Ezekiel under the figure of an invasion of the land of Israel by the hordes of the king of Magog and their overthrow. Ezekiel's description is referred to and its imagery is borrowed by John (Rev. 20:8, 9). See Gog 2.

Ma'gor-mis'sa-bib (mā'gbr-mis'ā-bīb) [terror on every side]. A prophetic name given to Pashhur, a priest and governor of the Temple who ill-treated the Prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 20:3).

Mag'pi-ash (māg'pī-āsh) [cf. Magbish]. One of the chiefs of the people who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:20).

Ma-ha'lah (mā-hā'lā). See MAHLAH 2.

Ma-ha-la-lel (mā-hā'lā-lēl), in A.V. and in R.V. of N.T. Ma-ha-la-lel (mā-hā'lā-lē'lēl), in A.V. of N.T. Ma-le-lel (mā-lē'lē-lēl) [praise of God, or probably, God shines forth]. 1. An antediluvian patriarch in the line of Seth (Gen. 5:12-17; Luke 3:37).

2. One of the tribe of Judah, family of Perez, who lived in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. 11:4).

Ma-ha-lath (mā-hā-lāth) [sickness]. 1. A musical term (Psalms 53; 88, titles), which judged by Heb. etymology refers to sickness (cf. Isa. 38:9 seq.). Maḥālath is probably the initial word of some well-known Hebrew song to the melody of which Psalm 53 was set. In Psalm 88 'al maḥālath le'annōth may mean "set to 'sickness to afflict, or to sing,'" which too was the name of a well-known song.

Le'annōth, however, may mean "for singing antiphonally." The meaning is quite uncertain.

2. Daughter of Ishmael and a wife of Esau (Gen. 28:9). Called also Basemath. See BASEMATH 2.

3. Daughter of Jerimoth and one of Rehoboam's wives (II Chron. 11:18).

Ma'ha-li (mā'hā-lī). See MAHLI.

Ma-ha-na'im (mā'hā-nā'im) [two camps]. The name given by Jacob to a place e. of Jordan where the angels of God met him, apparently in 2 detachments, just after he had finally parted from Laban and before he crossed the Jabbok (Gen. 32:2). It was on the boundary line between the tribes of Gad and Manasseh (Josh. 13:26, 30). It was afterward assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:38; I Chron. 6:80). Commencing as a sacred spot, it ultimately became a fortified city. It was Ish-bosheth's capital (II Sam. 2:8, 12, 29). David retired thither while his rebellious son Absalom was in possession of Jerusalem (II Sam. 17:24, 27; 19:32; I Kings 2:8). Ahinadab the son of Iddo was Solomon's purveyor in the region (I Kings 4:14). The site has not been identified. Robinson, and long before him the Jewish traveler Moses hap-Parchi, about 1315, suggested Khirbet Maḥneh, about 2½ miles n. of 'Ajlūn. Some have thought that Gerasa (Jerash) was built upon the site. Dalman prefers Tulul edh-Dhabab on the n. bank of the Jabbok, though others would locate Penuel at this place.

Ma'ha-neh-dan' (mā'hā-nē-dān') [camp of Dan]. A place behind, that is w. of Kiriath-jearim (Judg. 18:12), between Zorah and Eshtaol (ch. 13:25), so named when the Danite spies encamped at the spot.

Ma-har'a-i (mā-hār'ā-ī) [swift, impetuous]. A Netophathite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:28; I Chron. 11:30). He was David's captain for the 10th month (ch. 27:13).

Ma'hath (mā'hāth) [seizing]. 1. A Kohathite Levite, descended by the line of Zephaniah, Tahath, and Abiasaph (I Chron. 6:35). He was an ancestor of Samuel (v. 33).

2. Another Levite, one of the overseers who looked after the tithes and freewill offerings in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:13). Probably he was the son of Amasai, a descendant of Kohath (ch. 29:12).

Ma-ha-vite (mā'hā-vīt). A designation of unknown meaning appended to the name of Eliel, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:46).

Ma-ha-zi-oth (mā-hā-zī-ōth) [visions]. A Levite, a descendant of Heman (I Chron. 25:4). He obtained the 23d lot among the singers (v. 30).

Ma'her-shal'al-hash'baz' (mā'hēr-shāl'al-hāsh'baz') [spoil speeds, prey hastes]. The words which Isaiah was directed to display on a public tablet and have duly witnessed, and a year later was told to give as a name to his 2d son. They predicted the speedy conquest of Damascus and Samaria by the king of Assyria (Isa. 8:1-4). The preliminary formality drew public attention to the enigmatical words and attested that God was preparing and revealing the event a year before its occurrence.

Mah'tah (mā'lā), in A.V. once Ma-ha'lah (I Chron. 7:18) [disease]. 1. Daughter of Zelophead (Num. 26:33; 27:1).

2. Another Manassite, whose mother was Hammoleketh (I Chron. 7:18).

Mah'ti (mā'lī), in A.V. once Ma'ha-li (Ex. 6:19) [sick, weak]. 1. A Levite, son of Merari and brother of Mushi. He founded a tribal family or house (Ex. 6:19; Num. 3:20, 33; 26:58). His grandsons married their cousins (I Chron. 23:22).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (I Chron. 6:47; 23:23; 24:30).

Ma'h'lon (mā'h'lōn) [sickly]. Elder son of Elimelech and Naomi, and the 1st husband of Ruth (Ruth 1:2; 4:10).

Ma'hol (mā'hōl) [dance]. Father of Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, 3 noted wise men (I Kings 4:31).

Ma'h-se'iah (mā-sē'yā), in A.V. Ma'a-se'iah [Jehovah is a refuge]. An ancestor of Jeremiah's friend, Baruch, and of the chief chamberlain, Seraiah (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

Ma'kaz (mā'kāz) [a cutting off, end]. A town whence one of Solomon's purveyors drew supplies (I Kings 4:9).

Ma'ked (mā'kēd), in A.V. once Ma'ged (mā'gēd). A town of Gilead, in which Jews were shut up by the heathen (I Macc. 5:26). It was captured by Judas Maccabaeus, and the Jews were released (v. 36). It is located at Tell Mīkdād, almost 7 miles n. of Sheikh Miskin.

Ma'ke'loth (māk-hē'lōth) [assemblies]. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:25, 26); probably Kuntilet Krayeh or 'Ajrūd.

Ma'ke'dah (mā-kē'dā) [place of shepherds]. A Canaanite town in the lowland, taken by Joshua (Josh. 15:41). Near it was a cave (ch. 10:16). Eusebius located it 8 Roman miles e. of Eleutheropolis. He may, however, mean n. (as he sometimes does by e.), and so the place would be located at Khirbet el-Kheishum.

Ma'k'tesh (māk'tēsh) [a mortar, a trough, a hollow]. A locality at Jerusalem (Zeph. 1:11). The Targum identifies it with the Kidron valley; it probably was in the n. part of the city, and the name may have been derived from the hollowed-out form of that part of the Tyropean just n. of the walls, where foreign merchants congregated.

Mal'a-chi (māl'ā-kī) [my messenger, or rather, messenger (of Jehovah)]; cf. II Esdras 1:40. A prophet, the writer of the last book of the O.T. (Mal. 1:1). Nothing is known of his history except what may be learned from his book. Since the name may be interpreted as my messenger (so in ch. 3:1, but this may be a case of wordplay), some have supposed it to be, not the proper name, but the title of a prophet, perhaps of Ezra. But since each of the 11 preceding minor prophecies has its author's name prefixed, there is a strong presumption that it is so in the present case also, and that Malachi was the actual name of the author.

The book may be divided into the following sections: (1) God's special love for Israel, shown in his choice of Jacob instead of Esau (ch. 1:2-5), was not requited: (a) The priests and people dishonored God by presenting blemished offerings (vs. 6-14); punishment threatened for this departure from the norm established by God for the priesthood and once realized (ch. 2:1-9); (b) The people dealt treacherously against their brethren, intermarrying with the heathen, putting away their own wives, and doing deeds of violence (ch. 2:10-16). (2) Judgment imminent. God's messenger is about to prepare the way; the Lord himself will suddenly come to his temple; the messenger of the covenant shall come as judge and purify Levi from dross and visit evildoers (chs. 2:17 to 3:6; cf. Ex. 23:20-23; Matt. 11:10). (3) Call to repentance. Then the Lord will come in blessing and judgment, putting to nought the complaint that he makes no distinction between the good and the evil. Those who have turned from sin to God will be his peculiar treasure, but the wicked shall be burned as stubble (chs. 3:7 to 4:3). Exhortation to remember the Law of Moses, and announcement of the mission of Elijah to prepare for the terrible day of the Lord (ch. 4:4-6; Matt. 17:10-13; Luke 1:17).

When the prophecy was delivered the Jewish people were not under a king, but under a governor (Mal. 1:8), doubtless one appointed by the Persian emperor (Neh. 5:14). Zerubbabel's Temple was standing, as was the altar, and sacrifices were being offered as in the olden time (Mal. 1:7-10); hence Malachi is later than Haggai and Zechariah. But the outburst of religious life which had immediately followed the Return from Babylon, and had resulted in the rebuilding first of the sanctuary and then of the fortifications of Jerusalem, had had time to expend its force. Priests and people were corrupt. This condition suits the time of Nehemiah (Neh., ch. 13). Although the book reflects the age of Ezra and Nehemiah, it is not possible to determine the exact date of composition. While some date it before Ezra's return (458 B.C.) or before 444 B.C., a later date is more probable. In 433 Nehemiah was recalled to the Persian court, and on the whole the period of his absence may be the most probable date; it was hardly written while he was governor (cf. Mal. 1:8 with Neh. 5:15, 18).

Mal'cam (māl'kām), in A.V. Mal'cham (māl'kām) [(their) king]. 1. A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim and Hodesh (I Chron. 8:9).

2. Same as Milcom, the chief deity of the Ammonites (Jer. 49:1, 3, in A.V. and R.V. marg., their king; Zeph. 1:5). See MOLECH.

Mal'chiel (māl'kī-ēl) [God is king]. A son of Beriah and grandson of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45).

Mal'chī'jah (māl'kī-jā), in A.V. often Mal'chī'ah, once Mel'chī'ah (Jer. 21:1) [Jehovah is king]. 1. A Levite, family of Gershom, house of Shimei (I Chron. 6:40).

2. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and became the 5th course when David distributed the priests into divisions (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 9). Apparently members of a subdivision of his family, viz., the house of Pashhur, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:38). He is also probably referred to in I Chron. 9:12 and Neh. 11:12, where a priestly line is traced back through Pashhur to one of this name. The royal prince of Jer. 38:6 (and hence probably of v. 1) is a different person.

3. A royal prince, into whose dungeon the Prophet Jeremiah was cast (Jer. 38:6). It is natural to identify him with the father of Pashhur mentioned in v. 1 and ch. 21:1.

4. 5. Two sons of Parosh, both induced by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25).

6. A son of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:31). He joined with another Hebrew in repairing part of the wall of Jerusalem and the tower of the furnaces (Neh. 3:11).

7. A son of Rechab. He also repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:14).

8. A goldsmith who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:31).

9. A priest who with others officiated at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42); perhaps one of those who assisted Ezra when the law was explained to the people (Neh. 8:4).

10. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, signed the covenant (Neh. 10:3).

Mal-chi'ram (māl-kī'rām) [the king, i.e., God, is exalted]. A son of King Jehoiachin (I Chron. 3:18).

Mal'chi-shu'a (māl'kī-shō'ā), in A.V. Me'chi-shu'a in I Samuel [the king, i.e., God, is salvation]. A son of King Saul (I Sam. 14:49; I Chron. 8:33; 9:39). He was killed at the battle of Gilboa (I Sam. 31:2).

Mal'chus (māl'kūs) [Lat. from Gr. of Heb. melek, king]. The high priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off (John 18:10).

Ma-le'le-el (mā-lē'lē-ēl). See MAHALALEL.

Mal'lothi (māl'ō-thi). A son of Heman (I Chron. 25:4). He obtained by lot the leadership of the 19th course of singers (v. 26).

Mallows. The rendering of Heb. Mallūah, salt plant (Job 30:4, A.V.). Since genuine mallows are mucilaginous and not saline, the R.V. alters the name of the plant to saltwort; see SALTWORT.

Mal'luch (māl'ūk) [reigning, counselor]. 1. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (I Chron. 6:44).

2. A chief of the priests, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (v. 14, R.V.). In the latter passage the form Malluchi is probably due to dittography; the final letter of Malluchi is the initial letter of the following word, and moreover is not found in the LXX. Malluchi represents the kethib of the Hebrew text, but Melicu (A.V. and marg. of R.V.) is the kere.

3, 4. A son of Bani and a son of Harim, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29, 32).

5, 6. A priest and a chief of the people who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:4, 27).

Mam'mon [Gr. māmōnās, from Aram. māmōnā, wealth, riches]. A personification of wealth (Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:9, 11, 13).

Mam're (mām'rē). 1. The town or more probably district of Hebron (Gen. 23:19; 35:27), to the w. of Machpelah (ch. 23:17). A grove was there, near Hebron, where Abraham several times resided (chs. 13:18; 14:13; 18:1, etc.). In Josephus' time an aged terebinth was pointed out as Abraham's tree, 6 stades or  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile from Hebron (Jos. War iv. 9, 7); in the 4th century, one at Rāmet el-Khalil, 2 Roman miles n. of Hebron, which Constantine enclosed within the walls of a basilica. The remains of this building are called the house of Abraham. The tree which now claims the honor of being Abraham's oak, and which was already celebrated as such in the 16th century, is a genuine oak. Its trunk has a girth of 26 feet at the ground, and its branches extend over an area of 93 feet in diameter (Thomson). It stands about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles w.n.w. of modern Hebron.

2. An Amorite chieftain who dwelt at Mamre and who with his brothers, Eshcol and Aner, helped Abraham to retake the captives and the spoil carried off by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:13, 24). He was probably designated by the name of the district over which he ruled.

Man. See ADAM 1.

Man'a'en (mān'ā-ēn) [Gr. form of Menahem]. A Christian prophet or teacher in the church at Antioch. He had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch as his companion (Acts 13:1, A.V.), or was his foster brother, brought up at the same mother's breast (R.V.). He may have been a descendant, or at least a relative of Manahem, the Essene, who predicted to Herod the Great, when yet a schoolboy, that he would obtain the kingdom.

When the prophecy was fulfilled, Herod held him and his sect in high esteem (Jos. Antiq. xv. 10, 5).

Ma-na'hath (mān'ā-hāth) [resting place]. 1. A son of the Horite, Shobal (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40).

2. A place to which Benjamites of Geba were carried captive by their fellow tribesmen (I Chron. 8:6); probably Māha, 3 miles s.w. of Jerusalem. Descendants of Salma, of the family of Caleb, tribe of Judah, probably formed half the population of it or of another place of the name (ch. 2:54); see MANA-HATHITES.

Ma-na'hath-ites (mā-nā'hāth-its), in A.V. Ma-na'heth-ites (mā-nā'hēth-its). The inhabitants of a place or the descendants of a man Manahath (I Chron. 2:54). To judge by the context, a place is intended. For Manaheth-ites in v. 52, A.V., see MENEHOTH.

Ma-nas'seh (mā-nās'ē), in A.V. of N.T. Manas'ses (mā-nās'ēz), the Greek form [making to forget]. 1. The elder son of Joseph. He was born in Egypt, his mother being Asenath, daughter of Poti-phera, priest of On. In race, therefore, he, like his brother Ephraim, was half Hebrew, half Egyptian (Gen. 41:50, 51). When Jacob desired to bless the 2 boys, Joseph took Ephraim in his right hand, toward Jacob's left, and Manasseh in his left, toward Jacob's right; but the dying patriarch crossed his arms, so as to lay his right hand on Ephraim's head and his left on that of Manasseh, intimating prophetically that while both sons should become ancestors of great peoples, Ephraim should excel (ch. 48:8-21).

2. The tribe which descended from Manasseh. It consisted of 7 tribal families, of which one was founded by his son Machir and the remaining 6 sprang from his grandson Gilead (Gen. 50:23; Num. 26:28-34; Josh. 17:1, 2). At the 1st census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 32,200 fighting men (Num. 1:34, 35); at the 2d, which was taken 38 years later, 52,700 (ch. 26:34). After Moses had defeated Sihon, king of Heshbon, and Og, king of Bashan, one half the tribe of Manasseh joined with the tribes of Reuben and Gad in requesting permission to settle e. of the Jordan and obtained the leave they sought, on condition of going armed before their brethren, who had not yet obtained settlements, and aiding in the war w. of the Jordan (chs. 32:33-42; cf. vs. 1-32; 34:14, 15; Deut. 3:12, 13; 29:8; Josh. 12:4-6; 18:7). They observed the conditions laid down (Josh. 1:12-18; 4:12); and, when the war had been successfully fought out, were honorably dismissed to the territory they had chosen. A temporary misunderstanding about the building of an altar at one time threatened unpleasant consequences; but on explanation being given, matters were amicably arranged (ch. 22:1-34). The region given to the half tribe of Manasseh e. of the Jordan comprehended part of Gilead and all Bashan (Deut. 3:13-15), Mahanaim in one direction being on its boundary line (Josh. 13:29-33). It is between 65 and 70 miles from e. to w., by 40 or more from n. to s. It is mostly a tableland of 2,500 feet elevation, one of the richest parts of Palestine, and to this day the granary of a large part of Syria. It is studded with ruined towns. The other half of the tribe crossed the Jordan and had their inheritance in central Palestine, w. of the river. It was bounded on the s. by Ephraim, on the n.w. by Asher, and on the n.e. by Issachar. Its s. boundary ran by Janoah and Taanath-shiloh, near Shechem, and along the n. bank of the brook Kanah to its entrance into the Mediterranean (Josh. 17:5-10). But the children of Ephraim had cities in the midst of the inheritance of the children of Manasseh (ch. 16:9), and, on the other hand, Manasseh had various towns, viz., Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, En-dor, Taanach, and Megiddo, within the territories of Issachar and Asher (ch. 17:11; cf. I Chron. 7:29). The Manassites, however, failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants of the cities just named, but eventually put them there to tribute (Josh. 17:12, 13; Judg. 1:27, 28). Levitical cities were allotted from Manasseh as from the other tribes, including Golan in Bashan in the region e. of the Jordan, one of the 6 cities of refuge (Josh. 20:8; 21:27). The hero and judge Gideon was a Manassite (Judg. 6:15). Some Manassites joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:19, 20). No fewer than 18,000 offered him their services during his reign at Hebron (v. 31; cf. v. 37). The e. Manassites, in conjunction with the 2 tribes e. of the Jordan, waged war with the Hagrites and took possession of their country. They were themselves carried into exile by Tiglath-pileser (ch. 5:18-26). Some Manassites came to Asa when they saw that the Lord was with him (II Chron. 15:9); men of the same tribe also attended the great passover in Hezekiah's reign and also in Josiah's reign (chs. 30:1, 10, 11, 18; 31:1; 34:6, 9).

3. An intentional modification of the name Moses (Judg. 18:30, A.V.); see JONATHAN 1.

4. Son and successor of the good king Hezekiah. He ascended the throne about the year 693 B.C., when he was only 12 years of age. He undid the work of reformation which had been carried out in the former reign. He established the high places, built an altar to Baal, and reared an Asherah; made altars for the worship of the host of heaven within the 2 courts of the Temple, and caused one of his sons to pass through the fire. Prophets warned him, but he paid no attention to their threatenings. Instead of listening, he shed much innocent blood throughout every part of Jerusalem. The victims were doubtless chiefly those who, retaining their fidelity to Jehovah, opposed Manasseh's reactionary religious measures (II Kings 21:1-16). As a penalty for his wickedness, God left him to his enemies. Two kings of Assyria, Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, report receiving tribute from him. The Assyrian king by whose captains he was carried captive to Babylon (II Chron. 33:11) was probably Ashurbanipal. Manasseh repented, and was after a time restored to his kingdom. He put away the idols which had been his ruin, and restored the worship of Jehovah. He also added to the fortifications of Jerusalem (II Chron. 33:12-19). After a reign of 55 years, a longer one than any other king of Judah had enjoyed, he died about the year 639 B.C., leaving his son Amon to ascend the throne (II Kings 21:17, 18; II Chron. 33:20). For the Prayer of Manasses, see APOCRYPHA 12.

5 and 6. A son of Pahath-moab and a son of Hashum, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30, 33).

Man'drake. The rendering of Heb. dūdā'im, by a popular etymology connected with Heb. dōd (beloved, love). The plants were supposed to act as a love philter (Gen. 30:14-16; in R.V. marg., love apples). They are odoriferous (S. of Sol. 7:13). The mandrake (Mandragora officinarum) is a handsome plant of the solanaceous (nightshade) order. It has wavy leaves and pale-violet, white, or deep-blue flowers. Its fruit is small and yellow. The forked root bears a slight resemblance to the human body. It is found in the Jordan Valley and along the rivers running into it, in the plains of Moab and Gilead, and in Galilee.

Ma'neh (mā'nē). See WEIGHTS.

Man'ger. A feeding place for cattle, a crib or trough, in Greek phatnē (Luke 2:7, 12; 13:15, R.V. marg.; cf. Isa. 1:3). Mangers are ancient (Iliad x. 568; xxiv. 280; Herod. ix. 70). In Palestine the stable is usually in the owner's house, a portion of the interior being set apart for the cattle and furnished with mangers built of small stones and mortar in the shape of a box.

Man'na [Gr. manna, from Aram. mannā from Heb. mān (manna); cf. popular etymology (Ex. 16:15) Heb. mān hū' (what is it?) and Arab. mānn (gift, manna)]. A food on which the Israelites mainly subsisted during the 40 years' sojourn in the wilderness. It was first bestowed in the wilderness of Sin, in the 2d half of the 2d month, when the people murmured, owing to the deficiency of food. The descent of manna was described as a raining of bread from heaven (Ex. 16:1-4, 12). "In the morning . . . when the dew . . . was gone up," there lay "upon the face of the wilderness a small round thing, small as the hoar-frost on the ground. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another [ch. 16:15], mān hū', What is it? [A.V., It is manna] for they knew not what it was. And Moses said unto them, It is the bread which Jehovah hath given" (ch. 16:13-15; Num. 11:9). It was white like coriander seed, with a yellowish tinge and resinous appearance like bdellium, and tasted like wafers made with honey or like fresh oil (Ex. 16:31; Num. 11:8). It was ground in mills, beaten in mortars, boiled in pots, and made into cakes (Num. 11:8). The people were directed to gather an omer a day (about 3.36 quarts) for each member of their households, and not to attempt to keep any till the morrow. Some of the people disobeyed this injunction, but the hoarded manna decayed and stank. On the 6th day 2 omers were gathered for each person, as none descended on the Sabbath (Ex. 16:22-30). An omerful, which evidently was preserved from decay, was kept by Aaron and his successors to show future generations the nature of the food on which the Israelites had subsisted in the wilderness (vs. 32-34); see HIGH PRIEST. A year after it was first given, at the same season, the people are mentioned as having it, and again toward the end of the 40 years. It is referred to because the people were murmuring against the food (Num. 11: 4-9; 21:5), but the boon which they failed to appreciate was not withdrawn. It was continued during the whole of the 40 years' desert wanderings (Ex. 16:35; Deut. 8:3, 16; Neh. 9:20; Ps. 78:24), and did not cease till the day after the Israelites had crossed the Jordan, encamped at Gilgal, and begun to eat of the produce of Canaan (Josh. 5:10-12).

Mandrake

No substance is known which satisfies all the requirements of the O.T. references. The amount furnished during the journey of the Israelites is also miraculous. Various plants exude a mannalike substance, either emanating spontaneously from the plant itself or produced by the puncture of an insect. The Tamarix gallica mannifera does so, and grows in the peninsula of Sinai. The exudation is dirty yellow in color, but white when it falls on stones. It melts in the heat of the sun. It is produced during a period of from 6 to 10 weeks, the height of the season being June. Alhagi maurorum and A. desertorum, 2 species of camel's-thorn, also exude a mannalike substance, and there are other manna-bearing plants. The Arabs use plant manna of different kinds as butter and honey. Moreover, if taken in more than the most limited quantities it is purgative.

Insects (the Trabulina mannipara and the Najacoccus serpentinus minor), which suck the sap of the Tamarix mannifera, also are a source of manna; they exude the substance in beads varying between the size of a pin-head and that of a pea. In a few days the beads of manna crystallize and in color become anything between milk-white and yellow-brown.

In 1932 a white substance resembling manna one morning covered a patch of 2,100 feet by 60 feet in the farm owned by a Mr. Botha in Natal, South Africa. It was gathered and eaten by the natives.

Ma-no'ah (mā-nō'ā) [rest, quiet]. A Danite belonging to the village of Zorah, and father of Samson (Judg. 13:1-25).

Man'slay'er. See MURDER.

Man'tle. The large, sleeveless, outer garment or, as a rendering of Heb. mē'il, an occasional garment worn between the tunic and the outer garment. See CLOTHING.

Ma'och (mā'ōk) [perhaps, oppression]. Father of Achish, king of Gath (I Sam. 27:2). See ACHISH.

Ma'ōn (mā'ōn) [dwelling, habitation, abode]. 1. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:55), the residence of Nabal (I Sam. 25:2), now Tell Ma'in, about 1½ miles s. from Carmel of Judah, and 8½ s. of Hebron. In the wilderness in the vicinity of Maon David and his men for a time took refuge (I Sam. 23:24, 25).

2. Son of Shammai, of the tribe of Judah, and ancestor of the inhabitants of Beth-zur (I Chron. 2:45). Maon may indeed in this passage possibly be used collectively for the inhabitants of the town of this name (cf. Bethlehem, v. 54), and that Maon is immediately called the father of Beth-zur may be paralleled by I Chron. 1:8, 9, 11, 13.

3. A people that oppressed Israel (Judg. 10:12). The English versions translate, Maonites. See MEUNIM.

Ma'on-ites (mā'ōn-its). See MAON 3 and MEUNIM.

Ma'ra (mā'rā) [bitter, sad of spirit]. The name chosen by Naomi to express her bereavements (Ruth 1:20).

Ma'rah (mā'rā) [bitter, bitterness]. A fountain of bitter water in the wilderness of Shur on the route to Sinai, at which the Israelites halted when 3 days or a little more had elapsed after their passage of the Red Sea.

The badness of the water, and perhaps its scantiness, opened their eyes to the hardships which they might expect, and they murmured. Moses was directed by God to cast a certain tree into the waters, whereby they were rendered palatable, either miraculously or through the chemical and medicinal properties of the tree (Exod. 15:23-26; Num. 33:8, 9). Marah has been generally located at 'Ain Hawārah, about 47 miles from Suez, and a few miles inland from the Red Sea, from which it is separated by a range of hills. The well measures about 20 feet across, but is much wider at the bottom. Its depth is perhaps 25 feet. The soil of the region abounds in soda, and the water of the well is consequently salty and bitter.

Mar'a-lah (mār'd-lā). A frontier village of Zebulun toward the sea (Josh. 19:11); probably Tell Ghalta in the plain of the Kishon, s. of Jeida.

Mar'a-nath'a (mār'a-nāth'd) (A.V.), Mar'a-na tha (mār'd-nā thā) (A.R.V.), Mar'an ath'a (mār'ān āth'd) (E.R.V.). See ANATHEMA MARANATHA.

Mar'ble. Limestone, especially in a crystalline condition, which is capable of taking polish. It was called in Hebrew shayish and shēsh, from its brightness, and in Greek mar-maros. It was used for columns and costly pavements (Esth. 1:6; S. of Sol. 5:15), and was employed in Solomon's Temple (I Chron. 29:2). Josephus, in describing the walls of this edifice, mentions that they were built of white stone, but does not specify the kind of stone (Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 2). White, yellow, and red marble is obtained in Lebanon, but a choicer variety came from Arabia. Red and white marble was employed in the Greco-Roman period for palatial buildings in Palestine, both e. and w. of the Jordan. In Herod's Temple the pillars of the cloisters were monoliths of white marble, 25 cubits high (Jos. War v. 5, 2).

Mar'cus (mār'kūs). See MARK.

Mar'e'shah (mā-rē'shā) [perhaps, head place]. 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:44; cf. I Chron. 4:21). Rehoboam strengthened its fortifications (II Chron. 11:8). The great battle between King Asa and Zerah the Ethiopian was fought in its vicinity (ch. 14:9, 10). In the Greek period it was an important town, inhabited by Edomites, and known as Marissa (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; xiv. 1, 4). It was plundered by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:66; II Macc. 12:35; Jos. Antiq. xii. 8, 6). John Hyrcanus planted a Jewish colony there (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; 10, 2); but Pompey made the town free in 63 (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 4). Gabinus fortified it (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 5, 3). It was finally destroyed by the Parthians in 40 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 13, 9). According to Eusebius, its ruins existed 2 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis; and Bliss has located it at Tell Sandaḥannah, 1 mile s. by e. of Beit Jibrin.

2. The father of Hebron (I Chron. 2:42). The form of expression, in the light of its context, suggests that Mareshah was the progenitor of the inhabitants of Hebron, but the mention of Hebron's sons in the following verse makes it probable that Hebron was a man. If so, he is not mentioned elsewhere.

Mar-hesh'van (mār-hēsh'vān), Mar'ches'van (mār-kēs'vān) [Heb. marheshvān, from Akkad. araḥ (warbu) + samnu (shavna, in Neo-Babylonian), eighth month]. Same as Bul. See BUL and YEAR.

Mark (märk), in A.V. of N.T. thrice Mar'cus (Col. 4:10; Philemon 24; I Peter 5:13) [Lat. marcus, a large hammer]. The Evangelist to whom is traditionally assigned the Second Gospel. Mark was his surname (Acts 12:12, 25; 15:37); his 1st name was John, by which alone he is designated in Acts 13:5, 13. There are several instances in the N.T. of Jews with Latin surnames (Acts 1:23; 13:1, 9). His mother, Mary, was in comfortable circumstances, and her house in Jerusalem was one of the meeting places of the Christians (Acts 12:12-17); see MARY 5. Mark was also the cousin of Barnabas (Col. 4:10, R.V.; in A.V. sister's son). He accompanied Barnabas and Paul from Jerusalem to Antioch of Syria (Acts 12:25; 13:1) and afterward on their missionary journey (ch. 13:5); but, for some unstated reason, he left them at Perga (v. 13) and returned to Jerusalem. Whatever was the reason of Mark's conduct on that occasion, Paul disapproved of it so much that he refused to take him with them when a second journey was proposed (ch. 15:38). This caused a contention between the 2 missionaries, so that they separated and Barnabas, with Mark, sailed to Cyprus to resume his evangelistic work. After this Mark disappears from the history for about 10 years. We next find him in Rome with Paul and joining with the apostle in sending salutations (Col. 4:10; Philemon 24). It thus appears that the former cause of variance between the 2 men had been removed; and, at a still later period, Paul speaks of Mark in highly commendatory terms: "Take Mark, and bring him with thee; for he is useful to me for ministering" (II Tim. 4:11). This last reference further implies that Mark had been in the e., certainly in Asia Minor and perhaps still farther e. Peter calls Mark his son, which, if not a mere term of endearment, may mean that Mark had been one of Peter's converts. The fact that Peter, when released by the angel from prison, went to the house of Mark's mother (Acts 12:12) may indicate his intimacy with the family. Tradition varies on the point as to whether Mark had been an immediate follower of Jesus. Many think, however, that the young man who was present at the time of Christ's arrest (Mark 14:51, 52) was Mark himself. The incident is mentioned by no other Evangelist, and there would seem to be no motive for recording it except the wish to give a personal reminiscence. The time and place of Mark's death are unknown. Early tradition represents him as the interpreter of Peter. Among others, Papias of Hierapolis, who wrote about A.D. 140, quoting "the elder" as his authority, says: "Mark, having become Peter's interpreter, wrote down accurately, though not in order, as many as he remembered of the things said or done by the Lord. For he neither had heard the Lord nor followed him, but at a later time, as I said, [he followed] Peter, who delivered his instructions according to the needs [of the occasion], but not with a view to giving a systematic account of the Lord's sayings. So that Mark made no mistake, thus writing down some things as he remembered them; for of one thing he took forethought, [namely] not to leave out any one of the things he had heard or to state falsely anything in them" (Eusebius, H.E. iii. 39, 15). This reference to Mark as the interpreter of Peter may either mean that he accompanied Peter in the later years of the apostle's life, on his missionary journeys and acted as his spokesman when he was addressing Gentile audiences, or may merely describe Mark's work in writing down the preaching of Peter in the Gospel which goes by his [Mark's] name. There can be little doubt that Mark was in Rome with both Paul and Peter. Tradition also made him the founder of the church in Alexandria, but the value of the tradition is uncertain. The main point to be observed is that Mark's early history and his later association with the chief apostles fitted him to become the writer of a Gospel.

The Gospel According to Mark is the 2d of our 4 Gospels, though not necessarily the 2d in order of composition. It is the shortest of the 4, but this brevity is not the result of condensation of the material. What Mark does give he generally describes with much detail. The story moves forward rapidly with pictorial power, and consists of a succession of descriptive scenes. These proceed in a more chronological order than in Matthew or Luke. Especial stress is laid on the deeds of Christ rather than on his formal instruction by word of mouth, only 4 full parables being related compared with 19 miracles and but one of Christ's longer discourses being given at any length (ch. 13). Christ is depicted as the mighty Son of God (chs. 1:11; 5:7; 9:7; 14:61; also chs. 8:38; 12:1-11; 13:32; 14:36), the conquering Saviour. The narrative deals mainly with 2 themes: the ministry in Galilee (chs. 1:14 to 9:50), and the last week at Jerusalem (chs. 11:1 to 16:8). These sections are connected by a somewhat brief survey of the intervening period (ch. 10:1-52). Throughout the whole book the thought of suffering and the doctrine of the cross are stressed again and again. The account of the Passion occupies nearly a 3d of the record, and its shadows lie on some of the earliest pages of the Gospel (cf. chs. 2:20; 3:6). The way of discipleship is the way of cross-bearing (ch. 8:34 seq.), and implies a baptism of suffering and the drinking of a cup (ch. 10:38 seq.). No saying is more characteristic of the Marcan representation than the words of Jesus recorded in ch. 10:45.

In its entirety, it may be divided as follows: 1. Beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, including the ministry of John the Baptist and the baptism and temptation of Jesus (ch. 1:1-13). 2. The opening of the Galilean ministry, giving the place and the message, the call of the 1st 4 apostles, miracles in Capernaum and Galilee (ch. 1:14-45). 3. Christ's triumph over rising opposition, including the curing of the paralytic, Levi's feast and the discourse on fasting, and the Sabbath controversy (chs. 2:1 to 3:6). 4. Extension of Christ's work amid increasing opposition, including the description of the multitudes who followed him; the appointment of the Twelve; replies to the Pharisees; the visit of his mother and brethren; the parables of the Sower, the Seed Growing Secretly, and the Mustard Seed, with remarks; the great miracles of stilling the waves, the Gerasene demoniac, the woman with a bloody issue, and the raising of Jairus' daughter; the (2d) rejection at Nazareth; the sending out of the Twelve; Herod's inquiry about Jesus together with an account of the death of John the Baptist; the feeding of the 5,000; the walking on the sea; and Christ's denunciation of Pharisaic traditionalism (chs. 3:7 to 7:23). 5. A period of comparative retirement, embracing the later Galilean ministry (see GOSPEL), including: the healing of the Syrophenician's daughter in the borders of Tyre and Sidon and of a deaf-mute in Decapolis; the feeding of the 4,000; the refusal to give the Pharisees a sign and the warning of the disciples against them; healing of a blind man near Bethsaida, followed by incidents near Caesarea Philippi, including the prediction by Christ of his death, Peter's confession, etc., the transfiguration, the cure of the demoniac boy, a renewed prediction of Christ's death and, on returning to Capernaum, special instructions to the disciples (chs. 7:24 to 9:50). This period is specially complete in Mark. 6. Christ's closing ministry in Perea, including the question of the Pharisees about divorce; the blessing of the children; the rich young ruler; explanations to the disciples; the ascent to Jerusalem, including a 3d prediction of his death, the request of James and John, the healing of Bartimaeus (ch. 10). 7. The last week, including the triumphal entry; the blasting of the barren fig tree; the (2d) cleansing of the Temple; the visit of the deputation from the sanhedrin; the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen; the questions of the Pharisees and Herodians, of the Sadducees, and of the scribe (lawyer); Christ's question about the son of David; a brief report of his denunciations of the Pharisees and scribes (cf. Matt., ch. 23); the widow's gift; the discourse on the Mount of Olives; Judas' treachery and, in connection with it, the supper at Bethany; a brief account of the last evening with the disciples and the institution of the Lord's Supper; the agony in Gethsemane; the arrest; the trial of Jesus at night before the sanhedrin; Peter's denials; the trial before Pilate and the crucifixion; the burial; the announcement of Christ's resurrection to certain women by an angel seated in his empty tomb (chs. 11:1 to 16:8).

The last 12 verses of Mark's Gospel, as found in A.V. are not present in B and  $\aleph$ , the oldest MSS. of the N.T.; therefore they are believed by most scholars not to have formed the original close of the book. Hence in R.V. they are separated by a space from the preceding verses. They were certainly added at a very early time, perhaps at the beginning of the 2d century. They seem to have been formed in part out of the other Gospels and they truthfully describe the beliefs of the apostolic churches on the subjects with which they deal. Chapter 16:8, however, is too abrupt an ending. The original close must have been lost at a very early time, soon after the book was finished. Some have supposed that Mark was prevented by death or some other cause from finishing.

This Gospel was in general circulation among the Christians as early as the middle of the 2d century, and was included by Tatian in his Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Four Gospels, c. A.D. 170. Irenaeus, writing in the last quarter of the 2d century, repeatedly quotes it, and quotes it as Mark's; and, as others before him (such as Papias), declares Mark to have been Peter's disciple and interpreter. Thus ancient and trustworthy tradition represents the Gospel of Mark as in some degree connected with Peter's preaching about Christ. This relation to Peter is confirmed by the many vivid particulars which it contains, which seem to be due to the reminiscences of an eyewitness (e.g. chs. 1:40; 2:1-4; 3:5; 5:4-6; 6:39, 40; 7:34; 8:33; 10:21; 11:20); by its superiority to the other Gospels in those sections where Peter alone was an eyewitness or competent to give a full account (cf. the account of Peter's denials); and, as Eusebius noticed, by its silence regarding matters which reflect credit on Peter (Matt. 16:17-19; Luke 5:3-10). This reported dependence on Peter must not be pressed, however, to the exclusion of other sources of information; for Mark had abundant opportunities to learn from other eyewitnesses besides Peter, and from other members of the primitive Christian community, such as his kinsman Barnabas and Paul and the disciples who frequented his mother's house (Acts 12:12, 17). These sources of the Second Gospel circulated partly in oral form, partly in written (as the Passion narrative). Much of the material discloses an Aramaic coloring that points to its early currency on Palestinian soil. Tradition states that Mark wrote his Gospel at Rome, either shortly before or shortly after Peter's death. If so, it must be dated A.D. 65-68. But if Luke's Gospel was written prior to 63 (see LUKE), Mark must be dated still earlier, because Luke used Mark. Recent interpreters regard it as the Gospel for a persecuted Church (under Nero) called to a great missionary task, furnished with information as to the origins of the faith, with weapons for its defense and means for its world-wide dissemination.

Mark's Gospel was evidently written primarily for Gentiles. This appears, e.g., in his explanations of Palestinian places and Jewish customs and terms (chs. 3:17; 5:41; 7:3, 4, 11, 34; 12:42; 14:12; 15:22, 42, etc.). He uses also a good many Latin words in Greek form, which may indicate that his book was originally published, as tradition states, at Rome. Unlike Matthew, he says nothing of Christ's relation to the Mosaic Law, but few allusions to the fulfillment of prophecy are noted, and except in reporting Christ's words there is an almost total absence of quotation from the Old Testament. Ma'roth (mă'rōth) [bitterness, bitter fountains]. A town of Judah (Micah 1:12). Site unknown.

Mar'riage. Marriage is a divine institution, constituted at the beginning before the origin of human society. The Creator made man male and female, and ordained marriage as the indispensable condition of the continuance of the race (Gen. 1:27, 28). He implanted social affections and desires in man's nature. He made marriage an ennobling influence, powerfully contributing to the development of a complete life in man and woman. He declared it to be not good for man to be alone and provided a help meet for him (Gen. 2:18). Abstinence from marriage is commendable at the call of duty (Matt. 19:12; I Cor. 7:8, 26), but its ascetic prohibition is a sign of departure from the faith (I Tim. 4:3).

Monogamy is the divine ideal. The Creator constituted marriage as a union between one man and one woman (Gen. 2:18-24; Matt. 19:5; I Cor. 6:16). He preserves the number of males practically equal to the number of females.

Marriage is a permanent relation (Matt. 19:6). The Creator has indicated the permanence of the relation by making the growth of affection between husband and wife, as the years pass, to be a natural process, invariable under normal conditions. Moral ends require that the relation be permanent: the disciplining of husband and wife in obedience to the obligations which spring from their relations to each other, and the adequate training of children to obedience and virtue. It cannot be dissolved by any legitimate act of man. It is dissolved by death (Rom. 7:2, 3). It may be dissolved on account of adultery (Matt. 19:3-9). Protestants, following Paul, teach that it may be dissolved by willful, deliberate, final desertion (I Cor. 7:15). It is probable, however, that in those times desertion was accompanied by adulterous or marital consorting with another person. The marriage of persons divorced on improper grounds is forbidden (Matt. 5:32; 19:9; Mark 10:11 seq.; Luke 16:18; I Cor. 7:10 seq.). In the sight of God, a civil tribunal cannot annul a marriage; it declares whether the marriage has been sinfully annulled by one or both of the persons concerned.

Among the antediluvians, Adam, Cain, Noah, and his 3 sons appear each as the husband of 1 wife. But polygamy was already practiced, Lamech having 2 wives (Gen. 4:19); and the purity of marriages was impaired by men allowing themselves to be governed by low motives in the choice of wives (ch. 6:2). Polygamy was unwisely adopted by Abraham, when he thought that he must needs help God to fulfill his promise (Gen. 16:4). Isaac had 1 wife. Jacob took 2 wives and their maids. Moses, who was correcting abuses, not suddenly abolishing them, did not forbid polygamy, but discouraged it. He regulated what he found; but the record of the primitive period showed that the state of things among the Israelites was not the ordination of the Creator. Moses' service to the cause of matrimony consisted in setting a higher ideal by establishing the degrees of consanguinity and affinity within which marriage is proper (Lev., ch. 18), discouraging polygamy (Lev. 18:18; Deut. 17:17), securing the rights of inferior wives (Ex. 21:2-11; Deut. 21:10-17), restricting divorce (Deut. 22:19, 29; 24:1), and requiring purity in the married life (Ex. 20:14, 17; Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22). Polygamy continued to be practiced more or less by wealthy individuals after the time of Moses, as by Gideon, Elkanah, Saul, David, Solomon, Rehoboam, and others (Judg. 8:30; I Sam. 1:2; II Sam. 5:13; 12:8; 21:8; I Kings 11:3). The evils of polygamy are exhibited in Scripture by the record of the jealousies of the wives of Abraham and Elkanah (Gen. 16:6; I Sam. 1:6), and beautiful pictures are presented of the felicity of marriage between one man and one woman (I's. 128:3; Prov. 5:18; 31:10-29; Eccl. 9:9; cf. Eccles. 26:1-27).

In the family to which Abraham belonged marriage was permitted with a half-sister and with 2 sisters (Gen. 20:12; 29:26). Marriage with a full sister was not rare in Egypt, and an exception was made for Cambyases in Persia (Herod. iii. 31). Marriage with a half-sister by the same father was permitted at Athens, and with a half-sister by the same mother at Sparta. The Mosaic Law prohibited alliance with persons so closely related by blood as these and with others less near of kin (Lev. 18:6-18); but in case a man died childless, his brother took the widow (Deut. 25:5). This was called a levirate marriage. Such marriage was ordained, but it was not compulsory. The Roman law was not unlike the Hebrew. It declared marriages to be incestuous "when the parties were too nearly related by consanguinity—that is, by being of the same blood, as brother and sister; or by affinity—that is, by being connected through marriage, as father-in-law and daughter-in-law."

The selection of a wife for a young man devolved on his relatives, especially on his father (Gen. 21:21; 24; 38:6; II Esdras 9:47), though sometimes the son made known his preference and the father merely conducted the negotiations (Gen. 34:4, 8; Judg. 14:1-10). Only under extraordinary circumstances did the young man make the arrangements (Gen. 29:18). Likewise it was the consent of the maid's father and eldest brother that was sought, and it was not necessary to consult her (Gen. 24:51; 34:11). Occasionally a parent looked out an eligible husband for a daughter or offered her to a suitable person in marriage (Ex. 2:21; Josh. 15:17; Ruth 3:1, 2; I Sam. 18:27). Presents were given to the parents, and sometimes to the maiden (Gen. 24:22, 53; 29:18, 27; 34:12; I Sam. 18:25). Between betrothal and marriage all communication between the affianced parties was carried on through a friend deputed for the purpose and termed the friend of the bridegroom (John 3:29).

The marriage itself was a purely domestic affair, without definite religious services, though probably the espousal was ratified by an oath (Ezek. 16:8; Mal. 2:14). After the Exile it became customary to draw up and seal a written contract (Tobit 7:14). When the day appointed for the wedding arrived, the bride bathed (cf. Judith 10:3; probably also Eph. 5:26 seq.), put on white robes, often richly embroidered (Rev. 19:8; Ps. 45:13, 14), decked herself with jewels (Isa. 61:10; Rev. 21:2), fastened the indispensable bridal girdle about her waist (Isa. 3:24; 49:18; Jer. 2:32), covered herself with a veil (Gen. 24:65), and placed a garland on her head. The bridegroom, arrayed in his best attire, with a handsome headdress and a garland on his head (S. of Sol. 3:11; Isa. 61:10), set out from his home for the house of the bride's parents, attended by his friends (Judg. 14:11; Matt. 9:15), accompanied by musicians and singers and, if the procession moved at night, by persons bearing torches (I Macc. 9:39; Matt. 25:7; cf. Gen. 31:27; Jer. 7:34). Having received his bride, deeply veiled, from her parents with their blessing and the good wishes of friends (Gen. 24:59; Ruth 4:11; Tobit 7:13), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house with song, music, and dancing (Ps. 45:15; S. of Sol. 3:6-11; I Macc. 9:37). On the way back they were joined by maidens, friends of the bride and groom (Matt. 25:6). A feast was served at the house of the groom or of his parents (Matt. 22:1-10; John 2:1, 9); but if he lived at a great distance the feast was spread in the house of the bride's parents, at either their expense or the groom's (Gen. 29:22; Judg. 14:10; Tobit 8:19). The groom now associated with his bride for the first time. In the evening the bride was escorted to the nuptial chamber by her parents (Gen. 29:23; Judg. 15:1; Tobit 7:16, 17), and the groom by his companions or the bride's parents (Tobit 8:1). On the morrow the festivities were resumed, and continued for 1 or 2 weeks (Gen. 29:27; Judg. 14:12; Tobit 8:19, 20).

The spiritual relation between Jehovah and his people is figuratively spoken of as a marriage or betrothal (Isa. 62:4, 5; Hos. 2:19). The apostasy of God's people through idolatry or other form of sin is accordingly likened to infidelity on the part of a wife (Isa. 1:21; Jer. 3:1-20; Ezek., chs. 16; 23; Hos., ch. 2), and leads to divorce (Ps. 73:27; Jer. 2:20; Hos. 4:12). The figure is continued in the N.T.; Christ is the bridegroom (Matt. 9:15; John 3:29), and the Church is the bride (II Cor. 11:2; Rev. 19:7; 21:2, 9; 22:17). The love of Christ for the Church, his solicitude for her perfection, and his headship are held up as the standard for imitation by husbands and wives (Eph. 5:23-32).

Mar-se-na (mär-sē'nā) [cf. Avestan marsh-anā, forgetful man]. One of the 7 princes of Persia who were permitted to see the king's face (Esth. 1:14). See PRINCE.

Mars' (märz) Hill. See AREOPAGUS.

Mar'tha (mär'thá) [Aram., lady, mistress]. Sister of Mary and Lazarus of Bethany (John 11:1, 2). The 3 were tenderly attached to Jesus. Martha loved him and desired to make him comfortable and show him respect in her house. Mary gave evidence of a deeper appreciation by her hunger for the words of truth that fell from his lips; and when Martha would have him rebuke Mary for not assisting her to attend to his external wants, Jesus taught that he himself regarded the inward craving of his followers for spiritual fellowship with him as more essential than their concern for his external honor (Luke 10:38-42). Both sisters were sincere believers (John 11:21-32). The house where Jesus was received is called Martha's (Luke 10:38); and the supper which was given to him at Bethany, at which Lazarus was present and Martha again served, where Mary anointed his feet (John 12:1-3) was at the house of Simon the leper (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3). Accordingly it has been suggested that Martha may have been the wife or widow of Simon.

Mari'y (mâr'I) [Lat. Maria, from Gr. María, Mariam, from Heb. Miryâm. See MIRIAM]. Six women of the name mentioned in the New Testament. (1) Mary the (wife) of Clopas or Cleophas, a Mary so designated in John 19:25. "Wife," according to the idiom of the Greek language, is not found in the original Greek, but is properly supplied both by A.V. and R.V. Clopas of the R.V., Cleophas of the A.V., is apparently to be identified with Alphaeus (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15), the 2 names being variant forms of the same Aramaic original. He and Mary were thus the parents of the Apostle James the Less, who had also a brother Josés (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; Luke 24:10). Those who understand the Lord's "brethren" to have been his cousins on his mother's side suppose that this Mary was a sister of the Virgin, and that John (ch. 19:25) mentions only 3 women at the cross. But it is unlikely that 2 sisters should have had the same name, and other considerations make the cousin theory improbable; see BRETHREN OF THE LORD. In that case John mentions 4 women at the cross. One of them was Mary the wife of Clopas; but, beyond the fact that her husband and sons were, like herself, disciples of Jesus and that probably one of her sons was an apostle, we know nothing more of her. Besides being at the cross, Mary was one of the women who followed the body of Jesus to the tomb (Matt. 27:61), and on the 3d day took spices to the sepulcher, and to whom the risen Saviour appeared (Matt. 28:1; Mark 15:47; 16:1; Luke 24:10). See section 2 of this article; also ALPHAÆUS 1, JAMES 2.

2. Mary the Virgin; the Virgin Mary. All the authentic information about her comes from Scripture. We are told that, in the 6th month after the conception of John the Baptist, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to Nazareth, a city or village of Galilee, to a virgin named Mary, who was residing there and who was betrothed to a carpenter named Joseph (Luke 1:26, 27). Joseph is explicitly declared to have been a descendant of David. Mary is not so described; but many believe that she too was of Davidic lineage, because she was told that her child should receive "the throne of his father David," also because our Lord is said to have been of "the seed of David according to the flesh" (Rom. 1:3; II Tim. 2:8; cf. Acts 2:30), and again because, in the opinion of many scholars, the genealogy of Christ given by Luke (ch. 3:23-38) is through his mother, in which case Mary's father is supposed to have been Heli. However this may be, Gabriel hailed Mary as a highly favored one, and announced to her that she should have a son whose name she should call Jesus. "He," said the angel, "shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1:32, 33, R.V.). When Mary asked how this could be, since she was a virgin, she was told that it would be wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, "wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God" (Luke 1:35, R.V.). These expressions revealed to Mary that she was chosen to be the mother of Messiah, and with humble piety she accepted the honor which God was mysteriously to confer upon her. For her comfort she was informed by the angel that her kinswoman Elisabeth was also to become a mother, whereupon Mary hastened to the village of Judah where Zacharias and Elisabeth lived. At her coming Elisabeth was made aware of the honor intended for Mary, and broke out into an inspired song of praise. Thereupon Mary also gave voice to a hymn of thanksgiving ("The Magnificat," Luke 1:46-55). We learn from all this the profound piety and solemn joy with which these holy women contemplated the power and grace of God which was through their offspring to fulfill the ancient promises to Israel and bring salvation to the world. Mary remained under the protection of Elisabeth until just before the birth of John, when she returned to Nazareth. The cause of her condition was revealed in a dream to Joseph, who at first had thought of quietly putting her away from him (Matt. 1:18-21). He was directed to marry her and to call the name of the child Jesus, "for it is he that shall save his people from their sins." Joseph reverently obeyed. He "took unto him his wife; and knew her not till she had brought forth a son: and he called his name Jesus" (Matt. 1:24, 25, R.V.). By this marriage Mary was protected, her mysterious secret was guarded, and her child was born as the legal son of Joseph, and therefore through him heir of David.

The birth, however, took place at Bethlehem. A decree of Augustus "that all the world should be enrolled" (Luke 2:1, R.V.) was being carried out in Palestine, and compelled Joseph, being of Davidic descent, to repair to David's city to be enrolled. Mary accompanied him. Finding no room in the inn, or khan, they were compelled to lodge in a stable, perhaps, however, one that was then not being used by cattle. There Jesus was born, and his mother "wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger" (Luke 2:7). With reverent, trustful awe Mary heard the shepherds relate the vision of angels which they had seen and the song of peace which they had heard heralding the Saviour's birth. Of course, she did not know that her child was God made flesh. She only knew that he was to be Messiah, and with true piety she waited for God to make his mission clear. On the 40th day after the birth Mary went, with Joseph and Jesus, to Jerusalem to present the child to the Lord and to offer in the Temple the offering required by the Law (Lev., ch. 12) from women after childbirth. The fact that her offering is said to have been that required of poor people—a pair of turtledoves or 2 young pigeons—indicates the humble circumstances of the family. When, however, the parents brought in the child, they were met by the aged Simeon who rejoiced over the birth of Messiah, but foretold to Mary that she should have great sorrow because of what would happen to him (Luke 2:35). After this Joseph and Mary appear to have returned to Bethlehem and to have lived in a house (Matt. 2:11). There Mary received the Wise Men from the East who came to worship Jesus (Matt. 2:1-11). Shortly thereafter she fled with Joseph and the child to Egypt, and afterward by divine direction they returned to Nazareth. There she must have devoted herself especially to the rearing of the child of promise who had been committed to her care and of whose future she must have thought continually. One glimpse of Mary's character is given us when Jesus was 12 years old. She was in the habit piously of attending with Joseph the yearly passover (Luke 2:41), though this was not specifically required of Jewish women (Ex. 23:17). With like piety Joseph and Mary took Jesus with them, as soon as he reached the age when it was customary for children to attend, and his delay in the Temple and his words when his parents found him with the doctors were the occasion of increased awe to his parents. "His mother kept all these sayings in her heart" (Luke 2:51). Mary did not understand how great her child really was or how he was to fulfill his mission. It was hers reverently and trustfully to rear him for God's service, and this she did so long as he was under her. If the "brethren of the Lord" (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD) were, as is probable, the children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus, Mary was the mother of a large family. We read also of Christ's sisters (Mark 6:3). But nothing further is recorded of Mary until the beginning of Christ's public ministry. She then appears at the marriage in Cana (John 2:1-10). She evidently rejoiced in her son's assumption of Messianic office and fully believed in him. But she ventured improperly to direct his actions, and thus elicited from him a respectful but firm rebuke. Mary must understand that in his work she could share only as a follower. While as her son he gave her reverence, as the Messiah and Saviour he could only regard her as a disciple, needing as much as others the salvation he came to bring.

A similar truth was brought out on another occasion on which she appears (Matt. 12:46-50; Mark 3:31-35; Luke 8:19-21). While Jesus was teaching the multitudes, Mary with his brethren desired to see him. Perhaps they wished to restrain him from a course which seemed to be bringing upon him opposition and peril. His reply again declared that the spiritual bond between him and his disciples was more important than any human tie. "For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Matt. 12:50). While Christ pursued his ministry, Mary and his brethren appear to have still lived in Nazareth. As no mention is made of Joseph, it is natural to suppose that he had died. But at the crucifixion Mary appears with other women at the cross. Unlike his brethren (John 7:5) she had always believed in her son's Messiahship, and therefore it is not strange to find that she followed him on the last fatal journey to Jerusalem. With a mother's love, as well as with a disciple's sorrow, she beheld his crucifixion, and to her Jesus spoke in the hour of his suffering. He gave her to the care of his beloved disciple John, and "from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home" (John 19:25-27). After the ascension she was with the apostles in the upper room in Jerusalem (Acts 1:14), and this is the last notice of her in Scripture. We do not know the time or manner of her death. The tomb of the Virgin is shown in the valley of the Kidron, but there is no reason to believe in its genuineness. Later legends were busy with her name, but none contain trustworthy information. As presented in Scripture, she is simply a beautiful example of a devoted and pious mother.

3. Mary Magdalene. The designation given to this Mary (Matt. 27:56, 61; 28:1; Mark 15:40, 47; 16:1, 9; Luke 8:2; 24:10; John 19:25; 20:1, 18) doubtless indicates that she was a resident of Magdala, on the s. w. coast of the Sea of Galilee. Out of her Jesus had cast 7 devils (Mark 16:9; Luke 8:2), and she became one of his most devoted disciples. The old belief that she had been a woman of bad character, from which the current use of the word magdalen has arisen, rests merely on the fact that the first mention of her (Luke 8:2) follows closely upon the account of the sinful woman who anointed the Saviour's feet in a city of Galilee (Luke 7:36-50). This, however, is not sufficient proof, and we have no reason to identify her with the sinful woman, whose name has been withheld. What form her terrible malady had taken we do not know. She became a disciple during the early Galilean ministry, and was one of those who joined the little company of Christ's immediate followers, and ministered to him of her substance (Luke 8:1-3). She was one of the women at the cross (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40; John 19:25) and observed the Lord's burial (Matt. 27:61). Early on the 3d day she, with Mary the wife of Clopas and Salome, went to the sepulcher to anoint the body of Jesus (Mark 16:1). Finding the stone rolled away she quickly returned to the city and told Peter and John that the body of Jesus had been taken away (John 20:1, 2). Then, following the apostles, she returned again to the garden and lingered there after they had gone. To her first Jesus appeared (Mark 16:9; John 20:11-17), and she reported his resurrection to the other disciples (John 20:18). Nothing further is known of her history.

4. Mary of Bethany. A woman who, with her sister Martha, lived in "a certain village" (Luke 10:38 seq.) which John reveals to have been Bethany (John 11:1; 12:1 seq.), about a mile e. of the summit of the Mount of Olives. On the first occasion when Jesus is recorded to have visited their house (Luke 10:38-42), Mary appears as eager to receive his instruction. Martha requested Jesus to bid Mary help her in serving the entertainment, but he replied: "But one thing is needful: for Mary hath chosen the good part, which shall not be taken away from her" (Luke 10:42, R.V.). John (ch. 11) further relates that Mary had a brother named Lazarus whom the Lord raised from the dead. When Jesus reached the house, after Lazarus had been 4 days dead, Mary at first "still sat in the house" (John 11:20, R.V.), but afterward was summoned by Martha to meet the Lord who had called for her (v. 28). As Martha had done, Mary exclaimed, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," and the grief of the sisters deeply moved the sympathetic Saviour. Afterward, 6 days before his last passover (John 12:1), Jesus came to Bethany, and a supper was made in his honor in the house of Simon the leper (Mark 14:3). While it was in progress Mary brought an alabaster box of pure ointment, very costly, and, breaking the box, poured the ointment on the head of Jesus (ibid.), and anointed his feet, wiping them with her hair (John 12:3). It was an act of rare devotion, testifying both to her gratitude and to her sense of the high dignity of him whom she honored. Judas, and some others of the disciples, were disposed to find fault with the waste; but Jesus commended the act and declared that "whosoever the gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her" (Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9). He looked upon her act also as a loving, though doubtless unintentional, consecration of him to his approaching sacrifice (John 12:7, 8).

5. Mary the mother of Mark. The Christian woman in whose house the disciples had met to pray for the release of Peter, when he was imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, and to which Peter at once went when delivered by the angel (Acts 12:12). Her son was the author of our Second Gospel; see MARK. She was evidently in comfortable circumstances (v. 13), and her house is supposed to have been one of the principal meeting places of the early Jerusalem Christians. According to A.V. in Col. 4:10 she was the sister of Barnabas; but R.V. correctly translates "cousin" instead of "sister's son," and it does not appear whether Mark's relationship to Barnabas was on his father's or his mother's side. Nothing is told us of Mary's husband.

6. Mary of Rome. A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. 16:6). The A.V. reads 'who bestowed much labor on us," implying that Mary at one time had greatly assisted the apostle. The R.V., however, properly reads "who bestowed much labor on you." Mary had thus been an active worker in the Christian cause at Rome. Beyond this reference we know nothing of her.

Mas'a-loth (mās'ā-lōth). See MESALOTH.

Mas'chil (mās'kil) [attentive, intelligent, or rendering intelligent]. A Hebrew word occurring in the titles of Psalms 32; 42; 44; 45; 52; 53; 54; 55; 74; 78; 88; 89; 142. Although the meaning is obscure, it probably signifies a didactic psalm (cf. Ps. 32:8, "I will instruct," same root); or it may mean a meditation, a skillful psalm.

Mash (māsh). A branch of the Aramaeans (Gen. 10:23). Called in I Chron. 1:17 Meshech (the LXX has Mosoch in both places). This is due to its confusion by copyists with the more familiar name; or else, if the original text, it points to an intermingling of Japhetic and Semitic people in Meshech.

Ma'shal (mā'shāl). See MISHAL.

Ma'son. A workman skilled to hew and saw stones into shape for building purposes and erect walls (II Sam. 5:11; I Kings 7:9; I Chron. 22:2; II Chron. 24:12). The art made great progress among the ancient Egyptians; as the pyramids, built under Dyn. IV, and numerous temples show. The Hebrews served in brick and mortar while they were in bondage in Egypt (Ex. 1:11, 14); but there is no mention of their being employed in shaping and laying stones. In Solomon's time the Phoenicians had more skill in the art than the Hebrews, who as yet had not had occasion to erect great structures of stone, and Phoenician masons were accordingly hired to build the Temple and Solomon's palace. They managed blocks of stone 12 and 15 feet in length and even longer, and proportionately broad and high (I Kings 7:10). But they were doubtless Hebrew workmen who afterward erected walls and fortresses, built aqueducts and reservoirs, arches and bridges, and fashioned columns (II Chron. 33:14; Ezra 3:10; S. of Sol. 5:15; Jos. Antiq. xv. 11, 2). They also understood the use of the plummet (Amos 7:7; Zech. 4:10; Isa. 28:17).

Mas'pha (mās'fā). See MIZPEH 2 and 5.

Mas're-kah (mās'rē-kā) [perhaps, vineyard]. An Edomite city (Gen. 36:36; I Chron.

1:47); Jebel el-Mushrāk, about 22 miles s.s.w. of Ma'an.

Mas'sa (mās'ā) [a load, a burden]. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; I Chron. 1:30; cf. Prov. 30:1 and 31:1, R.V. marg.); generally identified with the Masani, a tribe of the Arabian desert near the Persian Gulf, n.e. of Dumah. The Assyrian inscriptions refer to Massa, Tema, and Nebaioth; cf. Gen. 25:13-15.

Mas'sah (mās'ā) [testing, temptation]. A name given by Moses to the place at Horeb where the smitten rock yielded water, because the Israelites there in unbelief put Jehovah to a test (Ex. 17:7; Ps. 95:8, 9, R.V.; and also Deut. 33:8, where the thought is expressed that Jehovah tested the fidelity of the Levites in the person of Moses). In Ex. 17:7 the place is called Meribah also; possibly so in the 2 other passages already cited, although there 2 distinct events and places may be in the writer's mind. The name Massah alone is used in Deut. 6:16; 9:22. Israel's rebelliousness against Jehovah soon after leaving Egypt (ch. 9:7), and apparently before reaching Horeb (v. 8), is dwelt upon; the event at Massah is mentioned in the same breath with similar events that occurred in the immediate vicinity of Horeb (v. 22). See MERIBAH 1.

Mat'tred (mā'trēd) [perhaps, expulsion]. The mother-in-law of Hadar, king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; I Chron. 1:50).

Mat'tri (mā'trī) [rainy]. A Benjamite family, from which sprang Kish and his son King Saul (I Sam. 10:21).

Mat'tan (māt'ān) [a gift]. 1. A priest of Baal slain before the altar of that god during the revolution which led to the death of Athaliah and the elevation of Joash to the throne of Judah (II Kings 11:18; II Chron. 23:17). 2. Father of Shephatiah (Jer. 38:1).

Mat'tuah (māt'ā-nā) [a gift]. One of the stations of the Israelites in or near the Moabite territory (Num. 21:18 seq.); el-Medei-yineh, at the wadies Wāleh and eth-Themed.

Mat'tan'iah (māt'ā-nī'ā) [gift of Jehovah]. 1. A singer, son of Heman, in David's time (I Chron. 25:4, 16).

2. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, and founder of a branch of the family (II Chron. 20:14). Probably he himself is mentioned in I Chron. 9:15, and Neh. 13:13; and the representative of the house in Neh. 12:8; cf. Ezra 2:41; Neh. 11:17, 22; 12:25.

3. A Levite descended from Asaph. He was one of those who aided King Hezekiah in his work of religious reformation (II Chron. 29:13).

4. A son of King Josiah. He was placed on the throne and his name was altered to Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 24:17); see ZEDEKIAH 4.

5-8. Four Hebrews, a son of Elam, a son of Zattu, a son of Pahath-moab, and a son of Bani, who were induced by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26, 27, 30, 37).

Mat'ta-thā (māt'ā-thā) [gift (of God)]. A son of Nathan and grandson of King David (Luke 3:31).

Mat'ta-thah (māt'ā-thā). See MATTATHAH.

Mat'tathi'as (māt'ā-thī'ās) [Greek form of Mattithiah, gift of Jehovah (see LXX, I Chron. 9:31; 25:3)]. 1 and 2. A name borne by 2 ancestors of Christ, separated from each other by 5 generations, who lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:25, 26).

3. A priest, founder of the Maccabee family (I Macc., ch. 2). See MACCABEE.

4. Son of Absalom, and a captain in the army of Jonathan Maccabaeus. He distinguished himself at the battle of Hazor by remaining at the side of Jonathan when all the other captains save one had fled (I Macc. 11:70). He was perhaps a brother of Jonathan, son of Absalom (ch. 13:11).

5. Son of Simon Maccabaeus. His father, his brother, and he were treacherously murdered by his brother-in-law in the castle of Dok (I Macc. 16:14-17). See JUDAS 5.

Mat'tat-tah (măt'ă-tă), in A.V. Mat'ta-thah [gift (of Jehovah)]. A son of Hashum, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

Mat'te-na'i (măt'ê-nă'I) [gift of Jehovah]. 1. A priest, head of the father's house Joiarib in the time of Joiakim (Neh. 12:19).

2 and 3. Two Hebrews, a son of Hashum and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:33, 37).

Mat'than (măt'thăn) [gift (of God)]. A near ancestor of Joseph and, in law, of Christ (Matt. 1:15).

Mat'that (măt'thăt) [gift (of God)]. Two ancestors of Christ: the one near, the other quite remote (Luke 3:24, 29).

Mat'thew (măth'ū) [Gr. Maththaios, Matthaios, from Heb. Matthyāh, gift of Jehovah]. A publican or taxgatherer, in the service either of the Roman or Herodian Government, stationed at Capernaum. While sitting at "the place of toll" (A.V., "the receipt of custom"), he was called by Jesus to become his follower and, leaving his business, he immediately obeyed (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). He was afterward appointed one of the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15). Mark and Luke give his name as Levi and state that his father was named Alphaeus. Either he had originally 2 names, as was not uncommon among the Jews, or he received the name Matthew when he became a Christian, as Simon did that of Peter. He is always called Matthew in the lists of apostles and as the author of our First Gospel. The acceptance by Jesus of a publican as a disciple evidently led others of the outcast classes to follow him and increased the opposition of the Pharisees. This appears at the feast which Matthew gave to Jesus soon after his conversion, when many "publicans and sinners" were present, and when, in answer to the criticism of the Pharisees, the Lord made the famous reply, "I am not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance" (Matt. 9:10-13; Mark 2:15-17; Luke 5:29-32). Matthew himself does not say that the feast was in his house (Matt. 9:10), but Mark (ch. 2:15) and Luke (ch. 5:29) do, and Luke adds that it was a great feast. Some have identified Matthew's father Alphaeus with the father of James the Less; but Matthew and James are not joined together in the lists of apostles as other pairs of brothers are. The identification is therefore to be rejected. Matthew appears for the last time in the N.T. among the apostles after Christ's resurrection (Acts 1:13). Tradition states that he first preached among the Jews, and from the character of his Gospel, this is not improbable.

The Gospel According to Matthew is the 1st of our 4 Gospels. Its contents may be arranged as follows:

1. The descent, birth, and infancy of the royal Messiah (chs. 1 and 2). The special object of this section is to set forth Jesus as the son of David and the Christ of prophecy.

2. Introduction to the public ministry of Christ (chs. 3:1 to 4:17), relating the preparatory work of the Baptist, the baptism and temptation of Jesus, and the latter's settlement in Capernaum in accordance with prophecy.

3. The Galilean ministry of Christ (chs. 4:18 to 9:35). This important section begins with Christ's call of the 4 leading disciples (ch. 4:18-22), and a summary description of his teaching and healing, and of his fame throughout Palestine (ch. 4:19-25). Then follows, as an example of his teaching, the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5 to 7), to which is appended a collection of incidents, mostly miracles, which illustrated his teaching (chs. 8:1 to 9:34).

4. The mission of the apostles (chs. 9:36 to 10:42), beginning with an account of Christ's compassion on the shepherdless people, his appointment of the Twelve, and his instructions to them.

5. Christ in conflict with increasing opposition (chs. 11:1 to 15:20), comprising the inquiry of the Baptist and Christ's discourse concerning John, together with other remarks occasioned by popular unbelief; the opposition of the Pharisees, beginning with the Sabbath controversy and culminating in the charge that Jesus was in league with Beelzebub, together with Christ's reply and his refusal to give them a sign; the visit of his mother and brethren; a collection of the parables of Jesus spoken at this time; his (2d) rejection at Nazareth; Herod's inquiry and the death of the Baptist; the feeding of the 5,000 and walking on the water; Christ's final rupture with the Pharisees in Galilee and his denunciation of their formalism.

6. Christ's retirement from Capernaum and instruction of his disciples (chs. 15:21 to 18:35), comprising the healing of the daughter of the woman of Canaan, the feeding of 4,000, refusal of a sign and warning against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, the confession and rebuke of Peter, Christ's first prediction of his death, his transfiguration and the cure of the demoniac boy; the return to Capernaum, the provision of tribute money, and instruction of the disciples concerning the humble, self-denying, loving, and forgiving spirit of true discipleship.

7. The closing ministry of Christ in Perea and Judea (chs. 19; 20), comprising instructions about divorce, blessing the children, the rich young ruler, the parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard, the ascent to Jerusalem, with another prediction of his death, the request of James and John, and the healing of two blind men at Jericho; cf. Bartimaeus, Mark 10:46-52.

8. The last week of Christ's ministry (chs. 21 to 28), comprising the triumphal entry and the cleansing of the Temple; the withering of the barren fig tree; the deputation from the sanhedrin; the parables of the Two Sons, the Wicked Husbandmen, and the Marriage of the King's Son; the questions of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and a lawyer, with Christ's question in reply concerning the son of David; woes against the scribes and Pharisees; the eschatological discourse on Olivet, followed by the parables of the Virgins and of the Talents and a description of the Last Judgment. Then follow the treachery of Judas, the last passover, the agony in Gethsemane, the arrest and trial of Jesus before the sanhedrin, Peter's denials, the remorse of Judas, the trial before Pilate, and the crucifixion and burial. The last chapter relates the appearance of Jesus to the women, the report of the Roman watch, and the gathering of Christ with his disciples on a mountain in Galilee, when he gave them the commission to preach his gospel to the world and promised to be always with them.

The arrangement of this Gospel is chronological only in general outline. In the 2d half, indeed, beginning with ch. 14:6, it follows with seldom a deviation what is probably the true order of events, but this is because that order naturally agreed with the Evangelist's object. This orderly arrangement is manifested in numerical groupings of 3, 5, and 7 units. There are 3 sets of 14 generations each in the genealogy of ch. 1. Three kinds of hypocritical ostentation are warned against in ch. 6—in connection with almsgiving, prayer, and fasting. Chapter 13 has 7 parables. Furthermore the author deliberately calls attention to 5 great discourses of our Lord by concluding each with a formula such as: "And it came to pass, when Jesus had finished these words" (chs. 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). Thus the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 5 to 7), the charge to the apostles (ch. 10), the parabolic teaching concerning the Kingdom of heaven (ch. 13), the teaching concerning the Church and Christian relationship (ch. 18), and that concerning the end of the age (ch. 24 seq.) are plainly marked by this formula as key sections in the structure of the Gospel. He sets forth Jesus as the royal Messiah, who brought about the fulfillment of law and prophecy, and established in the Church, by his redeeming work and spiritual teaching, the true Kingdom of God, which is meant to embrace all nations. The fulfillment of prophecy is frequently noted (chs. 1:22, 23; 2:5, 6, 15, 17, 18, 23; 3:3; 4:14-16; 8:17; 11:10; 12:17-21; 13:14, 15, 35; 21:4, 5; 26:24, 31, 56; 27:9, 35), and there are about a hundred quotations, more or less formal, from the O.T. While Matthew wrote from the Hebrew point of view, he brings out the destination of the gospel for the Gentiles (e.g., chs. 8:10-12; 10:18; 21:43; 22:9; 24:14; 28:19), represents the opposition to Christ of current Judaism (e.g., chs. 5:20-48; 6:5-18; 9:10-17; 12:1-13, 34; 15:1-20; 16:1-12; 19:3-9; 21:12-16; 23, etc.), and shows by his explanations of terms (chs. 1:23; 27:33), places (chs. 2:23; 4:13), Jewish beliefs (ch. 22:23) and customs (ch. 27:15), that he wrote not merely for Jews, but for all believers.

The question of authorship is no easy problem. There is a strong and consistent tradition in the Early Church that Matthew was the author. This tradition is confirmed: (1) by the conclusive evidence, furnished by the contents, that the writer of this Gospel was a Jewish Christian emancipated from Judaism; (2) by the improbability that so important a book would have been attributed to so obscure an apostle without good reason; (3) by the likelihood that a publican would keep records; (4) by the modest way in which the writer speaks of the feast given by Matthew to Jesus (ch. 9:10; cf. Luke 5:29).

On the other hand, many scholars feel that internal evidence makes it difficult to accept this tradition of the Early Church. Matthew reproduces about 90 per cent of the subject matter of Mark in language very largely identical with that of Mark. Now it is highly improbable that an apostle would have used as a major source the work of one who in all likelihood had not been an eyewitness of the ministry of Jesus. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, writing c. A.D. 140, may provide a key to this problem. Eusebius (H.E. iii. 39, 16) quotes him as saying, "Matthew collected the logia (sayings, or oracles) in the Hebrew language, and each one interpreted them as he was able." This brief sentence is probably to be interpreted as follows. The Apostle Matthew (c. A.D. 50) wrote down Jesus' sayings in Aramaic. These sayings, with a brief frame of historical narrative were translated into Greek and thus constituted the document that scholars designate by the symbol Q (for German Quelle, source). This document and material from Mark and other sources were woven into what is now our First Gospel. By this hypothesis, the name Matthew, originally attached to the Aramaic source of Q, was transferred to the whole work which had incorporated it.

The date of the completed Gospel is difficult to determine. Many modern scholars date it variously from shortly after A.D. 70 to c. 85, but conservative scholars generally assign it to a date just prior to the Fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The baptismal formula (Matt. 28:19), which has been regarded as evidence of a late date, is matched by a similar formula in a benediction (II Cor. 13:14); and the word church for an organized body (Matt. 18:17) was early used, being so employed by Stephen, Paul, and James (Acts 7:38; 20:28; James 5:14). The Fall of Jerusalem seems not to have occurred (Matt. 5:35; 24:16). The most ancient tradition, that of Irenaeus (c. A.D. 175), assigns it to the period when Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel in Rome (Haer. iii. 1, 1). The place of its composition is unknown; Jerusalem and Antioch in Syria have been suggested. The acquaintance with it shown by postapostolic writers in widely scattered localities proves that it obtained, as soon as it was published, general circulation.

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Mat-thi'as (mā-thi'ās) [probably a variant form of Mattathias, gift of Jehovah (see LXX, I Chron. 25:21, MS., A)]. One of those disciples who accompanied with the followers of Christ from the time of Christ's baptism and was a witness of the resurrection. He accordingly had qualifications for the apostleship. The question whether he or another disciple with similar qualifications should fill the place in the number of the Twelve made vacant by the treachery of Judas was submitted to God by prayer; and when lots were given, Matthias was chosen, and he was at once numbered with the apostles (Acts 1:21-26). Nothing more is known of his history.

Mat'ti-thi'ah (māt'i-thi'd) [gift of Jehovah]. 1. A Levite, son of the singer Jeduthun (I Chron. 25:3), and himself one of the musicians of the sanctuary who played the harp (ch. 15:18, 21). He was afterward made head of the 14th of the courses into which the musicians were divided by David (ch. 25:21).

2. A Levite of the sons of Korah, family of Kohath. He was the eldest son of Shallum, and was placed in charge over the things that were baked in pans (I Chron. 9:31).

3. A son of Nebo, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:43).

4. A priest or Levite who supported Ezra when he addressed the returned exiles regarding the Law (Neh. 8:4).

Mat'tock. An instrument for loosening the soil, shaped like a pickax or hoe with two blades in different planes, the cutting edge of one resembling that of an ax, and the other that of an adz. It is used specially for grubbing up the roots of trees. In the O.T. mattock is the rendering of: 1. Heb. mahāreshāh, cutting instrument, in I Sam. 13:20, 21. Mahāresheth, a similar word from the same root, occurs in v. 20, and is believed to denote the plowshare. Both of these implements were made of metal. 2. The Hebrew ma'dēr, dressing instrument. It was used in digging and dressing vineyards (Isa. 7:25).

In II Chron. 34:6 the Hebrew is believed to be corrupt, and for mattock of the A.V., the R.V. substitutes ruins (axes, in the margin).

Maul. The rendering of Heb. mēphīs, breaker, a weapon of war (Prov. 25:18).

Maz'za-roth (māz'ā-rōth) [mazzārōth]. A feature of the starry heavens (Job 38:32). The margin of both English versions interprets it as the signs of the zodiac, equivalent to Heb. mazzālōth (II Kings 23:5 marg.). The parallel passage, Job 9:9, suggests that the mazzārōth are a constellation of the s. sky, a cluster among the stars that are chambered in the s.

Mea'dow. 1. The rendering of Heb. āhū in A.V. of Gen. 41:2, 18. The word denotes reed grass or, as it is rendered in Job 8:11, flag.

2. The rendering of Heb. ma'āreh (Judg. 20:33, A.V.); see MAAREH-GEBA.

Me'ah (mē'ā) [a hundred]. A tower at Jerusalem not far from that of Hananeel and the sheep gate (Neh. 3:1; 12:39); R.V. Hammeah; here Ham- is the Hebrew definite article. See JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Meal Of'fer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Meals. The Israelites ate in the morning and in the evening (Ex. 16:12; I Kings 17:6; John 21:4, 5, 12). This custom did not forbid a morsel at other hours. Laborers partook of a light repast at noon (Ruth 2:14). Later the ascetic Essenes did with 2 meals, the 1st at the 5th hour or 11 o'clock in the morning, and the other in the evening (Jos. War ii. 8, 5). Among the stricter Jews of the time of Christ, the fast of the night was not broken by a meal on an ordinary day before 9 o'clock, which was the hour of prayer (Acts 2:15); and on the Sabbath food was not served before 12 o'clock, when the service in the synagogue was over (Jos. Life 54). The chief meal of the day took place in the evening (Jos. War i. 17, 4; Life 44; cf. Gen. 19:1-3; Ex. 12:18). Feasts were sometimes spread at noon by the Egyptians and Syrians (Gen. 43:16; I Kings 20:16).

As to the posture at meals, the ancient Hebrews, like the ancient Egyptians and Greeks and modern Arabs, were in the habit of sitting, probably on mats spread on the floor or ground. Reclining on couches came into use later (Esth. 1:6; 7:8; Ezek. 23:41; John 21:20). Three couches were ordinarily placed about a table, being arranged so as to form 3 sides of a square and leave the 4th side open for the admittance of servants with the dishes. The couches were designated highest, middle, and lowest respectively, the highest being to the right of the servants as they approached the table. Generally, only 3 persons occupied a couch, but occasionally 4 or 5. The body lay diagonally on the couch, the head being near the table and the feet stretched out toward the back of the couch. The left elbow rested on a cushion and supported the upper part of the body. The right arm remained free. The head of the person reclining in front of another rested on or near the breast of him who lay behind (John 13:23; 21:20). The 3 positions on each couch were also termed highest, middle, and lowest, the highest person being the one who had nobody at his back. The position of honor (Matt. 23:6, R.V.) was the highest place on the highest couch. Women took their meals with men, occasionally at least (Ruth 2:14; I Sam. 1:4; Job 1:4).

The Hebrews and Greeks, like the modern Arabs, washed their hands before eating (Matt. 26:23), since generally there was a common dish into which the hand of each was dipped. This custom became a ritual observance with the Pharisees, and as such was condemned by Christ (Mark 7:1-13). A blessing was asked before the meal by Samuel (I Sam. 9:13), by Christ (Matt. 14:19; 15:36; 26:26), and by the early Christians (Acts 27:35). It was also customary among the Jews in the time of Christ (cf. Jos. War ii. 8, 5). A piece of bread served as a spoon and was dipped into the bowl of grease or meat, or the thick soup or pottage was ladled with the hollow hand into a dish. Occasionally separate portions were served in the same manner to each (Ruth 2:14; I Sam. 1:4; John 13:26). Prayer after meals developed out of Deut. 8:10 (Jos. War ii. 8, 5).

At pretentious meals on festive occasions, when a large company of guests gathered about the table, greater ceremony was observed. It was courteous to receive the guest with a kiss (Luke 7:45), and indispensable to provide water for him to wash his feet and hands with (Gen. 18:4; 19:2; Luke 7:44; John 2:6). He came in his best attire, of course, and often with the hair, beard, feet, and sometimes clothes, perfumed (Amos 6:6; Wisd. of Sol. 2:7). Occasionally he was anointed at the house of the host (Luke 7:38; John 12:3). The participants at the feast sometimes wore a wreath on the head (Isa. 28:1; Wisd. of Sol. 2:7, 8; Jos. Antiq. xix. 9, 1). They were arranged according to rank (I Sam. 9:22; Luke 14:8; and so in Egypt, Gen. 43:33). Portions of food were placed before each (I Sam. 1:4), and the guest of honor received a larger or choicer share (chs. 1:5; 9:24; so in Egypt, Gen. 43:34). A ruler was sometimes appointed to preside at the feast, taste the viands, and direct the proceedings (Ecclus. 32:1, 2; John 2:9, 10). The banquet was rendered merrier by music (Isa. 5:12; Ecclus. 32:5, 6), singing (II Sam. 19:35; Amos 6:4-6), dancing (Matt. 14:6; Luke 15:25), and riddles (Judg. 14:12). These customs receive illustration from the manner of feasts among the Greeks. The guests were apt to be placed according to rank, and the guest of honor received the choicest food (Herod. vi. 57; Homer Iliad vii. 321). At the conclusion of the meal garlands and various kinds of perfumes were given to the guests, and wine was served. Ordinarily a governor, chosen from among the company (Xen. Anabasis vi. 1, 30), presided. His command was law. He tasted the food and drink before they were placed on the table, directed the servants, fixed the proportion in which the wine and water were mixed, and determined the quantity which each of the company should drink. He also proposed the amusements. The pleasure was heightened by songs, and by the spectacle of dancing (Plato Sympos. ii., Leges 671; Xen. Anabasis vi. 1, 3-13).

A gruesome custom existed among the Egyptians, according to Herodotus (ii. 78). At the banquets of the wealthy the image of a dead body in a coffin was carried round and shown to each of the company with the remark: "Look upon this, then drink and enjoy yourself; for when dead you will be like this."

Mea'rah (mé-ā'rá) [a cave]. A place near Sidon (Josh. 13:4); commonly, but without certainty, identified with a district of caves, on the top of Lebanon, e. of Sidon, known as Mughār Jezzīn or caves of Jezzīn. Conder suggests Mogheiriyeh, 6 miles n.e. of Sidon.

Meas'ure.

I. MEASURES OF LENGTH.

The unit was the cubit, 18 inches or more; see CUBIT.

- 4 fingers = 1 handbreadth
- 3 handbreadths = 1 span
- 2 spans = 1 cubit

The finger, accordingly, was  $\frac{3}{4}$  inch.

In the Greco-Roman period distance was measured by miles and stades. 5,000 Roman feet = 1 Roman mile = about 1,482 meters = about 4,860 English feet. The Roman mile equaled about .92 of an English mile. The stadium (plural stadia; Luke 24:13, furlong) in the race course at Olympia equaled 630.8 English feet; the Attic and the Roman stadium measured 607 English feet.

II. MEASURE OF AREA.

In most countries it was the custom to state land area in terms of that which a yoke of oxen could plough in a day. A second ancient measure was the amount of seed required to sow an area. Acre is the rendering of Heb. šemed, yoke of oxen (I Sam. 14:14; Isa. 5:10). The Roman actus (furrow) was 120 Roman feet in length, and the unit of Roman land measure was the square actus. The jugerum (yokeland) was 2 actus long and 1 wide, i.e., it consisted of 2 square actus or .622 acre.

III. MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

Our knowledge of ancient measures is not exact, and there were variations in the standards at different periods. The equivalents in U.S. values given below are to be understood as representing merely approximate values. The unit was the ephah for dry substances and the bath for liquids, the ephah and the bath being of equal capacity (Ezek. 45:11), and containing 1.05 bushels, U. S. dry measure, or 9.8 gallons, U. S. wine measure. See BATH; EPHAH, I.

Liquid Measure

- 12 logs = 1 hin
- 6 hins = 1 bath
- 10 baths = 1 homer, or cor (Ezek. 45:14)

The log, accordingly, contained .54 quart, and the hin 1.62 gallons, U. S. measure. A 3d part, Heb. šālīsh (Ps. 80:5; Isa. 40:12, rendered measure) was probably the 3d of an ephah, and hence corresponded to a seah. The Greek measure metrētēs (John 2:6, rendered firkin) contained in Athens 39 liters or 10.3 U. S. gallons.

Dry Measure

- 4 logs = 1 kab
- 6 kabs = 1 seah
- 3 seahs or measures } = 1 ephah (Ex. 16:36; Num. 15:4, LXX)
- or
- 10 omers or tenth parts } = 1 ephah (Ex. 16:36; Num. 15:4, LXX)
- 10 ephahs = 1 homer (Ezek. 45:11)

The kab was equivalent to 1.86 quarts, U. S. measure, and the seah to 1.4 pecks, U. S. measure. The homer consisted of 10.48 U. S. bushels. The Greek choinix (Rev. 6:6, rendered measure) is estimated at 1.08 liters or .98 quart. The Roman modius (Matt. 5:15, rendered bushel) contained .96 peck, or 7.68 U. S. dry quarts.

Meat Offering. See OFFERINGS.

Me-bun'nai (mê-būn'ī) [built]. A Hushathite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:27). The name is probably to be read Sibbecai, in accordance with ch. 21:18 and I Chron. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11.

Me-che'rath-ite (mê-kē'rāth-it). A person related by birth or residence to Mecherah (I Chron. 11:36). No person or place called Mecherah is known; cf. Maacathite in II Sam. 23:34.

Me-co'nah (mê-kō'nā), in A.V. Me-ko'nah [foundation]. A town in the territory of Judah (Neh. 11:28), named in connection with Ziklag and other towns of the extreme s.

Me'dad (mē'dād) [beloved, friend]. A man who, though not present at the tabernacle when the Spirit was imparted to the elders, yet received the gift (Num. 11:26-29). See ELIAD.

Me'dan (mē'dān). A tribe descended from Abraham and Keturah and mentioned in connection with Midian (Gen. 25:2; I Chron. 1:32). Wetzstein observes that the Arabian geographer Yakut mentions Wadi Medān near the ruined town of Dedān (cf. Gen. 25:3). Hommel suggests it is Bedan in n.w. Arabia, with which may be compared Badanatha of Pliny and the Badana who were conquered by Tiglath-pileser III.

Mede (mēd), in A.V. once Me'di'an (Dan. 5:31). A person belonging to the Median nationality; a native or an inhabitant of Media (II Kings 17:6; Esth. 1:19; Isa. 13:17; Dan. 5:28, 31).

Med'e-ba (mēd'ē-bā), in I Maccabees Med'a-ba (mēd'ā-bā). An old Moabite town mentioned with Heshbon and Dibon in Num. 21:30. It was allotted to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:9, 16). In the war of Ammon with Israel, in the reign of David, an Aramaean army hired by the Ammonites marched hither (I Chron. 19:7); see RABBAH I. The town reverted to Moab (Moabite Stone, 30, see MOABITE STONE; Isa. 15:2). John Maccabaeus was seized and slain here by sons of Jambri or Ambri, a powerful family of the town. The act was revenged by his brothers Jonathan and Simon (I Macc. 9:36-42; Jos. Antiq. xiii, 1, 2, 4). John Hyrcanus took the town after a siege lasting nearly 6 months (Jos. Antiq. xiii, 9, 1). The ruins today are called Mādabā and are situated about 16 miles e. by s. of the mouth of the Jordan and 6 to the s. of Heshbon. They are on an eminence, from which the city extended e. into the fertile plain. There are remains of a city wall, and of churches and other buildings, which date mainly from Christian times. Outside the walls are the remains of a fine tank or reservoir 108 yards by 103 yards; it was 12 feet deep, but is now dry.

Me'di'a (mē'dī-ā). A country in Asia lying e. of the Zagros Mountains, s. of the Caspian Sea, w. of Parthia, and n. of Elam. Its length was about 600 miles, its breadth about 250, and its area about 150,000 square miles. But when the empire was at the greatest it extended beyond these limits, especially in the n.w. A great part of Media proper was a tableland 3,600 feet high. The rest consisted of 7 parallel mountain chains running from the n.w. to the s.e., with fertile and well-watered valleys between. The pasture was excellent, and the country was noted for its horses. The aborigines were conquered by an Indo-European people, the Madai of Gen. 10:2 (cf. Herod. vii, 62).

The history of Media begins to be known in the 9th century B.C. The name of the Medes is met for the 1st time in the inscriptions of Shalmaneser III of Assyria who c.

835 invaded their land; 27 petty kings of Parsua land paid him tribute. These invasions were continued by Shamshi-Adad (825-812) and by Adad-Nirari III (812-782); the latter made his expeditions against Media in 801, 795, 790, and 787. Tiglath-pileser III in 737 invaded and annexed districts of Media. When Sargon captured Samaria, 722 B.C., he placed Israelites in the cities of the Medes (II Kings 17:6; 18:11). About 710 the Medes themselves were more thoroughly conquered by Sargon, who exacted from them a tribute of the fine horses for which Media was celebrated. Sennacherib also boasts of tribute received from Media, and Esarhaddon placed governors in the country. In all this there is no trace of the Medes' forming a united nation under one king (contrary to Herod. i. 96 seq.). Under Phraortes, 674-653 B.C., Media became a formidable power. About 625 his son Cyaxares allied himself with Nabopolassar of Babylon, besieged and captured Nineveh, and terminated the Assyrian Empire (cf. Jos. Antiq. x. 5, 1). The victors divided the spoil between them, the share of Cyaxares being Assyria proper and the countries dependent on it toward the n. and n.w. The marriage of Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, with Amyitis (Amuheia, Amuhia), daughter of Cyaxares, cemented the alliance between Babylonia and Media, and greatly strengthened both monarchies. Cyaxares (652-612) was succeeded by Arbaces (612-585). Astyages, son of Cyaxares, reigned from 584 to 550; in the year 550 the Persians, whose country lay s. and s.e. of Media, successfully rebelled, and Cyrus, king of Anshan, became king of Media and Persia. The conquerors and the conquered were both of the fine Aryan race, and they became a dual nation, Medo-Persia. In 330 B.C. Media became a part of Alexander's empire. After this conqueror's death it was united to Syria (I Macc. 6:56), and later it formed a part of the Parthian Empire.

In the Hebrew Scriptures the Medes are introduced as one of the nationalities which should take part in the capture of Babylon (Isa. 13:17 seq.; cf. also Jer. 51:11, 28); and Elam and Media are named as the 2 countries from which the conquerors of Babylon should come (Isa. 21:2, 9). On the capture of the great city by the Medo-Persians under Cyrus in 539, Darius the Mede took the kingdom of Babylon (Dan. 5:31; cf. v. 28). The Median Empire is the 2d kingdom (Dan. 2:39), the bear (ch. 7:5); the two-horned ram (ch. 8:3-7, 20) is the symbol of Media and Persia. One horn was higher than the other, and the higher came up last (v. 3); in other words, the Median power came first, but the Persian, which followed, surpassed it in strength.

Me'di-an (mē'dī-ān). See MEDE.

Med'i-cine. Egypt was early renowned for medical knowledge and skill. Cyrus of Persia sent to Egypt for an oculist, and Darius had Egyptian physicians at Susa (Herod. iii. 1, 129). For each disease there was a practitioner (Herod. ii. 84). They embalmed (Gen. 50:2); they treated diseases of the eye and feet (Herod. iii. 1, 129); women practiced midwifery (Ex. 1:15). They had many medicines (Jer. 46:11). Hammurabi fixed the physicians' fees, which varied according to the social rank of the patient. Bronze lancets were used in performing operations. Surgeons must have had considerable skill, since they operated upon the eyes for cataracts. In Greece the physicians of Crotona enjoyed the highest reputation, while those of Cyrene in Africa stood next (Herod. iii. 131).

The physician and his coadjutor the apothecary are mentioned in the writings of the Hebrews, beginning as early as the Exodus from Egypt (II Chron. 16:12; Jer. 8:22; Matt. 9:12; Mark 5:26; Jos. War ii. 8, 6; and Ex. 30:35; Neh. 3:8; Eccl. 10:1; Ecclus. 38:8). The means and medicines which they employed for effecting cures were bandages (Isa. 1:6), applications of oil and of oil mingled with wine, and baths of oil (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34; James 5:14; Jos. War i. 33, 5), salves and poultices (II Kings 20:7; Jer. 8:22), roots and leaves (Ezek. 47:12; Jos. War ii. 8, 6), and wine (I Tim. 5:23). "The Lord created medicines out of the earth; and a prudent man will have no disgust at them" (Ecclus. 38:4).

Med'ter-ra'ne-an (mē'dī-tē-rā'nē-ān) Sea. The sea which lies between Europe and Africa. In Scripture it is referred to simply as the sea, since it was the chief one in the current thought of the Hebrews (Num. 13:29; Acts 10:6); or it is called the great sea (Num. 34:6; Josh. 15:47), or the hinder or western sea (Deut. 11:24; Joel 2:20; in A.V. utmost and uttermost), or the sea of the Philistines (Ex. 23:31). Its length is 2,000 miles, and its narrowest part is between Sicily and the African coast, where it is only 79 miles in width. In O.T. times the Phoenician navigators were acquainted with it in its entire extent from Syria to the Straits of Gibraltar, or the Pillars of Hercules.

Meg'id'do (mē-gid'dō), once Meg'id'don (mē-gid'dōn) (Zech. 12:11). An important town in Palestine, settled c. 3500 B.C.; it is mentioned as captured by Thothmes III of Egypt c. 1479 B.C. The site has now been cleared to bedrock. Many of its first inhabitants lived in caves. A pavement of the last half of the 4th millennium has been found. The city wall of colossal masonry was built about 2500 B.C.; it had an original width of 13 feet, which subsequently was doubled. When found it still had a height of 11½ feet (cf. Deut. 1:28).

When the Israelites entered Canaan, Megiddo had a native king, who was slain by Joshua (Josh. 12:21). It was within the limits of the tribe of Issachar; but was assigned to the Manassites, who, however, failed to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (ch. 17:11; Judg. 1:27; I Chron. 7:29). It had waters, doubtless some stream, in its vicinity (Judg. 5:19), and was not far from Taanach and Beth-shean (ch. 1:27; I Kings 4:12). Solomon strengthened its fortifications (chs. 9:15-19; 10:26). Archaeological excavations have shown that Solomon had built at Megiddo well-constructed stables with cement floors for at least 400, and perhaps many more, horses. Ahaziah, king of Judah, wounded by the partisans of Jehu, fled to Megiddo, and died there (II Kings 9:27). In the plain near the city the battle was fought between Necho and Josiah, in which the latter was killed (ch. 23:29; II Chron. 35:22; I Esdras 1:29). A great mourning for the death of the good king took place (II Chron. 35:25; Zech. 12:11). The name Megiddo enters into the composition of Har-magedon (Armageddon, q.v.). Robinson, and 500 years before him Moses hap-Parchi, considered Megiddo to have been at el-Lejjūn, on the chief tributary of the Kishon, about 9 miles w. slightly n. of Jezreel. The site, however, has been located at Tell el-Mutesellim, less than a mile n. of el-Lejjūn. Recent excavation has shown that the citadel crowned the height marked by Tell el-Mutesellim; while the camp of the legion, which the Romans stationed at Megiddo, stood 5 minutes' walk distant at the hamlet known as el-Lejjūn, which perpetuates Lat. legio (legion) and where bricks have been found bearing the stamp of the 6th legion. The place had great strategic importance, since it commanded the pass through the mountains between the plains of Sharon and Esdraelon.

Me-gil'loth (mê-gil'ôth) [scrolls]. See CANON, OLD TESTAMENT.

Me-het'a-bel (mê-hêt'â-bêl), in A.V. once Me-het'a-beel (mê-hêt'â-bêl) (Neh. 6:10) [God benefits]. 1. The wife of Hadar, king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chron. 1:50).

2. Father of a certain Delaiah (Neh. 6:10).

Me-hi'da (mê-hi'dâ). Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:43, 52).

Me'hîr (mê'hêr) [price, hire]. A man of Judah (1 Chron. 4:11).

Me-ho'la-thite (mê-hô'lâ-thît). A native or inhabitant of a place called Meholah (1 Sam. 18:19); perhaps Abel-meholah, Elisha's native village.

Me-hu'ael (mê-hû'jâ-êl). Son of Irad, and father of Methushael, of the race of Cain (Gen. 4:18).

Me-hu'man (mê-hû'mân) [trusty, eunuch; Pu'al participle based on Aram. mêhēman (Haph'el passive participle), reliable]. One of the 7 chamberlains who served in the presence of King Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10). See ABAGTHA.

Me-hu'nim (mê-hû'nîm), Me-hu'nîms (mê-hû'nîmz). See MEUNIM.

Me'jar'kon (mê'jâr'kôn) [waters of yellow color]. A spot in the territory of Dan near Joppa (Josh. 19:46). A place on the river 'Aujâh has been suggested. The river flows from a swamp, through canes, willows, rushes, and grass, and then in a deeply hollowed channel, whence it carries away vegetable soil enough to render the water yellow. The stream is never dry, and in winter is unfordable. It falls into the Mediterranean, 3¼ miles n. of Joppa.

Me-ko'nah (mê-kô'nâ). See MECONAH.

Me'a-ti'ah (mêl'â-tî'â) [Jehovah has set free]. A Gibeonite who helped to rebuild part of the wall around Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7).

Me'ehi (mêl'kî) [N.T. Gr., probably contraction of Malchijah (q.v.)]. A name borne by two ancestors of Christ who lived, the one before, the other after, the time of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:24, 28).

Me-chi'ah (mêl-kî'â). See MALCHIJAHA.

Me-chis'e-dec (mêl-kîz'ê-dêk). See MELCHIZEDEK.

Me-chi-shu'a (mêl'kî-shô'â). See MALCHISHUA.

Me-chiz'e-dek (mêl-kîz'ê-dêk), in A.V. of N.T. Me-chis'e-dec [king of righteousness or probably originally, the (divine) king is righteousness, cf. Ps. 4:2]. King of Salem and priest of the Most High God (Gen. 14:18 seq.). By Salem, Jerusalem is probably meant; for: 1. The city was in existence, bore the name of Jerusalem, and was under a king before the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites. 2. The name Jerusalem means city or, to the Hebrew ear, foundation of peace or safety, so that Salem is an appropriate abbreviation. 3. Salem is used as the name of Jerusalem in Ps. 76:2. 4. The comparison of David's Lord with Melchizedek in Ps. 110:4 appears most apt if Melchizedek was king of the same city as David. 5. Jerusalem is on the route from Hobah and Damascus to Hebron, whither Abraham was going.

Melchizedek, as described in Heb. 5:10; 6:20; ch. 7, was without father, without mother, without genealogy. This statement means that his pedigree is not recorded (cf. Ezra 2:59, 62). This mode of expression is ancient. Thus Urukagina, king of Lagash (c.

2450 B.C.), who is famous for his economic reforms, said that he had neither father nor mother, but that the god Ningirsu appointed him; he probably was a usurper. Melchizedek is further described as having neither beginning of days nor end of life, of whom it is testified that he lives. He suddenly emerges from the unknown and as suddenly disappears; it is not known whence he came or whither he went; neither birth nor death is assigned to him; he is a type of undying priesthood.

Melchizedek was priest of God Most High. 'êl 'elyôn appears late among the Phoenicians as a title of Saturn, the begetter of heaven and earth. If 'êl 'elyôn is not in Melchizedek's conception the absolutely only God, he is the highest, the God of the gods; a lofty idea, even though not a pure monotheism. Melchizedek came forth from his royal city to welcome the returning benefactor of the peoples of Canaan; and Abraham recognized him as a priest of the true God and publicly testified to sharing the same or a kindred faith by paying tithes to him who was representative of God Most High, to the priest who had ascribed the victory to the Creator of heaven and earth (cf. Acts 10:35).

The author of The Epistle to the Hebrews shows how great a personage Melchizedek was, to whom even Abraham, and through him virtually Levi, paid tithes, thus admitting their inferiority. When thus our Lord was made a high priest after the order of Melchizedek, he held a higher office than the Aaronic priesthood.

Me'lea (mê'lê-â). An ancestor of Christ, who lived shortly after David (Luke 3:31).

Me'lech (mê'lêk) [a king]. A son of Micah, a descendant of Saul and Jonathan (1 Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

Mel'icu (mêl'î-kû). See MALLUCH 2.

Mel'ita (mêl'î-tâ). The island where Paul was shipwrecked (Acts 28:1). Two islands bore this name in ancient times. One, now called Meleda, lies in the Adriatic Sea off the coast of Dalmatia; the other is now known as Malta. The latter is now probably universally believed to be the island where the ship of Paul was wrecked. This opinion is strongly confirmed by the fact that Mr. Smith, of Jordanhill, who was accustomed to sail in a yacht on the Mediterranean, investigated first the direction from which the wind Euroclydon or Euraquilo blew, then the course in which the ship would drift, and her probable rate of progress while she lay to under storm sails. The result was that he found she would reach Malta just about the time which the narrative in The Acts requires. The vessel had been driven to and fro in the (sea of) Adria (Acts 27:27); see ADRIA. The traditional site of the shipwreck is St. Paul's Bay, on the n.e. coast of the island. In The Acts the inhabitants of the island are called barbarians because they were neither Greeks nor Romans.

Mel'on. A succulent plant and its edible fruit, in Hebrew 'abattiah, which the Hebrews ate when in Egypt (Num. 11:5). Melons of all sorts were cultivated in Egypt, among which was the watermelon (Citrullus vulgaris).

Mel'zar (mêl'zâr) [from Akkad. maššar, watch, sentry]. A man whom the chief of the eunuchs set over Daniel and his companions (Dan. 1:11, 16, A.V.). But in Hebrew it has the article before it; the R.V., J.V., and the margin of the A.V. therefore more properly translate it steward.

Mem (mêm). The 13th letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from which is derived Gr.

mu (m), whence Latin and English m. It stands at the head of the 13th section of Ps. 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Mem'phis (mēm'fīs) [Gr. Memphis, from Coptic (Sahidic) Mēnphe, (Bohairic) Memphī, from Egyptian Mn-nfr, good permanence (the name of the pyramids of Pepi II)]. An important Egyptian city, said by Herodotus to have been built by Menes, the first historical king of Egypt, on land reclaimed by him from the Nile. It stood in the plain on the w. side of the Nile, about 10 miles above the apex of the delta. It became the metropolis and capital of Lower Egypt, and the 3d, the 4th, the 5th, the 7th, and the 8th dynasties were considered Memphite by Manetho. The deity specially worshiped in the city was Ptah. Memphis remained a flourishing city even after the capital was transferred to Thebes, and did not lose its importance until Alexandria was founded. To the Hebrews Memphis was known as Noph (Isa. 19:13, A.V.) and Moph (Heb. text Hos. 9:6). After the fall of Jerusalem and murder of Gedaliah, the Jews left in the land fled to Egypt, and some of them settled at Memphis (Jer. 44:1). Judgment was threatened against the city by Jeremiah and Ezekiel (Jer. 46:19; cf. also chs. 2:16 and 46:14; Ezek. 30:13, 16; cf. also Isa. 19:13; Hos. 9:6). A considerable part of Memphis existed in the Middle Ages, but materials from it were continually carried away to be used for building purposes in Cairo. Now it is all but gone, 2 Arab villages occupying its site. But 20 pyramids, which constituted its necropolis, and the celebrated sphinx present the most impressive memorials of its former greatness.

Mem-u'can (mē-mū'kǎn) [perhaps from Old Pers. magav, Magian]. One of the 7 princes of Persia and Media at the court of Ahasuerus who saw the king's face. Memucan's counsel was adverse to Vashti (Esth. 1:14, 16, 21).

Men'a-hem (mēn'ā-hēm) [comforter]. A son of Gadi who, when the news reached Tirzah that Shallum had murdered King Zechariah, went to Samaria, slew Shallum, and reigned in his stead (II Kings 15:14). The town of Tiphshah refused to admit him within its gates, so he captured it, and perpetrated cruelties on the inhabitants (v. 16). His throne was unsteady, and when Tiglath-pileser III, king of Assyria, invaded the land, Menahem purchased exemption from devastation for his realm and support for his own tottering throne by the payment of 1,000 talents of silver. The money was raised by a tax on the wealthiest men in Israel, who had to pay 50 shekels each. There must, therefore, have been more than 60,000 Israelites able to contribute this amount under compulsion. Tiglath-pileser, as recorded in the Assyrian sculptures, claims Menahem of Samaria as one of his tributaries. In religion the Israelite king adhered to the calf worship of Jeroboam I. He reigned 10 years, from about 744 to 735 B.C. inclusive, and was succeeded on the throne of Israel by his son Pekahiah (II Kings 15:17, 22).

Me'nān (mē'nān). See MENNA.

Me'ne (mē'nē). The 1st word of the Aramaic inscription written by a hand on the wall at Belshazzar's feast: MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (Dan. 5:25), rendered in the margin of R.V., "Numbered, numbered, weighed, and divisions." These words appear in Theodotion as three in number: manē thekel phares, with which agrees the Vulgate: mane thecel phares. From this and from PERES (v. 28) it may be inferred that the original Aramaic text was mēnē, tekel, perēs. Mēnē is a passive participle of the Pe'al; tekel and peris (passive participles, Pe'al) accordingly are vocalized to conform to mēnē. The inscription therefore means, "Numbered, weighed, divided." It seems probable, however, that they were understood as nominal forms, for Josephus (Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 3) renders, "Number, weight, fragment." The repeated MENE (mēnē) and UPHARSIN (ūpharsin) accordingly are secondary. Daniel's interpretation follows (Dan. 5:26-28): "God hath numbered thy kingdom and brought it to an end," or transferred it; "thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting." In the case of UPHARSIN, ū is the conjunction and and pharsin is the plural of perēs. In the interpretation of this word, the singular, PERES, is used (v. 28): "Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians." With a play upon pāras (Persia, Persians) a double meaning is given to the mystic word.

Professor James A. Montgomery says: "The terms may have been actual language of the countinghouse or of the law, used of the settling of a bargain, winding up of a contract, settling a bankrupt's affairs, or the like." Another interpretation of mēnē, tekel, perēs is that the words represent a series of money values: mina, shekel, half mina. There were two difficulties in reading the inscription: first, intelligent vocalization, since the consonants alone were written and the vowels were not supplied in Aramaic script; secondly, the correct interpretation of the words after they had been correctly pronounced.

Me'nī (mē'nī) [Heb. mānī, fate, destiny; cf. Arab. manīyyah, which has same meaning. MENE (Dan. 5:25) is from the same root]. The name of the god of destiny, whom idolatrous Hebrews worshiped (Isa. 65:11 margin).

Men'na (mēn'nā), in A.V. Me'nān (mē'nān). An ancestor of Christ, who lived shortly after the time of David (Luke 3:31).

Me-nu'hoth (mē-nū'hōth) [the resting places]. A place, if the present Hebrew text is correct, of which half the inhabitants were descended through Shobal from Caleb of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:52, R.V.). The name, if vocalized as in the present Hebrew text, would not give rise to the gentile adjective of v. 54, which is rendered Manahathites. Perhaps, therefore, Menuhoth should be read Manahath (q.v.).

Me-on'e-nim (mē-ōn'ē-nīm) [augurs]. The augurs' oak or terebinth stood near Shechem (Judg. 9:37; not plain, as in A.V.). See MOREH 1.

Me-on'o-thai (mē-ōn'ō-thī) [my habitations]. A man of Judah, the father of the inhabitants of Ophrah (I Chron. 4:14).

Meph'a-ath (mēf'ā-āth) [splendor]. A town of the Reubenites (Josh. 13:18), given to the Merarite Levites (ch. 21:37; I Chron. 6:79). In Jeremiah's time it was in the hands of the Moabites (Jer. 48:21). Probably at Tell Jawa, about 6 miles s. of 'Ammān.

Me-phl'b'o's-sheth (mē-fīb'ō-shēth) [one who scatters or disperses shame]. 1. Son of King Saul by Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah. He was executed at the instance of the Gibeonites (II Sam. 21:8, 9).

2. The son of Jonathan. He was 5 years old when the tidings came of his father's and his grandfather's death at Gilboa. Under the influence of panic, the nurse took him up in her arms and fled with him; but in her flight she let him fall, so that he became lame in both his feet (II Sam. 4:4). For a long time he lived at Lo-debar, e. of the Jordan, whence David called him to court to show him kindness for his father Jonathan's sake, restoring to him the estates of Saul and appointing him a place at the royal table (ch. 9:1-13). During the rebellion of Absalom he remained at Jerusalem, and was accused by his servant Ziba of disloyalty. David believed the accusation and transferred Mephibosheth's estates to Ziba. After the return of David, Mephibosheth attempted to clear himself of the charge, and David restored half the estates to him; but he declared that he did not wish the property, since he had his desire in the restoration of the king (chs. 16:1-4; 19:24-30). He had a son Mica (ch. 9:12), through whom the race of Jonathan was perpetuated. In I Chron. 8:34; 9:40 Mephibosheth is called Merib-baal (q.v.). This was probably his original name, bōsheth, shame, being substituted for ba'al, lord, by later writers when the word Baal had become distasteful through association with idolatry.

Me'rab (mē'rāb) [perhaps, increase]. Saul's elder daughter (I Sam. 14:49). Her father promised her in marriage to David, and then, breaking faith, gave her as a wife to Adriel the Meholathite (ch. 18:17-19). Their 5 sons were given up by David to the Gibeonites to be put to death for the sin of Saul (II Sam. 21:8 marg.; cf. Greek of Lucian, which reads Merob).

Me-ra'lah (mê-rā'yā) [rebellious]. A priest, head of the father's house Seraiah in the days of Joiakim, a generation after the Exile (Neh. 12:12).

Me-ra'loth (mê-rā'yōth) [rebellious]. 1. A priest, son of Zerariah (I Chron. 6:6, 7, 52). He lived while the house of Eli had charge of the tabernacle.

2. A priest, son of Ahitub and father of the younger Zadok of the high-priestly line (I Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11). He seems to have lived about half a century before the Exile.

3. A father's house among the priests in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:15). See MERE-MOTH 1.

Me-ra'ri (mê-rā'ri) [bitter, but perhaps from Egypt. mrr, beloved]. Son of Levi, and founder of one of the 3 Levitical families (Gen. 46:11; Ex. 6:16; Num. 26:57).

Me-ra'rites (mê-rā'rits). One of the 3 great families of the tribe of Levi. They were descended from Merari. In the wilderness they encamped on the n. side of the tabernacle (Num. 3:35), had under their charge its boards, bars, pillars, sockets, and vessels (chs. 3:36; 4:29-33), and were under the direction of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron (ch. 4:28). To enable them to carry these materials there were assigned to them 4 wagons and 8 oxen (ch. 7:8). They were subdivided into the Mahlites and the Mushites (ch. 3:20, 33); and at the first census in the wilderness numbered 6,200 males from a month old and upward (vs. 33, 34), being fewer in total number than the other families of Levi. Of these, 3,200 were from 30 to 60 years old (ch. 4:42-45), a larger proportion than in the other families. The cities assigned to them numbered 12, of which 4 were in the tribe of Zebulun, 4 in that of Reuben, and 4 in that of Gad; one of them, Ramoth-gilead, being a city of refuge (Josh. 21:34-40; I Chron. 6:63, 77-81). They were reorganized by David (I Chron. 23:6, 21-23). They had a due part with their fellow Levites in the musical service of the sanctuary, holding 6 of the 24 offices (I Chron. 6:31, 44; 25:3). Members of the family are mentioned among those who aided in cleansing the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:12), and a small but notable company of them returned with Ezra to Jerusalem after the Exile (Ezra 8:18, 19).

Mer'a-tha'im (mēr'ā-thā'im) [twofold rebellion]. A symbolical name for Babylon (Jer. 50:21); the name Marrātim (S. Babylonia) may have suggested this use.

Mer'cu'ry (mūr'kū-rī), in A.V. Mer'cu'rius (mūr'kū-rī-ūs). A deity worshiped by the Romans and, under the name of Hermes, by the Greeks also. He was the herald of the gods, and specially attended upon Jupiter. He is generally represented as equipped with the caduceus, a winged rod entwined by two serpents, a winged cap, and winged sandals. Paul and Barnabas were looked upon as gods by the people of Lystra, when the cripple was healed at the apostle's word; and as Paul was the chief speaker, they took him for Mercury and Barnabas, whom he accompanied, for Jupiter (Acts 14:12).

Mer'cy Seat. The covering of the Ark; the Heb. word kappōreth (from the Heb. root kāphar, to cover over in a figurative sense, to make propitiation, to make atonement), means covering (especially, if not exclusively, in the sense of atonement), and in Greek hilastērion, propitiatory (Ex. 26:34; Heb. 9:5). Its name did not suggest a mere lid, but brought to mind the act and place of atonement and the accomplished atonement. The rendering "mercy seat" is therefore a happy one, adopted by Tyndale from Luther. It was made of pure gold; its length was 2½ cubits, and its breadth a cubit and a half. On each side of it and wrought as one piece with it stood a cherub, with its face toward the other cherub, but bent downward toward the mercy seat, and with outstretched wings, so that a wing of each extended over the mercy seat and met that of the other cherub. Between these cherubim Jehovah's glory was manifested, and there Jehovah communed with his people (Ex. 25:17-22; 30:6; Num.

7:89). There was a similar arrangement in Solomon's Temple (I Kings 6:23-28; 8:6-11; I Chron. 28:11). Once a year, on the great Day of Atonement, the high priest, after he had offered a sin offering for himself, entered the Most Holy Place and burned incense, symbol of accepted worship, in the presence of Jehovah, which rose and enveloped the mercy seat in a cloud. He then sprinkled the blood of the sacrificed bullock on and before the mercy seat. Having sacrificed the goat that was the sin offering for the nation, he carried its blood also beyond the veil, into the Most Holy Place, and sprinkled it upon and before the mercy seat. He made atonement for the sins of himself and the nation in the presence of the covenant law, which was written on the tables of stone and was lying in the Ark, and of Jehovah, who dwelt between the cherubim (Lev. 16:2, 13-17).

Me'řed (mē'rēd) [rebellion]. Son of Ezra, who was reckoned as belonging to the tribe of Judah. He had a daughter of Pharaoh to wife and probably also a Jewess (I Chron. 4:17, 18, R.V.).

Mer'e-moth (mēr'ē-mōth) [elevations]. 1. A chief of the priests, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:3, 7). In the next generation a father's house among the priests, enumerated in the corresponding position in the catalogue, bears the name Merai'oth (v. 15), which probably arose out of an error in reading yodh (y) and waw (w) for mem (m).

2. A priest, son of Uriah. He was employed to weigh the silver and gold brought by Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:33). He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 21), and is probably the person of the name who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:5).

3. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

Me'res (mēr'ēz) [perhaps, the forgetful one, from Avestan marša]. One of the 7 princes of Persia and Media at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:14).

Mer'i-bah (mēr'ī-bā) [contention, strife]. 1. A name used in addition to Massah to designate the place at Horeb, near Rephidim, where the people strove with Moses (Ex., ch. 17) for water, and God gave them drink from the rock (vs. 1-7). See MASSAH.

2. A 2d locality, namely, Kadesh-barnea in the wilderness of Zin, where also the people strove with Moses and with Jehovah and water was miraculously brought from the rock (Num. 20:3, 13, 24; 27:14; Deut. 32:51). The waters of this Meribah are the waters of strife, which are mentioned in the A.V. of Ps. 106:32 and Ezek. 47:19; 48:28. For strife the R.V. in its text of the first passage substitutes Meribah, in the 2d Meriboth-kadesh, and in the 3d Meribath-kadesh. This event may well be referred to in Ps. 81:7, where it is God who proves Israel; and in Deut. 33:8, where God proves Levi and where Meribah is mentioned with Massah; and in Ps. 95:8, R.V., where also Meribah is mentioned with Massah (see MASSAH). It is to be noted that there is nothing surprising, under the circumstances, in the outbreak of discontent at the scarcity of water, which was experienced more than twice or thrice. The localities are different and quite far apart.

Mer'ib-ba'al (mēr'ib-bā'āl) [Baal (i.e., the lord) contends; or, my lord is Baal; or, Baal rewards]. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

Mer'i-bath-ka'desh (mēr'ī-bāth-kā'desh) [contention at Kadesh] and Mer'i-both-ka'desh (mēr'ī-bōth-kā'desh) [contentions at Kadesh]. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28, R.V.). See MERIBAH 2.

Me-rō'dach (mê-rō'dāk) [Akkad. Marduk]. The patron deity of Babylon (Jer. 50:2). See BEL.

Me-rō'dach-bal'a'dan (mê-rō'dāk-bāl'ā-dān), in II Kings 20:12 Be-rō'dach-bal'a'dan [Heb. for Akkad., Marduk has given a son]. Bero-dach may be a copyist's misspelling for Mero-dach, or represent the approximation of sound between m and b in Akkadian. A king of Babylon, son of Baladan (II Kings 20:12), from Bit-Yakin, which lay in the marshes near the mouth of the Euphrates, a district which was the ancestral home of the Chaldeans. He was a man of great ability, courage, and enterprise, and became the leader of the Chaldeans. About 731 B.C. he did homage to Tiglath-pileser III, king of Assyria; but when, in 722, the Assyrian army was absent carrying on the siege of Samaria, and news reached Babylonia that Shalmaneser V, king of Assyria, had died, Merodach-baladan seized the opportunity of becoming king of Babylon. Sargon, king of Assyria, recognized him in 721. He reigned 11 years. In 712, or thereabouts, Merodach-baladan sent the embassy to Hezekiah, which, traveling with the ostensible object of congratulating Hezekiah on his recovery (II Kings 20:12-19; I Chron. 32:31; Isa. 39:1-8), was really designed to invite him to join in a confederacy with the rulers of Babylon, Susiana, Phoenicia, Moab, Edom, Philistia, and Egypt for a grand attack on the Assyrian Empire. Sargon suspected what was going on, attacked his enemies individually before they had time to unite, and vanquished them one by one. In 710 Sargon took Babylon, and in 709 Bit-Yakin, capturing Merodach-baladan at the latter place. Apparently Merodach-baladan made a favorable impression on the Assyrians, for he was reinstated in his principedom of Bit-Yakin. In 703 he re-entered Babylon, and once again ruled in the capital city, making Borsippa his residence. But his 2d reign lasted less than a year. He was defeated and driven from Babylon to Bit-Yakin by Sennacherib, Sargon's son and successor. Belibni, who was left to govern Babylonia, proved to be incompetent, and so in 700 Sennacherib sent his son Ashur-nadin-shum to pacify the country. Bit-Yakin was conquered, and Merodach-baladan fled across the Persian Gulf into Elamite territory at Nagite-rakki. Many of the inhabitants of Bit-Yakin were deported, but those who had fled were safe under Elamite protection. In 694 Sennacherib determined to reduce the Chaldeans. Boats were built on the Tigris and floated down the river to Opis, whence they were conveyed by camels overland to the Euphrates. The Assyrians, who had Phoenician and Cyprian sailors, proceeded to the mud banks of the Persian Gulf and overpowered the remnants of Bit-Yakin and the adjoining districts of Elam. Though Merodach-baladan may have ultimately failed in his enterprises, yet he had not lived in vain. The Chaldeans, whose chief he was, became from his days the dominant caste in Babylon.

Me'rom (mērōm) [a height, a high place]. By the waters of Merom Joshua defeated the kings of n. Canaan and their allies (Josh. 11:5, 7). Since Reland (1714) these waters are usually identified with a lake on the Jordan, 11 miles n. of the Sea of Galilee, or with the streams that flow through its basin. This lake is 4 miles long by 3½ broad, its surface lies 689 feet above the Sea of Galilee, and it is almost certainly the body of water called by Josephus the lake Semchonitis (Jos. Antiq. v. 5, 1; War iv. 1, 1). It occupies the s. portion of a very marshy basin about 15 miles long by 5 broad. The basin is now called the Hüleh and the lake Bahret el-Hüleh or lake of the Hüleh. Hüleh, an Arabic name given also to the plain s. of Hamath, perhaps echoes the name of the district Ulatha, between Trachonitis and Galilee (Jos. Antiq. xv. 10, 3).

Scholars, however, are not unanimous in accepting the traditional interpretation. Mrm appears in the list of Thutmose III (c. 1482 B.C.), and this has been identified with modern Meirôn, situated at the foot of Jebel Jermak, w. of Şafed; near Meirôn an important spring gushes into a wadi. Some scholars consider this place to be Merom. Others, however, take Mârûn er-Râs; in this case the waters would be the perpetual stream of Wadi 'Aubâ. At Khirbet el-Bijar, near Mârûn er-Râs, are almost a hundred springs. If Meirôn be accepted, the battle took place on the relatively flat spaces of Şafşaf and el-Jis; in the other case, those of Yârûn. An abundance of water for the armies would have been found in the springs which flow from the foot of the mountains on which are located Kedesh (of Naphtali), Mârûn er-Râs, and Meirôn; these springs may be the waters of Merom. If Merom refers to a region instead of a definite place, the traditional and the later views are not mutually exclusive.

Me-ron-ô-thite (mê-rôn'â-thit). An inhabitant of Meronoth (I Chron. 27:30; Neh. 3:7). Meronoth has not been identified.

Me'roz (mê'rôz). A town which gave no assistance in the fight with Sisera (Judg. 5:23); Khirbet Mârûs, about 7½ miles s. of Kedesh of Naphtali.

Mes'a-loth (mês'â-lôth), in A.V. Mas'a-loth [perhaps, from Heb. m'silôth, ascents, stairs]. A place in the district of Arbela (I Macc. 9:2). Josephus understood it to be the region of fortified caves at Arbela in Galilee, which were only to be reached by steps (Jos. Antiq. xii. 11, 1).

Me'sech (mê'sék). See MESHECH 1.

Me'sha, I (mê'shá). The limit in one direction of the region occupied by the descendants of Joktan (Gen. 10:30). In contrast to Sephar it seems to refer to a w. place, and so Hommel suggests Jebel Shammar and perhaps also the date region of Gôf.

Me'sha, II (mê'shá). A Benjamite, a son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (I Chron. 8:8, 9).

Me'sha, III (mê'shá) [salvation]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. He was ancestor of the inhabitants of Ziph (I Chron. 2:42).

2. A king of Moab, son of Chemosh-melech. He rendered to King Ahab the tribute of 100,000 lambs and as many rams, namely their wool (II Kings 3:4). Ahab was slain at the battle of Ramoth-gilead c. 852 B.C., which probably took place in the early spring, "the time when kings go forth to war," and Ahaziah thereby became sole king. The discomfiture of Israel and Judah at Ramoth-gilead and the death of Ahab were the signal to Mesha to refuse the tribute of this year, the 2d of Ahaziah (Jos. Antiq. ix. 2, 1), to Israel (II Kings 1:1). Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, returned from Ramoth-gilead to Jerusalem and undertook a religious reformation of the nation (II Chron., ch. 19). After this work of reform had begun (ch. 20:1), the Ammonites and Moabites, in alliance with the Edomites, who had been persuaded to revolt, invaded Judah. Jehoshaphat defeated the allies and reduced Edom to its former subjection, and a time of peace ensued (v. 30). Upon the death of Ahaziah Jehoram his brother succeeded him (II Kings 1:17). Je-horam, desiring to render Moab again tributary, asked aid of Jehoshaphat (ch. 3:7). The latter probably wished to chastise the Moabites still further for their invasion of Judah, and, therefore, although he had been rebuked for allying himself with ungodly Ahab and Ahaziah, consented, for Jehoram had exhibited signs of godliness by a considerable reformation (v. 2). Jehoram advanced with his confederates, Jehoshaphat and an unnamed Edomite king, round the s. end of the Dead Sea. The allied armies almost perished with thirst, but Elisha bade them dig trenches, predicting that water would come. It flowed into the valley early in the morning; and as the ruddy light of the sun shone on it, the Moabite king, doubtless Mesha, thinking it was blood and inferring that the 3 invading armies had quarreled and turned their swords against each other, carelessly advanced with his forces to take the prey. He was routed, and the Israelites entered his land and beat down his cities (vs. 24, 25). At Kir-hareseth, seeing that the battle was too sore for him and failing in a desperate attempt to break through the lines of the enemy, he took his eldest son and heir apparent and offered him as a burnt offering to Chemosh on the city wall. The besiegers thereupon in fear raised the siege and returned to the land of Israel without resubjugating Moab (vs. 25-27). The Moabite Stone was erected partly for the purpose of commemorating this revolt and its successful issue; see MOABITE STONE.

Me'shach (mê'shâk). The name given by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon to Mishael, one of the 3 faithful Jews afterward saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:7; 2:49; 3:13-30).

Me'shech (mê'shêk), in A.V. once Me'sech (Ps. 120:5). 1. A people descended from Japheth (Gen. 10:2). They traded in the Tyrian markets in slaves and vessels of brass (Ezek. 27:13). They were allies of Tubal, and allies or subjects of Gog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal (Ezek. 32:26; 38:2, 3; 39:1, R.V.). In the days of Tiglath-pileser I c. 1115-1102 B.C., and Shalmaneser III, 860-825, the land of Musku, that is Meshech, lay in the mountains to the n. of Assyria and bordered on Taba, that is Tubal, in the w. They were gradually driven n. to near the Black Sea. Herodotus calls the 2 races the Moschoi and Tibarenoi, and locates them in the mountains s.e. of the Black Sea (Herod. iii. 94; vii. 78). The Moschoi dwelt between the Phasis and Cyrus Rivers (Pliny Hist. Nat. vi. 4; Strabo xi. 2, 14-17).

2. Meshech (I Chron. 1:17). See MASH.

Me'shel'e-mi'ah (mê-shêl'ê-mi'â) [Jehovah recompenses]. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar and Korah. He and his sons were doorkeepers of the sanctuary (I Chron. 9:21; 26:1). In ch. 26:14 he is called Shelemiah.

Me'shez'a-bel (mê-shêz'â-bêl), in A.V. Me'shez'a-beel (mê-shêz'â-bêl) [God delivers]. 1. Father of a certain Berechiah (Neh. 3:4).

2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:21).

3. A man of Judah, family of Zerach (Neh. 11:24).

Meshil'le-mith (mê-shil'ê-mith) [recompense, retribution]. See MESHILLEMOTH 2.

Me-shil'le-moth (mê-shil'ê-môth) [acts of recompense]. 1. An Ephraimite, father of that Berechiah who urged the release of the captives brought from Judah by Pekah's army (II Chron. 28:12).

2. A priest descended from Immer (Neh. 11:13), called Meshillemith in I Chron. 9:12.

Me-sho'bab (mê-shô'bâb) [restored]. One of the Simeonite princes who seized upon the pasture lands near Gedor (I Chron. 4:34-41).

Me-shul'lam (mê-shûl'âm) [recompensed, required]. 1. A Benjamite, descended from Shaharaim through Eljhaal (I Chron. 8:17).

2. A leading man among the Gadites in the reign of Jotham (I Chron. 5:13).

3. An ancestor of Shaphan the scribe (II Kings 22:3).

4. A priest, son of Zadok, and father of the high priest Hilkiah who lived in Josiah's reign (I Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11). See SHALLUM 7.

5. A Kohathite Levite who with others helped faithfully to superintend the workmen who repaired the Temple in Josiah's reign (II Chron. 34:12).

6. A priest, son of Meshilemith of the house of Immer (I Chron. 9:12).

7. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:19).

8. A Benjamite, father of Sallu (I Chron. 9:7; Neh. 11:7).

9. Another Benjamite, son of Shephatiah (I Chron. 9:8).

10. A chief man whom, with others, Ezra sent from the river of Ahava to secure Levites to go to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16).

11. One of those who were connected with the matter of inducing the Jews who had married foreign wives to put them away (Ezra 10:15). It is not certain from the Hebrew text whether they were opposed to the measure or not. (Cf. R.V. text and marg., also A.V.)

12. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29).

13. A son of Berechiah. He helped to repair 2 portions of the wall of Jerusalem, at the 2d of which he had a chamber (Neh. 3:4, 30). Johanan, son of Tobiah the Ammonite, married his daughter (ch. 6:18).

14. Son of Besodeiah. He with another returned exile repaired the old gate of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6).

15. One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read and explained the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

16. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:7).

17. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:20).

18. One of the princes of Judah who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:33).

19. A priest, head of the father's house Ezra in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:13).

20. Another priest at the same date, head of the father's house Ginnethon (Neh. 12:16).

21. A porter who lived at the same date (Neh. 12:25).

Me-shul'le-meth (mê-shûl'ê-mêth) [fem. of Meshullam]. Wife of King Manasseh, and mother of King Amon (II Kings 21:19).

Me-so'ba-ite (mê-sô'bâ-î't). See MEZOBAITE.

Me-sop'ta'mi'a (mês'ô-pô-tâ'mi-â) [Gr., land between rivers]. The rendering, borrowed from the LXX, for the Hebrew Aram-naharaim; see ARAM 2, (1). It is a Greek name which appears after the time of Alexander the Great. The Greek and Roman geographers used the term for the whole country between the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers, excluding the mountainous region where the rivers take their rise and ordinarily also the low-lying plain of Babylonia in the other direction. Thus limited, its upper portion is hilly and fertile and its lower part, especially toward the Tigris, is a salt desert.

Some of its inhabitants were present on that Day of Pentecost on which the Holy Spirit descended (Acts 2:9). Stephen includes Ur of the Chaldees in Mesopotamia (ch. 7:2), and the name is often used in that broad sense by modern scholars.

Mes-si'ah, in A.V. of N.T. Mes-si'as (John 1:41; 4:25), the Greek form [Aram. m'shihâ, Heb. māshiah, anointed one, of which Gr. Christos is a translation]. The term was applicable to any person anointed with the holy oil, as the high priest (Lev. 4:3, 5, 16; I Sam. 12:3, 5, Hebrew) or the king (II Sam. 1:14, 16). The title is given to the patriarchs Abraham and Isaac and to the Persian king Cyrus, as chosen ones to administer the kingdom of God (Ps. 105:15; Isa. 45:1). When God promised David that the throne and scepter should remain in his family forever (II Sam. 7:13), the title acquired a special reference and denoted the representative of the royal line of David (Ps. 2:2; 18:50; 84:9; 89:38, 51; 132:10, 17; Lam. 4:20; Hab. 3:13). And when prophecy began to tell of a king who should appear in this line and be the great deliverer of his people (Jer. 23:5, 6), "whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting" (Micah 5:2-5), and who should uphold the throne and kingdom of David forever (Isa. 9:6, 7), the title of the Messiah, par excellence, naturally became attached to him (Dan. 9:25, 26; Targum of Onkelos, Num. 24:17-19), and ultimately became a customary designation of him, being as common as the title son of David (John 1:41; 4:25; and in the form Christ, Matt. 1:1 et passim). In Jewish and Christian belief the Messiah is the one anointed, i.e., empowered by God's resident spirit, to deliver his people and to establish his Kingdom.

The term Messianic prophecy denotes all prophecy which treats of the person, work, or Kingdom of Christ, and by extension it is often applied to passages which speak of the future salvation, glory, and consummation of God's Kingdom without mention of the Mediator. The term Messianic times does not refer exclusively to the period when Christ lived on earth. It generally comprehends the dispensation which Christ inaugurated and conducts as mediatorial king, whether viewed in its entirety or in some of its aspects.

Met'als. The metals used in ancient times were gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, and tin (Num. 31:22, q.v.). Perhaps antimony was employed for coloring the eyelids and eyebrows. See PAINT.

Me'theg'am'mah (mê'thêg-âm'â) [bridle of the mother city, i.e., jurisdiction of the metropolis]. A town taken by David from the Philistines (II Sam. 8:1). The reference is doubtless to Gath and its suburbs (I Chron. 18:1).

Me'thu'sa-el (mê-thû'sâ-êl). See METHUSHAEL.

Me'thu'se-lah (mê-thû'sê-lâ), in A.V. of N.T. Ma-thu'sa'la [probably, man of a javelin]. Son of Enoch and father of the Sethite Lamech (Gen. 5:21-27). If the number of years which are assigned to him refer to his own individual life, he is notable for having lived to a greater age than any other man recorded in history. See CHRONOLOGY, I.

Me'thu'sa-el (mê-thû'shâ-êl) in A.V. Me'thu'sa-el [man of God]. Son of Mehujael, and father of Lamech, of the race of Cain (Gen. 4:18).

Me'u'nim (mê-û'nîm), in A.V. also Me-hu'nim and Me-hu'nims [plural of the gentile adjective from Maon, denoting the people of Maon]. A people whose capital was probably the city of Ma'an, 12 miles s.e. of Petra. They inhabited Mount Seir (cf. II Chron. 20:1, emended text, R.V., marg., with v. 10; cf. Minaeans of LXX). A body of them were smitten by the Simeonites near Gedor, where they dwelt as strangers (I Chron. 4:39-41). They are mentioned in connection with Philistines and Arabians (II Chron. 26:7). Some of them, probably captives of war and their descendants, served at the Temple in Jerusalem as Nethinim (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52). They are mentioned in Judg. 10:12, where the LXX has Madian (= Midian). The Meunim are identified by the LXX with the Minaeans. If the identification be correct, they are a n. settlement of that people.

Me'za-hab (mēz'ā-hāb), in A.V. Mez'a-hab (mēz'ā-hāb) [waters of gold]. An ancestress of the wife of Hadar, king of Edom (Gen. 36:39; I Chron. 1:50); or perhaps a district, of which Matred was a native.

Me-zo'ba-ite (mē-zō'bā-it), in A.V. Me-so'ba-ite. Apparently a gentilic adjective (I Chron. 11:47). The Hebrew text is evidently corrupt; perhaps for "from Zobah."

Me-zu'zah (mē-zōō'zā) [doorpost]. Among orthodox Jews a piece of parchment containing Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21 written in 22 lines. It is rolled up in a wooden, metal, or glass case or tube and attached to the doorpost as is commanded in these passages.

Mi'a-min (mī'd-min). See MIJAMIN.

Mib'har (mīb'hār) [choice, elite]. One of David's mighty men, son of Hagri or better a Hagrite (I Chron. 11:38); see remarks about the text under BANI 1.

Mib'sam (mīb'sām) [sweet odor, balsam].

1. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:13; I Chron. 1:29).

2. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:25).

Mib'zar (mīb'zār) [a fortification, a stronghold]. An Edomite chieftain (Gen. 36:42; I Chron. 1:53).

Mi'ca (mī'cā), in A.V. Mi'cha, once Mi'cah (I Chron. 9:15) [evidently, like Micah, an abbreviation of Micaiah, Who is like Jehovah? (cf. Micah 1:1 with Jer. 26:18, R.V., and II Chron. 34:20 with II Kings 22:12)]. A variant Hebrew spelling yields the English form Micah; cf. II Sam. 9:12 with I Chron. 8:34. 1. A son of Mephibosheth (II Sam. 9:12). The interchangeable form of the name, Micah, is given him in I Chron. 8:34, 35; 9:40, 41.

2. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:11).

3. A Levite descended from Asaph (I Chron. 9:15; Neh. 11:17, 22; 12:35, where the form Micaiah is used).

Mi'cah (mī'kā), in A.V. thrice Mi'chah (mī'kā) (I Chron. 24:24, 25) [who is like Jehovah?]. See MICA. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (I Chron. 23:20; 24:24, 25).

2. An Ephraimite who stole from his mother 1100 shekels of silver, but afterward gave them back again. His mother dedicated 200 of them to the Lord for images. A graven and a molten image were made of them and placed in the house of Micah, and Micah consecrated his son to be priest. A Levite chanced to pass that way, and Micah embraced the opportunity to secure an accredited minister at the sanctuary by hiring the Levite, who, though not a priest, was better than the layman, Micah's son. Sometime afterward, migrating Danites passed that way, allured the Levite to go with them, and carried off Micah's images, despite his protestations (Judg., chs. 17; 18).

3. A son of Merib-baal (I Chron. 8:34, 35; 9:40, 41); see MICA 1.

4. A Reubenite who lived several generations before 734 B.C. (I Chron. 5:5).

5. Father of Abdon. He was born before

Josiah's reign (II Chron. 34:20; II Kings 22:12, where the form Micaiah is used); cf. ACHBOR 2.

6. A descendant of Asaph (I Chron. 9:15, A.V.); see MICA 3.

7. A Morashtite, a native apparently of Moresheth-gath (Micah 1:14), a town believed to have been in Judah, not far from Gath and for a time a dependency of the Philistine city. He prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (Micah 1:1; and Jer. 26:18, R.V. marg., Micaiah). He therefore began his career a little later than his contemporaries Hosea and Isaiah (cf. Micah 1:1 with Isa. 1:1 and Hos. 1:1). He spoke upon the same great themes as Isaiah and so similarly that, as Calvin has said, Micah was, as it were, Isaiah's colleague. Isaiah, however, writes as one acquainted with the society and manners of the capital; Micah is a "man of the people," who sympathized with the peasantry in their sufferings. He attacks (ch. 3:2-4) the wrongs to which the poor were exposed at the hands of the nobles and rich proprietors of Judah.

Micah's style is simple; not rugged, but elegant. He is plain-spoken in the rebuke of sin (Micah 1:5; 2:1, 2; 6:10-12). His transitions of thought are often abrupt, but a logical connection is seldom difficult to discern. He is fond of the interrogation (chs. 1:5; 2:7; 4:9; 6:3, 6, 7, 10, 11), uses irony (ch. 2:11), introduces a metaphor, and retains it and carries it forward (chs. 1:6; 3:2, 3, 6; 4:6-8, 13; 6:10, 11, 14, 15), and delights in paronomasia or play upon words, employing it largely in the 1st chapter and perhaps allowing it to determine the form of the concluding paragraph of the book. That paragraph is spoken in praise of Jehovah, and is based on the rhetorical question, "Who is a God like unto thee?" (ch. 7:18). The prophet closes his prophecy by publishing the claim which his own name makes. See etymology of the name Micah.

Micah drew confidence and strength from the character of God, as revealed in the Ten Commandments, in his dealing with Israel, and in individual experience (chs. 2:7; 6:3-5; 7:15). God himself does justice and loves mercy, and he requires these traits in his people. The promises of God were also a source of strength and sweet encouragement to the prophet. He knew that Israel's security lay in God's purpose to save his people according to the promise made to Abraham (ch. 7:20) and centered in the son of David (ch. 5:2-6; cf. Luke 1:72-75). The foes of the Kingdom cannot prevail. Chapter 5 is based on the same truth as Psalm 2; and, like the sweet message of forgiveness and restoration (Micah 7:8-20), rests upon God's word.

The Book of Micah is the 6th of the Minor Prophets. Its author prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (ch. 1:1). Its contents also show that it was written after the reigns of Omri and Ahab (ch. 6:16), at the time when Assyria was the power which the Israelites dreaded (ch. 5:5 seq.), and in part at least while Samaria and the Northern Kingdom were still in existence (ch. 1:6, 14); but how long before the fall of Samaria the words of ch. 1:5-7 were uttered cannot be determined, for from the time of Uziah and Jotham the prophets were foretelling the approaching doom of Samaria (Hos. 1:6; 3:4; 5:9; Amos 2:6; 3:12; 5:1-3, 27; 6:1, 7-11, 14; Isa. 7:8, 9; 8:4) and the desolation of Judah (Hos. 5:10; Amos 2:4; Isa. 6:1, 11-13; 7:17-25). Micah 1:9-16 may contain a reference to the campaign of Sargon (711) or that of Sennacherib (701). The prophecy of ch. 3:12 was spoken during the reign of Hezekiah (Jer. 26:18), though Micah may have discoursed on this theme before.

The prophecies of Micah, although they refer especially to Judah and were spoken to the people of the Southern Kingdom, yet concern all Israel (Micah 1:1, 5-7, 9-16). The abrupt transitions indicate that the book is rather a summary of the prophet's teaching than a series of distinct discourses. The expression, "Hear ye," repeated 3 times, serves to mark the beginning of 3 divisions, each of which likewise ends with a message of hope.

1. Prophecies of judgment. The prophet begins (ch. 1:2-4) by describing, in impressive imagery, the approaching manifestation of Jehovah for judgment. He prophesies judgment upon Samaria for its incurable disposition toward idolatry (ch. 1:2-8), and upon Judah as involved in like guilt (vs. 9-16). Micah prophesies woe upon the oppressors of the people and the ruin and captivity of the nation (ch. 2:4, 5) as a punishment for the unrighteousness and injustice of its representative men (vs. 1-11). Yet a remnant shall be restored (vs. 12, 13).

II. Denunciations passing into prophecies of salvation. In contrast to, "And I said" (ch. 3:1), we have (v. 5), "Thus saith Jehovah." As opposed to the false prophets, Micah appears as a true prophet of God (v. 8). Here we have rebuke of the civil and religious authorities for heartless indifference to truth and right and for the mercenary character of their doctrine and government (ch. 3:1-11); and the consequent abandonment of Zion by Jehovah to the power of its foes (v. 12). This prophecy of v. 12 made such an impression that it was still remembered more than a hundred years later (Jer. 26:18). There follows the ultimate exaltation of Jehovah's Kingdom in moral influence among men and in peace, prosperity, and power (ch. 4:1-8). But at present the prophet sees dismay, helplessness, captivity (vs. 9, 10), followed by the overthrow of its enemies for their sinful opposition to Jehovah (vs. 11-13); now there is discomfiture for Zion (ch. 5:1), until he shall come forth unto God that is to be ruler in Israel, "whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting" (vs. 2-4). This foreordination of God regarding the Messiah assures and secures the deliverance of Zion from the Assyrians (v. 5 seq.; cf. Isa. 7:4-16), and is the pledge and potency that guarantees the survival of God's people throughout the ages and their ultimate triumph over all foes and attainment of conformity to God's ideal (Micah 5:7-15).

III. Jehovah's controversy with the people as a whole, not with the wealthy and the official classes only (ch. 6:1-5), explaining the requirements of true religion (vs. 6-8; cf. Isa. 1:11-17), lamenting its absence and the presence of its very opposite (Micah 6:9 to 7:6), and closing with the prophet's own confidence in a glorious future due to the forgiving grace of Jehovah and his faithfulness to his covenant with Abraham (vs. 7-20).

The book may also be divided according to form and general arrangement of material as follows: chs. 1 to 3, threats; chs. 4:1 to 5:9, promise; chs. 5:10 to 7:6, threats; ch. 7:7-20, promise.

Chapter 4:1-3 is almost identical with Isa. 2:2-4, but is more closely connected than in the corresponding passage in Isaiah with the verses which immediately follow. Joel expresses a similar thought (Joel 3:10). It appears that both Isaiah and Micah are quoting an anonymous prophecy which was well-known in their time. The liturgical refrains (Isa. 2:5; Micah 4:5) suggest that both prophets quoted from a liturgical collection of hymns, or, in view of the difference in the refrains, from two different collections. At any rate God's people of old had authoritative prophecy upon which they relied, and favorite passages which they quoted, just as Christians of today have.

Elissfeldt maintains that Micah 7:7-20 is a unity of 4 parts (vs. 7-10, 11-13, 14-17, 18-20), all of which can with certainty be assigned to a later period, c. the 2d half of the 6th century B.C.; he sees a resemblance between this section of Micah and Isa., chs. 56 to 66. Micah 7:7-20 bears the same relation to chs. 5:10 to 7:6 as chs. 4:1 to 5:9+ch. 2:12 seq. to chs. 1 to 3. The Book of Micah accordingly has a twofold succession of threats and promises. According to this scholar, it is possible that there were 2 collections of Micah's prophecies of doom, which were each secondarily provided with a message of hope or release and later joined together. He sees, however, another possibility, that the prophecies of doom were mitigated by the addition of a prophecy of deliverance both in the middle and at the end, especially since the prediction of calamity (ch. 3:12) seemed to demand a more hopeful outcome. Elissfeldt supposes that perhaps ch. 4:1-15 was first introduced and that in consequence other prophecies of promise were added. He sees a condition similar to what is found in Isa., chs. 11; 12, where he proposes 2 possibilities: these 2 chapters either were inserted into a collection of Isa., chs. 1 to 35, or were added to a collection extending to ch. 10. By this theory Micah 2:12 seq.; 4:1 to 5:9; 7:7-20 are according to form and content not to be assigned to Micah, but are considered as valuable witnesses to the hope which inspired and sustained postexilic Judaism.

Several remarks that bear on the genuineness of chs. 6 and 7 may be thrown loosely together. The thought of the exiles scattered far and wide (Micah 7:12) is not surprising in a contemporary of Isaiah; and the hope that the walls of Jerusalem will be rebuilt (ch. 7:11) is natural after one has pictured the enemy treading down Zion as the mire of the streets (v. 10). Over against Ewald's assignment of chs. 6 and 7 to the time of Manasseh (a date which need not fall outside of Micah's lifetime) may be placed Cornill's opinion that everything in these chapters applies well to the time of Ahaz. The anticipation of exile (ch. 7:7-20), and the ravaging of the kingdom by its foes, yet their submission (chs. 6:13-16; 7:16, 17), and the transition from threatening to promise, characterize chs. 1 to 5 equally with chs. 6 and 7. Chapters 6 and 7 form a natural advance from the denunciation of the official representatives of the nation (chs. 1 to 3) to Jehovah's controversy with the people as a whole (chs. 6; 7). The figure of Jehovah in controversy with Israel was familiar to the prophets of this period (Hos. 4:1; 12:2; cf. Isa. 1:2-24); and to refer to events of Israel's early history, as in chs. 6:4, 5; 7: 15, 20, was a common practice with Micah (chs. 1: 15; 5:6), Hosea, and Isaiah. As the prophecies of chs. 1 to 5 resemble Isaiah's utterances, so ch. 6 resembles Isa., ch. 1.

It may be supposed that Micah uttered other prophecies which, however, have not been recorded. At any rate he is the prophet of the humble and the poor. The Messiah, he says, will not come from the capital, but from the small town (ch. 5:2). The passage, ch. 5:2-4, is especially dear to the Christian on account of the interpretation we have in Matthew (Matt. 2:5 seq.), who sees here a reference to Christ. We find in Micah a protest against formalism and a demand for an ethical religion (Micah 6:6-8); here is found (v. 8) the classic definition of a simple practical religion, which has not been surpassed. The book is brief, but its value and influence must not be judged by its size.

Mi-ca'iah (mī-kā'yā), in A.V. Mi-cha'iah except in I Kings 22:8-28; II Chron. 18:6-27 [who is like Jehovah?]. 1. Daughter of Uriel of Gibeah, wife of Rehoboam, and mother of King Abijah (II Chron. 13:2). According to II Chron. 11:20, Abijah's mother was Maacah, daughter of Absalom. Micaiah is probably a corruption of Maacah, for so Abijah's mother is always called elsewhere, and she was probably granddaughter of Absalom and daughter of Uriel by his wife Tamar, Absalom's daughter. See MAACAH 9.

2. A prophet, son of Imlah. Being desired by Ahab to concur in the favorable prediction given by the prophets of Baal regarding Ahab's expedition against Ramoth-gilead, he did what was required of him, but with such transparent insincerity that he was adjured to speak the truth, on which, in the name of Jehovah, he predicted the death of Ahab in the coming fight. The order was given to make him a prisoner till Ahab's expected victory should prove his unfavorable vaticination to be untrue (I Kings 22:8-28; II Chron. 18:6-27). As it turned out, Ahab lost his life at Ramoth-gilead.

3. One of Jehoshaphat's princes sent by him to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

4. The prophet, better known as Micah (Jer. 26:18, A.R.V. marg.).

5. Father of Achbor. He lived before Josiah's reign (II Kings 22:12); see MICAH 5.

6. A son of Gemariah, who reported to the Jewish princes in the reign of Jehoiakim the contents of Jeremiah's book as read by Baruch (Jer. 36:11-13).

7. A descendant of Asaph (Neh. 12:35); see MICA 3.

8. A priest, one of those who blew trumpets when the wall of Jerusalem was dedicated by Nehemiah (Neh. 12:41).

Mi'cha (mī'kā). See MICA.

Mi'chael (mī'kā-ēl) [who is like God?]. 1. A man of Asher, father of the representative from that tribe on the commission to spy out Canaan (Num. 13:13).

2. A Gadite, descended from Buz and head of a father's house in Gilead (I Chron. 5:13; cf. vs. 11, 14, 16).

3. Another Gadite, ancestor of the preceding (I Chron. 5:14).

4. A Levite, family of Gershon and ancestor of Asaph (I Chron. 6:40).

5. A chief man of the tribe of Issachar, family of Tola, house of Uzzi (I Chron. 7:3).

6. A Benjamite, family of Beriah (I Chron. 8:16).

7. A Manassite captain who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

8. Father of Omri, who ruled the people of Issachar in David's reign (I Chron. 27:18).

9. A son of King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 21:2).

10. Father of Zebadiah, of the sons of Shephatiah (Ezra 8:8).

11. An archangel (Jude 9), one of the chief angelic princes who helped the man clothed in linen against the spiritual being, called the prince of the kingdom of Persia (Dan. 10:13); he also contended for Israel (Dan. 10:21; 12:1), and later with his angels warred victoriously against the enemies of the people of God (Rev. 12:7). When the doctrine of angels was wrought out by the Jews after the Exile, Michael was made one of 7 archangels (Tobit 3:17; 12:15), Gabriel being, of course, included in the number (Dan. 8:16; 9:21), and 5 others being added to make up 7, namely, Raphael, Uriel (II Esdras 4:1), Chamuel, Jophiel, and Zadkiel. The belief that Michael disputed with Satan about the body of Moses, to which Jude refers and upon which he bases a lesson (Jude 9; cf. II Peter

2:11) is derived from the pseudepigraph Assumption of Moses; cf. the Targum of Jonathan on Deut. 34:6, which ascribes the burial of Moses to Michael and other angels.

Mi'chah (mī'kā). See MICAH.

Mi-cha'iah (mī-kā'yā). See MICAIAH.

Mi'chal (mī'kāl) [perhaps, who is like El (God)?]. The younger daughter of King Saul (I Sam. 14:49). After Saul had failed to fulfill his promise to give his elder daughter Merab to David, he learned that Michal was in love with the young hero, and he gladly embraced the opportunity which this affection afforded him to expose David to the risk of death. He offered Michal to David on condition that he should slay a hundred Philistines. David accomplished the assigned task and received Michal to wife (I Sam. 18:27, 28). She aided David in escaping from her father's machinations, but after the former became a fugitive Saul married her to another man, regardless of her obligations to David (I Sam. 25:44). When Abner, Ish-bosheth's general, sought to make up matters with David, the king required that his wife Michal should be restored to him, which was done (II Sam. 3:15). But when David was bringing the Ark to Jerusalem and, in the intensity of his religious zeal, danced before the Lord, Michal thought the hero and king was acting in an undignified manner, and she despised him in her heart, and rebuked him. But David replied that he had humbled himself before the Lord and would continue to do so, and that he would be held in honor by those in whose sight she falsely insinuated he had acted in a lewd manner. After a time Michal died childless (II Sam. 6:14-23).

Mich'mash (mīk'māsh) and twice Mich'mas (mīk'mās) (Ezra 2:27; Neh. 7:31), and so in A.V. of I Macc. 9:73 [a hidden place]. A town near the mount of Beth-el (I Sam. 13:2), e. of Beth-aven (v. 5), and n. of Geba (I Sam. 14:5, in A.V. Gibeah; Isa. 10:28, 29). The Philistines encamped at Michmash to war with Saul; but through the valor of Jonathan and his armor-bearer at the craggy pass near by a slaughter was begun among them and they were routed by the army of Israel (I Sam. 13:5-7, 15 seq.; 14:1-23). Exiles from Michmash returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:27; Neh. 7:31). They were Benjamites (Neh. 11:31). Jonathan Maccabaeus took up his residence at Michmash and exercised judgeship (I Macc. 9:73, in A.V. Machmas; Jos. Antiq. xlii. 1, 6). The pass of Michmash, still retaining the name of Mukhmās, is 7½ miles n. by e. of Jerusalem, 2 n.e. of Geba, and 3 s. by e. of Beth-el. The village of Mukhmās is one of a humble character; the pass is probably Wadi eš-Suweinīt.

Mich'me-thath (mīk'mē-thāth), in A.V. Mich'me-thah (mīk'mē-thā). A town on the boundary line between Ephraim and Manasseh. It lay "before Shechem" (Josh. 16:6; 17:7), and is to be identified with Khirbet Juleijil.

Mich'ri (mīk'ri) [perhaps, purchase price]. A Benjamite (I Chron. 9:8).

Mich'tam (mīk'tām). A word of obscure meaning occurring in the titles of Psalms 16; 56 to 60. The LXX, followed by Theodotion, translates: "An engraved writing," "An inscription on a tablet," with or without the preposition for; cf. Targum: "A straight [or upright] inscription." From this has been deduced the explanation: a poem of epigrammatic character. Aquila, Symmachus, and Jerome render it as an epithet of David: "The humble and sincere [blameless]." The margin of A.V. reads: "A golden Psalm." It has also been understood as meaning a mysterious poem, poetry concerning problems or a hitherto unknown composition. In connection with this last explanation, cf. Arab. katama, to hide, and Akkad. katāmu, to cover; the root may accordingly be understood in the sense of to cover sin. Michtam may therefore mean a song the object of which is to cover or atone for sin, uncleanness, or the consequences of sin.

Mid'din (mīd'īn) [perhaps, extensions]. A village in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. 15: 61); perhaps, Khirbet Kūmrān, almost 2 miles n. of 'Ain Feshkhah on the n.w. shore of the Dead Sea.

Mid'ian (mīd'ī-ān), in A.V. of N.T. Ma'di-an [place of judgment]. 1. A son of Abraham by Keturah, sent away with gifts into the wilderness, and in whom the Midianites were linked with Abraham. The person and tribe form one conception (Gen. 25:1-6).

2. A region in the Arabian desert near the Gulf of 'Akabah, occupied by the Midianites. It was bordered by Edom on the n.w. Its boundaries were never demarked, and doubtless shifted considerably at different periods; but all the region referred to in the O.T. as dominated by the Midianites is found within an area which measures about 175 miles from n. to s. About the time of the Exodus Midian controlled the pasture lands e. of Horeb in the peninsula of Sinai (Ex. 3:1). A district adjacent to Moab and near the Amorite kingdom, whose capital was Heshbon, was occupied by Midianites, who had been settled there for some time (Gen. 36:35; Num. 22:4; 25:1, 6; Josh. 13:21). The intervening region e. of Edom to the Red Sea doubtless belonged to Midian. The Midianites who were routed in the valley of Jezreel fled in this direction, and Gideon in pursuing them passed Succoth and the Gadite town of Jogbehah (Judg. 8: 5, 10, 11; cf. Gen. 37:25, 28). In David's time a royal refugee from Edom found temporary asylum in Midian, probably s.e. of Edom, before he went into Egypt (I Kings 11:17, 18). The center of population was e. and s.e. of the Gulf of 'Akabah, where the name is still preserved in Madyan.

Mid'ian-ites (mīd'ī-ān-īts). A people of the desert (Gen. 25:2, 6; Num. 10:29-31; Isa. 60:6; Hab. 3:7; Judith 2:26). Five families of them sprang from Midian, q.v. (Gen. 25:4). Midianite merchants, who were with the caravan of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead, bought Joseph and carried him to Egypt (Gen. 37:25, 28, 36). The father-in-law of Moses was a Midianite (Ex. 3:1). Midianites joined with Moabites in hiring Balaam to curse the Israelites and afterward seduced the people to idolatry and licentiousness (Num. 22:4, 6; ch. 25). The Israelites were consequently directed to make war on them. They did so, killing the 5 kings of Midian with all the male population of the district and the married women (ch. 31). These kings were allies or vassals of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. 13:21). In the period of the Judges, Midianites, in conjunction with the Amalekites and the children of the e., entered Canaan, with their cattle and their tents, like locusts for multitude, everywhere appropriating the crops, and reducing to the greatest distress those who had sown them. After the oppression had lasted for 7 years, God raised up Jerubbaal, or Gideon, to deliver the now repentant people. The decisive battle was fought in the Plain of Jezreel. It resulted in the complete defeat of the foreign oppressors. Their 2 princes, Oreb and Zeeb, were taken and put to death; and later their 2 kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, shared the same fate. The land had rest, then, for the normal period of 40 years (Judg., chs. 6 to 8; 9:17; Ps. 83:9-12; Isa. 9:4; 10:26).

Mid'rash. See COMMENTARY.

Mig'dal-el' (mīg'dāl-ēl') [tower of God]. A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38). Its site may be at Mujeidil (on a hill n.w. of Tibnin), 12½ miles n.w. of Kades (Kedesh) and 11 miles n.n.w. of Yārūn (Iron).

Mig'dal-gad' (mīg'dāl-gād') [tower of Gad or fortune]. A town in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh 15:37), probably Khirbet el-Mejdeleh, 5 miles s. of Beit Jibrin, near Dawa'imeh.

Mig'dol (mīg'dōl) [tower]. 1. An encampment of the Israelites while they were leaving Egypt. It was near the Red Sea (cf. Ex. 15:4, 22; Deut. 11:4); before Pi-hahiroth and before Baal-zephon (Ex. 14:2; Num. 33:7). It may have been a watchtower or military post on the way.

2. After the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Jews fled to Egypt and took up their abode in a place called Migdol (Jer. 44:1; 46:14). The marginal reading of Ezek. 29:10; 30:6, from Migdol to Syene (which is the text of J.V.) seems to be the better interpretation of those 2 passages. Migdol was in the extreme n. of Egypt. It may be identified with Magdali of the Tell el-Amarna tablets and Egypt. Mktr; it corresponds to Magdolo of the Itinerarium Antonini, which is modern Tell el-Heir, about 11 miles s. of Pelusium.

Mig'ron (mīg'rōn) [probably, precipitous]. 1. A village of Benjamin, s. of Aiath and n. of Michmash (Isa. 10:28). The site may be at Makrūn n. of Michmash on the way to Ai.

2. Saul once camped at Migron in the outermost part of Gibeah (I Sam. 14:2). If the site of Gibeah is Tell el-Fūl, as is commonly believed, or perhaps even if Geba is intended, and if the text of I Sam. 14:2 is pure, there apparently were 2 Migrons, one n. and the other considerably s. of Michmash.

Mij'amin (mīj'ā-mīn), in A.V. sometimes Mi'a-min [from the right hand, i.e., side of good luck]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house by the time of David, and became the 6th of the 24 courses into which David distributed the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 9).

2. A chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:5, 7). In the next generation a father's house among the priests bore the name Miniamin (v. 17). There is no difference between these names: in one form the letter nun (n) is assimilated; in the other it is not.

3. A son of Parosh, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:25).

4. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house (cf. 2), sealed the covenant in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7). Perhaps it was he who was one of the trumpeters at the dedication of the wall (ch. 12:41); see MINIAMIN 3, and for form of the name see under 2 of this article.

Mik'loth (mīk'lōth) [rods]. 1. A military captain in David's reign, who was on duty with another captain in the 2d month (I Chron. 27:4).

2. A Benjamite, of the family of Jeiel of Gibeon (I Chron. 8:32; 9:37, 38).

Mik-ne'iah (mīk-nē'yā) [possession of Jehovah]. A Levite of the 2d degree, a gate-keeper of the Ark, who played the harp in David's reign (I Chron. 15:18, 21).

Mil'a-la'i (mīl'ā-lā'i) [perhaps, eloquent]. A Levite who played a musical instrument at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

Mil'cah (mīl'ká) [counsel]. 1. A daughter of Haran and sister of Lot. She became the wife of Nahor and the mother of Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel (Gen. 11:29; 22:20-23). She was the grandmother of Rebekah (chs. 22:23; 24:15, 24).

2. A daughter of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33).

Mil'com (mil'kōm). See MOLECH.

Mile [Lat. milia, thousand (paces)]. In the only passage of the Bible in which the word occurs (Matt. 5:41) the Roman mile is intended, containing 1,000 paces of 5 Roman feet each, and equivalent to 4,860 English feet, or about  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an English mile.

Mi-le'tus (mī-lē'tūs), in A.V. once Mi-le'tum (mī-lē'tūm). A seaport to which Paul came a day after he had been at Trogyllum (Acts 20:15). Thither he summoned the elders of the church at Ephesus, to give them exhortations and bid them farewell (vs. 17-38). At Miletus Trophimus was once left when he was sick (II Tim. 4:20, in A.V. Miletum). The city was on the seacoast of Ionia, about 36 miles s. of Ephesus, being located on the s. shore of the bay of Latmus into which flowed the Menander. It had a celebrated temple of Apollo, and was the birthplace of the philosophers Thales and Anaximander.

Milk. An important article of diet, especially in the East. The milk of cows, sheep (Deut. 32:14), goats (Prov. 27:27), and camels (cf. Gen. 32:15) was and is still used. The milk of the camel is excellent, being rich and strong, but not very sweet. Milk was used in its natural state and as curds and as cheese (Deut. 32:14; Judg. 5:25; II Sam. 17:29). It was kept in skin bottles, and served in dishes (Judg. 4:19; 5:25).

MILL. In Palestine and neighboring lands the mill was a simple machine, consisting of 2 round millstones (Deut. 24:6). In the mill in use among the people today, the stones are generally made of basalt, about a foot and a half in diameter and from 2 to 4 inches thick. The nether stone is slightly convex on the top. It has a peg in the center, about which the upper stone revolves. This upper stone is slightly concave on the under side in order to fit on the nether stone, and is pierced by a hole in the center which receives the peg and into which the grain is dropped by hand. It is turned by means of an upright handle near the circumference. The meal falls over the edge of the nether stone into a cloth spread underneath or into a platter. The work of grinding is laborious and menial. It was performed by the women (Eccl. 12:3, R.V. marg.; Matt. 24:41), slave women (Ex. 11:5; Isa. 47:2), and prisoners (Judg. 16:21). In ordinary Jewish households, however, it was not regarded as at all degrading for the women to grind meal every morning for a day's consumption, rising long before daybreak, at least in winter. If the millstone was taken away, the family was left without ground grain till it was returned, on which account it was forbidden by the Mosaic Law to take "the mill or the upper millstone to pledge; for he taketh a man's life to pledge" (Deut. 24:6). The cessation of the sound of grinding betokens utter desolation (Jer. 25:10; Rev. 18:22).

A larger mill, constructed on the same principle, but turned by an ass, was also in use (Matt. 18:6, R.V. marg.).

Mil'let. A cereal (Panicum miliaceum), Heb. dōhan. Ezekiel was bidden to use it as an ingredient of the bread which he was ordered to prepare (Ezek. 4:9). It is extensively used in w. and s. Asia, n. Africa, and s. Europe. The stalks make an excellent fodder for cattle, while the grain is fed to poultry, and affords a nutritious and palatable food for man. It is possible that under the Hebrew dōhan other allied species of cereals may be included, and especially Sorghum vulgare, the Indian millet, a taller grass much cultivated in India and s.w. Asia.

Mil'lo (mil'ō) [filling, terrace, artificial elevation, citadel]. 1. A house, probably a fortress, at Shechem (Judg. 9:6, 20).

2. A bastion at Jerusalem, in existence in the time of David, rebuilt by Solomon, and strengthened by Hezekiah as a precaution against the expected siege by the Assyrians (II Sam. 5:9; I Kings 9:15, 24; 11:27; II Chron. 32:5). See JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Mine. The operation of mining, by which gold, silver, iron, copper, and precious stones were obtained, is graphically described in Job 28:1-11. The Egyptians carried on mining operations from an early period. As early as the 4th dynasty they discovered copper in Wadi Magharah, in the Sinai peninsula, and commenced mining and smelting operations, which continued for many years. They also worked the turquoise mines at Serabit el-Khadem on the Sinai peninsula, about 50 miles from the traditional site of Mount Sinai. The miners were criminals, prisoners of war, and slaves, working under the whip of the taskmaster and often in fetters. The mines had broad, low openings. The shaft penetrated to a considerable depth. The roof was supported by pillars of stone which the miners left and by timber of acacia wood. The gold and silver mines of Spain were celebrated (I Macc. 8:3). Canaan was described to the expectant Israelites as "a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig copper" (Deut. 8:9); see EZION-GERBER. That the Hebrews understood how to drive shafts is shown by the tunnel which they cut from the Fountain of the Virgin to the Pool of Siloam.

Min'ia-min (mīn'yā-mīn) [see MIJAMIN]. 1. One of those who, under the direction of a Levite, Kore, took charge of the freewill offerings in the Temple and distributed them to the Levites during Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:15).

2. A father's house among the priests in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17); see MIJAMIN 2.

3. A priest; one of those who blew trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41); see MIJAMIN 4.

Min'is-ter. 1. A personal attendant and helper, not a menial. Joseph, the slave, when raised to a position of honor and trust in his master's household, "ministered unto him"

Women at the Mill

(Gen. 39:4). Abishag was given honorable and influential place by David, and she ministered to him (I Kings 1:4, 15). Joshua attended Moses, took charge of the first tent of meeting, and succeeded Moses in office (Ex. 24:13; 33:11; Josh. 1:1). Elisha attended Elijah, poured water on his hands, and succeeded him (I Kings 19:21; II Kings 3:11). The attendant of the synagogue aided the officiating teacher in the service (Luke 4:20). The disciples attended Jesus and were eyewitnesses (Luke 1:2; Acts 26:16). John Mark attended Paul and Barnabas during a part of the First Missionary Journey (Acts 13:5).

2. A public functionary in the service of the state or of God (Heb. m'shârêth, Gr. leitourgos): as the priests and Levites in the performance of the duties of the sanctuary (Ex. 28:43; Num. 3:31; Deut. 18:5; Isa. 61:6; cf. LXX; Luke 1:23; Heb. 9:21); Christ as high priest in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 8:2); Paul in administering the gospel to the Gentiles (Rom. 15:16). The epithet is applied to the civil magistrate as a public official (Rom. 13:6). It designates an attaché of the royal court (I Kings 10:5), often a person of high rank (II Chron. 22:8; Esth. 1:10), and it is used of the angels (Ps. 103:21; 104:4).

3. One engaged in the service of another, and regarded primarily as the master's own representative and servant, and not as acting in behalf of others (Gr. diakonos); for example, a magistrate as the representative of God, "an avenger for wrath to him that doeth evil" (Rom. 13:4). It is used especially for God's minister in the gospel: as Timothy (I Thess. 3:2), Paul and Apollos (I Cor. 3:5), Tychicus (Eph. 6:21), Epaphras (Col. 1:7). The term diakonos was also used in a restricted sense for deacon, a church officer with specified duties distinguishing him from a bishop.

Min'ni (mîn'î). A people of Armenia (Jos. Antiq. i. 3, 6) inhabiting the district near Lake Van, probably between that and Lake Urmia, and adjacent to the kingdom of Ararat on the Araxes. In 830 B.C. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, pillaged the country of the Minni. In 716 B.C. and again in 715 the king of the Minni revolted against Assyria, but in 714 he was subdued anew. The Minni continued to give trouble at intervals, especially during the reign of the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (669-626); till at length in 612 B.C. they took part with the Medes, Cimmerians, and other nationalities in capturing Nineveh and ending the Assyrian Empire. In Jer. 51:27, R.V., the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz are described as uniting for the destruction of Babylon.

Min'nith (mîn'îth). A town of the Ammonite country (Judg. 11:33). It exported wheat to Tyre (Ezek. 27:17). According to Eusebius, there was a village called Manith 4 Roman miles from Heshbon in the direction of Philadelphia.

Min'strel. A musician (Rev. 18:22, in A.V. musician); especially one who sings to the accompaniment of an instrument. 1. Hebrew menaggēn, which is rendered minstrel in II Kings 3:15, signifies a player on a stringed instrument, as harp or lyre. Music was employed by the Hebrews to still excitement; and when Saul was troubled by an evil spirit, David was summoned to the court to act as minstrel (I Sam. 16:14-23). Music, sometimes at least, formed part of the religious exercises of the prophets (I Sam. 10:5-10); and Elisha summoned a minstrel to play before him while he waited for God to speak to him (II Kings 3:15). The music calmed the prophet's mind, recalled his thoughts from the outside world, and gladdened his spirit.

"Prophecy," says Maimonides, "dwelleth not in the midst of melancholy nor in the midst of apathy, but in the midst of joy."

2. The minstrels hired by Jairus (Matt. 9:23, A.V.) were "flute-players" (R.V.), who with singers and wailing women were employed as professional mourners (II Chron. 35:25; Jer. 9:17-20; cf. ch. 48:31 with v. 36).

Mint. An herb of the genus Mentha, of which there are several species. It is called in Greek hēdyosmon, sweet-smelling (Matt. 23:23). Horsemint (Mentha sylvestris) is the most common species in Syria, and grows wild on all the hills. It is not known certainly which sort the ancient Israelites cultivated.

Miph'kad (mîf'kād). See HAMMIPHKAD.

Mir'a'cle. Miracles are wonders, signs, types, powers, works of God (Deut. 11:3; 29:3; Ps. 78:7, 11, 12, 43; 95:9; Mark 9:39; Luke 23:8; John 2:11, 23; 9:3; Acts 2:22; 6:8; 8:13; see R.V.). They are not merely supernatural events, like the creation of the world; for God is not represented as bringing the universe into existence as a sign of attestation. The locusts which were blown into Egypt by the strong e. wind and blown away again by the w. wind (Ex. 10:13, 19), and the arrival of quails, which migrate in the spring and supplied the camp of Israel with meat for an evening (Ex. 16:13), were extraordinary providences, but with additional elements. They were foretold and were intended as signs. The plague of locusts was one of the signs and wonders wrought at Zoan (Ps. 78:43, 46), and the quails were sent that Israel might know that Jehovah is God and their God (Ex. 16:12). In the narrowest Biblical sense, miracles are events in the external world, wrought by the immediate power of God and intended as a sign or attestation. They are possible because God sustains, controls, and guides all things, and is personal and omnipotent. Perhaps the manner of working these deeds in the realm of the physical universe is illustrated by the power of the human will. Man wills, and muscular force is exerted which controls or counteracts nature's laws, as when one hurls a stone into the air against the law of gravitation.

Miracles are not to be credulously received, but their genuineness must be tested. The tests are: 1. They exhibit the character of God and teach truths concerning God. 2. They are in harmony with the established truths of religion (Deut. 13:1-3). If a wonder is worked which contradicts the doctrines of the Bible, it is a lying wonder (II Thess. 2:9; Rev. 16:14). 3. There is an adequate occasion for them. God does not work them except for great cause and for a religious purpose. They belong to the history of redemption, and there is no genuine miracle without an adequate occasion for it in God's redemptive revelation of himself. 4. They are established, not by the number of witnesses, but by the character and qualifications of the witnesses.

The miracles of the Bible are confined almost exclusively to 4 periods, separated from each other by centuries. The time of: 1. The redemption of God's people from Egypt and their establishment in Canaan under Moses and Joshua. 2. The life-and-death struggle of the true religion with heathenism under Elijah and Elisha. 3. The Exile, when Jehovah afforded proof of his power and supremacy over the gods of the heathen, although his people were in captivity (Daniel and his companions). 4. The introduction of Christianity, when miracles attested the person of Christ and his doctrine. Outside these periods miracles are rare indeed (Gen. 5:24). They were almost totally unknown during the many centuries from the Creation to the Exodus.

The working of miracles in the Apostolic Age, although not confined to the apostles (Acts 6:8; 8:5-7), were the signs of an apostle (II Cor. 12:12; Heb. 2:4; cf. Acts 2:43; Gal. 3:15).

Miracles of Our Lord. In the following list are considered the miracles wrought by our Lord during his life in the flesh, and one (No. 18) performed after the resurrection is included. For obvious reasons other miraculous events associated with the career of Jesus have been omitted: annunciation by the angels, Virgin birth, angels' song, appearances of angels to Joseph to protect the Child Jesus, the star of the Magi, descent of dove and voice at baptism of Jesus, transfiguration and voice heard in that connection, falling to ground of soldiers (John 18:6), opening of graves after death of Jesus, rending of veil of Temple, darkness over land, earthquake, the resurrection, entering a room through closed doors (John 20:26), and the ascension.

Num. 26:59). It was probably she who watched over the ark which contained the infant Moses (Ex. 2:4-8). After the passage of the Red Sea, she took a timbrel and led the Israelite women with timbrels and with dances, saying:

"Sing ye to Jehovah, for he hath triumphed gloriously;

The horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." (Ex. 15:20, 21.)

She was a prophetess, and she and her brothers were chosen by God to be leaders of the Hebrew people (Ex. 4:15, 29, 30; Micah 6:4); but she instigated Aaron, and they made Moses' marriage with a Cushite woman the occasion of murmuring against his superior position and influence. They claimed that God had spoken by them as well as by Moses. For this insubordination to the will of God, she was made a leper as white as snow, but owing to the intercession of Moses was speedily healed (Num. 12:1-16; Deut. 24:9). She

Mir'iam (mīr'i-ām) [obstinacy, rebellion].

1. Sister of Aaron and of Moses (Ex. 15:20; died in Kadesh, and was buried there (Num. 20:1).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Ezra (I Chron. 4:17).

Mir'mah (mūr'mā), in A.V. Mir'ma (mūr'mā) [deceit]. A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (I Chron. 8:10).

Mir'ror. A polished surface intended to reflect objects, especially the face (Wisd. of Sol. 7:26; II Cor. 3:18; James 1:23). Ancient mirrors were made of molten brass or other alloy of copper (Ex. 38:8; Job 37:18), and were round, oval, and square, and often provided with a handle. If they acquired rust spots, they were polished anew (Ecclus. 12:11). They lacked the perfection of the modern glass, and the image in them was less clear and true (I Cor. 13:12). As the material was metal, R.V. substitutes mirror for glass, the rendering of A.V.

Later, in the West, mirrors were sometimes made of tin. Praxiteles, in the time of Pompey, is said to have been the first to make them of silver. They were even made of gold.

Mirror, Probably of the First Century, A.D.

Mis'gab (mīs'gāb) [high place, the high fort]. An unidentified Moabite city (Jer. 48:1), but it may not be a proper name (cf. R.V. marg.).

Mish'a-el (mīsh'ā-ēl) [who is what God is?]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (Ex. 6:22; Lev. 10:4).

2. One of Daniel's 3 companions, called by the Babylonians Meshach (Dan. 1:6, 7, 11, 19; 2:17; I Macc. 2:59).

3. One of those who stood by Ezra when he preached to the people (Neh. 8:4).

Mī'shal (mī'shāl), in A.V. once Mish'eal (Josh. 19:26). A village of Asher (Josh. 19:26), given with its suburbs to the Levites of the Gershonite family (Josh. 21:30); called Mashal in I Chron. 6:74. Probably located in the plain s. of Acre toward Tell Nahl.

Mī'sham (mī'shām) [swift; cf. Arab. sa'ama, to walk swiftly (of a camel)]. A Benjamite, a son of Elpaal, with his brothers built Ono and Lod (I Chron. 8:12).

Mish'eal (mīsh'ē-āl). See MISHAL.

Mish'ma (mīsh'mā) [hearing; but perhaps, mixed with black and white; cf. Arab. thamgha]. 1. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:14; I Chron. 1:30). The name perhaps lingers either in Jebel Misma', midway between Damascus and Jaufr, or in the other Jebel Misma', about 150 miles due e. of Teima.

2. A descendant of Simeon (I Chron. 4:25).

Mish-man'nah (mīsh-mān'ā) [fatness, tit-bit]. One of the Gadites who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:10).

Mish'ra-ites (mīsh'rā-its). A family which was connected with Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:53).

Mis'par (mīs'pār), in A.V. Miz'par [a narrative, a number]. One of those who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:2). In Neh. 7:7 the feminine form, Mispereth, is used.

Mis'pe-reth (mīs'pē-rēth). See MISPAR.

Mis're-photh-ma'im (mīs'rē-fōth-mā'im) [hot springs]. A place to which Joshua pursued the kings defeated at the waters of Merom (Josh. 11:8), on the frontier of the country of the Sidonians (Josh. 13:6). It is now commonly, and probably correctly, identified with Khirbet el-Musheirifeh, 11 miles n. of Acre, and ½ mile from the sea, at the foot of Rās en-Nakūrah.

Mite. A small coin, worth about ⅓ cent (Mark 12:42). See MONEY.

Mi'ter. The headdress or turban, called in Hebrew misnepheth, which was worn by the high priest. It was made of fine linen. Its distinguishing characteristic was a golden plate inscribed with the words "Holiness to the Lord," and affixed in front by a blue-colored lace (Ex. 28:4, 36-39; Lev. 16:4; Ezek. 21:26, in A.V. diadem); see HIGH PRIEST, and for Zech. 3:5 see DIADEM 1, 2.

Mith'kah (mīth'kā), in A.V. Mith'eah (mīth'kā) [sweetness]. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:28, 29); perhaps Wādī Abu Takiyeh, which descends from Nakb el-Arūd to Wādī Jerāfi.

Mith'nite (mīth'nīt). Probably an inhabitant of a town called Methen (I Chron. 11:43).

Mith're-dath (mīth'rē-dāth) [from Old Pers., gift of Mithra (Persian god of the light of the zone between heaven and hell, defender of the truth)]. 1. Treasurer under Cyrus, king of Persia, through whom the sacred vessels were restored to the Jews (Ezra 1:8).

2. One of those who in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus complained that the Jews were rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:7).

Mit'y-le'ne (mīt-ī-lē'nē). A city on the island of Lesbos, visited by Paul in going from Assos to Chios (Acts 20:13-15).

Mī'zar (mī'zār) [small]. A hill on the e. side of the Jordan, probably within sight of the peaks of Hermon (Ps. 42:6).

Miz'pah (mīz'pā) and Miz'peh [watch-tower]. 1. The name given to the cairn n. of the Jabbok, called Galeed or heap of witness, to indicate the special thing to which it bore witness, namely, that God is the watcher between the covenanting parties (Gen. 31:44-49); see GALEED.

2. A town in Gilead, e. of the Jordan (Judg. 10:17; 11:11); probably identical with Mizpeh of Gilead (Judg. 11:29) and with Ramath-mizpeh or height of Mizpeh (Josh. 13:26), otherwise known as Ramoth in Gilead or Ramoth-gilead (Deut. 4:43; I Kings 4:13) and Ramah (II Kings 8:28, 29). It was situated in the territory of Gad, on the boundary (Josh. 13:26), assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:38), and appointed a city of refuge (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8). Jephthah dwelt here (Judg. 11:34), and it was the residence of the taxgatherer for one of the twelve districts into which Solomon divided the country (I Kings 4:13). To gain and hold possession of it battles were fought between Israel and the Syrians (I Kings 22:3 seq.; II Kings 8:28). It was taken and burned by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:35, A.V., Maspha). According to Eusebius, it lay 15 Roman miles w. of Philadelphia, on the Jabbok. It is supposed to have been at el-Hoṣn in 'Ajlūn, about 10 miles s.w. of er-Ramthah, but another suggestion is that it was located at er-Ramthah.

3. A place at the foot of Mount Hermon (Josh. 11:3). The land of Mizpah is probably the same as the valley of Mizpeh (v. 8). Robinson located it 8 miles w.n.w. of Bāniās at Muṭallah, at the s. end of the broad and fertile plain, the Merj 'Ayūn, between the Haṣbāny and the Liṭāny, but this is considered by many as not far enough to the e. Accordingly some prefer a height 2 miles n.e. of Bāniās, where are now the ruins of the castle Kal'at es-Subeibeh.

4. A village in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:38). Eusebius located it n. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), in the direction of Jerusalem. There are Khirbet Ṣāfiyeh about 2 miles n.e. of Beit Jibrin and Ṣufiyeḥ 6 miles n. of the same place; either may be the site.

5. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26), not far from Ramah (v. 25; I Kings 15:22) and over against Jerusalem (I Macc. 3:46, A.V., Maspha). The tribes were summoned to it at times for conferences (I Sam. 7:5-17; 10:17; Judg. 20:1-3; 21:1, 5, 8). It was fortified by Asa as a defense against the n. tribes (I Kings 15:22; II Chron. 16:6). After the destruction of Jerusalem, the Babylonian governor fixed his residence here (II Kings 25:23-25; Jer. 40:6-16; 41:1-16). It was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. 3:7, 15, 19). Robinson located it at Neby Samwil, 4½ miles n.w. of Jerusalem. The place is 2,935 feet above the sea level, and 500 feet higher than the surrounding country. Many scholars, however, follow Badé, who identifies it with Tell en-Naṣbeh, the summit of an isolated hill between Wadi Jiliān and its tributary Wadi Duweit, about 8 miles n. of Jerusalem and almost 2 s. of el-Bireh.

6. A place in Moab (I Sam. 22:3), perhaps Rujm el-Meshrefeh, w.s.w. of Mādabā.

Miz'par (miz'pār). See MISPAR.

Miz'peh (miz'pē). See MIZPAH.

Miz'ra'im (miz'rā'im). Egypt, the form (probably a dual) pointing to the 2 countries of Upper and Lower Egypt, settled by descendants of Ham (Gen. 10:6); see EGYPT, I. 1; II. 1.

Miz'zah (miz'ā). The chief of a tribe in the land of Edom, a descendant of Esau, and also of Ishmael (Gen. 36:3, 4, 13, 17; I Chron. 1:37).

Mna'son (nā'sōn). An early disciple from Cyprus, who accompanied Paul on his last journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem, and with whom the apostle was to lodge (Acts 21:16).

Mo'ab (mō'āb) [probably, desirable; perhaps, seed of a father]. 1. Son of Lot by an incestuous union with his elder daughter (Gen. 19:37).

2. The descendants of Moab, Lot's son, closely related to the Ammonites (Gen. 19:37, 38). They had become numerous before the time that the Israelites crossed the Red Sea (Ex. 15:15); had taken possession of the country from the plain of Heshbon unto the Seil el-Kerāhi, which emerges at the s. end of the Dead Sea, and formed the boundary of Moab toward Edom; and with their kindred the Ammonites had absorbed and destroyed the remnants of the stalwart race which had previously occupied the country e. of the Jordan (Deut. 2:10, 11, 19-21; cf. Gen. 14:5). Shortly before the arrival of the Israelites, Sihon, king of the Amorites, had wrested from them the pasture land n. of the Arnon, though the country was still remembered as the land of Moab, confining Moab for a time to the country s. of the Arnon (Num. 21:13-15, 26-30). The Moabites showed a commercial friendliness to the migrating Israelites (Deut. 2:28, 29), but refused them permission to pass through their land (Judg. 11:17; cf. Deut. 23:4). Doubtless because of the kinship between the Moabites and Israelites, Moses was forbidden to attack them (Deut. 2:9; cf. v. 19). Nevertheless, the king of Moab, alarmed when the Israelites encamped in his vicinity, sent for Balaam to curse them (Num., chs. 22 to 24; Josh. 24:9). For this hostile attitude the Israelites were commanded to exclude them from the congregation to the 10th generation, and to maintain a coldness and indifference toward them forever (Deut. 23:3-6; Neh. 13:1). The last encampment of the Israelites before they crossed the Jordan was at Shittim in the plains that lay within the old bounds of Moab (Num. 22:1; Josh. 3:1). While they were there, Moabite and Midianite women seduced them to licentious idolatry (Num., ch. 25; Hos. 9:10).

Early in the time of the Judges Eglon, king of Moab, invaded Canaan, established his seat of government at Jericho, and oppressed the Israelites of the adjacent hill country 18 years until he was assassinated by Ehud (Judg. 3:12-30). Elimelech sojourned in Moab, and thence came his 2 daughters-in-law, Orpah and Ruth. Ruth married Boaz and became the ancestress of David (Ruth 1:22; 4:3, 5, 10, 13-17; Matt. 1:5-16). Saul warred with the Moabites (I Sam. 14:47), and David, when a fugitive from Saul, put his father and mother in charge of the king of Moab (ch. 22:3, 4). After David became king, he overcame the Moabites, laid them under tribute, and doomed a large proportion of them to death (II Sam. 8:2, 12; I Chron. 18:2, 11). The Moabites were subject to Omri and his son; but on the death of Ahab they rebelled, and neither of Omri's grandsons, Ahaziah, who was incapacitated for the attempt by a fall, and Jehoram, was able to subdue them (II Kings 1:1; 3:4-27; Moabite Stone, see MOABITE STONE). Jehoshaphat was king of Judah at that time, and the Moabites formed a confederacy with the Ammonites, Edomites, and others for the invasion of Judah, but the allies turned their weapons against each other, and Judah did not need to strike a blow (II Chron. 20:1-30; cf. Ps. 60:8; 83:6; 108:9). The year that Elisha died, bands of Moabites invaded the Kingdom of Israel (II Kings 13:20). They paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser and Sennacherib, kings of Assyria. They entered Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim (II Kings 24:2). Many of the towns n. of the Arnon had reverted to Moab (cf. Isa., ch. 15). The prophets denounced the Moabites often as types of the enemies of the Kingdom of God (Isa., chs. 15; 16; 25:10; Jer. 9:26; 25:21; 27:3; ch. 48; Ezek. 25:8-11; Amos 2:1, 2; Zeph. 2:8-11). Some of the Jews, who fled from Jerusalem when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judah, took refuge in Moab, but returned when Gedaliah was appointed governor (Jer. 40:11 seq.). Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the Moabites (Jos. Antiq. x, 9, 7). They disappear henceforth from history as a nation, though still existing as a race (Ezra 9:1; Neh. 13:1, 23; Jos. Antiq. i, 11, 5). Alexander Jannaeus placed them under tribute (Jos. Antiq. xiii, 13, 5).

3. The country occupied by the Moabites. There was c. 1900 B.C. a thoroughgoing destruction visited upon all the great fortresses and settlements of the land, which in consequence had no sedentary population until the 13th century B.C.; then a new agricultural civilization appeared. Moab was bounded on the w. by the Dead Sea; it was separated from Edom on the s. by the Seil el-Kerāhi, known in its upper course as Wadi el-Hesā. This fact is learned from the towns which are mentioned as situated in Moabite territory. On the e. lay the desert (Num. 21:11). The n. boundary which the Amorites and Israelites recognized was the Arnon (Num. 21:13; Deut. 2:36; 3:12; Josh. 12:1; Judg. 11:18), but the Moabites at an early date possessed (Num. 21:26), and always regarded as theirs and frequently occupied, a considerable district n. of the river (Isa., ch. 15; Moabite Stone, 8-30, see MOABITE STONE). Moab is chiefly a rolling plateau, about 3,200 feet above the level of the sea, and is well adapted for pasturage. The w. edge descends abruptly to the Dead Sea, and the face of the bluff is cut by deep valleys. Machaerus, the place where John the Baptist was imprisoned and beheaded, lay in the land of Moab, e. of the Dead Sea and n. of the Arnon. The shore of the Dead Sea is comparatively fertile from the great abundance of springs.

The field of Moab was the territory of Moab (Gen. 36:35; Num. 21:20, R.V.). The plains of Moab were those parts of the Arabah or level valley of the Jordan which at one time were included within the bounds of Moab. They lay on the e. of the river, opposite Jericho, and along the e. shore of the Dead Sea (Num. 22:1; 33:48, 49).

Mo'ab-ite (mō'āb-it) Stone. An inscribed stone found within the territory of Moab and recording Moabite history. On the 19th of August, 1868, Rev. F. Klein, a German in the employ of the Church Missionary Society, was encamped at Dhibān, the ruins of the ancient Moabite town of Dibon, when he was informed by a sheik that within 10 minutes' walk from his tent there lay an inscribed stone. Proceeding to the spot, he found lying on its back a slab of black basalt, 3 feet 10 inches high, 2 feet broad, and a foot and 2½ inches thick, rounded at the top and the bottom to nearly a semicircle. The inscription consisted of 34 lines of writing in an unknown character, running across the stone, about an inch and a quarter apart. He at once set on foot negotiations for its transfer to the Berlin Museum. Unhappily, M. Clermont-Ganneau, of the French Consulate, also attempted to obtain it for the Paris Museum. This ran it up to a nearly prohibitory price. Then the Arabs fell to fighting over the expected money. The dispute settled nothing, so, kindling a fire under the stone and pouring water on it when it was hot, they broke it into fragments, which they distributed among the several granaries to act as blessings to the grain. Prior to the destruction, a messenger from M. Clermont-Ganneau had obtained a squeeze of the inscription; but having to escape precipitately on horseback and crumpling up the paper while it was still wet, he broke it into seven pieces, and it was not of much use. Better squeezes of the two larger portions of the broken stone were afterward obtained by a messenger from Sir Charles Warren and by another from M. Clermont-Ganneau; finally many of the fragments were recovered and as far as possible placed together by M. Clermont-Ganneau. Although parts here and there are uncertain or missing, the inscription is in the main quite intelligible and clear. The stone with the missing parts supplied in plaster of Paris from the squeezes is now in the Museum of the Louvre in Paris. It was found that of about 1,100 letters, 669 in all, or less than ¾, had been recovered, and that the language was akin to Hebrew. The inscription is as follows:

To judge from Mesha's own words, the stele was a memorial commemorative not merely of his recovery of independence for Moab from Israel, but of his glorious and successful reign as a whole (I. 4, 31); it was erected late in his reign, after the death of Ahab, after the humiliation of that house also, and not improbably after the extinction of the line of Omri by Jehu, and the entrance of Israel into its period of dire distress (I. 7). The Hebrew records date the revolt of Moab after the death of Ahab (II Kings 1:1; 3:5). See OMRI 4; MESHA, III. 2.

Mo'a-di'ah (mō'ā-dī'ā) [Jehovah summons (or promises, in Arabic)]. A father's house among the priests in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17; see MAADIAH.

Mo'din (mō'dīn) [informers or prognosticators, prognostication (cf. Isa. 47:13)]. The native town of the Maccabees (I Macc. 2:1), with the family tomb where Mattathias and 2 of his sons, Judas and Jonathan, were buried (I Macc. 2:70; 9:19; 13:25). It stood on the edge of the plain of Philistia (ch. 16:4, 5), and the tomb was visible from the sea (ch. 13:29 seq.). In Hebrew it was called Mōdī'im and Mōdī'ith. The town was still in existence in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, in the vicinity of Diospolis (Lydda). The Talmud states its distance from Jerusalem at 15 Roman miles. The most probable location is el-Medyeh (or el-Midyah), a village about 7 miles e. of Lydda and about 16 from the sea. South of the village is a conical knoll, Er-Rās, from the top of which Joppa and the sea are visible; this may have been the site of Simon's tomb.

Mo'a-dah (mōl'ā-dā) [birth, origin]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:26), assigned to the Simeonites (Josh. 19:2; I Chron. 4:28). It was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:26). It is doubtless the town known in the Greek period as Malatha, in Idumaea, to which Herod Agrippa I, during the earlier and less prosperous period of his life, retired in debt and in depression of spirits (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 2). The Onomasticon locates Malatha 4 Roman miles from Arad and on the road from Hebron to Aila, that is Elath; identified with Tell el-Milh, on the Roman road 7½ miles s.w. of Arad, where there are vestiges of an extensive town with important wells. It is about 14 miles e. by s. from Beer-sheba, and 22 s. by w. from Hebron.

Mole. 1. The rendering of Hebrew tinshe-meth (Lev. 11:30, A.V.). See CHAMELEON.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew words hāphōr pērōth, digging of holes or digging of rats (Isa. 2:20). The 2 words are better regarded as one, hāphar-pārōth, diggers. These may be rats or moles. It is believed that no species of Talpa, the genus to which the common mole (T. europaea) belongs, exists in Palestine, its place being taken by the mole rat (Spalax typhlus), which is probably the animal intended by Isaiah. This animal is very common in the Holy Land, living underground in small groups. It resembles the mole in appearance, but is not of the same order, being a rodent feeding on vegetables, chiefly bulbs, whereas the mole is insectivorous. It is larger than the mole, being 8 or more inches long. It is silvery gray in color, is tailless, and has only minute or rudimentary eyes.

Mo'lech (mō'lēk), in A.V. twice Mo'loch, a spelling introduced into the English version through the LXX of Amos 5:26 and its quotation by Stephen in Acts 7:43. The Hebrew text and R.V. have "your king" in place of Moloch [Heb. melek, king, with the vowels of bōsheth, shame, in order to show contempt for the heathen god]. A deity worshiped by the children of Ammon (I Kings 11:7). The article is prefixed to his name where it occurs in Hebrew, indicating that the word is not a proper name, but an appellative preserving its meaning of "reigning one." He was known also as Milcom (I Kings 11:5, 33) and Malcām (Jer. 49:1, 3, R.V.; Zeph. 1:5; and R.V. marg., II Sam. 12:30; I Chron. 20:2), proper names formed by the familiar terminations ōm and ām. He was an aspect of Baal (Jer. 32:35), whose name is a common noun likewise and signifies lord. Baal was worshiped with human sacrifices at Tyre under the name of Melcart, king of the city; and an exceedingly detestable feature of Molech's worship was the burning of children to him in the fire. The practice was in vogue early; and the Mosaic law was enacted that if any man made or permitted his children to "pass through the fire to Molech" he was to be put to death (Lev. 18:21; 20:1-5). Nevertheless Solomon in his old age erected an altar to Milcom, being led into this idolatry by his Ammonite wives; and in the following centuries children were burned to Molech in the valley of Hinnom at the high place of Topheth (Ps. 106:38; Jer. 7:31; 19:4, 5; Ezek. 16:21; 23:37, 39; cf. Isa. 30:33). Ahaz burned children of his there (II Chron. 28:3), and Manasseh made at least one of his sons pass through the fire (II Kings 21:6). The n. Israelites were also guilty of this hideous rite (II Kings 17:17; Ezek. 23:37). Josiah destroyed the altars which Solomon built on the mount of corruption to this false divinity and other heathen gods, and defiled the high place of Topheth (II Kings 23:10, 13).

Mo'lid (mō'līd) [begetter]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:29).

Mo'loch (mō'lōk). See MOLECH.

Mol'ten Sea or Brazen Sea. A great basin made by Solomon of brass which David had taken as booty (I Chron. 18:3). It stood in the inner court of the Temple between the altar of burnt offering and the sanctuary.

somewhat toward the s., and was intended for the priests to wash their hands and feet in before entering the sanctuary or approaching the altar (I Kings 7:39; II Chron. 4:6; Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 6; cf. Ex. 30:18-21). It was round, 10 cubits in diameter and 5 in height, and held 2,000 baths (I Kings 7:23, 26; in II Chron. 4:5 incorrectly 3,000). The brim curved outward like a cup, and the sides were ornamented with 2 rows of knobs underneath the brim (I Kings 7:24, 26). It was not an exact hemisphere, but its sides bulged out like a tulip, as appears from the statement of its capacity and from the comparison of it to a lily. It stood upon 12 brazen oxen, in 4 groups of 3 each, facing the 4 quarters. Ahaz took it down from the oxen (II Kings 16:17); and finally, when Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, he broke the basin in pieces (II Kings 25:13, 16; Jer. 27:19-22).

Money. Barter was originally the method of exchange. Thus Latin pecunia (money) from pecus (cattle) shows that once cattle were the standard of value. Coins were probably first issued in the 8th century B.C., in Asia Minor, where lived the Lydians and Greeks. According to Herodotus (I. 94) the Lydians were the first to issue coins. Staters, made of an alloy of gold with silver called electron, were struck in Lydia in Asia Minor and silver coins at Aegina as early as 700 to 650 B.C. In the rest of w. Asia and in Egypt people were content to use gold and silver in bars, rings, and other forms, probably stamped with the value, but not issued by authority (Josh. 7:21; and cf. name of talent, kikkār, circle). In business transactions reliance was not placed on the stamp, but the quantity was determined by weighing (Gen. 23:16; 43:21; see WEIGHTS. Counting was rarely resorted to (II Kings 12:10 seq.), and then only to form a general estimate. Shekel in the early period does not mean a coin bearing an authoritative stamp, but a certain weight (shekel) of silver. The weights formed a series in the denomination of talent, maneh, shekel, gerah, and beka or half shekel; see WEIGHTS. References to shekels or other denominations of precious metal before the time of native Jewish coinage are to uncoined metal, not to coins. Darius Hystaspis, 521-486 B.C., is credited with the introduction of coinage into Persia (Herod. iv. 166), whereby the Jews became acquainted with coins. The ordinary daric (Ezra 2:69; in A.V. dram) was a thick gold coin, showing on one side the king, kneeling and holding a bow and a javelin. On the reverse was an irregular square, doubtless the mark of the punch with which the lump of metal was driven into the die. It was worth about $5.50; see DARIC. After the fall of the Persian Empire, the Greek system came into vogue in Palestine, and money was reckoned by talents and drachmas (I Macc. 11:28; II Macc. 4:19).

In the year 141-140 B.C., Simon Maccabaeus obtained the right to coin money for his nation with his own stamp (I Macc. 15:6), but apparently the privilege was soon withdrawn (v. 27). The small copper coin of John Hyrcanus bears on the obverse within a wreath of olive the inscription, "Jehohanan the high priest, and the community of the Jews." The reverse has a Greek symbol, the double cornucopia with a poppy head in the center. Herod the Great and his successors down to Herod Agrippa II issued copper coins, but only with Greek legends.

The money of the Greeks, however, continued to circulate along with the Jewish coinage. The coins consisted of drachmas and tetradrachmas. The silver drachma (Luke 15:8, R.V. marg.) in the time of the Herods and the procurators was equivalent to the Roman denarius and worth about 16 cents; the silver stater or tetradrachma (Matt. 17:27 marg.), struck by the Greek cities of Syria and Phoenicia, was worth about 66 cents, but soon afterward became much debased. The lepton was a small copper coin (Luke 12:59; 21:2, rendered mite), not the lepton of the Greek system, but the smallest copper coin in circulation, worth about  $\frac{1}{4}$  cent and equal to half the quadrans (Mark 12:42). It was a Jewish coin, for only Jewish money was allowed to be offered in the Temple; and it was probably a copper coin issued by John Hyrcanus or another Maccabaeus prince. The drachma, which corresponded to the half shekel (Matt. 17:24 marg.), was probably not in circulation or but little used in Palestine. The talent employed in Palestine (I Macc. 11:28; Matt. 18:24) was the Attic talent, which Alexander had made the lawful standard throughout his empire and which afterward maintained its supremacy. It was not a coin, but money of account; was divided into minas (I Macc. 14:24; Luke 19:13-25, Gr. mnā, mina, rendered pound); and it consisted of 60 minas or 6,000 drachmas. A mina consisted of 100 drachmas. It suffered great depreciation, the drachma falling off from about 67.5 grains to about 55 grains or 16 cents under the early Caesars. Pound (Gr. mnā=mina) as a sum of money was equivalent to 100 drachmas and worth about 16 dollars (Luke 19:13, R.V. marg.; cf. 15:8, R.V. marg.).

With the advent of the Romans in Palestine, the money of the Romans had also come into circulation. The denarius (Matt. 18:28; A.V., penny; R.V., shilling) was a silver coin. In the time of the empire its obverse almost invariably bore the head of the reigning sovereign or of some member of the imperial family. From the time of Augustus to that of Nero, its standard weight was 60 grains, equivalent to about 17 cents. It was the tribute money payable by the Jews to the imperial treasury (Matt. 22:19). The assarion (Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6, A.V., farthing; R.V., penny), the Greek name of the Roman as, was a small copper coin, the value of which was reduced in 217 B.C. to  $\frac{1}{16}$  of a denarius or to about 1 cent. The quadrans (Matt. 5:26; Mark 12:42, rendered farthing) was the 4th part of an as, or  $\frac{1}{4}$  cent. The procurators of Judea were also accustomed to coin money. They issued copper pieces in the name of the imperial family and with the legend in Greek letters. One coin bears the name of Ti. Claudius Caesar Germanicus written in Greek on the margin, and in the center two palm branches laid crosswise with the date, "year 14," between them. The reverse contains the name of the emperor's wife, Julia Agrippina. It was struck in A.D. 54, during the procuratorship of Felix.

The gold coin which was current in Palestine during the N.T. period was the Roman denarius aureus, generally termed simply aureus (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 8, 5, rendered pieces of gold), which passed for 25 silver denarii.

Silver Half Shekel of Year 1 of the First Revolt
(A.D. 66-70)

A national coinage of silver was struck by the Jews during the First Revolt (A.D. 66-70) and also during the Second Revolt (A.D. 132-135). On the suppression of the First Revolt and the capture of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), coins such as that shown in the accompanying cut were struck in Rome with the image and name of the emperor Vespasian on the obverse, and a female captive under a palm tree, with the inscription "Judaea subdued" or "Judaea captive" on the reverse. Herod Agrippa II, king of part of Galilee and the region to the e., continued to issue copper coins after the fall of Jerusalem. Some dating from the reign of Titus bear the head of the emperor, his name and titles, on the obverse; on the reverse a winged victory holding a wreath and a palm branch, and the date, "year 26 of King Agrippa."

(A.D. 66-70)

Capture of Jerusalem (Struck at Rome)

During the Second Revolt, which was headed by Bar-cocheba, A.D. 132-135, shekels and quarter shekels of silver and also of copper, with old Hebrew inscriptions, were again coined. The shekel shows a tetrastyle temple on the obverse, probably a conventional representation of the Beautiful Gate of the Temple at Jerusalem. At the sides of it appears the word Simon, the personal name of the leader of the revolt; while above it a star is introduced, doubtless in allusion to the surname of the leader, Bar-cocheba, son of a star. To obtain quarter shekels the Roman denarius was restruck, which at this time so nearly equaled the quarter shekel in value that it could be substituted for it without inconvenience.

Mon'ey-chang'ers. When a census was taken every Israelite, whether rich or poor, who had reached the age of 20 years was required to pay half a shekel into the treasury of the Lord as an offering to make atonement (Ex. 30:13-15). Later it was customary, according to Maimonides, to pay this poll tax annually. Besides this tax, pious Israelites made freewill offerings, which they cast into chests placed in the court of the women (Mark 12:41). This money had to be in native coin since several currencies circulated in Palestine in the time of Christ, and as multitudes of Jews from foreign lands visited Jerusalem at the passover, bringing the coin of their country with them, need arose of facilities for exchanging foreign for native money. The business of the money-changer sprang up. These men had stalls in the city, and as the feast approached they were admitted to the precincts of the Temple and placed their tables in the Court of the Gentiles. The commission paid for half a shekel was, according to the Talmud, a kollybos, equal to 12 grains of silver and worth about 3 cents. From this premium the money-changer was called a kollybistēs (Matt. 21:12), and from the table at which he sat a trapeitēs (Matt. 25:27). On two different occasions Jesus overturned the tables of the money-changers and drove the cattle dealers from the court, because their presence and too often their dishonesty and avarice were incompatible with the sanctity of the place and with the quiet which is necessary for worship (John 2:14-16; Matt. 21:12, 13).

Month. In Egypt the Israelites were acquainted with a year of 12 months of 30 days each, with 5 additional days to produce conformity with the solar year of 365 days (Herod. ii. 4), and in the account of the Flood the months are reckoned at 30 days each (Gen. 7:11, 24; 8:3, 4). Afterward, however, the Hebrews appear to have used a lunar month. This may be gathered from: (1) the 2 words for month which denote respectively new moon and lunation and indicate the original measurement; (2) passages like Gen. 1:14; Ps. 104:19; Eccles. 43:6-8; (3) the observance of the day of the new moon by special offerings to Jehovah (Num. 10:10; 28:11-14; II Chron. 2:4); and (4) the coincidence between the passover, which was always celebrated on the evening of the 14th day of the month, and the full moon (Ps. 81:3-5); see further Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 3 and 5; iv. 4, 6, and article YEAR. A lunation requires a little more than 29½ days. The months would accordingly average 29 and 30 days alternately. When, however, a month is spoken of generally, 30 days are meant (cf. Num. 20:29; Deut. 34:8 with ch. 21:13). The months were commonly distinguished by number. The names of only 4 Hebrew months are found in Bible narratives relating to the period before the Captivity. They are the 1st month, Abib (Ex. 13:4, etc.), the 2d month, Ziv (I Kings 6:37); the 7th, Ethanim (I Kings 8:2); and the 8th, Bul (I Kings 6:38). After the Captivity the names in common use among the Babylonians and other Semites were employed. See YEAR.

Moon. The principal luminary of the night (Gen. 1:16; Ps. 136:9), relied upon to measure time, marking off moons or months, and regulating the day of the passover, and thus aiding in regulating the feasts of the year (Gen. 1:14; Ps. 104:19; Eccles. 43:6, 7; Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 5). Almost all the nations with which the ancient Hebrews came into contact worshiped the moon. Ur of the Chaldees, from which Abraham emigrated, and Haran, where he settled for a time and where Jacob dwelt for 20 years, were noted seats of the moon's worship. When Abraham removed to Canaan, he had neighbors who worshiped the moon. The Egyptians sacrificed the pig to the moon, when the disk was at its full (Herod. ii. 47). In the time of the Assyrian and Babylonian invasions of Palestine, the Hebrews came again into contact with people who regarded the moon as one of the great gods. At this time the worship of the moon and other heavenly bodies made serious inroads on the religion of Jehovah (II Kings 21:3; 23:4, 5; Jer. 7:18; 8:2). The moon was adored by a kiss of the hand (Job 31:26, 27), with the burning of incense (II Kings 23:5). In heathen temples the moon was often represented by the crescent as a symbol and by an image in the form of a human being. This heathenism had its check in the sublime doctrine of Jehovah. The sun and moon were made by the God of Israel, were created for the useful purpose of giving light, and were serviceable to man in affording a convenient measurement of time.

Different from the worship of the moon was the conception that the varying appearance of the moon from night to night at its rising, during its course across the sky, and at its setting, which are due to atmospheric and astronomic conditions, presaged political occurrences. The aspect of the moon may indicate weather probabilities, but the folly of basing predictions of national events on such phenomena was pointed out by the prophets (Isa. 47:13). The Hebrews seem to have shared in the widespread belief that the moon may affect the health and under circumstances produce evil consequences to muscles and nerves. But the child of God can safely entrust himself to the watchful care of Jehovah (Ps. 121:6).

As the months were lunar, the new moon marked the beginning of the month, and the day of the new moon, being the commencement of a natural division of time, was observed as a holy day. No set convocation seems to have been prescribed, but additional sacrifices were offered (Num. 28:11-14), trumpets were blown (Num. 10:10; Ps. 81:3), ordinary labor was suspended (Amos 8:5), and the day offered favorable opportunity for religious instruction (II Kings 4:23; Ezek. 46:1, 3). It was kept with joy and feasting (I Sam. 20:5; Judith 8:6). The new moon of the 7th month marked the beginning of the 7th recurrence of a fixed portion of time and consequently fell under the Sabbath law and was observed as such in addition to the usual worship on the day of the new moon (Lev. 23:24, 25; Num. 29:1-6). After the Exile this celebration assumed the character of a new year's festival.

The advent of the new moon was calculated at an early period (I Sam. 20:5, 18). The Babylonian astrologers watched for it on the evening when it was expected to be seen, in order to take note of its appearance. According to the Talmud, the sanhedrin assembled 7 times a year early in the morning of the 30th day of the month. Watchmen were stationed on the heights about Jerusalem to watch for the new moon and report it as soon as seen. When the evidence of its appearance was deemed sufficient, the sanhedrin pronounced the word Mekuddash (consecrated), and the day became the 1st of the new month, leaving 29 days for the preceding month. If fogs or clouds prevented the moon from being discerned, the day was reckoned as the 30th and the new month began on the morrow. The announcement of the new moon was made to the country at large by lighting a beacon fire on the Mount of Olives, which was repeated by similar signals from other mountain tops. The Samaritans are said to have thwarted this plan by kindling fires prematurely. In consequence the signals were discontinued, and the announcement of the new moon was made by messengers.

Moph (mōf). See MEMPHIS.

Mo-rash'tite (mō-rāsh'tīt), in A.V. Mo-ras'thite (mō-rās'thīt). A native or inhabitant of Moresheth, as was the Prophet Micah (ch. 1:1; Jer. 26:18); see MORESHETH-GATH.

Mor'decai (mōr'dē-ki) [from Akkad. Mar-duk, chief god of Babylon]. 1. A Benjamite, son or descendant of Jair, son of Shimei, son of Kish (Esth. 2:5). The relative clause which as v. 6 follows this genealogy may refer to the last name of the series (cf. II Chron. 22:9), and state that Kish, a Benjamite, was carried into exile with King Jeconiah in 597 B.C.; or the clause may relate to an earlier name in the list, for example, to Jair, in which case Mordecai was a descendant of Jair, a Benjamite, who was carried away to Babylonia with Jeconiah. He brought up Hadassah or Esther, his uncle's daughter, adopting her as his own after her father and mother had died. She acted under his direction in the series of events which ended by making her queen of Persia as wife of Ahasuerus (Esth. 2:7-20). This king was Xerxes, who reigned from 486 to 464 B.C. Through Esther Mordecai informed the king of a plot against his life, and the 2 conspirators were executed (vs. 21-23). When Haman was the king's favorite, Mordecai declined to prostrate himself before him, refusing to pay the customary civility because of Haman's unprincipled character or perhaps because Haman was an Agagite. The insulted dignity determined to wreak vengeance not on Mordecai alone, but on the entire Jewish people, and the king granted him leave (ch. 3:5-11). One night Ahasuerus could not sleep, and to relieve the tedium of his waking hours, he desired that the book recording the chronicles of the kingdom should be read to him by his attendants. The conspiracy came up in the part read, and the king remembered that he had done nothing for his deliverer. When morning dawned he requested Haman, who had come to ask permission to hang Mordecai, to take that faithful subject, array him in royal apparel, and conduct him through the streets of the city (Susa) mounted on a horse belonging to the sovereign, and to proclaim before him as he went along: "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor." This was the commencement of Haman's fall, and of a series of events which resulted in the death of Haman and his sons, and the promotion of Mordecai to be the 2d man in the empire (Esth., chs. 6 to 10).

2. A Jew who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

Mo'reh (mō'rē) [teacher, soothsayer]. 1. A terebinth or oak tree and grove near Shechem (Gen. 12:6; Deut. 11:30), which most probably took its name from an archer or teacher who at one time or other dwelt there. Abraham encamped by it when he arrived in Canaan from Mesopotamia, and erected an altar there to Jehovah who appeared unto him. It was probably the tree under which Jacob buried the amulets and idols that his family had brought with them from Haran, and where Joshua erected a stone to commemorate the covenant which the people renewed there, and whither the men of Shechem went to make Abimelech king (Gen. 35:4; Josh. 24:26, though slightly different words are used for terebinth in these two passages from that employed in Gen. 12:6; Judg. 9:6).

2. A hill in the valley of Jezreel to the n. of the spring of Harod (Judg. 7:1), probably Jebel Dahy, or Little Hermon, about 8 miles n.w. of Mount Gilboa and 1 mile s. of Nain.

Mo'resh-eth-gath' (mō'rēsh-ēth-gāth') [possession of Gath or of a wine press]. A town mentioned in connection with places in Judah, and therefore evidently situated in the same region (Micah 1:14). Jerome located it in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis, and it may be identified with Khirbet el-Baṣal, about 1¼ miles from that place. Gath in the name is generally supposed to denote the Philistine city and to indicate that Moresheth was near it. Perhaps the town was the home of the Prophet Micah (ch. 1:1).

Mo-r'ah (mō-rī'd). 1. A district, on one of whose hills Abraham prepared to sacrifice Isaac; probably the region lying round about the hill of the same name on which the Temple was afterward built, and taking its name from that hill or from some circumstance common to both it and the hill (Gen. 22:2; Jos. Antiq. i. 13, 1 and 2). The Samaritans, and after them a few modern scholars like Bleek, Tuch, Stanley, identify Moreh near Shechem with Moriah (see Samaritan text) and Gerizim with the scene of Abraham's sacrifice. The Samaritan identification doubtless rests on the fact that Abraham did build an altar at Moreh (Gen. 12:6, 7), and the identification was encouraged by the desire to enhance the religious glory of their country. But the etymology of Moreh and Moriah is different.

2. The hill on which was the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite. David purchased the floor and erected an altar on it, and Solomon made it the site of the Temple (II Sam. 24:18 seq.; II Chron. 3:1). The original hill has been much altered artificially and part of its slopes are hidden beneath accumulated rubbish and embankments, but its general contour has been determined. Mount Moriah stood between the Kidron and Tyropoeon valleys, and lifted its summit directly opposite the mouth of that ravine which forms the w. branch of the latter valley. On the n. a slight depression separated it from the narrow neck of land which connected it with the main plateau. It is difficult to state exact dimensions; to call its original area 600 feet from n. to s. by 300 from e. to w. may be not far from the truth. Its highest point is now, according to Warren, 2,448 feet above the ocean. Other platforms are 2,430 and 2,420 feet, from which the e. and w. slopes very rapidly fall.

Mor'tar, I. A vessel in which grain and spices are pounded with a pestle (Num. 11:8; Prov. 27:22).

Mor'tar, II. A substance used to bind bricks or stones together in a wall. Various materials were used: 1. Mud or clay without lime (Nahum 3:14), frequently employed by peasants in Palestine. 2. Mortar properly so called, consisting of sand and lime mixed with water, which was employed in building the better class of houses (cf. Ezek. 13:10). Palestine is a limestone country, and lime is easily obtained (Isa. 33:12). 3. Bitumen in regions like Babylonia where clay and lime are scarce (Gen. 11:3, R.V. marg.). The walls of houses were and still are daubed or plastered with mud or mortar, often mixed with straw and pebbles, to protect them against the weather (Lev. 14:42). The mortar used for this purpose in Egypt consists of ½ clay, ¼ lime, and the rest ashes and straw.

Mo-se'rah (mō-sē'rā), in A.V. Mo-se'ra (mō-sē'rā) [bond, fetter]. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness near Bene-jaakan (Deut. 10:6). In Num. 33:30, the plural form Moseroth is used as the name of the place. The site is unknown; but it was near Mount Hor, by the border of Edom (Num. 20:23; 33:37), in the country of the Horites (cf. Gen. 36:20, 27 with I Chron. 1:42). See HOR 1.

Mo-se'roth (mō-sē'rōth). See MOSERAH.

Mo'ses (mō'zēz) [from Egypt. mś, chēd, a son]. The great Hebrew leader and legislator. He was a Levite, family of Kohath, house of Amram (Ex. 6:18, 20). Jochebed is called the mother of Moses (v. 20); but this expression is doubtless to be understood in the sense of ancestress, Amram and Jochebed being founders of the tribal house into which Moses was born; see EGYPT. The edict requiring the Hebrew male children to be cast into the Nile brought Moses into imminent peril of his life. But his mother saw that he was a goodly child, or, as Stephen words it, "exceeding fair" (Acts 7:20), and she hid him 3 months in her house. When she could hide him no longer, she placed him within an ark of bulrushes, which had been daubed with bitumen and pitch to render it watertight; put it among the flags on the river's bank; and posted Miriam, then a young girl, to watch the result. By and by Pharaoh's daughter, attended by her maidens, came to the river to bathe. Her name was Thermuthis, according to Josephus (Jos. Antiq. ii. 9, 5). The rabbis identified her with Bithiah (I Chron. 4:18). She espied the ark, and had it opened. She saw by the features and color of the infant that he was a Hebrew. He wept and she was touched with pity. At this critical moment Miriam stepped forward, and with admirable tact asked: "Shall I go and call thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee?" The princess bade her go, and the child's mother was called and the infant committed to her care. When he was weaned he was taken to Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him and called him Moses. The name was doubly fitting, the child having been drawn from the water and being adopted as a son (Ex. 2:1-10); the Egyptian mś (son) by a popular etymology is connected with Heb. māshāh, to draw out.

The adopted son of a princess required a princely education, and Moses became instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts 7:22), who were then unsurpassed in civilization by any people in the world. This was designed to fit him for high office under the government, if not even for the Egyptian throne. But in God's intention it was to prepare him for the leadership of the Hebrews. He was possessed of great natural ability, and the training which he received schooled him for the great work for which he was destined. He became familiar with court life and intercourse with princes, with the grandeur and pomp of religious worship and with ritualistic conventionalities and symbolism, with letters and the literary ideas of the time. He witnessed the administration of justice, and he acquired a general acquaintance with the arts which were practiced in civilized life. He remembered, however, his origin, believed the promises which had been made to the Hebrew people, and before the close of his sojourn in Egypt he had discovered the call of God to him to be the judge and the deliverer of the Israelites. Going out to observe the state of his countrymen, he saw one of them struck by an Egyptian. Moses killed the oppressor, and hid his body in the sand. Another day he tried to reconcile 2 Hebrews who were striving together, on which the one who was in the wrong insolently asked: "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? thinkest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian?" Moses was alarmed to find that his deed of the previous day had become known, and, on learning that it had reached the ears of Pharaoh, who said that he would kill him for it, fled from Egypt to the land of Midian. He had thus refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; he had cast in his lot with the people of God, and was to assume the position of deliverer and judge (Ex. 2:11-15; Acts 7:24-28; Heb. 11:24, 25). He was now 40 years old (Acts 7:23).

On arriving in Midian, Moses aided the daughters of Jethro to water their flocks. This act introduced him to Jethro, who was a priest. Jethro showed him hospitality, furnished him with employment, and gave him one of his daughters to wife. She bore Moses 2 sons, Gershom and Eliezer (Ex. 2:22; 18:3, 4). He remained in Midian 40 years (Acts 7:30), intimately associated with a people who were descended from Abraham and perhaps worshiped the God of Abraham (cf. Ex. 18:10-12). This period was likewise a time of preparation. He enjoyed close fellowship with a leading man of the Midianites, a man of sound judgment (Ex., ch. 18) and a priest. Here Moses widened his acquaintance with religious thought and forms of worship. He learned the roads of the wilderness, its resources, climate, and mode of life of its inhabitants. Amid its solemn grandeur and in its deep solitude he had opportunity for reflection. At the close of this period he was astonished to see a bush burning and yet remaining unconsumed. As he turned aside to look more narrowly at a sight so unique, he received an authoritative call from Jehovah, and the objections which he raised on the ground of insufficiency for the work were overcome (Ex. 3:11): inability to tell the people in what character God would manifest himself for their deliverance (v. 13), lack of credentials to secure the recognition of the people (ch. 4:1), and lack of eloquence to persuade (v. 10). These difficulties were removed, and Moses acquiesced, but unwillingly, God was displeased, and promised that Aaron should help Moses (v. 14).

Moses took his wife Zipporah and his sons to return to Egypt (v. 20). Two sons had been born to him. One of them, doubtless the younger, he had not circumcised, because Zipporah regarded the rite as bloody. In yielding to her in this matter Moses had shown himself unfaithful in his own household and unfit for his high commission. God was displeased with this neglect of the sign of the covenant; and now, as Moses was returning to Egypt with his family, God brought him high unto death at the inn. But Zipporah discerned the cause and, desirous of saving her husband's life, at once took a knife and performed the operation, saying, "A bridegroom of blood art thou to me" (Ex. 4:24-26). Arriving in Egypt, Moses, in conjunction with Aaron, repeatedly conveyed to Pharaoh the divine commands, the rejection of which brought on the obstinate king and his people the succession of judgments known as the ten plagues (chs. 5 to 13:16). When the departure from Egypt took place, it was Moses who, under divine guidance, led the people. At Sinai he was admitted to intimate relations with God. God allowed all the people to hear his voice in articulate words; but he permitted Moses to see him manifested and he "spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend" (Ex. 24:9-11; 33:11, 17-23; 34:5-29), and he revealed his will to Moses from time to time for the instruction of his people, as he did afterward to the successive prophets. In communion with God Moses obtained the statutes based on the Ten Commandments (see THEOCRACY). Immediately afterward, during a sojourn of 40 days on the mount, he was made acquainted with the form, dimensions, and materials of the tabernacle and its furniture (see TABERNACLE 2), and received from God the two tables of stone; but on finding that in his absence the people had taken to worshiping a golden calf, he dashed the tablets to the ground as he neared the camp and broke them in his righteous indignation and in token of the fact that the covenant, of which they were the fundamental law, had been annulled by the sin of the people. He then inflicted punishment upon the people; and all who had not held aloof from the place of idolatrous worship, or had not retired when reminded of their sin by the act of Moses, in their obstinacy were exposed to death at the hands of the Levites who offered themselves as executioners. Having acted symbolically and judicially, Moses now acted mediatorially and interceded for the people, and God promised that his angel should accompany the host.

Moses was again called into the mountain, and the portions of the covenant respecting the service of God, which had been grossly violated in a fundamental principle, were singled out and emphasized, and he received two other tables inscribed like the first (Ex., chs. 19; 20; 32 to 34). On each of these occasions he fasted forty days and nights (Ex. 24:18; 34:28; Deut. 9:9, 18), as Elijah afterward did (I Kings 19:8), both in this respect foreshadowing the similar fast of our Lord (Matt. 4:2). The name of Moses is forever associated with the laws given at Sinai and during the subsequent desert wanderings (see LEVITICUS and NUMBERS).

When Moses came down from Mount Sinai, after the 2d sojourn of 40 days, with the tables of the law in his hand, the skin of his face shone, sending forth beams (Heb., horns), and the people were afraid to come near him (Ex. 34:29, R.V. marg.). Moses called to them, and they returned to him, and he spoke with them and gave them all that the Lord had spoken with him. "And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face. But when Moses went in before the Lord to speak with him, he took the veil off, until he came out" (Ex. 34:33, 34, A.V.). The R.V. and J.V., following the LXX and Vulgate and correctly rendering the Hebrew, say just the contrary: "And when Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face." He did not wear the veil while speaking either with the people or with the Lord. He wore the veil, not to hide the splendor (A.V.), but to conceal the vanishing away of the splendor (R.V.); and he wore it until he returned to the presence of the Lord, where the light of his countenance was rekindled. Moses "put a veil upon his face, that the children of Israel should not look stedfastly on the end of that which was passing away" (II Cor. 3:13, R.V., cf. v. 7).

In the 2d year of the sojourn of the Israelites in the wilderness, Moses is mentioned as having married a Cushite woman (Num. 12:1). Zipporah may have died during the preceding year, although her death is not recorded (cf. Ex. 18:2). Among the later Jews the story ran that the Cushite woman was an Ethiopian princess named Tharbis, who had fallen in love with Moses on the occasion of his leading an Egyptian army into Ethiopia, while he was still a member of Pharaoh's household (Jos. Antiq. ii. 10, 2). The tale is evidently a fabrication. The marriage took place in the wilderness, when Miriam and Aaron were jealous of Moses' superiority in public affairs. They were leaders of the host, directors of the national life, and prophets as well as Moses; and on this ground they claimed that their opposition to Moses' marriage with the foreigner should have been heeded by him. The Cushite woman was probably one of the mixed multitude which accompanied the Israelites in the flight from Egypt (Ex. 12:38).

Shortly after leaving Kadesh, Korah and other princes rebelled against the authority of Moses and Aaron, but were signally punished by God (Num., ch. 16); see KORAH 4.

At the 2d encampment at Kadesh, Moses and Aaron grievously sinned (Num., ch. 20). When bidden by God to speak to the rock that it give forth its water, Moses said to the assembled people: "Hear now, ye rebels; shall we bring you forth water out of this rock?" The brothers failed to observe their subordinate position. They claimed to be the leaders and providers of the people, whereas it was God who had led the Israelites from Egypt and had fed them for 40 years in the wilderness. They took to themselves the honor which belonged to God alone. When called upon to act for God, they acted in their own name, and used for their own glory the power delegated unto them. For this sin of treason they were denied the privilege of conducting the people into the Promised Land. It was a sore chastisement to Moses, but it made no change in the fidelity of this great servant of the Lord. After the condemnation he was faithful, as he had been before. He started the people once more on their march to Canaan. He led Aaron up Mount Hor, stripped him of his official robes, and transferred his office to Eleazar. When the people were bitten by the fiery serpents, he interceded with God for them, and at God's bidding erected the brazen serpent and bade his dying countrymen look and live. He led the armies of Israel into the territory of Sihon and Og, and conquered it for Israel. When the camp was pitched in a valley in the mountains of Abarim, and glimpses of the land of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were obtained, the pent-up emotions of Moses' soul again, as on other unrecorded occasions since his transgression found relief in prayer: "O Lord God, thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness, and thy strong hand: . . . Let me go over, I pray thee, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon." But the answer came: "Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter . . . for thou shalt not go over Jordan" (Deut. 3:24-27).

The camp was moved and pitched at Shittim in the valley, and Moses put his house in order that he might die. He delivered a parting address to the people; see DEUTERONOMY. He led Joshua, whom God had appointed to succeed him, before the high priest in the presence of the congregation, placed his hands upon him, and, giving him a charge, transferred to him the office which he himself had so honorably and efficiently filled for 40 years. He afterward led Joshua to the door of the tabernacle to receive a charge from God. Then he taught the people a song that they might have words of religious wisdom in their memory and on their tongues, bestowed his farewell blessing on the several tribes, ascended Mount Nebo and viewed the Promised Land from its summit, and died. He was 120 years old, yet "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." God buried him near by (Deut., ch. 34).

It was during the 40 years in the wilderness that the principal literary work of Moses was done. He kept a record of the encampments (Num., ch. 33), made a note of events, such as the battle with Amalek (Ex. 17:14), committed the statutes founded on the covenant law to writing (Ex. 24:4-7), preserved a copy of his farewell address (Deut. 31:24). He had also the richness, vividness, and depth of thought requisite for writing Hebrew poetry, which is very simple in its structure and a ready vehicle for fervid utterance. The most spontaneous of his poems, written under the intense feeling of the moment, was the song which he uttered when Pharaoh was overthrown in the Red Sea (Ex. 15:1-18). Moses ascribes the glory to Jehovah (Ex. 15:1-3), describes the event (vs. 4-12), anticipates its effect upon the enemies of Israel (vs. 13-15), and discerns in it a guarantee that Jehovah will bring Israel into the Promised Land (vs. 16-18). His farewell blessing of the tribes, like the farewell words of Jacob to his sons, was also cast in poetic form (Deut., ch. 33). Moses had literary ability; in these several forms of literature he had predecessors among the Egyptians; and especially did he have also the stimulus afforded by their literary ideas and the example of their histories, and the incentive of the awakened national life of the Hebrews, and the stirring events amid which he lived, to lead him to write a connected history of his people (or at least the basic facts), such as is found in the Pentateuch. See PENTATEUCH.

As the organizer of a nation Moses under the guidance of God provided Israel with civil and religious institutions. These institutions were timely in the sense that both kinds were regarded by the peoples of that day as normal and essential to a state, their character corresponded to the ideals of the age, and they represented the highest moral and religious truth possessed by men. The laws were not as a whole novel. The constitution consisted of ten commandments. It had long been known to Israel that idolatry, proscribed by the Second Commandment, was abhorrent to Jehovah (Gen. 35:2). There is evidence that the Sabbath day was instituted long before the Fourth Commandment was promulgated at Sinai (cf. Ex. 16:21-30). Long also before Israel heard the Law at Sinai, murder, adultery, theft, and false witness-bearing were universally held to be crimes punishable by man. The significance of Israel's constitution lay in the fact that recognized moral obligations were made the fundamental law of the kingdom, and that the Tenth Commandment probed back of the outward act into the inner nature of man and located the source of sin in the evil desires of the heart. The main portion of the Book of the Covenant consists of statutes based on the covenant law of the Decalogue (Ex. 21:1 to 23:19). In certain cases at least old laws were reaffirmed and ancient customs were made laws of the kingdom. The Code of Hammurabi (q.v.) enables the student to trace more of the ordinances back into the period before Moses than had previously been possible; and it shows also that the idea of codification, which is so marked a feature of the Book of the Covenant, had dawned upon man centuries before the time of Moses.

The ecclesiastical legislation of Moses was also timely, providing a sanctuary with the ground plan of the prevalent type of Egyptian temple, as an edifice stable, symmetrical in its proportions, and employing the approved symbolism of the day in its appointments and ritual, with a priesthood and priestly organization and priestly functions in general like those of contemporary nations. It was a sacred house and a worship that embodied the good in the religious thought and practice of the civilized world, which were intelligible alike to Israelite and Gentile, and were distinguished by monotheism and spirituality, and by the exhibition of the way in which the sinner may approach the holy God. Moses was inspired, but a body of laws and a form of worship entirely hidden from the foundation of the world were not revealed to him. Moses was a prophet, and was inspired as other prophets were inspired. Under the influence of the Holy Spirit he was made an infallible communicator to his fellow men of the mind and will of God. He spent days in personal communion with God, who enlightened his mind concerning God and the nature of the Kingdom. God led him infallibly to discern the laws appropriate to the condition of the people and adapted to discipline them in the spirit of the Kingdom; he prompted and controlled and enabled Moses to frame legislation and found institutions, more or less out of old materials and on old models indeed, yet distinguished from all analogies among contemporary peoples by the exhibition of the spiritual nature and holiness of God, by the extrication of man's conduct from merely civil relations and bringing it also into relation to God, and by the power to lift the secular life into the true service of God.

Moses had the wisdom of a statesman. He observed the opposition to him which was manifested in his own family (Num., ch. 12), the jealousy of other tribes and his own of the pre-eminence of himself and Aaron (Num., ch. 16), the worldly considerations by which the people were actuated (Num., ch. 32), their lack of faith in Jehovah at critical moments, and their readiness to lapse into idolatry. He meditated on these weaknesses which threatened the national existence; and when he came to prepare his farewell address he insisted upon the law of the one altar and upon the spirituality of religion as the great means under God of overcoming these defects by deepening the moral life on the one hand, and on the other hand by preserving purity of worship and doctrine, binding the people together as one nation, and making their own religion a grander spectacle than the ceremonies at heathen shrines; see ALTAR and DEUTERONOMY. After his death the greatness of Moses was universally recognized (Jer. 15:1; Heb. 3:2). He had, moreover, the distinguished honor of being permitted to reappear as the representative of O.T. law, with Elijah, the representative of O.T. prophecy, to hold converse with Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:3, 4). See MICHAEL 11.

Moth. An insect proverbial for its destruction of clothing (Job 13:28; Matt. 6:19; James 5:2). Its larva feeds upon wool (Isa. 51:8), and out of the same substance builds itself a house or case, in which it lives (Job 27:18), protruding its head while eating. The clothes moth (Thina) is intended, of which several species feed on fur and wool.

Mount. 1. A mountain. The word is now used almost exclusively in poetry or as part of a compound name, as Mount Carmel, Mount Tabor, Mount Zion, Mount of Olives (I Kings 18:19; Ps. 48:2; Zech. 14:4); see CARMEL, OLIVES, MOUNT OF, TABOR, ZION.

2. A mound, especially one raised against the wall of a besieged city by the assailing army (Jer. 6:6; Dan. 11:15; and R.V. of II Sam. 20:15; II Kings 19:32), and on which the battering-ram was placed (Ezek. 26:8, 9, R.V.).

Moun'tain. Of the mountains in or near Palestine the loftiest was Mount Hermon. Then followed the Lebanon range. Compared with those towering elevations such hills as Mount Zion, Mount Moriah, Mount Carmel, Mount Tabor, etc., were very inferior eminences (Deut. 3:25). Mountain is a natural image for eternal continuance (Deut. 33:15; Hab. 3:6), for stability (Isa. 54:10), for difficult, dangerous, wearisome paths in life (Jer. 13:16), for insurmountable obstacles (Zech. 4:7; Matt. 21:21).

Mount of Con'gre-ga'tion. A mountain in the farthest n. (Isa. 14:13); the reference probably being to a conception common in ancient mythology and current among the Babylonians that the gods assembled on a mountain of the n.

Mourn'ing. The mourning of the Oriental always has been ostentatious. Public expression was given to grief principally by removing ornaments and neglecting the person (Ex. 33:4; II Sam. 14:2; 19:24; Matt. 6:16-18), rending the clothes by slitting the tunic at the throat or tearing the coat or the outer mantle (Lev. 10:6; II Sam. 13:31; Joel 2:13), shaving the head or plucking out the hair (Ezra 9:3; Jer. 7:29), putting on sackcloth (Joel 1:8), sprinkling ashes or dust on the head (II Sam. 15:32), fasting (Ps. 35:13), weeping and lamenting (Joel 1:8, 13). Several of these modes were usually combined (Gen. 37:34; II Sam. 3:31, 32; 13:19; 15:32; Ezra 9:3, 5; Job 1:20; Jer. 41:5). Friends came to the house of mourning, and flute players and professional mourners, chiefly women, were employed, who made loud lamentations (Jer. 9:17, 18; Matt. 9:23; Acts 9:39); see MINSTREL. Feasts were provided for the crowds that assembled at the funeral (Jer. 16:7; Baruch 6:32). After the funeral women would come forth very early in the morning to visit the grave, as they are still accustomed to do, and to pray, weep, and sob or chant hymns or beat their breasts (Mark 16:1, 2). Many of them were professionals; but others were sincere mourners, relatives of the deceased and their sympathizing friends (John 11:31). Customs, in general similar, prevailed in Egypt, Persia, and Scythia (Herod. ii. 66, 85; iv. 71; viii. 99; ix. 24).

The period of mourning varied. It was 30 days for Aaron and Moses (Num. 20:29; Deut. 34:8), and 7 days for Saul (I Sam. 31:13). The Egyptians observed 70 days for Jacob, and 7 more days were devoted to public mourning for him at the threshing floor of Atad (Gen. 50:3, 10).

Mouse. A small rodent quadruped, Mus musculus and other allied species of the family Muridae. It was an unclean animal (Lev. 11:29), but was eaten by Israelites in Isaiah's time who gave themselves up to heathenism and paid no attention to the Mosaic Law (Isa. 66:17). The field mouse (Arvicola arvalis) was destructive to crops (I Sam. 6:5). The Hebrew word for mouse, 'akbār, is a comprehensive one, including not merely the genus Mus, but most of the family Muridae, with many animals from other families having either an affinity or an analogy to the typical mice.

Mo'za (mō'zā) [a going forth, sunrise]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:46).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:36, 37).

Mo'zah (mō'zā). A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26), probably to be identified with Kālunya (or Kōlōniyeh), about 4½ miles n.w. of Jerusalem on the road to Jaffa.

Mul'ber'ry Tree. A tree of the genus Morus, of the family Moraceae. It is cultivated in Syria for the sake of its leaves, on which the silkworm feeds. A cooling drink is made from its berries, the juice being expressed, sweetened with honey, and flavored with spices. The juice of the berries was shown to elephants to prepare them for battle (I Macc. 6:34). A mulberry is mentioned in the N.T. under the name of sycamine (Luke 17:6).

Mulberry is the rendering of the Heb. bākā', weeping, distilling; a tree which grew near Jerusalem and of which the leaves rustled in the wind (II Sam. 5:23 seq.; I Chron. 14:14, 15). In these passages and in Ps. 84:6 the margin of R.V. has balsam tree.

Mule. A graminivorous animal, called in Heb. pered (I Kings 18:5). The mule is a hybrid between the horse and the ass. It is often mentioned with horses (Ps. 32:9), and was much used for riding and for carrying burdens (II Sam. 13:29; II Kings 5:17; I Chron. 12:40). It is not mentioned before the time of David, but was in common use from his days onward. The Tyrians obtained mules in Armenia (Ezek. 27:14).

In A.V. of Gen. 36:24 the Heb. plural yēmim is translated mules; but it should rather be rendered hot springs, as it is in the Vulgate and in R.V. In A.V. of Esth. 8:10, 14 rekesh is rendered mule; in I Kings 4:28, dromedary. R.V. substitutes swift steed.

Mup'pim (mūp'im). A son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21); see SHEPHUPHAM.

Mur'der. Just after the deluge it was enacted that "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man" (Gen. 9:6). The avenger of blood had the right to put the murderer to death (Num. 35:19); but if the manslayer reached a city of refuge he was temporarily safe. The cities of refuge were not instituted for the benefit of the deliberate murderer; they were designed for the man who had accidentally committed manslaughter (Num., ch. 35). Even if the deliberate murderer had fled for asylum to the altar, and probably taken hold of its horns, he was to be taken from it and put to death (Ex. 21:14; cf. I Kings 2:28-34). At the city of refuge the manslayer was given a trial. The concurrent testimony of at least 2 witnesses was required to convict him of murder (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6). If he was guilty of deliberate murder, no ransom was accepted (Num. 35:31), and he was delivered to the avenger of blood to be slain (v. 19; Deut. 19:12). If acquitted, he was granted asylum in the city. See CITY OF REFUGE.

Mu'shi (mū'shī). A Levite, son of Merari, and the founder of a tribal family or house (Ex. 6:19; Num. 3:20; 26:58; I Chron. 6:19, 47; 23:21, 23; 24:26, 30).

Mu'sic. Music is ancient (Gen. 4:21). Among the Hebrews, Miriam and her companions took timbrels and danced and sang praises to the Lord for his deliverance of the Israelites at the Red Sea (Ex. 15:20). The people danced and sang in idolatrous worship about the golden calf (Ex. 32:6, 18). In family feasts and religious festivals they sang, played on musical instruments, and danced (Jer. 25:10; I Macc. 9:39; Luke 15:25). Marriage processions, as they passed through the streets, were accompanied with music and song (Jer. 7:34). Women and maidens welcomed the victorious warrior on his return home with music, song, and dance (Judg. 11:34; I Sam. 18:6). Kings had their court musicians (II Chron. 35:25; Eccl. 2:8). The accession of a king and his marriage and his feasts were made joyous with music (II Sam. 19:35; I Kings 1:40; Ps. 45:8, R.V.). The shepherd might have his harp (I Sam. 16:18). The mind might be quieted and refreshed by music (I Sam. 10:5; 16:16; II Kings 3:15). Psalms might be sung to the accompaniment of the harp (Ps. 92:1-3; 137:2; cf. Amos 6:5).

The musical instruments of the Hebrews were of 3 classes: stringed instruments, wind instruments, and instruments of percussion. Stringed instruments consisted of a body of wood with strings of gut, and were played with the fingers of one or both hands or were struck with a plectrum of wood, ivory, or metal. They were chiefly the harp and psaltery. The harp was in general use among the people both for worldly and sacred music; the psaltery was commonly, though not exclusively, reserved for religious purposes. The psaltery was tuned to the soprano register, the harp an octave lower (I Chron. 15:20, 21). The wind instruments were chiefly flutes or pipes and horns. The pipe was often played with other instruments (I Sam. 10:5; I Kings 1:40; Isa. 5:12; 30:29; Eccles. 40:21), was employed to lead dancing (Matt. 11:17), and was played at weddings (I Macc. 3:45; Rev. 18:22). It was specially the instrument of lamentation (Jer. 48:36; Matt. 9:23, R.V.; Jos. War iii. 9, 5). The Bible does not mention its use in the Temple service, not even in I Macc. 4:54; but it was used in sacred music and was heard in processions of worshipers marching to the house of God, and in the later Temple it had an assigned place, especially at the passover and feast of tabernacles. The ram's horn, or an imitation of it, was sometimes used to increase the noise of other instruments (I Chron. 15:28; II Chron. 15:14; Ps. 98:6, rendered trumpet), but was generally blown by itself. Its principal employment was not in music, but for military purposes and to make proclamations. Straight, narrow, silver trumpets, about a cubit in length, and called hāšōšerāh, were used by the priests to announce festivals, to call the congregation, and on advancing to battle (Num. 10:1-10). They were rarely blown by laymen (Hos. 5:8; perhaps, II Kings 11:14 and II Chron. 23:13). Of the instruments of percussion the timbrel or tabret was the popular instrument; it was usually played by women and was employed on festive occasions, especially to beat time at the dances and for singers (Gen. 31:27; Ex. 15:20; Judg. 11:34; Ps. 81:2). Cymbals of brass were used in the Temple service (I Chron. 15:19).

Music was cultivated by the companies which gathered about the prophets (I Sam. 10:5), various instruments being employed as an orchestra. It is not mentioned as belonging to the service of the tabernacle in the early period. David introduced it into the worship at the sanctuary, and Solomon promoted it (II Sam. 6:5, 14; I Kings 10:12; I Chron., chs. 15; 16). Hezekiah and Josiah paid special attention to its restoration (II Chron. 29:25; 35:15). David was assisted in his work by Asaph, Heman, and Ethan or Jeduthun, 3 masters of music. A choir of singers and musicians, with Asaph at its head, was formed of Levites, and stationed before the Ark at the tabernacle on Zion, while Heman and Jeduthun, with their choirs, were assigned to the old tabernacle at Gibeon (I Chron. 16:4-6, 39-42). These 3 choirs were afterward united in the Temple. In David's reign they numbered 4,000 members (I Chron. 23:5), of whom 288 were trained musicians, who were depended upon to lead the less skilled body of assistants (I Chron. 25:7, 8). They were divided into 24 courses, containing 12 trained musicians each. Of these courses 4 belonged to the family of Asaph, 6 to that of Jeduthun, and 4 to that of Heman. The orchestra which accompanied the singing consisted of stringed instruments, but cymbals were also used, being probably struck by the chief musician to beat time (I Chron. 15:19-21). It appears from this passage that the proportion of psalteries to harps was 8 to 6. In Herod's Temple there were ordinarily 2 psalteries, 9 harps, and 1 cymbal, and on certain days pipes were added. The participation of priests with trumpets in the orchestra of stringed instruments was exceptional (II Chron. 5:12, 13; 7:6). In the 2d Temple the trumpets, when blown in connection with the regular orchestra, were heard only in the pauses or as responsive music (Ezra 3:10, 11). The musicians stood on the e. of the great altar (II Chron. 5:12). In Herod's Temple they occupied a broad staircase, which led from the court of Israel to the court of the priests. In this later Temple a choir of boys, standing at the foot of the stairs, lent their higher voices to the song of the Levites.

Little is known of the character of the music. The Hebrews had a scale of 8 tones. Their sacred choirs probably sang in unison the same simple melody, divided into 2 parts, the one an octave higher than the other, and representing the male and female voices, and were accompanied by the instruments in the same tones (I Chron. 15:20, 21). Melodies are probably named in the titles of Psalms 9; 22; 45; 56; 57, and others. Antiphonal and responsive singing was practiced (Ex. 15:21; Neh. 12:31-43) and was often heard in the Temple service (Ezra 3:10, 11; Jer. 33:11); several psalms were arranged for this purpose, e.g., Ps. 24:7-10; 136. The congregation seldom, if ever, joined in the singing in the 1st Temple, but at its close they united in saying "Amen" (I Chron. 16:7, 36). In the Herodian Temple the people sometimes participated by singing responses.

Mus'tard. A garden herb (Luke 13:19), which in comparison with other herbs becomes a great tree (Matt. 13:32; Mark 4:32), on whose branches the birds rest for the sake of obtaining its seeds. Its seeds are, hyperbolically speaking, less than all seeds (Matt. 13:32). The largeness of the plant grown from seeds so small illustrates the increase of the Kingdom of heaven from a very small beginning. The mustard seed was employed proverbially by the Jews, just as it was by Jesus (Matt. 17:20; Luke 17:6), to denote anything very minute. The common mustard of Palestine is Sinapis nigra or black mustard. It grows wild, attaining the height of a horse and rider, as travelers have noticed. It is also cultivated in gardens for its seed, which is used as a condiment. Those who seek another identification generally consider the mustard of Scripture to have been Salvadora persica, the type of the natural order Salvadoraceae or Salvadorads, but this view is unlikely. Royle, who supported this view, says that it has a succulent fruit, tasting like garden cress. It is, however, small, and apparently confined to the low valley of the Jordan; and it is not an herb.

Muth'-lab'-ben (mūth'lāb'ēn) [die for the son; death of the son; death whiteness]. An expression of doubtful meaning in the title of Psalm 9. Probably the opening words of a well-known song to the melody of which the psalm was to be sung.

Myn'dos (mīn'dōs), in A.V. Myn'dus (mīn'dūs). A small town of Caria, situated on the seacoast (Herod. v. 33). It was not far from Halicarnassus, for Alexander led a detachment of troops across the intervening country in one night. In the time of Simon Maccabaeus it was subject to Rome (I Macc. 15:23). Its site is probably marked by the small sheltered port of Gumishlu.

My'ra (mī'rā). A city of Lycia, where Paul, when a prisoner on his way to Rome, changed ships (Acts 27:5, 6). Myra was one of the principal cities of Lycia. It stood some 2 miles from the sea, and was built on and about a cliff, at the mouth of the gorge leading into the interior mountain region. It is now called Dembre.

Myrrh. 1. A fragrant substance, called in Heb. mōr, in Gr. smyrna, myrrha. It was an ingredient in the oil with which Aaron and his successors were anointed (Ex. 30:23). Beds and garments were perfumed with it (Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; S. of Sol. 3:6), and an oil of myrrh was used in the purification of women (Esth. 2:12). The Magi brought it from the e. to present to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:11). At the crucifixion it was offered to him in wine, probably to deaden pain (Mark 15:23), and was an ingredient in the spices designed for anointing his body (John 19:39). It was used for embalming the dead (Herod. ii. 86). The tree which produced it grew in Arabia and was probably the Balsamodendron myrrha. It is a small tree, with odoriferous wood and bark, short spiny branches, trifoliate leaves, and plumlike fruit. The tree Commiphora abyssinica of e. Africa and Arabia furnishes the myrrh of modern commerce.

2. The rendering of Heb. lōt (Gen. 37:25; 43:11). Myrrh is not a happy translation; it should have been ladanum (R.V. marg.), called by the Greeks lēdon, lēdanon, and ladanon. It is a highly fragrant resin, containing a volatile oil, and is produced by Cistus creticus and various other species of rock rose. It grows in parts of Syria.

Myr'tle. A tree, called in Heb. hādas. It grew in the mountains near Jerusalem, and booths were made of its branches at the feast of tabernacles (Neh. 8:15). It is mentioned also in Isa. 41:19; 55:13; Zech. 1:8-11. The tree is undoubtedly the common myrtle (Myrtus communis), which grows in Palestine.

Mys'ta (mish'tā). A province in the extreme n.w. of Asia Minor; bounded on the n. by the Propontis, now Sea of Marmora, on the s. by Lydia, on the e. by Bithynia, and on the w. by the Hellespont. The Troad lay within its limits. Paul and Silas passed through it to Troas, one of its cities (Acts 16:7, 8). Assos, to which Paul sailed to meet his associates, was another (Acts 20:13). A third was Pergamos, one of the 7 churches in Asia (Rev. 1:11; 2:12-17).

Mys'tery. A word taken over from heathen religion, in which a mystery was a secret and peculiar doctrine, which found expression in rites, ceremonies, and purifications to which only initiated persons were admitted. The purpose of the ceremonies was to better the worshippers in this life and to assure them of life after death through union with the god thus worshiped. The word does not imply that the doctrine is incomprehensible. In the N.T. it denotes a secret hidden from the world till the appointed time (Rom. 16:25), or until man has been prepared by the Spirit of God to receive and appreciate it (Mark 4:11), which forms a characteristic and essential doctrine and finds expression in the life (I Tim. 3:16).

N

Na'am (nā'ām) [sweetness, pleasantness]. A son of the celebrated Caleb (I Chron. 4:15).

Na'a-mah (nā'ā-mā) [sweet, pleasant]. 1. Daughter of Lamech, and sister of Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22).

2. An Ammonitess, a wife of Solomon and the mother of King Rehoboam (I Kings 14:21, 31; II Chron. 12:13).

3. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:41); probably Khirbet Fered near 'Arak Naaman.

Na'am-an (nā'ā-mān) [pleasant]. 1. A grandson of Benjamin, a son of Bela and founder of a family (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:40).

2. Commander of the army of Ben-hadad, king of Damascus. He was an able general, and had won deliverance for the Syrians, but he was a leper. In Syria leprosy did not exclude from human society, as it did in Israel, though it was a loathsome disease. In one of the Syrian raids into the Israelite territory, the soldiers had brought away a little maid, who became a slave to Naaman's wife. This girl expressed to her mistress the wish that Naaman were with Elisha in Samaria, because the prophet would heal him of his leprosy. The speech of the maiden was reported to her master, who resolved to seek a cure from Elisha. His sovereign, the king of Syria, wrote a letter of introduction for him, and sent him to the king of Israel to be cured. When the Israelite ruler received it he thought that the real intention of his correspondent was to pick a quarrel and declare war. Elisha reassured the king, and desired that Naaman should be sent to him, when he would learn that there was a prophet in Israel. When he came with his horses and chariot to Elisha's door, the prophet in order to humble his pride and teach him that he owed his cure not to man, but solely to the power of God, did not appear, but sent out a message that he should dip 7 times in the Jordan. Naaman, feeling affronted, and despising the means, started for home in a passion, saying, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them and be clean?" But his servants soothed his temper, and urged him to dip in the Jordan. He did so, and was cured. Filled with gratitude, he wished to reward Elisha. The prophet desired to impress upon the Syrian the freeness of God's blessings, and refused all recompense; but Gehazi, his servant, acted in a very different spirit. Naaman renounced idolatry, and became a worshiper of Jehovah; and he carried home 2 mules' burden of earth to build an altar to Jehovah. He lived, however, in a heathen community and could not altogether escape outward participation in heathen customs. His king was an idolater, a worshiper of Rimmon; and it was Naaman's official duty to support him when he entered the Temple and bowed before the god. The prophet of Jehovah permitted Naaman to fulfill his secular duties, even though to do so involved his assisting his king to perform heathen worship (II Kings, ch. 5).

Na'a-ma-thite (nā'ā-má-thit). A native or inhabitant of Naamah; as Zophar, Job's friend (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). The place was probably in n. Arabia.

Na'a-rah (nā'ā-rá) [a girl]. 1. A wife of Ashhur, the ancestor of the inhabitants of Tekoa (I Chron. 4:5, 6).

2. A town on the boundary line of Ephraim, e. of Beth-el, and not far from Jericho (Josh. 16:7). In A.V. the name is written Naarath. The town is doubtless one with Naaran (I Chron. 7:28). Archelaus diverted half the water supply of Neira to irrigate the palms of his palace at Jericho (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 13, 1). Eusebius mentions a village Noorath, 5 Roman miles from Jericho; probably to be identified with 'Ain Dūk.

Na'a-rai (nā'ā-rī). One of David's valiant men (I Chron. 11:37; apparently a diverse reading, perhaps the correction, of Paarai, II Sam. 23:35).

Na'a-ran (nā'ā-rān). See NAARAH 2.

Na'a-rath (nā'ā-rāth). See NAARAH 2.

Na'-ash'on (nā'-āsh'ōn). See NAHSHON.

Na'-as'son (nā'-ās'ōn). See NAHSHON.

Na'bal (nā'bāl) [foolish, churlish]. A sheep-master, resident in Maon, who pastured his flocks around the village of Carmel in Judah, on the confines of the wilderness. His wife's name was Abigail. David and his followers had dwelt for some time in the neighborhood, and had used their might to protect the property of the people from marauding bands of robbers. When Nabal was shearing his sheep, David sent 10 young men to solicit assistance for himself and his followers. Nabal sent back a churlish refusal, which so irritated David that he put his men in motion with the intention of cutting off Nabal and every other male belonging to the household. Abigail, who was a clever and judicious woman, made ready a present for David, and, starting promptly, apologized for her husband's conduct, allayed the resentment which it had caused, and prevented the gathering storm from breaking on her home. Returning to her abode, she found a great feast in progress, and her lord completely intoxicated. Next morning, when he was sober, she told him how narrowly he had escaped destruction. He was profoundly affected by the report, and from the shock which it caused died about 10 days later. After a time, Abigail became one of David's wives (I Sam. 25:1-42).

Nab'a-tae'ans (nāb'ā-tē'ānz); Nab'a-thae'ans (nāb'ā-thē'ānz), in A.V. Nab'a-thites (nāb'ā-thits). The Nabataeans were an Arabian people, who not only spoke Arabic, but also wrote and spoke Aramaic; many of them also knew Greek. They developed a remarkable civilization in the first 2 centuries B.C. and the first century of our era. At one time their power extended as far n. as Damascus and Coele Syria and as far s. as Madā'in Šālīh (al-Hijr) in n. al-Hijāz (cf. besides the inscriptions, I Macc. 5:25; 9:35; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 2). The capital Petra was situated on the important trade routes between s. Arabia and Syria, and this location explains the spectacular rise and development of the Nabataean kingdom. The entire country from the Euphrates to the Red Sea was called Nabatene (Jos. Antiq. i. 12, 4). On the Arabian trade routes there were carried by numerous caravans the products of s. Arabia as well as merchandise from Africa, India, and even China. These commodities were distributed from Petra to Egypt, to Syria, and to Greece and Italy by way of Gaza. The Nabataeans became wealthy through the duties imposed on goods sent through their territory, and their trade routes were guarded by frontier posts, watchtowers, and fortresses. In art, architecture, engineering, and ceramics they were very gifted. They carved dwellings, temples, and tombs out of the native rock. No other people in the ancient Near East pushed agriculture as far into the desert as they did. When springs were available, water was carried by aqueducts long distances for irrigation purposes. In fact the Nabataean occupation of Edom and Moab was sustained both by trade and by agriculture.

In the 4th century B.C. the Nabataeans were nomadic Arabs, who did not engage in agriculture, but traded in the rich products of Arabia. They lived in tents and abhorred the use of wine. By c. 300 B.C. they had stone houses and also took up agriculture. Apparently the ban on wine was gone, judging from the motif of the grape, leaf, and vine in decoration.

A fertility religion developed out of their agricultural background. The best-known deity is dhu-al-Shara (Dushara, Dusares-Dionysus). Other deities of which we have representatives are Zeus-Hadad and Atargatis. A winged Tyche-Nike at Khirbet Tannur, holding aloft a cornucopia, combines the characteristics of Tyche, the goddess of fortune, and those of Nike, the goddess of victory. Nabataean temples have been discovered at Khirbet Tannur, Petra, Mesheirfeh, Kerak, Khirbet Dherih, Dhat Ras, Aineh, Kasr Rababah, and Ramm.

About 312 B.C. the Nabataeans were strong enough to resist 2 expeditions sent against them by Antigonos, one of the successors of Alexander the Great. The following kings are known: Aretas (Hārithath) I, 169 B.C.; Erotimus, 110–100 B.C.; Aretas II, 96 B.C.; Obadas ('Obidath), 90 B.C.; Aretas III, c. 85–60 B.C.; Malchus (Mālik) I, c. 50–28 B.C.; Obadas II, c. 28–9 B.C.; Aretas IV, 9 B.C. to A.D. 40; Abias; Malchus II, c. A.D. 48–71; Rabel (Rabbil), A.D. 71–106.

In the reign of Aretas III the Nabataeans first came into close contact with the Romans. In 47 B.C. Julius Caesar called on Malchus I to provide him with cavalry for the Alexandrian War. In the time of Obadas II there took place the Roman invasion of Arabia under Gallus (24 B.C.), in which the Nabataeans co-operated. Arabia Petraea reached its height under Aretas IV, whose ethnarch endeavored to arrest Paul at Damascus (II Cor. 11:32). In A.D. 105 Trajan put an end to Nabataean autonomy, and the following year their territory became a Roman province called Arabia Petraea (the Arabia of Petra). See ARETAS 1, SELA.

Nab'o-ni'dus (nāb'ō-ni'dūs) [Akkad. Nabū-nā'id, the god Nabū (Nebo) is exalted]. The last king of the Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean Empire (556–539 B.C.). His father, Nabū-balāṣu-iḫbi, was an important prince known for his wisdom and great attainments. His mother probably was Shumūa-damka, a priestess in the temple of the moon-god at Harran; this may explain his ardent interest in the shrines of Sin (the moon-god) at Ur and Harran. From a reasonable interpretation of the evidence it appears that his wife Nitocris was the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar II; Belshazzar, their son, was the coregent of Nabonidus at Babylon from the 3d year of his reign to the fall of the city in 539, but during that time the father did not relinquish his position as first ruler of the land.

It seems that the social rank of his father and the religious prestige of his mother prepared the way for Nabonidus' early rise to eminence. He probably is the individual of this name who in the 8th year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign was a city administrator. The Labynetus (Herod. i. 74), who in 585 was Nebuchadnezzar's emissary associated with Syennesis of Cilicia to make peace between Alyattes of Lydia and Astyages the Mede, probably was Nabonidus.

Amel-Marduk, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, who reigned from 562 to 560, was slain as the result of a conspiracy; he was succeeded by Nebuchadnezzar's son-in-law, Neriglissar, who was king for four years (560–556). His young son Lābāshi-Marduk, after a reign of 9 months, was slain by conspirators, who then chose Nabonidus, already an old man, as king.

Nabonidus was an archaeologist and a builder and restorer of temples. In rebuilding a temple, his workmen were instructed to dig for the original foundation stones. In finding inscriptions, which even at that time were ancient, and copying names and lists of kings, the work of Nabonidus has proved valuable for the historian in establishing dates. His own daughter, Bēl-Shalti-Nannar, was dedicated to the great temple of Sin at Ur. Nabonidus' devotion to Sin and the neglect of Marduk evidently aroused priestly opposition to his religious program. When Cyrus invaded Babylonia, Nabonidus had the images of the different gods in the various temples brought to Babylon for safekeeping; subsequently they were restored by Cyrus to their original shrines.

He spent many years of his reign at Taima (Teima), a healthful region which had important commercial and military advantages in the w. On account of the threatening invasion by Cyrus, Nabonidus returned home in the 17th year of his reign (539). The only real battle was fought at Opis in the 7th month (Tishri), and on the 14th of that month Sippar was captured by Cyrus. Two days later Babylon fell into the hands of Ugbaru (Gobryas), the chief general of Cyrus; the latter entered the city 17 days later (the 3d of Marheshvan). Nabonidus was kindly treated by Cyrus, who gave him Carmania (in s. Persia) to rule or much more probably as a place of abode in a new land (Jos. Apion i. 20). World power had now passed from the Semites to an Indo-European people. Babylon for centuries had stood for Semitic power, civilization, and culture, and its glory was ended. See BABYLONIA, BELSHAZZAR, CYRUS.

Na'both (nā'bōth) [perhaps, a sprout; cf. Arab. nabata, to grow, sprout]. An inhabitant of Jezreel, who had a vineyard at that town near one of Ahab's palaces. The king wished to buy it, but its owner would not sell it because it had descended to him from his ancestors. At the instance of Jezebel, Naboth's life was sworn away by suborned witnesses, he and his sons (II Kings 9:26), to whom the vineyard would have descended, were stoned to death, their bodies were left to be devoured by the dogs, and the vineyard was seized by Ahab. This act of violence called down the judgment of God on the guilty king and his yet guiltier wife (I Kings 21:1–24; 22:34–38; II Kings 9:30–37).

Na'chon (nā'kōn). See NACON.

Na'chor (nā'kōr). See NAHOR.

Na'chon (nā'kōn), in A.V. Na'chon [firm, prepared]. The designation of a threshing floor at which Uzzah was struck dead for touching the Ark (II Sam. 6:6), and hence called Perez-uzzah, i.e., breach of Uzzah (II Sam. 6:8); see CHIDON.

Na'dab (nā'dāb) [(God is) liberal]. 1. The eldest of Aaron's 4 sons (Ex. 6:23; Num. 3:2). With his brother Abihu, he was granted the privilege of a near approach to Jehovah at Sinai (Ex. 24:1), and was subsequently appointed to the priesthood (Ex. 28:1), but both of them afterward offered strange fire to God, and as a penalty were consumed by fire (Lev. 10:1–7; Num. 26:61). From the fact that a command was immediately thereafter given to Aaron not to drink wine or strong drink when he entered the tabernacle, it may be inferred that Nadab and Abihu had done so, and were under the influence of liquor when they committed the sin which cost them their lives (Lev. 10:9). They both died childless (Num. 3:4; I Chron. 24:2).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:28, 30).

3. A Benjamite, a son of Gibeon and Maachah (I Chron. 8:30; 9:36).

4. Son of Jeroboam I, and his successor on the throne of Israel. He began to reign c. 913 B.C. He followed the evil example of his father with respect to calf worship. He led the forces of his kingdom to besiege Gibbethon, but was murdered with his relatives by Baasha, who then mounted the vacant throne. This massacre fulfilled the threatenings of Jehovah against Jeroboam and his house. Nadab reigned less than 2 full years (I Kings 14:10, 11, 20; 15:25, 30).

Nad'a-bath (năd'ă-băth), in A.V. Na-dab'-a-tha (nă-dăb'ă-thá). A place e. of the Jordan (I Macc. 9:37; in Jos. Antiq. xiii. 1, 4 Gab-atha); probably Khirbet el-Teim, about 1½ miles s. of Mādabā.

Nag'gai (năg'ī), in A.V. Nag'ge (năg'ē). An ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:25).

Na-ha-lal (nă'hă-lāl) and Na-ha-lol (Judg. 1:30), in A.V. once Na-hal'lal (Josh. 19:15) [drinking place for flocks]. A village of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15 seq.), from which, however, that tribe failed to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. 1:30). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:35). It probably is the modern Tell en-Nahl in the plain s. of Acre.

Na-ha-li-el (nă-hă-lī-ēl) [torrent-valley of God]. An encampment of the Israelites, between Beer, in the desert e. of Moab, and Bamoth, which lay between Dibon and Baal-meon (Num. 21:19). It may be the wadi Wāleh, a tributary of the Arnon draining a wide area n.e. of that river, or the wadi Zerkā Ma'in farther to the n.

Na-hal'lal (nă-hăl'lāl). See NAHALAL.

Na-ha-lol (nă'hă-lōl). See NAHALAL.

Na-ham (nă'hām) [solace, consolation]. Brother of Hodiah's wife (I Chron. 4:19, R.V.).

Na-ha-ma'ni (nă'hă-mă-nī) [compassionate]. One of those who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 7:7).

Na-ha-rai (nă'hă-rī), in A.V. once Na-ha-ri (nă'hă-rī) (II Sam. 23:37) [snorting]. A Beerothite, Joab's armor-bearer (II Sam. 23:37; I Chron. 11:39).

Na-hash (nă'hāsh) [serpent]. 1. Father of Abigail and Zeruiah, David's sisters (II Sam. 17:25; cf. I Chron. 2:16). Probably his widow, the mother of Abigail and Zeruiah, married Jesse and became the mother of David. This explanation is better than the assumption that Nahash was the name of Jesse's wife; or, as the later Jews interpreted the passage, that Nahash was another name of Jesse.

2. An Ammonite king who besieged Jabesh-gilead, and when its inhabitants offered to surrender and become tributary, would not accept the proposal unless every man in the place consented to lose the right eye. He determined to put a reproach upon Israel. A week's time was given in which to seek help. Before it expired, Saul, just before elected king, appeared with a relieving army, totally defeated the Ammonites, and saved Jabesh-gilead and its defenders (I Sam. 11:1-11). Either this Nahash or a son of his bearing the same name treated David kindly, perhaps because he was at variance with Saul (II Sam. 10:2).

3. A man who lived in Rabbah of the Ammonites (II Sam. 17:27). He may have been the king aforementioned, or an Israelite who had settled in Rabbah after its capture by David (II Sam. 12:29).

Na'hath (nă'hāth) [descent or quiet]. 1. A descendant of Esau and also of Ishmael. He became a chieftain of Edom (Gen. 36:3, 4, 13, 17; I Chron. 1:37).

2. A Kohathite Levite (I Chron. 6:26); probably the person elsewhere called Tohu and Toah (I Sam. 1:1; I Chron. 6:34).

3. A Levite; one of those who had charge of the tithes and offerings under Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

Nah'bi (nă'bī) [concealed; but cf. Arab. naḥb, fainthearted]. The representative spy from the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 13:14).

Na'hor (nă'hôr), in A.V. twice Na'chor (Josh. 24:2; Luke 3:34) [breathing hard, snorting]. 1. A son of Serug, and grandfather of Abraham (Gen. 11:24, 25).

2. A son of Terah, and brother of Abraham (Gen. 11:27). He married his niece Milcah, daughter of Haran and sister of Lot (Gen. 11:29). He is not mentioned as emigrating from Ur with Terah, Abraham, and Lot; but later he is found in Mesopotamia at Haran (Gen. 24:10; 27:43). Eight sons were born to him by Milcah, from whom sprang Aramaean tribes. Four others traced their descent from his concubine (Gen. 22:21-24). One of his sons by Milcah was Bethuel, who became the father of Rebekah and Laban (Gen. 24:15, 29).

The city of Nahor (Gen. 24:10) figures often as Nakhur (Naḥur) in the Mari tablets and also in the more recent Middle-Assyrian documents. It seems to have been located below Haran in the Balikh valley, and was ruled by an Amorite prince in the 18th century B.C.

Nah'shon (nă'shōn), A.V. has once Na'ash'on (Ex. 6:23), and in N.T. Na'as'son [serpent]. A prince of the tribe of Judah in the early period of the wilderness wanderings (Num. 1:7; 2:3; 7:12, 17; 10:14). His sister was married to Aaron, who was of the tribe of Levi (Ex. 6:23). Nahshon was the grandfather or remoter ancestor of Boaz, Ruth's husband, and the 5th backward in the genealogy of David (Ruth 4:20-22; I Chron. 2:10-12). This placed him in the ancestry of our Lord (Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32, 33).

Na'hum (nă'hūm) [compassionate]. 1. A prophet born at Elkosh, doubtless a village of Palestine. He prophesied to Judah (Nahum 1:15), not to the 10 tribes in captivity. The prophet cites the destruction of No-amon (Thebes) in Egypt (ch. 3:8-10), which was overthrown by the Assyrians 663 B.C., and predicts the fall of Nineveh (v. 7), which occurred 612 B.C.; this narrows the limits within which the composition of the book must be sought to the years between these events. Kuenen suggested that the unsuccessful attack of Cyaxares upon Nineveh in 623 was the occasion of the prophecy.

The theme of the prophecy in The Book of Nahum is the burden of Nineveh (ch. 1:1). The prophet insists on the familiar truth that Jehovah is a jealous God, whose vengeance is certain to fall on his adversaries, but who is a stronghold to those that trust in him (vs. 2-8), urges the people to turn a deaf ear to the counsel of those who were speaking against Jehovah's tardiness and advising the abandonment of his service (vs. 9-11), declares the unalterable purpose of the Lord to deliver his people (vs. 12-14), and exhorts them to unswerving loyalty to their God and the faithful observance of his worship (v. 15). On the basis of this truth, the prophet proceeds to describe the overthrow of the worldly power which was then oppressing the kingdom of God. He pictures the siege of the city (ch. 2:1-10), and takes occasion to taunt the city which had been as a den of lions (vs. 11-13). Returning to the description of the siege, he attributes the judgment which befalls the city to its whoredoms (ch. 3:1-4). This allusion leads to a change of the figure, and he depicts the punishment as the punishment of a harlot (vs. 5-7). He draws attention to the fact that Nineveh is no better than No-amon, which went into captivity (vs. 8-10), and he predicts that like No-amon Nineveh shall be destroyed (vs. 11-19).

The prophecy opens with an address poetic in character and alphabetic in form (ch. 1:2-15; in Heb. text, chs. 1:2 to 2:1). But it is not an alphabetic psalm of the ordinary kind, in which the verses begin with the letters of the alphabet in their conventional sequence (cf. Psalm 119). The prophet has done more. He has allowed the consecutive sounds to introduce topics rather than verses and to follow each other singly or in groups throughout the stately oration. He teaches the ear to listen for certain sounds and to hear them with satisfaction. Nahum's book falls into 2 parts. Chapter 1 describes the majesty of God; chapters 2 and 3 pronounce judgment upon Nineveh.

I. The prophet enunciates a doctrine of Jehovah, God of Israel (aleph ['] in the very first word, 'el, God [v. 2]); the doctrine that forms the basal truth of his prophecy, namely, that Jehovah, though slow to anger, yet takes vengeance on his adversaries (ch. 1:2, 3; aleph beginning important words). Then the prophet describes the majesty and might of Jehovah in nature: he is in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet (beth [b] being heard thrice in this part of v. 3); he rebukes the waters that they dry up and vegetation languishes (v. 4, which begins with gimel [g]); the mountains and hills tremble before him (v. 5; he [h] being heard 4 times in prominent words, and the conjunction and [waw, w] being used 4 times also, if that is intentional); the fierceness of his indignation none can withstand (v. 6; the significant words beginning once with zayin [z] and twice with hheth [h] in proper order). The truth that has been set forth involves on the one hand the goodness of Jehovah to his people and his knowledge of them (v. 7; facts stated in words beginning with teth [t] and yodh [y]), and on the other hand, the overthrow of evil (v. 8; the principal word being kâlah, yielding the 2 sounds kaph [k] and lamedh [l] and followed twice by that of mem [m] in the word mākôm, place). The climax of doctrine has been reached.

II. A new section of the exalted discourse opens, in which the prophet bases prediction on the truth that has been set forth. He reiterates the impotence of opposition to Jehovah: first in the form of a question (v. 9; which in its main part begins with another mem [m] and ends with nun [n]; next as a declaration, repeating the conclusion of the doctrinal section (the consecution of sounds being allowed to recur, kaph [k] being heard once and lamedh [l] twice in the 2 words that dominate the thought, kâlah and lô', and immediately afterward mem [m] thrice). Then the prophet foretells the destruction of God's foes (vs. 10-13; samekh [s] beginning 4 consecutive words and fairly hissing through v. 10, while ayin ['] snarls 4 times in consecutive words in v. 11 and 4 times in the second half of v. 12 and in the first word of v. 13). The prediction of the deliverance of God's people proceeds (v. 14; tsadhe [s] beginning the verse, and qoph [k] being the initial letter of 2 words at its close). Finally, in view of the truth that has been presented, the prophet exhorts God's people to continue steadfast and undismayed in his service and worship (v. 15; resh [r] and sin [s] and shin [sh] being prominent tones, repeatedly heard in the first half of the verse; and tav [t] being the last letter of the verse and the concluding sound of the prophecy which began with aleph). This last verse, both by its thought and rhythm, forms the transition to ch. 2.

Nahum concentrates his prophetic passion, not upon Jerusalem, but upon Nineveh. Relief from the hated oppressor, Assyria, is in sight; the prophet sees the directing hand of God in history. For centuries Assyria had oppressed all the peoples of w. Asia. Probably the feeling of despair and suffering which they as well as their neighbors had endured helped to develop among the Hebrews the idea of a common humanity. Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah had told their hearers that they would be besieged and carried into captivity; in their inscriptions the Assyrian kings boasted of their sieges, conquests, and cruelties. Nahum prophesied how retribution would come to Nineveh and mark her end.

2. An ancestor of Christ, born scarcely 3 centuries earlier (Luke 3:25). A.V. uses the Greek form of the name, Naum.

Nail. 1. The horny scale at the end of the finger (Deut. 21:12; Dan. 4:33).

2. A tent pin (Judg. 4:21), which was of large size and commonly made of wood. Those used to fasten the curtains of the tabernacle were of brass (Ex. 27:19).

3. A pin, commonly of metal, used for driving into wood or other material to hold separate pieces together, or left projecting for hanging things on. It might be made of iron (I Chron. 22:3), or of gold, or be gilded (II Chron. 3:9). It was sometimes driven between the stones of a wall (Ecclus. 27:2). Idols were fastened securely in place by nails (Isa. 41:7; Jer. 10:4), and victims were often affixed to the cross by means of a nail driven through each hand and the feet (John 20:25).

Na'in (nā'in). A town where our Lord raised to life the only son of a widow (Luke 7:11-17). It is still called Nein, and is in the n.w. corner of the eminence called Jebel ed-Duh, or Little Hermon, 2 miles w.s.w. of En-dor, and 5 miles s.e. of Nazareth. It is a small hamlet, little more than a cluster of ruins, with ancient sepulchral caverns s.e. of the village.

Na'oth (nā'ōth) [perhaps, habitations]. The quarter in Ramah where the prophets, who gathered about Samuel to work under his direction, dwelt as a community (I Sam. 19:18 to 20:1).

The word occurs in this passage only, and the exact meaning is obscure. It appears in the kere as nāyōth, but as nāw'yath in the kethib; LXX (Codex Vaticanus and Lucian) favors the latter form. Heb. nāweh (pasture, pastoral or nomadic abode, and then abode in general) may be related. On the basis of Arabic, nāw'yath has also been explained as a place of study, a college, or school, but it is doubtful whether this meaning was developed so early. Accordingly, it is well to adhere to the common interpretation, habitation or habitations; see PROPHETIC ASSOCIATIONS.

Name. English names, such as James, Robert, Anne, have a meaning, but it is known only to those who have studied the etymology. In Biblical times it was different. The names of persons were not only significant, but as a rule everybody knew the meaning as soon as the name was heard. Sarah, Jacob, Miriam, Jehoshaphat, Martha, Rhoda, Dorcas were intelligible to all.

The name was probably given by the Hebrews on the 8th day after birth (Gen. 17:12; 21:3, 4; Luke 1:59; 2:21). The child might be given the name of a natural object, as: Terah, wild goat; Leah, wild cow; Jonah, dove; Tamar, palm tree; Tabitha, gazelle. It might receive a name expressive of its physical condition; for example, Shiphrah, beauty; or of the parents' hope regarding it, as Noah, rest (Gen. 5:29). Some names were given prophetically, as that of Jesus because he should be the Saviour (Matt. 1:21). Many names testified to the piety or gratitude of the parents, as: Simeon, hearing (Gen. 29:33); or Nathaniah, Jehovah has given; or Elizur, God is a rock. Others were commemorative of national events, as Ichabod (I Sam. 4:21); yet others were family names (Luke 1:59-61; cf. ch. 3:23-38). When character had developed, a new name was sometimes given as expressive of it, as Israel and Cephas. In the later period, when several languages were spoken in Palestine, a name was often translated and the person was known by 2 names, as: Cephas after the Aramaic; Peter after the Greek; Thomas and Didymus, both names meaning twin; Messiah and Christ, both meaning anointed. At this time also names were transformed, the Hebrew Jehohanan became in Greek Joannes, and Joseph became Josés.

Surnames were lacking among the Hebrews; persons were designated by adding to the personal name the name of their city, as Jesus of Nazareth, Joseph of Arimathea, Mary Magdalene, Nahum the Elkoshite; or by a statement of their descent, as Simon son of Jonah; by their disposition, trade, or other characteristic, as Simon Peter, Nathan the prophet, Joseph the carpenter, Matthew the publican, Simon the Zealot, and Dionysius the Areopagite. Every Roman had three names: a praenomen, which was his personal name and stood first, a nomen, which was that of his gens or house and stood second, and a cognomen or surname, which was that of his family and came last. Thus M. Antonius Felix, the procurator, was Marcus of the clan Antonia and the family called Felix. Frequently only the nomen and cognomen were given, the personal name being omitted; as Julius Caesar, Pontius Pilate, Claudius Lysias.

Name is often used in Hebrew in the sense of revealed character and essence. God swears by his great name to carry out his purpose (Jer. 44:26), that is, he swears by his attested power to accomplish his word. The name of God which is excellent in all the earth (Ps. 8:1) is that expression of his being which is exhibited in creation and redemption. The name of the God of Jacob which sets the king on high (Ps. 20:1) is the manifested power of Israel's God. The name of God was in the angel which led Israel through the wilderness (Ex. 23:21), because in him the revealed might and majesty of God himself dwelt. The name of God dwelt in his sanctuary (II Sam. 7:13), the place where he manifested himself. To know the name of God is to witness the manifestation of those attributes and apprehend that character which the name denotes (cf. Ex. 6:3 with v. 7; I Kings 8:43; Ps. 91:14; Isa. 52:6; 64:2; Jer. 16:21).

Na'omi (nā'ō-mī; nā-ō'mī) [my sweetness or delight]. Wife of Elimelech. Elimelech went with her and his 2 sons to sojourn in Moab, because famine prevailed in Judah. The sons married Moabite women. Elimelech and his sons died, and Naomi accompanied by her daughter-in-law Ruth returned to Bethlehem of Judah (Ruth, chs. 1 to 4).

Na'phish (nā'fish), in A.V. once Ne'phish (I Chron. 5:19). Son of Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; I Chron. 1:31), and founder of a clan with which the Israelite tribes e. of the Jordan were at one time in conflict (I Chron. 5:18-22).

Naph'tali (nāf'tā-lī), in A.V. twice Neph'tha-lim (Matt. 4:13, 15), once Nep'tha-lim (Rev. 7:6) [my wrestling]. 1. Sixth son of Jacob, and second by Bilhah, Rachel's maid-servant. Rachel gave him this name because she had wrestled in prayer for God's favor and blessing (Gen. 30:8).

2. The tribe descended from Naphtali. It was subdivided into 4 great families which sprang from the 4 sons of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48, 49). The prince of the Naphtalite tribe early in the wilderness wanderings was Ahira, son of Enan (Num. 1:15; 2:29); at a later period it was Pedahel, son of Amihud (Num. 34:28); its representative spy was Nahbi, son of Vophsi (ch. 13:14). At the 1st census in the wilderness its fighting men were 53,400 (ch. 2:29, 30); at the 2d they were 45,400 (ch. 26:50). The tribe of Naphtali pitched on the n. side of the tabernacle, beside those of Dan and Asher (ch. 2:29). Upon their arrival in Canaan, they were one of the 6 tribes which stood upon Mount Ebal to pronounce curses on transgressors of the law (Deut. 27:13; cf. Josh. 8:33). The territory allotted to them was in n. Palestine. It was bounded on the e. by the upper Jordan and the Sea of Galilee, on the s. by Issachar and Zebulun, and on the w. by Zebulun and Asher (Josh. 19:34). It was a long, narrow strip of land, about 50 miles from n. to s. and varying from about 10 to 15 from e. to w. It is mostly mountainous (Josh. 20:7), and is quite fertile. Its boundary ran by Mount Tabor (ch. 19:34), and it numbered Ramah, Hazor, Kedesh, Iron, and Beth-anath among its fortified cities (vs. 36-38). The Gershonite Levites had 3 cities allotted them within its limits; they were Kedesh, Hammoth-dor, and Kartan. The first of them was a city of refuge (Josh. 20:7; 21:6, 32; I Chron. 6:62, 76).

Up to the early period of the Judges the Naphtalites had not succeeded in expelling the Canaanites from Beth-shemesh and Beth-anath; they had, however, made them tributary. The Naphtalites took a large share in the fighting under Deborah and Barak, being mentioned with Zebulun as having jeopardized their lives unto death in the high places of the field (Judg. 4:6, 10; 5:18). They also responded to the summons to arms issued by Gideon (Judg. 6:35; 7:23). A thousand captains, with 37,000 fighting men, came to David at Hebron, to aid him in the contest with Ishbosheth (I Chron. 12:34; cf. v. 40). Their ruler some time afterward was Jerimoth, son of Azriel (I Chron. 27:19; cf. Ps. 68:27). Ahimaaz was Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali (I Kings 4:15). Hiram, not the Tyrian king, but the skillful worker in metal, was a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali (I Kings 7:14). The land of Naphtali was ravaged by Ben-hadad, king of Syria (I Kings 15:20; II Chron. 16:4), and many of its inhabitants were subsequently carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (II Kings 15:29). To these calamities Isaiah alludes, and comforts the afflicted people by intimating in the name of the Lord that the territory now ravaged should one day receive special privilege, so that they who walked in darkness should see a great light (Isa. 9:1-7). This prophecy was fulfilled when our Lord made the region on which the invasion had fallen the special seat of his ministry (Matt. 4:12-16). Chorazin, Capernaum, and Tiberias were within the limits of what had been Naphtali.

Naph'tu'him (nāf-tū'hīm). A tribe of Egyptian descent, mentioned between the Libyans of Lower and the Pathrusim of Upper Egypt (Gen. 10:13; I Chron. 1:11). It may be a designation for Lower Egypt or The Delta.

Nap'kin. See HANDKERCHIEF.

Nar-cis'sus (nār-sīs'ūs) [Lat. from Gr.]. A Roman, whose household was in the Lord and was greeted by Paul in his letter to the church (Rom. 16:11).

Nard. See SPIKENARD.

Na'sor (nā'sôr). See HAZOR 1.

Na'than (nā'thān) [he (i.e., God) has given]. 1. Son of Attai, and father of Zabab, belonging to the house of Jerahmeel, family of Hezron, tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:36).

2. A distinguished prophet in the reign of David and Solomon. The proposal to build the Temple was submitted to him by David. At first he was favorable to the project, but afterward received a message from the Lord directing that not David, but his successor was to have the honor of building the holy house (II Sam., ch. 7; I Chron. 17:1-15). Nathan was afterward sent to David to bring him to a sense of his great sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite. This the prophet did by the parable of the ewe lamb (II Sam. 12:1-15; cf. Psalm 51, title). In his official capacity as prophet of the Lord he named the young Solomon Jedidiah (II Sam. 12:25). With his and Gad's concurrence, or possibly at their instigation, David arranged the musical service for the sanctuary (II Chron. 29:25). When Adonijah aspired to the throne in lieu of Solomon, he sent no intimation of his intention to Nathan, believing probably that the prophet was too loyal to David to be seduced from his allegiance (I Kings 1:8-10). Nathan advised Bath-sheba to go at once and tell David what had occurred, arranging that he would come in and confirm her words. The plan was carried out, and David gave orders to Zadok the priest, Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah, chief of the bodyguard, to proclaim Solomon (I Kings 1:11-45). Nathan wrote a history in which he described the reign of David and part at least of that of Solomon (I Chron. 29:29; II Chron. 9:29).

3. The father of one and brother of another of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:36; I Chron. 11:38); see IGAL 2.

4. The 3d of those children of David who were born in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:14). He, or possibly the prophet, was father of Solomon's officials, Azariah and Zabud (I Kings 4:5). His family is mentioned in Zech. 12:12. Through him David and Jesus Christ are connected by natural lineage (Luke 3:31); while it is through Solomon that Joseph, the husband of Mary, is connected with David (Matt. 1:6).

5. A chief man with Ezra at the brook of Ahava (Ezra 8:16).

6. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:39).

Nathan'ael (nā-thān'ā-ēl) [Gr. from Heb., God has given]. A native of Cana in Galilee, whom Jesus declared to be an Israelite indeed in whom was no guile. His attention was directed by Philip to Jesus as the Messiah of O.T. prophecy. But as Nazareth is not mentioned in O.T. prophecy and besides had a questionable reputation, he felt difficulty in accepting the Messianic claims of one who had been brought up in that town; but he at once yielded to the evidence which the superhuman knowledge of Jesus furnished (John 1:45-51). He was in the boat with Simon Peter when the miraculous draught of fishes was brought in (ch. 21:2). The name does not occur in the lists of the apostles given in the first 3 Gospels, but he was probably the same person as Bartholomew.

Other persons of the name are mentioned in the O.T., but there the original Heb. form is used. See NETHANEL.

Nathan-me'leah (nā'thān-mē'lē'āh) [the (divine) king has given]. A chamberlain who lived in Josiah's time within the precincts of the Temple (II Kings 23:11).

Nā'um (nā'ū'm). See NAHUM 2.

Naz'arene (nāz'ā-rēn') [belonging to Nazareth]. 1. One born or resident in Nazareth (Matt. 2:23; Mark 16:6). In Isa. 11:1 the Messiah is called nēser or shoot out of the roots of Jesse; an offspring of the royal family indeed, but of that family shorn of its glory and reduced to its original humble condition. He is frequently called the branch also (Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12). On the most probable interpretation of Matt. 2:23, the Evangelist sees a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy in the providence which led the parents of Jesus to take up their residence in Nazareth again and resulted in Jesus' being a Nazarene. If Nazareth means protectress or guardian, Matthew finds the fulfillment merely in the similarity of sound and in the low esteem in which the town and its inhabitants were held; but if the name is derived from the same root as nēser (see NAZARETH), then Matthew finds the fulfillment chiefly in the meaning (Matt. 26:71, Gr. Nazōraios, of Nazareth, or Nazarene; cf. Mark 16:6, R.V.).

2. An adherent of the religion founded by Jesus; a Christian. It is used contemptuously (Acts 24:5).

Naz'areth (nāz'ā-rēth). A town of Galilee (Matt. 2:23), where Joseph and Mary lived (Luke 2:39), and where Jesus was brought up (ch. 4:16) and spent the greater part of 30 years (cf. Luke 3:23 with Mark 1:9). He was accordingly known as Jesus of Nazareth (Matt. 21:11; Mark 1:24). He was held in favor there (Luke 2:52; 4:16); but after he entered on his mission, he was twice rejected by his fellow townsmen (Luke 4:28-31; cf. Matt. 4:13; 13:54-58; Mark 6:1-6). Nazareth stood upon a hill (Luke 4:29). The town was either small and unimportant or of recent origin; for it is not mentioned in the O.T. or in the Apocrypha or by Josephus. It is still called en-Nāsīrah. It lies in a secluded valley in Lower Galilee, a little n. of the great Plain of Esdraelon, and is about 15 miles w.s.w. of Tiberias, 20 s.w. of Tell Hüm, the reputed site of Capernaum, and 19 s.e. of Acre; it is 88 miles n. of Jerusalem. The valley is about a mile from e. to w. and, on an average, a quarter of a mile from n. to s. The hill on the n.w. rises about 500 feet above the valley, and is cut into ravines on its e. slope. On that e. declivity stands the village of Nazareth. The houses are better than those in many other villages in Palestine, being made of the white limestone which is conspicuously displayed along all the higher parts of the investing hills. They are prettily situated among fig trees, olive trees, and some cypresses, while down below in the valley are gardens surrounded by hedges of prickly pear. In the midst of the gardens is the Fountain of the Virgin, from which Nazareth derives its water, and whither doubtless Mary frequently went to obtain water for her household. Nazareth now contains about 10,000 inhabitants, of whom 3,000 are Christians. There is a fine Franciscan convent. The monks point out many sacred sites in Nazareth, but only the Fountain of the Virgin rests on good evidence. The site of the place where Jesus' fellow townsmen attempted to cast him headlong from the brow of the hill (Luke 4:29) was probably near the Maronite church, where there are 2 or 3 bare scarps, 20, 30, 40, or 50 feet high.

The name Nazareth is written in several forms in the manuscripts of the N.T. Nazareth and Nazaret are the best attested, but there are also found Nazareth, Nazarat; in Matt. 4:13 and Luke 4:16 Westcott and Hort, and Nestle prefer the reading Nazara. The precise form of the word and its meaning are alike uncertain; the town may have been called in Aram. Nāṣrā, Nāṣerath, Nāṣartā, with the fem. ending t (th) retained, as was frequently the case in the names of towns (Zarephath, Daberath, Bozkath, Timnath). Accordingly, it may, under Heb. influence, have been pronounced Nāsereth (cf. Aram. ḡgērā, ḡgarrā, and Heb. ḡggereth, a letter). As thus explained, the word is a fem. participle. It is rare for the Semitic sound ṣ to be represented by z in Gr., as this explanation of Nazareth requires; but it is not unparalleled (cf. Zilpah; Heb. Ṣūpāh, Gr. Zeipha). The Syriac preserves ṣ, using the form Nāṣerath. The Arabs who conquered the country heard the emphatic sibilant and perpetuated the name in the form en-Nāsīrah. The Arabic name signifies helper or victor. The derivation of the original name is frequently sought in the Heb. root nāṣar (watch, protect, guard), so that Nazareth means protectress or guardian in the sense of a watchtower. A comparison of Matt. 2:23 with the Heb. text of Isa. 11:1 favors the derivation of the name Nazareth from the root which appears in Heb. nēṣer and Aramaic nīṣrā, sprout; Nazareth accordingly would mean verdant place or offshoot. The name may also be explained as a passive from nāṣar, signifying protected, secluded. If considered as a Niph'al participle of the root ṣur or ṣārār, it would mean confined, shut in.

Naz'irite (nāz'ī-rīt), in A.V. Naz'a-rite (nāz'a-rit)[separated, consecrated (to God)]. A person, male or female, who was specially consecrated to God. Nazirites probably existed of old among the Hebrews, but their mode of life was brought under the regulations of the Law at Sinai. The Nazirite vowed to separate himself unto the Lord for a certain specified period. He did not, however, become a hermit; he continued to live in human society. Nor was he necessarily an ascetic. By the Law he must not drink wine or strong drink nor eat any product of the vine during the days of his separation; for from the time of the nomadic patriarchs the vine was the symbol of a settled life and culture, which were quite right in themselves, but were removed from the ancient simplicity of life and manners. See JONADAB 2. Nor must the Nazirite shave his head. The long hair was the visible sign of his consecration to God; the hair was the glory of the head and the product of the body he had devoted to God; and the cutting of the hair, which God made grow, was popularly regarded as rendering the head in a measure common (cf. Ex. 20:25; Num. 19:2; Deut. 15:19). Finally, the Nazirite must not render himself ceremonially unclean by touching a dead body, even if the corpse should be that of a near relative. When the time approached for his vow to expire, he appeared before the priest, made certain prescribed offerings, and shaved off his hair and burned it, after which he might again drink wine (Num. 6:1-21). One might be a Nazirite for life instead of for a limited period, and might be dedicated to that mode of existence at or even before his birth. This was the case with Samson (Judg. 13:4, 5) and with Samuel (I Sam. 1:11, 28). Samson, however, permitted deviations not only from the law of the Nazirite, but at the same time from other laws and ancient customs and the dictates of refinement. In the time of Amos profane people tempted the Nazirites to break their vow of total abstinence from wine, even offering it to them to drink (Amos 2:11, 12). After the Exile Nazirites became comparatively numerous (I Macc. 3:49; Jos. War ii, 15, 1). John the Baptist was consecrated a Nazirite from his birth (Luke 1:15). The prophetess Anna was not unlikely a Nazirite (ch. 2:36, 37). It seems to have been the Nazirite vow that Paul was induced to take to allay the storm which his friends saw to be gathering against him on his last visit to Jerusalem (Acts 21:20-26). Wealthy persons often bore the legal expenses of poor Nazirites (Jos. Antiq. xix. 6, 1).

Ne'ah (nē'ā). A place on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh. 19:13); probably Tell el-Wāyilūt, one of the tells of Sahel el-Battōf.

Neap'olis (nē-āp'ō-līs) [Gr., new city]. The seaport of Philippi, and the 1st place in Europe at which Paul touched (Acts 16:11; implied also in ch. 20:6). It was situated on the Strymonian Gulf, 10 miles e.s.e. of Philippi.

Ne'a-rī'ah (nē-ā-rī'ā) [shield-bearer of Jehovah]. 1. A Simeonite captain, who took part in a successful war against the Amalekites near Mount Seir during the reign of Hezekiah (I Chron. 4:42).

2. A descendant of Shecaniah (I Chron. 3:22, 23).

Ne'bai (nē'bī). See NOBAI.

Ne-ba'ioth (nē-bā'yōth), in A.V. of Genesis Ne-ba'joth (nē-bā'jōth) [cf. name of god Nebo]. An Arabian tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. 25:13, 16; 28:9; 36:3); and rich in flocks (Isa. 60:7); not to be identified with the Nabataeans.

Ne-bal'lat (nē-bāl'āt). A town of Benjamin inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:34), now Beit Nabāla, about 4 miles n.e. of Lydda and 1½ n. of el-Haditheh, i.e., Hadid, and w. by n. of Beth-el.

Ne'bat (nē'bāt) [(God has) looked]. Father of Jeroboam I (I Kings 11:26).

Ne'bo (name of god, nā'bō; geographical name, nē'bō) [Heb. Nēbō, from Akkad. Nabū (root meaning to call, announce), a Babylonian god; as a geographical name it may indicate that the place was a seat of Nebo's worship, or correspond to Arab. naba'a (to be high), and denote elevation]. 1. A Babylonian god (Isa. 46:1), who presided over knowledge and literature. The special seat of his worship was at Borsippa, near Babylon. In Isaiah's time images of Nebo were used as objects of worship.

2. A peak of the Abarim mountains over against Jericho (Num. 33:47; Deut. 32:49), and the summit, apparently, of Pisgah (Deut. 34:1). Its probable site is Jebel en-Nebā, 8 miles e. of the mouth of the river Jordan. From its summit, especially from the elevation called Rās Siāghah, there are visible in the clear atmosphere of spring Hermon, at the foot of which lay Dan, and the mountains of Naphtali, and the hill country of Ephraim and Judah, which are bounded and at Carmel washed by the hinder sea, and the depression which marks the south country, and the Dead Sea and the Jordan Valley.

3. A Moabite town near or on Mount Nebo (Num. 32:3). It was rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. 32:37, 38; 33:47; cf. I Chron. 5:8), but came again into Moabite hands (Moabite Stone, 14, see MOABITE STONE; Isa. 15:2; Jer. 48:1, 22). The site is probably represented by Khirbet el-Mḥayiet, s. of Mount Nebo-Siāghah.

4. A town mentioned just after Beth-el and Ai (Ezra 2:29; Neh. 7:33); identified by Conder with Nūba, e. of Khirbet Kīla.

Ne'b'uchad-nez'zar (nēb'ū-kād-nēz'ēr) and Ne'b'uchad-rez'zar (nēb'ū-kād-rēz'ēr) [Akkad. Nabū-kudurri-uṣur, Nebo, defend the boundary. The form with -n- is due to dissimilation]. Son of Nabopolassar and king of Babylon. His father headed a successful revolt of the Chaldeans against Assyria and founded the Neo-Babylonian Empire in 625 B.C. Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, was taken by the Umman-Manda, the allies of Nabopolassar, 612 B.C., and the Egyptians had to reckon with the new claimants of the Assyrian dependencies. Necho II, who ascended the throne of Egypt in 609 B.C., invaded Palestine to protect Egyptian interests (II Kings 23:29; II Chron. 35:20) and fought Josiah, King of Judah, at Megiddo (608). Josiah was killed in battle. Necho returned home and came back with a large army in order to extend his empire beyond the Euphrates. Nabopolassar sent his son Nebuchadnezzar to meet the Egyptians. Nebuchadnezzar defeated them in 605 B.C. with great slaughter at the battle of Carchemish, drove them back to their own land, and subjugated the intervening regions (II Kings 24:7; Jer. 46:2). But news arrived that his father was dead. Committing affairs in the w. to his generals, he hastened back to Babylon and ascended the throne in 605 B.C. (Jos. Apion i. 19). Information regarding his reign is derived from the O.T. writers, including Nebuchadnezzar's contemporaries Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The Book of Daniel is also very important in this connection. The O.T. records are supplemented by notices on inscribed bricks, and the statements of the Babylonian historian Berossus, a priest of the 3d century B.C. After its subjection, Judah rendered tribute to Nebuchadnezzar for 3 years and then revolted (II Kings 24:1). He returned to Palestine after a while, suppressed the revolt, threw one king in fetters, presently ordered the new king to be carried captive to Babylon, and placed yet another king on the throne (II Chron. 36:6, 10); see JEHOIAKIM, JEHOIACHIN, ZEDEKIAH 4. Zedekiah remained professedly loyal for about 8 years; in the 9th year he struck for independence, being assisted by the advance of an Egyptian army (Jer. 37:5). The ultimate result was that Jerusalem was taken (586), and the Temple was burned, and the leading inhabitants of the capital and the country were carried into captivity (II Kings, chs. 24; 25; II Chron. 36: 5-21; Jer., chs. 39; 52). About this time (586-573), Nebuchadnezzar besieged Tyre (Ezek. 29:18; Jos. Apion i. 21; Antiq. x. 11, 1). In his 23d year, 582 B.C., he warred against Colesyria, Moab, and Ammon, and deported several hundred Jews (Jer. 52:30; Jos. Antiq. x. 9, 7). In his 37th year, c. 567 B.C., he invaded Egypt (cf. Ezek. 29:19).

It is probable that Nebuchadnezzar carried on other military campaigns, though the record of them is lost. He acted on the policy of transporting the inhabitants of conquered countries to other parts of the empire, and thus had at his command much labor, which enabled him to carry out important works. He built the great wall of Babylon, erected a magnificent palace for himself, and repaired the great temple of Marduk at Babylon, the temple of Nebo at Borsippa, and many other sanctuaries. He is said to have built hanging gardens to remind his wife Amyitis (Amuheia, Amuhia) of her native Median hills (Jos. Apion i. 19; Antiq. x. 11, 1), and to have constructed near Sippara a huge reservoir for irrigation, reputed to have been 140 miles in circumference and 180 feet in depth, besides canals across the land, and quays and breakwaters on the Persian Gulf. The form of madness from which he suffered when pride overthrew his reason was that called lycanthropy, in which the patient fancies himself one of the inferior animals and acts as such. Nebuchadnezzar imagined that he had become an ox, and went forth to eat grass like other cattle (Dan., ch. 4). He reigned more than 43 years and died after a brief illness in the year 562 B.C., leaving his son Evil-merodach to ascend the throne.

Neb'u-shaz'ban (nēb'ū-shāz'bān), in A.V. Neb'u-shas'ban (nēb'ū-shās'bān) [Akkad., Nabū-šēzibanni, Nebo, save me]. A Babylonian prince who held the office of rab-saris under Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 39:13).

Neb'uzara'dan (nēb'ū-zār-ā'dān) [Akkad., Nabū-zer-iddna, Nebo has given offspring]. The captain of the guard in the army of Nebuchadnezzar which captured Jerusalem. He was chief in command of the troops which completed the destruction of the city and burned the Temple (II Kings 25:3-11, 18-21; Jer. 39:9, 10; 52:12-30; cf. chs. 41:10; 43:6). To the Prophet Jeremiah, who had recommended his countrymen to submit to the Babylonians, he, by express orders from the victorious sovereign, showed all kindness (Jer. 39:11-14; 40:1-5). Five years later he deported a body of Jews (ch. 52:30).

Ne'co (nē'kō) and Ne'coh (nē'kō), in A.V. Ne'cho (nē'kō) and Ne'choh (nē'kō). See PHARAOH 5.

Nec'o-man'cy. See FAMILIAR SPIRIT and WIZARD.

Ned'a-bi'ah (nēd'ā-bī'ā) [Jehovah has been generous]. A son of King Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:18).

Nee'dle. A sharp instrument required for embroidering and sewing (cf. Ex. 35:35; Eccl. 3:7; Mark 2:21). The eye was called simply the hole (Matt. 19:24, Gr.). When Jesus speaks of a camel going through the eye of a needle, he uses a vivid figure of speech and aptly illustrates the difficulty, or rather impossibility, for them that trust in riches to enter into the Kingdom of God (Mark 10:24-26).

Neg'eb (nēg'ēb), The [dry]. The grazing region lying a few miles s. of Hebron (cf. Gen. 18:1 with ch. 20:1; Num. 13:22); called in R.V. the South (Gen. 12:9 marg.). As a physical division of the country, it contrasted with the hill country, the lowland, and the Arabah (Josh. 10:40; 12:8). The n. part of it was allotted to the tribes of Judah and Simeon (Josh. 15:21-32; 19:1-9). Notable places in it were Kadesh-barnea (Gen. 20:1), Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. 24:62), Beer-sheba (Josh. 15:28), Ziklag (Josh. 15:31), and Arad (Num. 21:1).

Neg'i'nah (nē-gē'nā), pl., Neg'i-noth (nēg'i-nōth) [music of a stringed instrument; stringed instrument]. A musical term occurring in the title of many psalms, where it denotes a stringed instrument, and is so rendered in R.V. (Psalm 61). Elsewhere the word often means song, music.

Ne-hel'a-mite (nē-hēl'ā-mīt). The designation of the false prophet Shemaiah (Jer. 29:24). It may be derived from his native place Nehelam, but no such place is mentioned in the Bible. In A.V. marg. it is rendered dreamer.

Ne-he-mi'ah (nē'hē-mī'ā) [Jehovah has comforted]. 1. One of the chief men who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

2. Son of Azbuk and ruler of half the district of Beth-zur. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:16).

Ruins of the Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar

3. A Jew of the Captivity, son of Hachaliah (Neh. 1:1). He was discharging his duty of cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, when the king observed that he looked sad, and questioned him as to the cause of his sorrow. Nehemiah frankly told him it was the state of ruin in which the city of his fathers' sepulchers, Jerusalem, was lying. He therefore begged permission to go and build again the wall of the city (445 B.C.). The king accorded him an escort of cavalry for the journey, gave him letters commending him to the different Persian governors by the way, and appointed him governor of Judah, as Zerubbabel had been (chs. 1:1 to 2:9; 5:14). He arrived at Jerusalem in the 20th year of Artaxerxes' reign, 444 B.C. Ezra the priest was then at the Jewish capital, having come from Babylonia 13 years previously. Nehemiah, on reaching the capital, made a journey by night around the city and viewed the ruined walls. He now intimated to the people his intention of rebuilding the walls, and solicited their active aid. They gave it with good will, each notable man undertaking a part of the wall (ch. 3). The neighboring Gentile tribes did not like to hear that Jerusalem was being rebuilt, and 3 of their representatives, Sanballat, the Horonite, Tobiah, an Ammonite, and Geshem, an Arab, put forth active efforts to stop the building. But they could neither circumvent nor intimidate Nehemiah, who resolutely held on his course. The builders also guarded against sudden attack by working with one hand while with the other they carried a weapon (chs. 2:10; 4 to 6; Eccles. 49:13). The wall was rebuilt in 52 days (Neh. 6:15), in the year 444 B.C. Attention was next turned to the instruction of the people (ch. 8), and a religious revival followed, which led to all the leading men, both of priests and people, sealing with Nehemiah a covenant to worship Jehovah (chs. 9; 10). After governing Judah for 12 years, Nehemiah, in 433-432 B.C., returned to Susa. He asked for further leave of absence (ch. 13:6), and, returning to Jerusalem, seems to have governed it for the remainder of his life, trying to enforce the Law of Moses against all who in any way departed from its provisions (ch. 13:8-31). Josephus states that he died at a great age (Jos. Antiq. xi. 5, 8). A successor, Bagohi (same name, but not same person as Bigvai, q.v.) by name, was in office in 411 B.C. (Elephantine papyri). For Nehemiah's connection with the formation of the canon, see CANON.

The Book of Nehemiah stands in the Hagiographa, or 3d division of the Hebrew Scriptures, immediately after Ezra and before Chronicles. In counting the books of Scripture, the Jews reckoned Ezra and Nehemiah as one book; see EZRA.

Nehemiah, informed of the wretched condition of Jerusalem (Neh., ch. 1), obtains permission of the Persian king Artaxerxes to visit Jerusalem temporarily as a royal commissioner (ch. 2; cf. v. 6). He incites the people to rebuild the walls (v. 17); the names of the builders are listed in ch. 3. He finds it necessary to arm the builders because of the opposition of the Samaritans (ch. 4). While the wall is in process of construction, he corrects abuses among the people (ch. 5). The wall is finished notwithstanding all attempts of Sanballat and Tobiah to terrify Nehemiah, and the secret aid furnished these foreigners by nobles of Judah (ch. 6). The city being large, but the population scanty, Nehemiah desires to increase the number of the inhabitants (ch. 7:4). To this end he gathers together the nobles, the rulers, and the people with the view 1st of reckoning them by genealogy and then of drafting some to dwell in Jerusalem. The register of them that came up at the 1st with Zerubbabel (ch. 7:6-73) is the register of Ezra, ch. 2. Before the registration had been accomplished, the 7th month arrived, which brought the populace to Jerusalem to the feast. The people asked that the Law of Moses be read. The reading resulted, 1st, in their building booths in which to dwell during the feast (Neh., ch. 8), and, 2d, in repentance of their sins and of their guilt in intermarriage with foreigners (ch. 9). They subscribed or sealed a covenant to obey God's Law and to abstain from intermarriage with the heathen. Chapter 10 gives a list of those who sealed. These religious acts having been performed, the original intention of making a registration of the people and securing additional inhabitants for the city was carried out. Lots were cast to draft 1 in 10 from the country people to dwell in Jerusalem in addition to those already inhabiting the city (ch. 11:1, 2). A list of the families who dwelt at Jerusalem (vs. 3-24). A list of the priests and Levites who returned at the first with Zerubbabel (ch. 12:1-9). List of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua (vs. 10, 11). A list of the heads of the priestly houses in the generation after the Return (vs. 12-21). A list of the heads of the Levites at the same time and shortly after (vs. 22-26). The dedication of the wall (v. 27 seq.). In the interval during which Nehemiah was absent at the Persian court abuses had grown up: the Levites had been ill provided for (ch. 13:10), the law of the Sabbath was observed with laxity (v. 15), and intermarriages with foreigners had not entirely ceased (v. 23). These abuses Nehemiah corrected.

The title assigns the authorship of the book to Nehemiah (ch. 1:1). Neh. 1:1 to 7:73a is an excerpt, apparently unaltered, from the memoirs of Nehemiah, as is clear from the use of the 1st person sing.; the register (ch. 7:6-73a) is expressly stated to have been an earlier document, which Nehemiah found and incorporated in his work. Ezra appears in chs. 7:73b to 10:39, and both Ezra and Nehemiah are mentioned in the 3d person (cf. ch. 8:1-9); in chs. 8:9; 10:1 Nehemiah receives the Persian title Tirshatha (so in A.V. and J.V., but governor in R.V.; cf. the same title applied to Zerubbabel, Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65, 70). Even though the register (Neh. 7:6-73a; cf. Ezra 2:1-10) be segregated, there is a difficulty of connection; Neh. 7:73b to 8:18 is not the sequel to ch. 7:4, 5. This section (chs. 7:73b to 10:39), based upon a reliable contemporary source, is perhaps modified here and there by the compiler or Chronicler, who is supposed to have edited the historical material composing the book. Many critics suppose that this source comes from the memoirs of Ezra. The prayer in ch. 9:6-38 is ascribed by the LXX to Ezra. In ch. 10:28-39 the 1st person pl. is employed.

Chapter 11 continues the material of ch. 7:4, but it is remarkable that there is no reference to Nehemiah's initiative, so prominent in ch. 7:1-5. It seems probable, however, that the facts contained in ch. 11 are based upon the materials left by Nehemiah himself, even though the 1st person does not occur here.

In chs. 12 and 13, ch. 12:27-43 and ch. 13:4-31 constitute 2 additional extracts from Nehemiah's memoirs (cf. the 1st person sing., chs. 12:31, 38, 40; 13 passim); it may be that the former in the introductory and concluding verses (ch. 12:27-30, 42, 43) were somewhat altered by the compiler or Chronicler. The lists in ch. 12:1-7, 8, 9, 12-21 probably were derived from older sources by the compiler. Reference to a source is made in ch. 12:23. Ch. 12:10, 11, 22-26 refers to circumstances after the time of Nehemiah; the references to the days of Nehemiah (chs. 12:44-47; 13:1-3) as of the past may be ascribed to the Chronicler. Critics accordingly recognize as definitely belonging to the memoirs of Nehemiah the following passages: chs. 1:1 to 7:5; 11:1, 2; 12:27-43; 13:4-31. The rest of the book is also based upon historical sources.

It cannot be determined whether the Chronicler had predecessors in editing the works of Ezra and Nehemiah. Critics, however, favor the view that the books of Ezra and Nehemiah in their present form are substantially due to the work of the Chronicler, who may be dated c. 400 B.C. See CHRONICLES, EZRA.

Ne'hî-loth (nê'hî-lôth [perhaps, wind instruments] (Psalm 5, title).

Ne'hûm (nê'hûm) [consolation]. One of those who returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Neh. 7:7). Called in Ezra 2:2 Rehûm, for which Nehûm may be a copyist's error.

Ne'hush'ta (nê-hûsh'tá) [of bronze]. Daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem. She became the wife of Jehoiakim and mother of Jehoiachin (II Kings 24:18).

Ne'hush'tan (nê-hûsh'tán) [piece of brass]. See BRAZEN SERPENT.

Ne'l'el (nê-l'él). A frontier village of Asher (Josh. 19:27); probably Khirbet Ya'nin, about 2 miles n. of Kabûl on the edge of the plain of Acre.

Ne'keb (nê'kêb) [a hollow, a narrow pass]. A frontier village of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33, A.V.). The R.V. joins the name with the preceding word, calling the place Adami-nekeb. If one wishes to give it a separate location, it may be placed at el-Bosşa, s.e. of Dâmieh and e. of Kefr Sabt. But see ADAMI-NEKEB.

Ne-ko'da (nê-kô'dá) [dotted, speckled]. Founder of a family of Nethinim (Ezra 2:48, 60).

Nem'u-el (nêm'û-él). 1. A Reubenite, brother of Dathan and Abiram (Num. 26:9). 2. A son of Simeon (Num. 26:12); see JEMUEL.

Ne'pheg (nê'fêg). 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (Ex. 6:21). 2. One of the sons born to David in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 3:7; 14:6).

Neph'tî-lim (nêf'tî-lîm). See GIANT.

Ne'phish (nê'fish). See NAPHISH.

Ne-phî'sim (nê-fî'sîm), or Ne-phû'sim (nê-fû'sîm); while in Ne-phish'esim (nê-fish'ê-sîm) or Ne-phush'esim, 2 spellings, 1 with sh, the other with s, are apparently combined in the same word [hackled ones]. A family of Nethinim (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52), perhaps originally captives taken from the tribe Naphtali (q.v.).

Neph'tha-lîm (nêf'thá-lîm). See NAPHTALI.

Neph-to'ah (nêf-tô'á) [an opening]. The fountain of the waters of Nephtoa was w. of Jerusalem, on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). The place is usually identified with Liftâ, 2 miles n.w. of Jerusalem.

Ne-phush'esim (nê-fûsh'ê-sîm) and Ne-phû'sim (nê-fû'sîm). See NEPHISIM.

Nep'tha-lîm (nêp'thá-lîm). See NAPHTALI.

Ner (nûr) [a lamp]. 1. A Benjamite, son of Abiel and father of Abner (I Sam. 14:51). He or Abner was Saul's uncle (v. 50). If Abner was Saul's uncle, Ner was Saul's grandfather and identical with the following.

2. A Benjamite, son of Jeiel and father or remoter ancestor of Saul's father, Kish (I Chron. 8:33; 9:35, 36). See KISH 2.

Ne'reus (nê'rûs) [Lat. from Gr., name of a sea god]. A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. 16:15), not improbably the son of Philologus.

Ner'gal (nâr'gâl). The Babylonian god of the sun in its burning destructive aspect (II Kings 17:30). The chief seat of his worship was Cuthah. He was ruler of the nether world, and god of war and pestilence.

Ner'gal-sha-re'zer (nûr'gâl-shâ-rê-zêr) [Akkad. Nergal-šar-ušur, Nergal, protect the king]. One of Nebuchadnezzar's princes, who held the office of rab-mag (Jer. 39:3, 13). He is the Nergalsharusur, known to the Greeks as Neriglissar, who married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, murdered his brother-in-law Evil-merodach, and ascended the throne as the latter's successor (Jos. Apion i. 20), reigning from 560 to 556 B.C.

Ne'ri (nê'rî). An ancestor of Christ and somehow genealogically the father of Shealtiel (Luke 3:27).

Nerî'ah (nê-rî'á) [Jehovah is a lamp]. Son of Maaseiah, and father of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer. 32:12; 36:4; 51:59).

Net. The net was used by the Hebrews in fowling (Prov. 1:17). Doubtless, as in Egypt, the clap net was used, a familiar form of which consisted of 2 half hoops or frames covered with netting and attached to a common axis. The trap was spread open flat, and the bait placed in the center. The motion of the bird at the bait released a spring, the 2 sides closed suddenly, and the bird was caught.

The net was also used in hunting (Isa. 51:20). It was cast about the game (Job 19:6) or over it (Ezek. 12:13; 19:8), or laid to catch the feet (Ps. 9:15; 25:15; 57:6; Lam. 1:13). Throughout the ancient world, as sculpture and narrative reveal, it was usual to extend nets on stakes to inclose a large space as by a fence, a single opening being left as an entrance. Through this gateway various kinds of game were driven, such as hares, boars, deer; and once within the inclosure they were under control and easily dispatched. Small nets were used to close gaps between bushes or to bar a path. Purse nets were laid that animals might run into them as into a tunnel and find no exit.

In fishing both drag nets (Hab. 1:15; Matt. 13:47, 48) and casting nets (Matt. 4:18; John 21:6) were used. The Hebrews were acquainted with the common drag net of Egypt (Isa. 19:8). It was quite large, its cords were made of flax, the lower edge was weighted with lead and sunk to the bottom of the river or sea, and the upper edge was floated by pieces of wood.

Ne'ta'im (nê-tá'im) [plantings]. A place in Judah with royal plantations (I Chron. 4:23).

Ne'than'el (nê-thân'él), in A.V. Ne'than'e-el (nê-thân'ê-él) [God has given]. The Gr. form is Nathanael. 1. Prince of the tribe of Issachar at an early period of the wilderness wanderings (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18, 23; 10:15).

2. Jesse's 4th son, and David's brother (I Chron. 2:14).

3. One of the priests who blew trumpets when the Ark was brought up to the city of David (I Chron. 15:24).

4. A Levite, father of Shemaiah (I Chron. 24:6).

5. A son of Obed-edom in David's reign (I Chron. 26:4).

6. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

7. A chief of the Levites in Josiah's reign (II Chron. 35:9).

8. A son of Pashhur, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:22).

9. A priest, head of the father's house of Jedaiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:21).

16. A priest's son who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

Neth'a-ni'ah (nēth'-ā-ni'ā) [Jehovah has given]. 1. A son of Asaph (I Chron. 25:2), the head of the 5th course of singers (v. 12).

2. A Levite sent with others by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

3. Father of Jehudi (Jer. 36:14).

4. Father of that Ishmael who assassinated Gedaliah (II Kings 25:23, 25).

Neth'i-nim (nēth'-i-nim), in A.V. Neth'i-nims (nēth'-i-nimz) [given (pl.)]. Temple servants or slaves given by David and the princes for the service of the Levites (Ezra 8:20). Prior to their appointment, similar functions seem to have been discharged by the Midianites, whom Moses gave over to the Levites (Num. 31:47), and at a subsequent period by the Gibeonites, whom Joshua assigned as hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of God (Josh. 9:23). Even after the Nethinim were associated with them or superseded them, the number of the Nethinim may have been too small for the elaborate Temple services instituted by David's son and successor, and have been increased; for we find in the books of Ezra (ch. 2:55-58) and Nehemiah (ch. 7:57-60) the children of Solomon's servants, i.e., slaves, mentioned after the Nethinim. Although they were organized by David, it was probably under a different name; for the word Nethinim occurs only in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, with a solitary passage in I Chronicles (ch. 9:2). They discharged the more menial duties required by the Temple worship. Of the Nethinim and the children of Solomon's servants, 392 returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:58; Neh. 7:60), and 220 more with Ezra (Ezra 8:17-20). The Nethinim seem to have been naturalized foreigners rather than people of true Israelite descent (I Chron. 9:2; Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61), and several of the names on the list of their leading men have a foreign aspect (Ezra 2:43-54; Neh. 7:46-56). They were probably descendants of the Midianites and Gibeonites, who have already been mentioned, and of various bands of captives taken in war; they are designated by the name of their progenitor or that of the prince or tribe from whom they were taken, as the children of Sisera, of Rezin, of Menunim, and of Nephthim (cf. Ezra 2:48, 50, 53; with I Chron. 5:19-21; II Chron. 26:7). Some of them lived on Ophel, a s. prolongation of the Temple hill (Neh. 3:26, 31; 11:3, 21), others in the villages round about Jerusalem (Ezra 2:70; Neh. 7:73). Holding an official position at the Temple, although the office was menial, they were exempt from imperial taxation (Ezra 7:24). They seem to have adopted with some cordiality the covenant made at the instance of Nehemiah to worship Jehovah (Neh. 10:28, 29).

Ne-to'phah (nē-tōf'-ā) [dropping, falling in drops]. A town of Judah, evidently near Bethlehem (I Chron. 2:54; Ezra 2:21, 22; Neh. 7:26). It was the home of 2 of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:28, 29). Netophathites with Seralah at their head were among the men who assembled loyally about Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made governor of Judah on the fall of Jerusalem (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8 seq.). Fifty-six of the town's people returned after the Exile (Ezra 2:22). It was not originally assigned to the Levites, but after the Return its dependent villages were occupied by certain of them, including singers (I Chron. 9:16; Neh. 12:28). It is identified with Khirbet Bedd Fālūh, about 3½ miles s. of Bethlehem at the junction of Wadi et-Taḥūneh and Wadi eḏ-Dī', near the road to Tekoa.

Ne-top'h'a-thite (nē-tōf'-ā-thit), in A.V. of Neh. 12:28 Ne-top'h'a-thi (nē-tōf'-ā-thi), the Heb. form being preserved. An inhabitant of Netophah (II Sam. 23:28).

Net'tle. 1. The rendering of Heb. ḥārūl. Men driven by want take refuge under it (Job 30:7). Along with another nettle, Heb. ḥimmēšōnim (pl.), it overspreads the slug-gard's unweeded garden (Prov. 24:31). In fact it springs up everywhere when cultivation of the land is neglected (Zeph. 2:9). The plant cannot be identified. R.V. places wild vetches in the marg.

2. The rendering of Heb. ḥimmōš in Isa. 34:13 and Hos. 9:6. The Roman or pill nettle (Urtica pilulifera) is found everywhere in Palestine. A modification of the word is pl. ḥimmēšōnim (Prov. 24:31), which the Eng. versions render "thorns."

New Moon. See MOON.

New Tes'ta-ment. The 2d of the 2 portions into which the Bible is naturally divided. Testament represents the Lat. word testamentum, which is used to translate Gr. diathēkē, covenant (II Cor. 3:14). The N.T. embodies the new covenant of which Jesus was the Mediator (Heb. 9:15; cf. ch. 10:16, 17 and Jer. 31:31-34). The 1st covenant was dedicated with blood (Heb. 9:19, 20), but was in no sense a testament; the 2d, while primarily a covenant was also a testament; that is, it was not merely dedicated with blood, but it required the death of the testator to give it force. It would not have had proper efficacy had not Jesus its Mediator died an atoning death.

The language of the 27 books of the N.T. is the koine or common Greek. This language had taken deep root in Palestine during the more than 3 centuries which had elapsed since the conquest of the Holy Land by Alexander the Great; and the merits of the language itself, and that of the literature which it enshrined, had given it the widest currency among educated men throughout the Roman Empire, though Greece had now for a considerable time lost its political independence.

The original MSS. of the books of the N.T. and almost all the copies made during the first 3 centuries have disappeared. Papyrus, which was commonly used for letters (II John 12), soon wore out, and in the time of Diocletian, A.D. 303, it was customary for the persecutors of Christians to seek for copies of the Scriptures and destroy them. The art of printing was unknown, but transcribers laboriously multiplied copies. The 4 Gospels were most frequently transcribed, and after them the Epistles of Paul. The Revelation was copied least often. No fewer than 4,489 MS. copies of the N.T. in whole or in part exist, their abundance markedly contrasting with the small number of the classical writers which have come down to our own day.

Corruptions of the text soon crept in. Copyists were fallible, careless, and sometimes imperfectly acquainted with Greek. Men of the patristic age and later were not governed by the modern demand for scientific exactness, and they handled the text with considerable license. They attempted to improve the grammar and the style, to correct supposed errors in history and geography, to adjust the quotations from the O.T. to the Greek of the LXX, and to harmonize the Gospels. They incorporated marginal notes, and they added to the Gospel narratives incidents obtained from authentic sources, as John 7:53 to 8:1 and Mark 16:9-20. The various readings which thus originated are very numerous. If each variant in every MS. is reckoned, the total is about 200,000. Nineteen twentieths of these are, however, of no authority, being evidently not genuine, and only the merest fraction of the remainder are of any consequence as affecting the sense. The very number of these readings, and the fact that they were made originally in different parts of the world, and from a variety of MSS., enables Biblical students to detect and eliminate the errors, and to approximate the original text more closely than if the various readings were fewer. This tedious but necessary work has been carried out with untiring energy by textual critics. It is possible indirectly to gain access to the readings in MSS. which have perished, for there were early versions of the N.T. in different languages, such as the Syriac and Latin, and quotations from the N.T. are found in the writings of the early Christians, especially in Clement of Alexandria and Origen. In most cases these versions and citations were made from MSS. not now existing, but a translation generally shows what the original must have been.

The N.T. MSS. fall into 2 divisions: Uncials, in Gr. capitals, at first without breathings or accents and with no separation between the different words, except occasionally to indicate the beginning of a new paragraph; and Cursives, in small running hand, and with divisions of words. The change between the 2 kinds of Greek writing took place about the 9th century. Only 5 MSS. of the N.T. approaching to completeness are more ancient than this dividing date. The 1st, designated as A, is the Alexandrian MS. Though given to England by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, as a present to Charles I, it is believed that it was written, not in that capital, but in Alexandria, whence its title. It is dated in the 1st half of the 5th century. In addition to a large portion of the O.T. and the First Epistle of Clement and part of the Second, it contains the whole of the N.T. except that the leaves containing Matt. 1:1 to 25:5; John 6:50 to 8:52; II Cor. 4:13 to 12:6 are lost. The page is divided into 2 columns, and the text is marked off into chapters, Mark, e.g., containing 48. The 2d, known as B, is the Vatican MS. It has been in the Vatican library at Rome from 1481 or an earlier period, but not till 1857 was an edition of it published, and that one, by Cardinal Mai, when issued, was uncritical and of little value. But in 1889-1890 a facsimile of it came forth, so that now it is fully accessible to scholars. The Vatican MS. dates from the middle of the 4th century, if not even from an earlier period. Besides most of the O.T., it contains all the N.T. except Heb. 9:14 to 13:25; I and II Timothy; Titus, Philemon, and Revelation. It has 3 columns to the page, and is divided into short chapters, Matthew, e.g., having 170. The 3d, C, or the Ephraem MS., is a palimpsest. In the 12th century the original writing was removed to make room for the text of several ascetic treatises of Ephraem the Syrian. Traces of the older writing were, however, discernible, and most of the N.T. text was recovered and published by Tischendorf in 1843. It is believed that it belongs to the 5th century, and perhaps a slightly later period of it than the MS. A. It contains portions of the O.T. and five eighths of the N.T. The lines run across the page. The 4th, D, is the MS. of Beza, to whom it belonged after it was taken from the abbey of St. Irenaeus in Lyons at the sack of the city in 1562. It is commonly dated in the 6th century, though some scholars favor the 5th. It contains the greater part of the Gr. text of the Gospels and Acts, together with a Lat. translation. It is for the most part the only witness among Gr. MSS. to a type of text which was widely current as early as the 2d century, and of which the other principal representatives are the Old Latin and the Old Syriac versions. It is written stichometrically, i.e., in single lines containing as many words as could be read at a breath, consistently with the sense. The 5th, called  $\aleph$  (the Heb. first letter, aleph), is the Sinaitic MS., obtained in 1844 and 1859 by Tischendorf from the monks belonging to the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. Besides the major part of the O.T., it contains the whole N.T. without a break, together with the Epistle of Barnabas and a large part of the Shepherd of Hermas. The last 12 verses of Mark are lacking. It was made in the 4th century, a little later than B. It has 4 columns to the page.

Of the 53 papyrus fragments, some very small, of the N.T., the most important are the Chester Beatty papyri. Portions of 30 leaves of the Gospels and Acts have been preserved from a codex of originally about 220 leaves. Eighty-six leaves, all slightly mutilated, show that another codex originally contained Romans, Hebrews, I and II Corinthians, Ephesians, Galatians, Philippians, Colossians, and I and II Thessalonians, in this order. Both codices are dated early in the 3d century A.D. Ten leaves from a codex of Revelation, dating from the 3d century, comprise a 3d section of these famous papyri. The earliest known portion of the Greek N.T. is a tiny fragment of a papyrus codex dating from not later than A.D. 140; it contains part of John 18:31-33, 37 seq.

Cursive or minuscule MSS. are much more numerous, numbering some 2,429 as compared with 212 uncial MSS. The great majority of them, however, date from the late Middle Ages and possess little or no value in determining the early text. In addition to these, 1,678 lectionaries (medieval MSS. containing lessons from the N.T. prescribed to be read during the church year) have been catalogued, though very few have been critically examined.

The 1st printed edition of the Greek N.T. actually published was that of Erasmus, who issued it in 1516. It was reprinted in 1518, a 2d and more correct edition followed in 1519, a 3d in 1522, a 4th in 1527, and a 5th in 1535. Cardinal Ximenes, the Roman Catholic primate of Spain, had been engaged for some years in preparing an edition of the Greek N.T.; though it was printed in 1514, various causes of delay kept it back from the world till 1521 or 1522. From being made at Alcalá, called by the Romans Complutum, it is known as the Complutensian edition. Among other editions of the Greek N.T. which followed, none were more celebrated than those of Robert Stephanus (Estienne, Stephens) of Paris, which appeared in 1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551. Then Beza the reformer came upon the scene and issued 9 editions of the Greek N.T. between 1565 and 1604, based on Stephanus' 3d edition (1550), which in turn had been founded mainly on Erasmus' 4th or 5th edition. Stephanus' edition of 1550 is the textus receptus in England, but on the continent of Europe this designation and authority are generally given to the 1st Elzevir edition, printed at Leyden in 1624. This Elzevir text is mainly that of Stephanus' edition of 1550, from which it differs in 287 places, including merely orthographic variations. It was mainly from Beza's edition of 1598 that the A.V. of the English Bible was made.

The division of the O.T. and N.T. into our present chapters is probably due to Stephen Langton, later archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1228. The division of the N.T. into our present verses was made by Robert Stephanus in the Greek N.T. which he published in 1551. The 1st English N.T. to be so divided was Whittingham's translation, Geneva, 1557, and the 1st English Bible so divided was the Geneva version of 1560.

Nez'ah (nē-zī'á) [pre-eminent; cf. Arab., sincere]. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:64; Neh. 7:56).

Ne'zib (nē'zīb) [pillar, garrison]. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:43); Khirbet Beit Nesib (or Nāsif), a little over 2 miles s. of Khirbet Kila.

Nib'haz (nīb'hāz). An idol, 1 of 2 worshipped by the Avvites, a tribe brought with others from the Assyrian empire to colonize Samaria after the captivity of the ten tribes (II Kings 17:31). Hommel identifies Nibhaz with an Elamite divinity, Ibna-haza; it has also been compared with Mandaic N'ebaz, the lord of darkness, who is a heavenly power.

Nib'shan (nīb'shān). A town in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. 15:62).

Ni-ca'nor (nī-kā'nōr) [Gr., victorious]. 1. Son of Patroclus and one of the king's friends whom Lysias, regent in w. Syria during the absence of Antiochus Epiphanes, in 166 B.C. selected to lead the army to suppress the Judean revolt (I Macc. 3:38; II Macc. 8:9). The Syrians were defeated, Nicanor stood high in the favor of Demetrius I also, and was appointed governor of Judea by him (I Macc. 7:26; II Macc. 14:12). He professed friendship for Judas Maccabaeus, but the Jew was not deceived. Nicanor engaged in battle with Judas at Capharsalama, and was slain in battle with him near Beth-horon, 160 B.C. (I Macc. 7:27-49; II Macc. 15:1-36).

2. One of the 7 men who were chosen in the church at Jerusalem to look after the Greek-speaking widows and, apparently, the poor in general (Acts 6:5).

Nic'o-de'mus (nik'ō-dē'mūs) [Gr., victor over the people]. A Pharisee and a member of the sanhedrin. Convinced by the miracles which Jesus wrought that the Teacher of Nazareth had come from God, he sought an interview with him; but by night, to escape observation or because the hour was convenient. Jesus explained to him the nature of the new birth, and the love of God for the world which prompted him to give his only begotten Son that whosoever accepted him in faith might have eternal life (John 3:1-21). At a meeting of the sanhedrin, when the members began to denounce Jesus as an impostor, Nicodemus pointedly asked whether the Law condemned a man unheard (ch. 7:50-52). After the death of Christ Nicodemus took about 100 pounds' weight of myrrh and aloes and aided in preparing the body for burial (ch. 19:39).

Nic'o-la'i'tans (nik'ō-lā'i'tānz). A party or sect in the churches of Ephesus and Pergamos whose practice and doctrine are severely censured. Following the doctrine of Balaam, they taught that Christians were free to eat things offered to idols and to commit the excesses of heathenism (Rev. 2:6, 14, 15), contrary to the command issued by the apostolic council held at Jerusalem A.D. 50 (Acts 15:29). Presumably the Nicolaitans were the followers of some heresiarch called Nicolaus. But that he was the deacon of that name in the church at Jerusalem (ch. 6:5) lacks proof. The earliest trace of the theory that the sect originated in the teaching of the deacon is found in the writings of Irenaeus, about A.D. 175. A sect of Nicolaitans existed among the Gnostics of the 3d century. They, too, taught the freedom of the flesh; and they may have grown out of these corrupt Christians of the Apostolic Age.

Nic'o-la'us (nik'ō-lā'ūs), in A.V. Nic'o-las (nik'ō-lās) [Gr., victor over the people]. A proselyte of Antioch, who was 1 of the 7 elected at the instance of the apostles to look after the interests of the Greek-speaking widows and, apparently, the Christian poor in general (Acts 6:5).

Ni-cop'o-lis (nī-cōp'ō-līs) [Gr., city of victory]. A place at which Paul, when he wrote the Epistle to Titus, hoped to winter (Titus 3:12). The note appended to the epistle says it was sent from Nicopolis of Macedonia, but it is of no authority and is not found in the oldest MSS. The place referred to in this postscript was situated on both sides of the river Nestus, which was the boundary line between Thrace and Macedonia. The postscript of the epistle in the received text is wrong: it assumes that Paul wrote from Nicopolis in spite of the distinct there, which shows that he was not then at Nicopolis, and it imagines that the Macedonian city by that name is meant. The probability is that the Nicopolis at which Paul meant to winter was the town in Epirus, 4 miles from Actium, which Augustus founded in 30 B.C. to commemorate his victory. Herod the Great built a number of its public edifices (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 5, 3). Its ruins remain at Prevesa.

Ni'ger (nī'jēr) [Lat., black]. A Latin surname of Simeon, a prophet and teacher in the church of Antioch (Acts 13:1).

Night. The period of darkness (Gen. 1:5). It was divided into 3 watches: sunset to midnight, midnight to cock-crow, cock-crow to sunrise (Ex. 14:24; Judg. 7:19; Lam. 2:19). The Greek and Roman division into 4 watches was in use in N.T. times (Mark 6:48; Luke 12:38). At this period the night, from sunset to sunrise, was divided into 12 hours (cf. Acts 23:33).

Night Hawk. The rendering of Heb. tahmās (cf. hāmas, to treat violently); an unclean bird mentioned in Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). It is doubtful what bird is meant. The Eng. versions make it the night hawk, which is another name for the night jar, better known as the goatsucker (Caprimulgus europaeus), or some species akin to it. The LXX and Vulgate identify it with the owl.

Night Mon'ster. The rendering of Heb. lilith (Isa. 34:14, R.V. marg.; in A.V. screech owl). The word in Heb. means simply nocturnal, and may denote any female nocturnal bird or beast. In Assyrian, it was applied to a nocturnal demon. See SATYR.

Nile (nīl). The great river of Egypt (Isa. 23:3, in A.V. Sihor; Jer. 2:18, marg. of R.V.); in Heb. Shihôr and Y'eôr (river). Its waters covered so vast an expanse, especially during the inundation, that it is sometimes called a sea (Nahum 3:8). The ultimate sources of the river are the streams which feed the Victoria Nyanza, 3° S. latitude; the Nile thus attains a length of some 3,670 miles. But the Nile in a narrower sense, as it presents those peculiarities which have made it famous, is formed by the confluence of the White and the Blue Nile at Khartum; from which point to its principal mouths at Damietta and Rosetta, a distance of about 1,650 miles as the river winds, it traverses an absolutely barren country and receives only 1 tributary, the Atbara, on the e. side, about 140 miles below Khartum. The banks rise several hundred feet and at places to upwards of 1,000 feet, resembling 2 large canal embankments, and wall the valley all the way to Cairo, where they diverge abruptly toward the e. and n.w. and face the protruded Delta. At Khartum, or just below it, the Nile enters the tableland of Nubian sandstone and winds its course in the form of a huge S; in this winding way are 6 cataracts. A short distance above Assuan, the ancient Syene, a ridge of granite, extending for 180 miles from e. to w., lies athwart the river's course. The stream breaks through this barrier, plunges down the rocks of the last or, on ascending the river, First Cataract, and enters the bounds of ancient Egypt. All above that cataract was Ethiopia, which extended from the First Cataract to the Sixth Cataract. The granite of this transverse ridge is colored; it is the well-known light-brown stone of which so many of the polished statues of the Pharaohs are made. Below Cairo the river divides and seeks the sea by several great channels. These mouths are now 2, the Damietta and the Rosetta; but formerly they numbered 7 of which the most important were the e. or Pelusiac, the w. or Canopic, and the middle or Sebennytic (Herod. ii. 17).

As the river pursues its tortuous course through thirsty land, much of its water is consumed by evaporation and infiltration, and still more by the extensive system of irrigating canals, which are necessary for agriculture.

The annual overflow is the famous feature of the Nile. Its occurrence in a rainless region was mysterious to the ancients (Herod. ii. 19-25). The region of Lake Victoria Nyanza is watered by rains which fall almost daily; this steady water supply gives the Nile its constant volume. The Blue Nile rises in the lofty highlands of Ethiopia and is a considerable mountain torrent. In the dry season this stream dwindles almost to nothing; in the rainy season it is a turbid mountain torrent, which rushes impetuously onward, laden with loose soil from the land which it drains. The Atbara is a fresher not unlike the Blue Nile.

Egypt is flanked on each side by extensive barren deserts. If it were not for the annual overflow of the Nile, Egypt would be a part of this desert. It is the variation of the water supply from the Blue Nile and the Atbara which causes the overflow of the Nile. At the beginning of June the river begins slowly to swell; between the 15th and 20th of July the increase becomes very rapid. Toward the end of September the water ceases to rise and remains at the same height for 20 to 30 days. In October it rises again attaining its greatest height. It then decreases, and in January, February, and March the fields gradually dry off. In consequence of this inundation the soil is both softened and fertilized. During a good inundation the Nile reaches a height of 40 feet at Assuan and of 23 to 27 at Cairo.

Occasionally inundation does not take place. A certain Amenemhet (Amen) of Dyn. XII under Sesostris I says that he did not collect arrears of the fields due after short payments during unfruitful years. The inundation failed for 7 years in the time of Joseph (Gen. 41:54); and it failed likewise for 7 years in the reign of the caliph el-Mustansir, the resulting famine reaching its height A.D. 1070. The ancient Egyptians kept records of the height of the inundation at different places in various years.

In the time of the Pharaohs the Egyptian agricultural year was divided into 3 seasons: the period of inundation (from the end of June to the end of October); spring (or winter), that of the growing of the crops (from the end of October to the end of February); summer, that of the harvest (from the end of February to the end of June).

Nim'rah (nīm'rā). An abbreviation of Beth-nimrah (cf. Num. 32:3 with v. 36); see BETH-NIMRAH.

Nim'rīm (nīm'rīm) [perhaps, a pl. of Nimrah, limd waters, or pl. meaning leopards]. A locality in Moab, noted for its waters (Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34). The name is still found in Wadi Nemeirah, near the s.e. end of the Dead Sea, where the ruins of a town Nemeirah exist. Tristram locates the site higher up the valley, where it is said there is an old Moabite city with the name Springs of Nemeirah. It has many well-watered gardens still in cultivation.

Nim'rod (nīm'rōd). A Cushite, a mighty hunter and a potent monarch, the beginning of whose original kingdom embraced Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, cities in the land of Shinar (Gen. 10:8-10; Micah 5:6). The only ancient king of Babylonia known, who fits this description, and was at the same time celebrated in tradition and song, was Gilgamesh. There is, however, no proof that Nimrod and Gilgamesh are identical. Nothing is known of Nimrod beyond what is recorded in the O.T.

Nim'shi (nīm'shī) [ety. uncertain; drawn out, but cf. Arab. nims, ichneumon, weasel]. An ancestor of Jehu (I Kings 19:16; II Kings 9:2), who was generally designated the son of Nimshi.

Nin'evēh (nīn'ē-vē). The capital of the Assyrian empire. The Hebrews embraced the entire population which was collected about the capital, and occupied the district at the confluence of the Tigris and the Upper Zab under the designation of Nineveh the great city (Gen. 10:11, 12; Jonah 1:2; 3:3; Judith 1:1). Nineveh in the narrower sense stood on the e. bank of the Tigris, at the mouth of a small tributary which is now known as the Khosr, about 27 miles above the confluence of the Zab with the main stream. It was built by a people of Babylonian origin (Gen. 10:11). Its tutelary deity was the goddess Ishtar, to whom Manishtusu of the Semitic Dynasty of Akkad (c. 2425-2245 B.C.) built a temple. The cult of the Ishtar of Nineveh was carried by Hurrians and Hittites as far as Egypt and s.w. Asia Minor. Asshur, 60 miles s. of Nineveh and on the opposite bank of the river, was the ancient seat of government; but Shalmaneser erected a palace at Nineveh (1280-1260), and from that period it was looked upon as the chief city of Assyria. Ashurnasirpal and his successor Shalmaneser, whose united reigns extended from c. 885 to 825, had palaces in both Nineveh and Calah, and resided sometimes in one place, sometimes in the other. Their successors dwelt in Nineveh in the broad sense; but the palace was not always in Nineveh proper, but was often erected in one of the suburbs, as Calah or Dur-sharrukin or Tarsis.

The Assyrians were great warriors, and the spoils of the conquered cities and nations were brought to the capital and used to embellish it. It was also the center of some literary activity. About 650 B.C. Ashurbanipal gathered a great library, consisting of documents inscribed on clay tablets, which related to history, ritual, incantation, astronomy, and mathematics. It was composed for the most part of copies of older works, which had been brought from Babylonia. The Prophet Nahum calls Nineveh the bloody city (Nahum 3:1), both because of the wars which it had waged for centuries with the surrounding nations, and because of the cruelty which was practiced by the victors. Ashurnasirpal, for example, was accustomed after his victories to cut off the hands and feet, and the noses and ears, and put out the eyes of his captives, and to raise mounds of human heads. In 625 B.C., when the Assyrian empire began to decline in vigor, Nabopolassar, governor of Babylon, declared himself independent, and in 612 B.C. the Umman-manda, acting in confederation with Nabopolassar, descended upon the plain and by their own might captured and destroyed Nineveh. They were greatly aided by a sudden rise of the Tigris, which carried away a great part of the city wall and rendered the place indefensible.

So complete was the desolation that in Greek and Roman times the departed Nineveh became like a myth. Yet all the while part of the city lay buried under mounds of apparent rubbish. In 1820 Rich, an English resident at Baghdad, inspected the mound called Kouyunjik, on the e. bank of the Tigris, and became convinced that it concealed the ruins of Nineveh. In 1843 Botta, French consul at Mosul, on the w. bank of the Tigris, began to make excavations. He was soon diverted to Khorsabad, 10 miles off, the site of Dur-sharrukin. Between 1845 and 1850 Layard commenced operations at Nimroud, 18 miles s. of Kouyunjik; then he made excavations at the latter place itself, which proved to be the site of Nineveh. George Smith conducted further excavations at the place from 1873 to 1876, and after his death the work was taken up and extended to other mounds by Rassam. The walls of Nineveh have been traced and indicate a city 3 miles in length by less than a mile and a half in breadth, containing an area of about 1,800 English acres. But, as already said, the Hebrews and perhaps other foreigners were accustomed to include under the name of Nineveh the complex of cities which included, besides Nineveh, Calah, 18 miles s., Resen between Calah and Nineveh, and Rehoboth-ir, broad places or suburb of the city, which is perhaps identical with Rebit Nina, suburb of Nineveh, which lay to the n.e. of the city. These are the 4 places which are enumerated in Gen. 10:11, 12 as composing the great city. But they were not the only towns which sprang up in the environs of Nineveh. Yarimja, on the river directly s. of Nineveh, marks an ancient site, and near the Tigris, 3 miles above Nineveh, was Tarbisu, with a royal palace, beginning the imposing line of habitations and walled towns which extended along the river s. to Calah. Back from the river, n.e. of Nineveh and beyond Rebit Nina, at the foot of the e. mountains, was Dur-sharrukin or Sargon's burg, a town about as large as Calah, built about 707 B.C., and containing a great palace. Seven miles s.e., and also at the foot of the e. mountain, was another town scarcely inferior in size to Calah. Its ancient name is unknown, but it is situated hard by Baasheilah. It was 1 of a series of towns which extended to Calah. Birtelleh, 6 miles s., probably marks the site of an ancient town, and Keremlis, 3 miles farther on, is known to do so. Imgurbel, with its palace and temple which Ashurnasirpal adorned, was 6 miles s. of the latter place, and was 9 miles from Calah. Other towns and villages dotted the plain within the bounds which have been thus defined. It may be that Diodorus Siculus, of the 1st century B.C., is citing an authentic tradition when he states that Nineveh formed a quadrangle measuring 150 stadia by 90, or 480 in circuit, about 60 miles. Strabo, a few years later, says that it was much larger than Babylon.

Ni'san (nī'sān) [Heb. nīsān, from Akkad. nīsannu, opening, beginning]. The name given after the Captivity to Abib, the 1st month of the year (Neh. 2:1; Esth. 3:7). It nearly corresponds to March. See YEAR.

Nis'roch (nīs'rōk). A god worshiped by Senacherib. It was in the temple of Nisroch at Nineveh that he was assassinated (II Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38). The name has not been identified; attempts have been made to equate him with Nusku or to see in the name a composite containing Asshur. Perhaps it is an intentional perversion of the name Marduk.

Ni'ter. Saltpeter, potassium nitrate; but among the ancients sodium carbonate and potassium carbonate. It is an alkali (Prov. 25: 20), and in solution was used in washing clothes (Jer. 2:22).

No (nō), once No'-a'mon (Nahum 3:8) [Egypt. nu.t, city, village]. The Egyptian city of Thebes, often called by this name on the monuments. Herodotus found its distance from On to be a voyage of 9 days up the river (Herod. ii. 9). After the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt, Ahmose I, the founder of Dyn. XVIII, turned his attention to the reorganization and improvement of the kingdom, and among other works embellished Thebes. The city at once rose to chief importance as the capital of the new empire, and became large, splendid, and populous. Homer speaks of its hundred gates (Iliad ix. 381). Its tutelary divinity was Amon, and the high priest of Amon was 2d only to the king. It remained the center of Egyptian civilization and power until, 1st, Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, conquered Egypt, in 671 B.C., and, afterward, Ashurbanipal, his son and successor, made a new conquest (667) and the Assyrians got as far as Thebes. In a 2d campaign by Ashurbanipal Thebes was taken and sacked 663 B.C. (Nahum 3:8). But even after that disaster Thebes long remained a place of importance (Jer. 46:25; Ezek. 30:14-16; Herod. ii. 3; iii. 10). It was finally destroyed utterly by the Roman prefect, Cornelius Gallus, for its participation in the revolt of Upper Egypt in 30-29 B.C. against oppressive Roman taxation. Splendid remains of the city, consisting of temples, obelisks, sphinxes, etc., still exist at Luxor and Karnak, on the e., and Kurna and Medinet-Habu, on the w. side of the river. West of what was the site of the city there is a gorge cut into the lower limestone which contains the tombs of the ancient Theban kings.

No'-a'di'ah (nō'-a'di'-ā) [Jehovah has met by appointment]. 1. Son of Binnui. He was one of those who took charge of the gold and silver vessels brought by Ezra and the returned captives from Babylon (Ezra 8:33).

2. A prophetess whose evil vaticinations were intended to frighten Nehemiah (Neh. 6: 14).

No'ah, I (nō'ā), in A.V. of Matthew and Luke No'e [rest]. Son of Lamech of the posterity of Seth (Gen. 5:28, 29). The reason for bestowing the name Noah is stated in words which bear some resemblance to the name in sound. Lamech called him Noah, saying: "This same shall comfort us [yənahāmēnā] in our work and in the toil of our hands, . . . because of the ground which Jehovah hath cursed." This method of wordplay is employed quite frequently by the Hebrew writers. The references to the years of Noah's life are capable of several explanations, in accordance with ancient methods of statement and of constructing genealogical registers. Several methods are mentioned in the article on chronology (q.v.). The application of the first 2 of these to the data referring to Noah is simple and needs no explanation. The 3d method is more intricate, but is also applicable. According to it, in the family of Lamech, 182 years after it succeeded to the position of prominence among the children of Seth and became the family through which the Church descended, a son was born whom his father called Noah, saying: "This same shall comfort us." Long afterward, among the descendants of this child of hope, who are collectively called Noah, just as the descendants of Israel were frequently called Israel, appeared one in whom the hopes were realized, who proved a comforter, whose conduct and worship were rewarded by God's promise not to curse the ground again for wicked man's sake or to smite any more everything living, who built the ark and who was the family's head and representative. He is referred to by the tribal name. His eldest son was about 100 years old when the Flood came. This event occurred in the 600th year of Noah, that is, 600 years after the family which was spoken of as Noah had attained to leadership. If the 3d method is the true one, such is its application to the record concerning Noah.

Noah was a just man and, like Enoch, walked with God (Gen. 6:9). But it was a time of almost universal apostasy. It was an age of religious indifference, when even the sons of God had become worldly and in contracting marriage chose by the outward appearance rather than by the disposition of the heart (ch. 6:2), and when men generally were living for the present moment, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage (Matt. 24:38). It was also an age that was defiant of God: there was secret hostility of the heart; men formed their plans without regard to God, every imagination and device of man's heart was evil (Gen. 6:5); there was open defiance also; the earth was filled with violence, the strong oppressed the weak (v. 11). The age was so corrupt that God purposed to destroy mankind; but a respite apparently of 120 years was given (v. 3). By his exemplary life at least, Noah was a preacher of righteousness (II Peter 2:5). To him God, the Creator and Judge of all, revealed his purpose to destroy man, and commanded him to build an ark to save himself and his family and keep alive the various kinds of animals, for a flood of waters was to overwhelm the land. Noah did so. When the ark was finished, Jehovah, God of redemption, bade Noah enter the ark with his family and provide for their use the clean animals which they needed for food and sacrifice; and he who had created the beasts and the birds had them also go by pairs into the vessel for the preservation of their species. The same God of redemption shut Noah in. Then the flood broke in all its violence. See FLOOD. When at length the judgment purposed by the Creator and Governor of the universe was accomplished, he remembered Noah and made the waters to assuage. After catching the first glimpse of the mountain tops, Noah waited the same length of time as the storm had raged and then sent forth birds to discover whether the waters were abated from the surface of the earth. When he learned that they were, he tarried yet in the ark, waiting until God should bid him disembark. On the 1st day of the 1st month, he removed the covering and saw that the ground was dry, but it was 8 weeks longer before God bade him go forth. Then he built an altar and offered burnt offerings to the God of his redemption, who accepted the worship and purposed in his heart not to curse the ground again and smite every living thing on account of man's wickedness. God proceeded to reveal this purpose. As he had blessed Adam when he created him and had commanded that he be fruitful and multiply, so now at the beginning of a new world he blessed Noah and bade him be fruitful. He also laid injunctions on the head of the new race; but of the 7 precepts of Noah, as they are called, which were regarded by the Jews as antecedent to the Law and the observance of which was required of all proselytes, 3 only are expressly mentioned here: the abstinence from blood, the prohibition of murder, and the recognition of the civil authority (Gen. 9:4-6). The remaining 4, the prohibition of idolatry, blasphemy, incest, and theft, rested on the general sense of mankind. God further, in revealing his purpose not to curse the ground again for man's sake, pledged himself not to cut off all flesh again by the waters of a flood, and adopted the rainbow as the sign of the engagement by which he had bound himself (vs. 8-17).

Noah naturally devoted himself to agriculture. Among other works he planted a vineyard, and he drank himself drunk on the wine.

His son Ham mocked at his disgrace, but the other sons sought to protect their father. When Noah recovered and learned what had occurred, with insight into character, and with that knowledge which he had derived before the Flood of God's ordination that the evil propensities of parents descend to children and that God blesses the righteous in their generations (Ex. 20:5, 6), he foretold degradation among the posterity of Ham, for some reason singling out only 1 of Ham's sons, predicted the subjection of this branch of the tribe to the descendants of the high-minded and godly brothers, pronounced the divine blessing on the families of Shem and Japheth, and announced especially their united service of Jehovah, God of Shem (Gen. 9:20-27); see CANAAN 1, JAPHETH, and SHEM.

Noah lived, or the family which he represented continued its leadership, for 350 years after the Flood (Gen. 9:28). Then the Semites, as distinguished from the other descendants of Noah, became the leading family and the line in which the Church descended. Isaiah (ch. 54:9) and Ezekiel (ch. 14:14) both allude to Noah. Our Lord compares the days of Noah to those which should precede his own Second Coming (Matt. 24:37); the patriarch's faith is commended in Heb. 11:7, and Peter twice alludes to the 8 saved from the Deluge when it overwhelmed the ungodly (I Peter 3:20; II Peter 2:5). The Greeks and Romans had a story about a flood from which only 2 people were saved, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha; Deucalion may be Noah under a different name. However this may be, the Babylonians at any rate preserved a tradition of the same flood of which the Hebrews had knowledge. See FLOOD.

No'ah, II (nō'ā) [a quivering, trembling]. A daughter of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33; 27:1; 36:11; Josh. 17:3).

No'-a'mon (nō'a'mōn). See No.

Nob (nōb). A town of the priests (I Sam. 22:19), in the territory of Benjamin (Neh. 11:32), on the n. and apparently within sight of Jerusalem (Isa. 10:32). After the capture of the Ark, the tabernacle was for a time pitched at Nob, with Ahimelech as high priest. He was ignorant of the variance between Saul and David, and when the latter came to Nob, Ahimelech allowed him and his men to eat the showbread and gave him the sword of Goliath. This act was reported to Saul, who summoned the priests and had them slain, and smote Nob, men, women, and children, with the sword. Abiathar, however, escaped and told David (I Sam., chs. 21; 22). The place was inhabited after the Exile (Neh. 11:32). Robinson contents himself with locating the place "somewhere upon the ridge of the Mount of Olives, n.e. of the city." Père Abel locates it more definitely on Scopus at the point known as Rās Umm et-Tala, the site of the Augusta-Victoria Stiftung.

No'bah (nō'bā) [barking]. 1. A Manassite, presumably, who captured the town of Kenath, on the w. slope of the Jebel Hauran, and gave it his own name (Num. 32:42). The old name was probably ere long restored. See KENATH.

2. A town mentioned in connection with the Gadite town of Jogbehah. A road leading to the country of the nomads passed on the e. (Judg. 8:11). The site of Nobah is a tell near Šafūt.

No'bai (nō'bī), in A.V. and marg. of R.V. Ne'bai, which is the kere. One of the chiefs of the people who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:19).

Nod (nōd) [wandering, exile]. A district on the e. of Eden to which Cain went and there abode (Gen. 4:16).

No'dab (nō'dāb) [probably, generosity, nobility]. An Arab tribe of the Syrian desert, to judge from their allies (I Chron. 5:19).

No'e (nō'ē). See NOAH, I.

No'gah (nō'gā) [brilliance]. A son of David (I Chron. 3:7; 14:6).

No'hah (nō'hā) [rest]. The 4th son of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:2), who, however, did not give rise to a tribal family. He is not mentioned among those who accompanied Jacob into Egypt, probably because he was born after the migration into Egypt. Keil offers a different explanation. He supposes that Nohah either is another name for Shephupham (Num. 26:39, R.V.), or else was a celebrated chief who was descended from Shephupham and whose name supplanted Shephupham as the designation of the family.

Non (nōn). See NUN.

Noph (nōf). See MEMPHIS.

No'phah (nō'fā) [possibly, a breeze]. A Moabite town (Num. 21:30), not elsewhere mentioned. The text is open to question; the LXX reads, "And the women besides [yet] kindled a fire at [against] Moab."

Nose Jew'el. A jewel inserted, generally by means of a ring, into the side of the nostril for an ornament (Isa. 3:21).

Nose Ring. A ring worn as an ornament, especially by women (R.V. of Gen. 24:47; Ezek. 16:12). It was inserted through the partition between the nostrils or in the side of the nose.

Nose Rings

Num'ber and Nu'mer-al. There is no evidence that the ancient Hebrews used figures to denote numbers. The numerals which occur in the present text of the Heb. Scriptures, in the Siloam inscription, and on the Moabite stone are spelled in full. The Hebrews employed the letters of the alphabet to represent numerals as early as Maccabean times, using aleph for 1, beth for 2. In the Elephantine papyri (mostly 5th century B.C.) the numerals are generally represented by signs. In the Nabataean inscriptions of the 1st century the numerals are generally spelled, but they are occasionally represented by signs, upright strokes for the smaller units, a figure like 5 without the upper horizontal arm for 5, and other marks. In the Aramaic inscriptions of the same period at Palmyra signs are also used. On the lion weights, which were used by Aramaean traders in Nineveh in the 8th century B.C., the weight is indicated by upright strokes for the units and a horizontal stroke for 10. In yet earlier centuries the Assyrians and Babylonians used cuneiform signs to indicate number.

Numbers were used symbolically and conventionally. Three had apparently no symbolism; but emphasis was conventionally expressed by it; as "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, are these" (Jer. 7:4), "O earth, earth, earth" (ch. 22:29), "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it" (Ezek. 21:27), "Holy, holy, holy" (Isa. 6:3), and the triple blessing (Num. 6:

24-26). The threefold character of the baptismal formula and the apostolic benediction resulted from the doctrine of the Trinity (Matt. 28:19; II Cor. 13:14). Four does not play an important part. Four corners or quarters of the earth were recognized, n., s., e., and w. (Isa. 11:12), and hence 4 winds (Dan. 7:2), and 4 chariots (Zech. 6:1, 5). Seven was early a sacred number among the Semites (Gen. 2:2; 4:24; 21:28). It did not derive its character from the fact that it was equal to 3 plus 4. Not arithmetical, but religious considerations were involved; see SABBATH. Ten was recognized as a complete number, and was constantly used as such; there were 10 commandments (Ex. 34:28), 10 antediluvian and 10 postdiluvian patriarchs (see CHRONOLOGY). Twelve was the basis of the duodecimal system of the Babylonians, and as a result found employment in common life. Something of it was probably inherited by the Hebrews, and was enhanced by the fact that the tribes of Israel were 12. Forty was a round number much in vogue (Ex. 24:18; I Kings 19:8; Jonah 3:4; Matt. 4:2; see CHRONOLOGY, III.

Num'bers. The 4th book of the Pentateuch. In the Heb. Scriptures it is named "In the wilderness" (see Num. 1:1). Its modern designation originated with the Gr. translators, and was chosen on account of the 2 enumerations of the people which the book relates: the 1st at Sinai in the 2d year of the Exodus, the 2d on the Jordan in the 40th year.

It may be divided into 3 main sections:

I. In the wilderness at Sinai (Num. 1:1 to 10:11). Census of the people, exclusive of the Levites, with assignment of a place for each tribe in the encampment (chs. 1; 2); census of the Levites, their location in the camp and specific duties (chs. 3; 4). The unclean removed from the camp (ch. 5:1-4). Law that the restitution for a trespass go to the priest in case the person wronged, to whom it ordinarily went, has died and is without heirs (vs. 5-10). Laws about jealousy and Nazirites and form of the priest's blessing (chs. 5:11 to 6:27). Offering of the princes at the dedication of the tabernacle (ch. 7). The place of the 7 lamps (ch. 8:1-4). Consecration of the Levites (vs. 5-22), and the age of entering service (vs. 23-26); see LEVITES. Observance of the passover and law of the supplementary celebration (ch. 9:1-14). The guiding pillar of cloud (vs. 15-23) and silver signal trumpets (ch. 10:1-10).

II. On the way from Sinai to the Jordan (chs. 10:11 to 21:35). Order of march (ch. 10:11-28). Hobab invited to go with Israel (vs. 29-32). A stage of the journey (vs. 33, 34). Words used when the Ark set forward and when it rested (vs. 35, 36). Murmurs against the manna, 70 elders to aid Moses, descent of quails (ch. 11). Miriam's leprosy (ch. 12). At Kadesh: the spies and their report, the people faithless and condemned to die in the wilderness (chs. 13; 14). Supplementary legal specifications (ch. 15). Rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and related events (chs. 16; 17); in consequence, duties and privileges of the priests and Levites affirmed (ch. 18). Law for purification of those defiled by contact with a dead body (ch. 19). Return to Kadesh: death of Miriam, sin of Moses and Aaron, embassy to Edom (ch. 20 1-21). Death of Aaron, journey from Mount Hor around Edom to plains of Moab, fiery serpents, conquest of the country e. of the Jordan (chs. 20:22 to 21:35).

III. At Shittim opposite Jericho (chs. 22:1 to 36:13). Balaam (chs. 22 to 24). Sin of Baal-peor (ch. 25). Census of the new generation (ch. 26). Laws regarding inheritance by daughters (ch. 27:1-11). Public announcement of Joshua as Moses' successor (vs. 12-23). Further regulation of the daily offerings and of vows (chs. 28 to 30). War with Midian (ch. 31). Assignment of the conquered country e. of Jordan to the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh (ch. 32). Itinerary from Egypt to Shittim (ch. 33). Boundaries of the land and a commission on allotment (ch. 34). Laws of the cities of refuge (ch. 35). Supplementary law concerning inheritance by daughters (ch. 36).

Numē'ni-us (nū-mē'nī-ūs) [Lat. from Gr., pertaining to new moon]. A Jew, son of Antiochus and a member of the senate (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 8), sent as ambassador to Rome and Sparta in 144 B.C. by Jonathan Maccabaeus, and dispatched a 2d time to Rome by Simon in 140 B.C. (I Macc. 12:16; 14:24; 15:15).

Nun (nūn), in A.V. and Heb. text once Non (I Chron. 7:27) [fish]. 1. Father of Joshua, the military leader (Ex. 33:11; Josh. 1:1), descended through Tahan and perhaps Beriah from Ephraim (I Chron. 7:27).

2. The 14th letter of the Heb. alphabet; it represents the same sound as Eng. n. It heads the 14th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Nurse. 1. A wet nurse, mēneḱeth, employed to suckle an infant (Ex. 2:7-9; II Kings 11:2). Deborah, who had nursed Rebekah, remained an honored servant in the family (Gen. 24:59; 35:8), as was frequently the case (Homer Odyssey xix. 15, 251).

2. A male ('ōmēn) or female ('ōmeneth) attendant, who acted as nurse, i.e., had the care of small children, either when infants (Num. 11:12; Ruth 4:16) or when older but still helpless (II Sam. 4:4).

Nuts. 1. The rendering of Heb. boḡnīm, pistachio nuts (Gen. 43:11, R.V. marg.). The true pistachio tree (Pistacia vera) belongs to the order Anacardiaceae. Its fruit, which is a little less than an inch in diameter, consists of a bony shell surrounded by a dry covering and enclosing a sweet, somewhat oily kernel. The nuts are eaten like almonds or used for making confectionery. It is a native of w. Asia, from which it has been introduced into s. Europe. It is not now common in Palestine. Jacob sent some of its fruit, with other vegetable produce, as a present to the Egyptian prime minister (Gen. 43:11).

2. The rendering of the Heb. word 'ēgōz, walnut (S. of Sol. 6:11). The walnut tree (Juglans regia), in America distinguished as the English walnut, is native from the Caucasus to the mountains of n. India. It is cultivated in Galilee and along the slopes of Lebanon and of Hermon.

Nym'phas (nīm'fās) [Gr., sacred to the nymphs]. A Christian at Laodicea or Colossae, to whom Paul sent salutation (Col. 4:15). Note form Nympha in R.V. marg.

O

Oak. 1. A rendering of Heb. 'ēlāh. The Heb. word occurs in 15 passages of the O.T. In 3 of these it serves as a geographical designation and is treated as a proper name, valley of Elah (I Sam. 17:2, 19; 21:9; R.V. marg., terebith). In 2 passages, where it is associated with another word, 'allōn, which is rendered oak, it is translated terebith in R.V., but teil tree and elms in A.V. (Isa. 6:13; Hos. 4:13). In the remaining 10 passages it is rendered oak, with terebith in the marg. of R.V.

2. The rendering of Heb. 'ēlōn, in the text of 9 passages of the R.V., terebith being placed in the marg. The A.V., following the Targums and Vulgate (place, plain), uniformly renders 'ēlōn by plain, but in the marg. of Judg. 9:6 it substitutes oak. There were the oak of Moreh (Gen. 12:6; Deut. 11:30), the oak of Mamre (Gen. 13:18; 14:13; 18:1), the oak in Zaanannim (Judg. 4:11), the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem (ch. 9:6), the oak of the augurs (ch. 9:37, R.V. marg.), and the oak of Tabor (I Sam. 10:3).

3. The rendering of Heb. 'ēl in Isa. 1:29.

4. The uniform and doubtless correct rendering of Heb. 'allōn. It occurs in 8 passages, and was a species of oak associated with Bashan (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6; Zech. 11:2). Under a tree of this species near Beth-el Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried (Gen. 35:8). It was probably the prickly oak (Quercus coccifera).

5. The rendering of Heb. 'allāh (Josh. 24:26).

Oak is the meaning of 'allōn, for it was a characteristic tree of Bashan. 'Elāh differed from it (Isa. 6:13; Hos. 4:13), and hence is probably the terebith; and the 3 related words, 'ēlāh, 'ēl, and 'ēlōn, may denote 3 kinds of terebith. They may, however, designate any large tree, and not specify the terebith in particular. Several species of oak grow in Palestine. Quercus sessiliflora grows high up on Lebanon and in the Hauran. Four varieties of the prickly evergreen oak (Q. coccifera) occur: one is Q. pseudococcifera, and is found on Carmel, in Gilead, and in Bashan, often being of magnificent growth; another is Q. calliprinos, which is found in Lebanon, on Tabor, and in Gilead. Valonia oak (Q. aegilops) is deciduous. It is common in Galilee and Gilead.

Oath. An appeal to God in attestation of the truth of a statement or of the binding character of a promise (Gen. 21:23; 31:53; Gal. 1:20; Heb. 6:16). Its violation was an offense against God (II Chron. 36:13; Ezek. 17:13, 18). Sometimes the appeal was to the sovereign or other sacred object (Gen. 42:15; II Sam. 11:11; Matt. 5:33; 23:16-22). Jehovah condescended to confirm his promise to the patriarch by an oath, swearing by himself (Gen. 22:16; Heb. 6:13-20). An oath was commonly made by lifting the hand unto God (Gen. 14:22; Ezek. 20:5, 6; Rev. 10:5), but it was sometimes made by placing the hand under the thigh of the person to whom the promise was made (Gen. 24:2; 47:29), probably as an invocation of the posterity, which should proceed from the loins, to guard the oath and avenge its violation. The oath was occasionally taken before the altar (I Kings 8:31). Abraham gave Abimelech 7 ewe lambs as witness of the oath (Gen. 21:27-31). An oath was sometimes intensified by slaying an animal, dividing it into 2 parts, and passing between the pieces (ch. 15:8-18). Each party to the oath invoked upon himself the fate of the victim if he broke the covenant. By the Mosaic Law, in certain judicial investigations, a man to clear himself was required to swear an oath of the Lord (Ex. 22:11; Num. 5:19-22). Any man swearing an oath or making a vow to God was required to carry out his promise, as was a woman, if while she was a virgin her father did not disallow her oath, or after her marriage her husband did not interfere; if she was a widow, or had been divorced, her oath stood (Num., ch. 30). If anyone swore falsely by the name of the true God, he profaned the divine name (Lev. 6:3; 19:12; cf. Isa. 48:1; Jer. 12:16; Mal. 3:5); and no one was under any circumstances to swear by a false god (Josh. 23:7). The man is commended in Ps. 15:4 who does not change, although he has sworn to his hurt. Our Lord condemned the use of oaths, even when taken with the best intention, declaring that whatever went beyond "yea, yea; nay, nay," was of the Evil One (Matt. 5:33-37). He was delivering the Sermon on the Mount and correcting various perversions of the Law which the scribes had introduced; and among other evils he condemned swearing in ordinary communications between man and man. But the judicial oath is lawful; for it was enjoined by God (Ex. 22:11). The oath was recognized as lawful by the apostles also, for they called on God to witness to the truth of what they said (II Cor. 11:31; Gal. 1:20). The mischief which may arise from a rash oath was well illustrated in that of Herod the tetrarch, which made him against his will the murderer of John the Baptist (Matt. 14:3-12).

O'ba-di'ah (ô'bâ-dî'â) [servant of Jehovah].

1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola, house of Uzzi (I Chron. 7:3).

2. A Gadite hero who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:9).

3. Father of the chief of the Zebulunites in David's reign (I Chron. 27:19).

4. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

5. The governor of Ahab's palace, who during the persecution of Jehovah's prophets by Queen Jezebel, had 100 prophets, in 2 companies of 50, in a cave (I Kings 18:3, 4). He was sent by his royal master to look for grass for the horses and mules during the great drought, and while so engaged fell in with Elijah, who persuaded him to announce to the king the presence of the prophet (vs. 5-16). Elijah's interview with the king led to the contest at Carmel, which was followed by the slaughter of Baal's prophets.

6. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

7. A prophet of Judah (Obad. 1). Josephus believed that he was the God-fearing Obadiah of Ahab's palace, but the prophet probably lived at least a century after Ahab.

The Book of Obadiah is the 4th of the Minor Prophets. It consists of one chapter, and foretells the destruction of Edom (vs. 1-9) and the reason of it, namely, Edom's unbrotherly attitude toward the children of Jacob (vs. 10, 11), warns Edom accordingly not to exult over the children of Judah in their distress (vs. 12-16), and predicts the deliverance and enlargement of Israel (vs. 17-21). The entire prophecy derives its incentive and strength from the great truth, clearly discerned by other holy men of God as well as by Obadiah, that the day of Jehovah is coming upon all nations (v. 15) to the destruction of every foe, native and foreign, of God's rule on earth; and the Kingdom shall be Jehovah's (v. 21; cf. Isa. 2:12, 17, 20, 21; 10:12-19; Joel 3:12-21; Amos 5:18; 9:8-15; Micah 4:11-13).

Much uncertainty exists as to the date of the prophecy.

1. It is very generally ascribed to the Chaldean period, when Jerusalem was alternately subject to the king of Egypt and the king of Babylon, and was finally captured by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C., razed to the ground, and its inhabitants carried into captivity. This view is based on the description of Judah's calamity (Obad. 10-16), and the fact is appealed to that Edom gave its sympathy to Babylon at this crisis (Ps. 137:7) and prophets of the time severely denounced Edom (Jer. 49:7-22; Ezek. 25:12-14; ch. 35). According to this view the place of the book in the Minor Prophets has no relation to the date of composition; the reference to Edom in Amos 9:12 may have been the occasion for placing Obadiah directly after Amos. Some critics, however, date vs. 1-14, 15b, a little before or after 460 B.C. and vs. 15a, 16-21, about 400 B.C.

II. The prophecy may, however, be much earlier, for: 1. No allusion is made to the stricking features of the fall of Jerusalem, the burning of the Temple, the razing of the walls, and annihilation of the city. 2. The relation of verses 1-9 to Jer. 49:7-22. On account of this common element it may be supposed that one borrowed from the other. It seems that this prophecy is in its more original form in Obadiah. It may be better, however, to assume that both prophets had access to an older prophecy which Obadiah incorporated with less alteration, while Jeremiah treated it with greater freedom. 3. The hostile attitude of Edom was of long standing (Ezek. 35:5), and the feeling against Edom expressed by Obadiah was voiced by Amos more than a century before the Chaldean invasion (Amos 1:6, 9, especially vs. 11, 12; 9:12; cf. Joel 3:19). 4. Particular historical conditions, which are presupposed by the prophet, existed as early as the reign of Amaziah. Jerusalem had been plundered by Egyptians in the time of Rehoboam (I Kings 14:25, 26), by Arabians and Philistines in the reign of Jehoram (II Chron. 21:16, 17); and in the reign of Amaziah, who slaughtered the Edomites, the king of Israel entered Jerusalem, broke down the n. wall of the city, plundered the Temple and palace, and carried off hostages (II Kings 14:14, 17; II Chron. 25:11, 12, 23, 24). These events may well have called forth those manifestations of Edom's unbrotherly spirit, which Obadiah rebukes. In that case the prophecy would date from the early part of the 8th century B.C., and antedate Joel (cf. Obad. 17; Joel 2:32; see JOEL 13); according to this view its position after Joel cannot be taken as indicating the exact chronological order of the Minor Prophets.

III. The book may, however, be approximately in its proper chronological place, and accordingly date from the time of Ahaz. For calamities befell Judah in the reign of Ahaz: the king of Damascus wrested Edom from Judah, the king of Israel ravaged to the gates of Jerusalem, the Philistines took the cities of the lowland, and Ahaz stripped the Temple of its treasures to buy aid from the king of Assyria, did homage to this foreigner, and made Judah a vassal state. Israelites also were carried into captivity (Obad. 20; Amos 1:6, 9; cf. I Chron. 5:26); then the Edomite did violence to his brother Jacob, refrained from extending aid, and became as one of Judah's enemies (II Chron. 28:17; II Kings 16:6, R.V. marg.; Obad. 10, 11). The year 731 B.C. or slightly earlier, in the reign of Ahaz when Judah was so deeply humiliated, was an appropriate time for Obadiah to take up his prophecy against the Edomites, rebuke them for their indifference to Judah's woes and for their open hostility in the past and present, and warn them not to exult over Judah's present distress for their own time of punishment was coming.

8. A Levite, one of the overseers over the workmen who repaired the Temple in the reign of Josiah (II Chron. 34:12).

9. Founder of a family, presumably of the lineage of David (I Chron. 3:21).

10. A descendant of Joab. He came from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:9).

11. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant made in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5).

12. A Levite, apparently founder of a family of porters (Neh. 12:25). He seems to have been the Levite Obadiah, son of Shemaiah (I Chron. 9:16), called Abda in Neh. 11:17.

O'bal (ô'bâl) [cf. Arab. 'abîla, to be thick]. A people descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:28). 'Abil is the name of one of the oldest tribes of Arabia (Delitzsch) and of a district in Yemen (Halévy). Bochart suggests Pliny's Avalitae on the African coast, near the straits of Bab el-Mandeb. In I Chron. 1:22 the name is written Ebal, yodh (jod), being used instead of vav (vau). These letters were often confused by copyists.

O'bed (ô'bêd) [server, worshiper]. 1. Son of Ephlal, of the house of Jerahmeel, tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:37).

2. Son of Boaz and Ruth, and grandfather of David (Ruth 4:17, 21, 22).

3. One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:47).

4. A Levite, one of the doorkeepers, son of Shemalah, house of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:7).

5. The father of a certain Azariah, in the time of Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

O'bed-e'dom (ô'bêd-ê'dôm) [serving Edom, or Edom is serving]. 1. A Gittite, that is, a native either of the Philistine Gath, and, if so, probably a member of David's bodyguard, or else of the Levitical city of Gath-rimmon in Dan. He lived between Kiriath-jearim and Jerusalem, near the spot where Uzzah was struck dead for touching the Ark. The Ark was therefore taken to Obed-edom's house by David's order, where it remained 3 months, blessings attending him and his family for giving it accommodation (II Sam. 6:10-12; I Chron. 13:13, 14; 15:25). If a Levite, he is doubtless identical with Obed-edom the Korahite (see 3). The Korahites were a division of the Kohathite family to which Gath-rimmon was assigned, and the statement that God blessed him (I Chron. 26:5) seems to refer to I Chron. 13:14 and II Sam. 6:11.

2. A Levite of the 2d degree, who with others acted as doorkeeper for the Ark, and was moreover a musician who played the harp at the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem, and afterward as a regular duty in the tent erected for the Ark (I Chron. 15:18, 21; 16:5).

3. A Levite, who as doorkeeper marched in front of the Ark at its removal to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:24). He is probably one with Obed-edom, son of Jeduthun, a doorkeeper for the Ark in the tent at Jerusalem (ch. 16:38), and who is generally, though on uncertain grounds, held to be the person mentioned in the preceding clause of the verse. He appears to be Obed-edom the Korahite (ch. 26:1, 4; cf. v. 10 with ch. 16:38), whose sons and grandsons, with their brethren, 62 in number, were among the 93 of whom the courses were formed in David's reign (ch. 26:8). Their station was at the s. gate (v. 15). The family was still on duty in the reign of Amaziah (II Chron. 25:24).

O'bil (ô'bîl) [perhaps, camel driver]. An Ishmaelite who had charge of David's camels (I Chron. 27:30).

Ob-la'tion. See OFFERINGS.

O'both (ô'bôth) [water skins]. A station of the Israelites before their arrival in the desert e. of Moab (Num. 21:10, 11; 33:43, 44); the oasis el-Weiba.

Och'ran (ôk'rân), in A.V. Oc'ran (ôk'rân) [troubled]. An Asherite, father of Pagiel (Num. 1:13).

O'ded (ô'dêd) [he has restored; or perhaps, seer, prophet]. 1. Father of the Prophet Azariah (II Chron. 15:1). In v. 8 the text is evidently corrupt.

2. An Israelite prophet in the reign of Pekah. Meeting the army of the Northern Kingdom returning from battle with many captives of Judah, the prophet remonstrated with them on their unbrotherly conduct, and in the name of Jehovah called on them to send the captives home. His words produced a great effect. Some of the leading men in Samaria, persuaded by him as to the path of duty, refused to allow the army to bring the prisoners inside the city. They then clothed the naked, fed the hungry, and, mounting the feeble on asses, took them to Jericho and handed them over to their countrymen (II Chron. 28:9-15).

Od-o-me'ra (ôd-ô-mê'râ), in A.V. Od'o-nar'kes (ôd'ô-nâr'kêz). Chief of a nomad tribe, or possibly an officer under Bacchides, whom Jonathan Maccabaeus smote (I Macc. 9:66).

Offer-ings. Offerings to God of various kinds can be traced from the dawn of human history. In the O.T. alone there are mentioned among others of early times the vegetable offering (Gen. 4:3), the sacrifice of the firstling of the flock (ch. 4:4), the burnt offering (Gen. 8:20; Ex. 10:25), the sacrificial meal (Gen. 31:54), and the drink offering (ch. 35:14). An elaborate ritual of sacrifice existed among the great nations of antiquity, notably in Babylonia and Egypt, long before the days of Moses.

Offerings of many kinds to God, or oblations, constituted a marked feature of the Israelitish worship. Extended information on the subject is found in Lev., chs. 1 to 7, but not there exclusively. Offerings were of 2 classes, public and private, according as they were offered at the expense of the nation or of an individual, and they were of 3 kinds: drink offerings, vegetable or meal offerings, and animal offerings or sacrifices.

The drink offering was not independent under the Law. It was made only in connection with the meal offering which accompanied all burnt offerings, except perhaps that of Lev. 12:6, and all peace offerings which were Nazirite, votive or freewill (Num. 6:17; 15:1-12). It was excluded from sin and trespass offerings.

The vegetable offering, called meat offering in A.V. and meal offering in R.V., consisted of white meal, or of unleavened bread, cakes, wafers, or of ears of grain roasted, always with salt and, except in the sin offering, with olive oil (Lev. 2:1, 4, 13, 14; 5:11). It might form an independent offering; and part might be placed on the altar and the rest belong to the priest, as in private voluntary offerings (ch. 2), and when accepted as a sin offering from the very poor in lieu of an animal (ch. 5:11-13); or else the whole might be consumed on the altar. In this latter case it corresponded to the burnt offering, and was made at the consecration of the high priest and at the cleansing of the leper (chs. 6:19-23; 14:10, 20). Or the vegetable offering might be subordinate, an accompaniment of a sacrifice. It was thus the invariable concomitant of the burnt offering, except perhaps that of Lev., ch. 12, and of peace offerings, except those obligatory at the feast of weeks. In these cases, according to tradition, it was entirely consumed on the altar. In other cases, part was placed on the altar and the rest went to the priest; namely, the wafers at the consecration of priests (ch. 8:26-28), in the thank offering (ch. 7:12-15), and at the release of the Nazirite (Num. 6:13-20).

Animal offerings or sacrifices called for cattle, sheep and goats of both sexes, rarely for doves. The animal was required to be free from blemish and at least 8 days old. Sacrifices were of 3 kinds, in each of which the blood made atonement (Lev. 1:4; 17:11): 1. The burnt offering, for which a male lamb, ram, goat, or bullock was prescribed. The case in I Sam. 6:14 was extraordinary. The blood was sprinkled round about upon the altar, and the entire animal was consumed on the altar. It was expressive of the entire self-dedication of the offerer to Jehovah. 2. The sin offering and the trespass or guilt offering; for the former of which a bullock, a male or female goat, a female lamb, a dove, or a pigeon was used (Lev. 4:4, 23, 28, 32; 5:7), while for the latter a ram was prescribed or, in the case of the leper and the Nazirite, a male lamb (Lev. 6:6; 14:12, 21; Num. 6:12). The blood was symbolically displayed, but in different ways. In the sin offering a portion of the blood was sprinkled before the Lord and smeared on the horns of the altar of incense, and the rest was poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering, when the sin had been committed by the high priest or the nation; but in the case of other sinners, a part was put on the altar of burnt offering and the rest was poured out as before (Lev. 4:6, 7, 17, 18, 25, 30, 34). In the trespass offering all the blood was scattered over the altar. The fat only was burnt on the altar. The flesh of those sin offerings of which the blood was taken into the sanctuary was burnt without the camp, whereas the flesh of other sin offerings and of trespass offerings belonged to the priests (Lev. 6:26, 30; 7:6, 7; cf. Ex. 29:14; Lev. 4:3, 12, 13, 21; 16:27; Heb. 13:11, 12). No part of these offerings was eaten by the offerer, as in the peace offerings; for the sacrificer came as one unworthy of communion with God, and these offerings were for purposes of expiation. The sin offering was made for sins of which the effect terminates primarily on the sinner; the trespass offering for sins of which the effects terminate primarily on another, and for which, in addition to the sacrifice, restitution was made through the hands of the priest to the person injured or, in case of his death without heirs, to the priest (Lev. 5:16; 6:5; Num. 5:7, 8). But sins committed deliberately and for which the penalty was death could not be expiated (Num. 15:30, 31). Atonement could be made for unintentional sins; for non-capital sins, like theft, for which punishment had been endured and restitution made; and for sins which the guilty one voluntarily confessed and for which he made compensation when possible. 3. The peace offering. Three kinds are distinguished: the thank offering in recognition of unmerited and unexpected blessings; the votive offering, in payment of a vow; and the freewill offering, probably not in gratitude for a special favor but as an expression of irrepressible love for God (Lev., ch. 3). Peace offerings might also be prompted by the felt need of renewing peaceful communion with God (Judg. 20:26; 21:4; II Sam. 24:25). Any animal authorized for sacrifice, of either sex, might be used, but no bird. The blood was sprinkled; the fat was consumed on the altar; and, when the offering was private, the breast and shoulder went to the priests and the rest of the flesh was eaten by the offerer and his friends before the Lord at the place of the sanctuary (Lev., chs. 3; 7:11-21; cf. ch. 7:22-27; Ex. 29:20-28; Deut. 12:7, 18; I Sam. 2:15-17); see WAVE OFFERING. The meal before Jehovah was a eucharistic feast. It signified that Jehovah was present as a guest.

The sacrificial acts were five: 1. Presentation of the sacrifice at the door of the sanctuary by the offerer himself as his personal act. 2. Laying on of hands. The offerer placed his hands on the victim's head, thereby dedicating it to God and making it his own representative and substitute (cf. Lev. 16:21); see LAYING ON OF HANDS. 3. Slaying the animal by the offerer himself, who thus symbolically accepted the punishment due for his sin. In later times the priests slew the animal. 4. Symbolic application of the blood. The priest sprinkled or smeared it on the altar and poured it out at the base. In specified cases a part was put on the offerer, or it was sprinkled before the veil of the sanctuary (Lev. 4:6), or carried into the Holy Place (ch. 6:30), or even into the Holy of Holies (ch. 16:14). 5. Burning the sacrifice, the whole of it or its fat only, on the altar of burnt offering, whereby its essence and flavor ascended to God.

Og (ōg). A king of the Amorites of Bashan (Deut. 3:1, 8), whose rule extended from the Jabbok to Mount Hermon (Deut. 3:8, 10; cf. Num. 21:23, 24). He had residences at both Ashtaroth and Edrei (Josh. 12:4, 5; 13:12). He was huge of stature, the last of the Rephaim, and had an iron bedstead or sarcophagus of ironstone, 9 cubits long by 4 broad, of course longer and wider than its occupant. This relic was preserved in Rabbath Ammon (Deut. 3:11). After the Israelites had conquered Sihon, they left their families and their cattle at the secure camp at Pisgah and marched against Og. They defeated and slew him at Edrai and took possession of his country (Num. 21:32-35; Deut. 3:14). This territory was given to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3:13).

O'had (ō'hād). A son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15). He did not found a tribal family.

O'hel (ō'hēl) [a tent]. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

O-ho'lah (ō-hō'lā), in A.V. A-ho'lah [(her?) tent]. Samaria and the Kingdom of Israel personified as a woman of bad character (Ezek. 23:1-49). Her name typified her infidelity to Jehovah.

O-ho'li'ab (ō-hō'lī-āb), in A.V. A-ho'li'ab [father's tent; or a tent (protection) is the father]. An artificer of the tribe of Dan, who assisted Bezalel in making furniture for the tabernacle (Ex. 31:6; 35:34, 35).

O-hol'i'bah (ō-hō'lī-bā), in A.V. A-hol'i'bah [tent in her; or my tent is in her]. Jerusalem and the Kingdom of Judah personified as a woman of bad character (Ezek. 23:1-49), although possessing Jehovah's tent.

O-hol'i'ba'mah (ō-hō'lī-bā'mā), in A.V. A-hol'i'ba'mah [my tent is a high place; or, tent of the high place]. A wife of Esau, daughter of Anah the Hivite (Gen. 36:2). She gave name to an Edomite family, organized under a chief (v. 41). She was also called Judith, the praiseworthy (ch. 26:34; see ANAH 1).

OIL. The oil used by the ancient Hebrews was chiefly olive oil. The fruit of the olive ripens in the autumn. It was, and is still, obtained by shaking the tree or beating it (Deut. 24:20; and Isa. 17:6; 24:13, R.V. text and marg.). The oil was pressed from the olives by treading them with the foot (Deut. 33:24; Micah 6:15), often in a shallow cavity hewn in the native rock, or by crushing them in a basin or circular trough under a wheel, collecting the outflowing oil, and then, in order to secure every drop that they contained, squeezing the pulp in a press constructed for the purpose. The expressed oil was collected in a rock-hewn vat or in a jar, and the impurities were allowed to settle. The fresh oil was specifically known to the Hebrews as yishār (cf. Joel 2:24, Heb. text). Pure beaten olive oil (Ex. 27:20; 29:40) was the finest in quality. Leaves, twigs, and dirt having been removed, the olives were beaten to pieces and crushed and put into a basket, and the oil was allowed to flow out of itself. It was a sort of first fruit, obtained before the pulp was placed under the press.

Oil was so important a product of Palestine that oil and wine are frequently mentioned, with or even without grain, as the chief harvest gain (Num. 18:12; Deut. 7:13; Neh. 10:39; 13:5; etc.). Oil was used for illuminating purposes, being burned in lamps (Ex. 25:6; Matt. 25:3). Pure beaten olive oil was prescribed for the continual light in the sanctuary (Ex. 27:20). Oil was used for food (I Chron. 12:40; Ezek. 16:13). It was mixed with meal and made into bread (I Kings 17:12); and cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, or with oil poured upon them, were part of the meal offering (Lev. 2:1, 4-7), the oil being prescribed probably on account of its common use in food. Oil was used in medicine for mollifying wounds (Isa. 1:6; Mark 6:13). Sometimes wine was added to the oil, as was done by the Good Samaritan in the case of the wounded Israelite (Luke 10:34). Herod was put in a bath of warm oil in the hope of alleviating his disease (Jos. War i. 33, 5). Oil was used for anointing the body, especially after a bath, and for rendering the hair smooth (II Sam. 14:2; Ps. 23:5; 104:15). Olive oil was used for anointing kings (I Sam. 10:1; 16:1, 13; I Kings 1:39; II Kings 9:1, 6); and was called holy because employed in behalf of God (Ps. 89:20). A holy oil of composite and expensive character was used for the anointing of high priests. The tabernacle, the Ark, the table, the candlestick, the altar, the laver and its foot were also anointed with the same precious compound (Ex. 30:22-33).

Oil Tree. The literal rendering of Heb. ēš shemen, tree of oil, in Isa. 41:19. The words are translated olive wood (I Kings 6:23; in A.V. olive tree) and wild olive (Neh. 8:15; in A.V. pine branch). From its wood the 2 cherubim in the oracle of Solomon's Temple were made, each of which was 10 cubits high (I Kings 6:23, 26), and also the doors of the oracle and the door posts for the entrance of the Temple (vs. 31-33). It is generally believed to be the oleaster (Elæagnus hortensis), a name formerly applied to wild olive. The oleaster is a shrub with sweet-smelling white flowers and silver-gray-green leaves. It yields an oil, but much inferior to that of the olive. It is abundant in Palestine, especially near Hebron, Samaria, and Mount Tabor. It is difficult to see how a shrub like the oleaster could fulfill the conditions required in the preceding references in I Kings. G. E. Post may be right in identifying the oil tree with a pine; in that case the resin could be regarded as oil or fat.

Ointment. Fragrant ointments were highly prized among the Hebrews. They were used in dressing the hair and in purifying and perfuming the skin (Esth. 2:12; Eccl. 9:8), and Jesus was several times anointed with ointment brought by women who regarded him with adoration (Matt. 26:6-13; Luke 7:36-50). Ointments, with other spices, were employed on the dead body and in embalming (Luke 23:56). Balm of Gilead and eye salve were used in medicine (Jer. 8:22; Rev. 3:18). In the ritual an ointment or holy oil was used, composed of myrrh, cassia, cinnamon, calamus, and olive oil (Ex. 30:25). In Palestine the usual ointment consisted of perfumed olive oil. The Heb. word for oil is sometimes rendered ointment in A.V. (cf. II Kings 20:13; Prov. 27:9; Eccl. 7:1; 9:8; 10:1; S. of Sol. 1:3; 4:10; Isa. 57:9; Amos 6:6, where A.R.V. has oil). See PERFUMERY.

Old Tes'tament. The 1st of the 2 portions into which the Bible is naturally divided. The title was borrowed from the Apostle Paul, who in II Cor. 3:14, says: "For until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away in the reading of the old testament [in R.V. covenant]." The O.T. consists of 39 books which, in the order in which they stand in the English Bible, naturally divide into 3 classes: 17 historical books (Genesis to Esther), 5 poetical books (Job to Song of Solomon), and 17 prophetic books. Poems and fragments of poems occur in the historical books (Gen. 4:23, 24; 9:25-27; 49:2-27; Ex. 15:1-18; Judg., ch. 5); prophecy also is found in the historical books (Gen. 3:15; 9:11-16; II Sam., ch. 7) and history in the prophetic books (Isa., ch. 7; Jer., chs. 26; 37:11 to 39:14; 40:7 to 43:8); and poetry abounds in the prophetic books. The Hebrew Bible contains all these books and no more; but there is a difference in the arrangement and in the classification. See CANON. The English Bible has adopted the arrangement of the Vulgate, which partly follows that of the LXX.

The whole of the O.T. was originally written in Heb., except Ezra 4:8 to 6:18; 7:12-26; Jer. 10:11; Dan. 2:4 to 7:28, which are in Aram. The letters of the Heb. and Aram. alphabets were similar. A primitive form of them was in use in Phœnicia as far back as c. 1500 B.C. An early form is seen on the Moabite stone, in the Siloam inscription, and on Maccabaean coins. They passed through various changes of form until they ultimately became the familiar square characters of the extant Hebrew MSS. and printed editions of the Hebrew Bible. The books of the O.T. were written in the older script, but, in the course of their multiplication by manuscript copies, the older characters were gradually transliterated into the square.

In writing the Hebrews originally made use of consonants only, leaving the vowels to be supplied by the reader. But by c. A.D. 700 Jewish scholars, resident chiefly at Tiberias in Palestine, had supplied vowel points which indicated the proper vocalization and followed the traditional pronunciation. Thus Aaron ben-Asher (the son of Moses ben-Asher) not only prepared the MS. of the O.T. marked with vowels and accents which became standard, but also prepared a number of Masoretic and grammatical manuals. These vowel signs gave greater fixity to the meaning of the texts. These Jewish scholars are called Masoretes or Massoretes, from Heb. māsōreth, massōreth, tradition; and the text, as supplied with vowels and otherwise improved, is known as the Masoretic (Massoretic) text. They also added a system of accents to indicate the proper accentuation of the words and the manner in which they are to be conjoined or disjoined. In the Jewish schools of Babylonia a different method of indicating the vowels was in vogue. The Babylonian punctuation was written above the lines of the text and was not as convenient as the Palestinian system, which became the prevailing one.

The Jews have divided the Hebrew text of the books of Moses into 54 sections or pericopes, for reading on the Sabbaths of the year. For example, the 1st section extends from Gen. 1:1 to 6:8; and the 2d from chs. 6:9 to 11:32. These larger sections are broken into smaller ones of 2 kinds, main divisions and subdivisions, technically called open and closed, and indicated in some printed editions by the letters pe (p) and samech (s) respectively. In the oldest and best MSS. as well as in Ginsburg's editions these letters are not used. Immediately before an open section the previous line is unfinished, the vacant space being that of 3 trilateral words. Or, if the previous section fills up the last line, an entire blank line precedes the open section. A closed section is indicated by its beginning with an indented line, the previous one being finished or unfinished. If the foregoing section ends in the middle of the line, there is left the prescribed vacant space, and the next closed section begins in the same line. Thus in the 2d pericope 1 open section contains the narrative of the Flood (chs. 6:9 to 9:17), which is subdivided into the 4 closed sections, ch. 6:9-12, introduction; chs. 6:13 to 8:14, the ark and the Flood; chs. 8:15 to 9:7, Noah leaves the ark, sacrifices, and receives God's blessings and commands; ch. 9:8-17, the covenant of the rainbow. Another open section contains the generations of Shem and Terah (ch. 11:10-32). Its closed sections are closely followed by the R.V. in paraphrasing the English text. The verses were first numbered in the Hebrew Bible in Bomberg's edition of 1547, in which the number was noted on the marg. opposite every 5th verse by the appropriate letter of the Heb. alphabet used numerically. Arias Montanus, in his Hebrew Bible with interlinear Lat. translation, published at Antwerp in 1571, was the first actually to break up the Heb. text into chapters. To number the verses, he added the Arab. numerals in the marg. See BIBLE.

The Hebrew text of the O.T. has come down practically unchanged since at least the 1st half of the 2d century of the Christian era. From this form all existing MSS. are derived. The preservation of this standard text, in its integrity and with freedom from errors, during its transmission has been due to the existence of professional scribes to whom its copying, pronunciation, and interpretation were entrusted and to the elaborate rules adopted for their guidance which rendered mistakes in copying unlikely to occur and made the detection of a chance error almost certain. In the early part of the 10th century Aaron ben-Asher and Ben-Naphtali were 2 rival textual critics. Of the latter nothing is known, and no MS. which he edited has come to light; his readings are known only from official lists of the variations of the 2 scholars. Moses ben-Asher copied and edited a MS. (c. A.D. 890-895), now in the possession of the Karaite community at Cairo; it contains only the Former and Latter Prophets. His son Aaron ben-Asher (c. A.D. 900-940) continued his father's studies; a MS. based on his work and including the whole O.T. is in possession of the Jewish community at Aleppo. A copy of this MS. made A.D. 1009 is now in Leningrad.

It is believed that the original MSS. of the O.T. books were written on skins; see Book. That many of them were is certain (Ps. 40:7; Jer. 36:14, 23). The existing MSS. are usually of parchment or, in the East, of leather. They are not old. In the British Museum is an undated MS. of the Pentateuch, probably written c. A.D. 820-850; reference has already been made to the MS. of the elder Ben-Asher in the Karaite synagogue at Cairo as well as to that based on the work of Aaron ben-Asher. The oldest extant MS. of which the date (A.D. 916) can be affirmed with certainty is a copy of the Latter Prophets (Major and Minor). Although it is written with the supralinear (Babylonian) punctuation, it is a mixed text and embodies both the e. and the w. readings before they were definitely separated. It is now at Leningrad. The MS. of the entire O.T. dated A.D. 1009, now at Leningrad, has been noted above. The scarcity of ancient Heb. MSS. is to a large extent due to the practice of the Jews, which is alluded to in the Talmud, of burying all sacred MSS. which became defective through wear or were otherwise faulty.

After the invention of printing, the book of The Psalms was put in type and published in 1477. Eleven years later, in 1488, the whole printed Heb. Bible was issued in folio from a press at Soncino in the duchy of Milan. In 1492 there appeared at Brescia an octavo volume containing the Pentateuch, the Five Megilloth, and the Haphtaroth (lessons from the Prophets); the companion volume containing the Prophets and the Hagiographa (except the Megilloth) was printed at the same place in 1494. Luther used this edition in making his translation. The great Rabbinic Bible of Jacob ben Hayyim, published by Daniel Bomberg at Venice in 1524-1525 in 4 volumes, is based upon a careful collation of MSS. and faithfully reproduces the standard text of the scribes at Tiberias. Van der Hooght's edition of the Heb. text was first published at Amsterdam in 1705. It has held its ground on account of its accuracy, being reprinted with minor corrections by Aug. Hahn in 1831 and by C. G. G. Theile in 1849. It has about 1,000 marginal readings, most of them of considerable antiquity. Yet more important is the edition of the Masoretic text, with critical and Masoretic appendixes, prepared by S. Baer and Franz Delitzsch. Genesis appeared in 1869, and various other books have followed at intervals. This edition and that of Ginsburg issued at London in 1894 are revisions of the text of Jacob ben Hayyim, designed to conform it more closely to the teachings of the Masora. A 2d edition in 4 volumes by Ginsburg, with a large critical apparatus, was published in London, 1926. Kittel's edition, printed at Leipzig, 1906, reproduces the text of Jacob ben Hayyim, and gives in footnotes the more important variants of the MSS. and versions; a 2d edition appeared, 1909, 1912-1913. The 3d edition by Kittel, Kahle, Alt, and Eissfeldt was published at Stuttgart in 1937; the text is based on the Leningrad MS. (A.D. 1009), and thus an attempt was made to reproduce the work of Ben-Asher. The variants in different Hebrew MSS. were collected and published by Bishop Kennicott (1776-1780) and de Rossi (1784-1788; 1798).

Ol'ive. A tree largely cultivated in Palestine in olive yards (Ex. 23:11; Josh. 24:13; Judg. 15:5; I Sam. 8:14). It grew also in Assyria (II Kings 18:32). Strabo mentions it among the trees of Armenia, and it is supposed to be indigenous in n. India and other temperate regions of Asia. The wood was used for timber (I Kings 6:23, 31-33). A valuable oil was obtained from the fruit, and had extensive use; see OIL.

Plants grown from the drupe or from slips cut from below the grafted branches, and the shoots which spring up around the trunk, are of the wild variety and require grafting. A good, fruitful olive tree, if its cultivation is neglected, deteriorates and becomes wild. The wild olive is a shrub or low tree; and any berries which it may produce are small and of no value. The process of grafting a cutting from the wild olive tree into one of the cultivated kind is alluded to in Rom. 11:17, 24 to illustrate the grafting of the Gentile converts on what hitherto had been the Jewish Church. In gardening the process was different; it was the grafting of a cutting from the cultivated tree into a stock of the wild olive to alter and improve its nature.

From an olive tree the dove plucked the leaf when the Flood was subsiding (Gen. 8:11). An olive branch is now an emblem of peace. The olive was also a symbol of prosperity and divine blessing, of beauty and strength (Ps. 52:8; Jer. 11:16; Hos. 14:6). The aged olive tree is often surrounded by young and thrifty shoots (Ps. 128:3). Women sometimes adorned themselves with garlands of olives on festal occasions (Judith 15:13), and at the Olympic games in Greece the victor's crown was composed of olive leaves.

The olive tree of Palestine is the common Olea europaea. It has lanceolate, entire, leathery, evergreen leaves of a dusty color, and small whitish, monopetalous flowers. The olive is still cultivated through nearly every part of Palestine.

Ol'ives (ōl'ivz), Mount of, and Ol'ivet [Lat. olivētum, olive grove; cf. Vulgate, Matt. 21:1; 26:30; Acts 1:12]. A hill which is before Jerusalem on the e. (Zech. 14:4), separated from it by the valley of the Kidron (II Sam. 15:14, 23, 30). Its summit with the farther slope was reckoned as a Sabbath-day's journey from the city (Acts 1:12), or, according to Josephus, at 5 or 6 stades (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 6; War v. 2, 3). David, barefoot and with covered head, went up its ascent when he fled from Absalom. On its summit God was wont to be worshiped (II Sam. 15:32). The glory of the Lord appeared there to Ezekiel in a vision (Ezek. 11:23), and Zechariah prophetically portrayed Jehovah standing on the mountain to interpose in behalf of his people (Zech. 14:4). Jesus went often to the Mount of Olives (Luke 21:37; 22:39; John 8:1). He was descending its slope when the multitude welcomed him to the city with hosannas (Luke 19:37, 38). He had crossed its summit when Jerusalem burst into full view, and he wept over the fate which he knew awaited the city (vs. 41-44). He was sitting on the mount with his disciples, gazing across the valley at the splendid Temple and the city, when he prophesied the destruction of both (Matt. 24:3; Mark 13:3). After his last passover he retired to the Mount of Olives (Matt. 26:30; Mark 14:26). The Garden of Gethsemane was w. of it, either at its base or some short distance up its ascent. Bethany and Bethphage were on the e. side (Matt. 21:1; Mark 11:1; Luke 19:29). It was near the former of these villages that our Lord's ascension took place (Luke 24:50). The Mount of Olives is unquestionably the eminence now called by the Arabs Jebel et-Tūr, e. of Jerusalem. Properly speaking, it is a chain of hills rising into 3 or, as some reckon, 4 summits, and with 2 lateral spurs. One spur runs w., starting at the bend of the Kidron, about a mile n. of Jerusalem, and attains an elevation of 2,737 feet above the sea. This n. spur is generally identified with Josephus' hill of Scopus, or the watchman (Jos. War ii. 19, 4). The other spur is separated from the main ridge by the Kidron. It also runs w., and faces the city on the s. It has been designated the hill of Evil Counsel, from the late and worthless tradition that Caiaphas had a country place on its summit and in his house the chief priests met and consulted about putting Jesus to death (John 11:47-53). Its altitude is 2,549 feet.

Of the 4 peaks into which the range of Olivēt rises, the most n. one, called Karem es-Sayyād, is the highest, being 2,723 feet above sea level. It was formerly called Galilee, either because Galileans encamped there when they came to Jerusalem to the festivals, or because in the 14th century it was believed to be the place of the ascension, where the angels addressed the disciples as men of Galilee. The 2d peak is called the Ascension. As early as A.D. 315 it was regarded as the spot whence Jesus ascended to heaven, and Constantine crowned it with a rotunda and a basilica. The latter has been replaced by a succession of churches of the Ascension. This is the Mount of Olives proper. It stands directly opposite to the e. gate of Jerusalem, and rises to 2,643 feet above the level of the ocean, 371 above the bed of the Kidron, and 208 over the Temple plateau. The 3d hill is called the Prophets', from what are called the prophets' tombs on its side. The 4th hill is named the mount of Offense, from the belief that Solomon there built the idolatrous shrines for his heathen wives. The Ascension hill and the hill of the Prophets are so slightly dis severed that some reduce the 4 summits to 3.

At the foot of the Mount of Olives proper, at the traditional site of Gethsemane, the road forks, including the Garden in its crotch. One branch runs s., rises by a gradual ascent, winds round the s. shoulder of the mountain, and continues on to Bethany and Jericho. It was built in the 7th century A.D. by the caliph 'Abd al-Malik. The n. fork runs e., and at the distance of about 50 yards divides into 3. The middle one, steep and rugged, leads up the face of the mountain, crosses it near the summit, and goes on past the so-called stone of Bethphage to Bethany. As early as the 4th century the Christians of Jerusalem, when celebrating the triumphal entry of Jesus into the city, used to come in procession over this road. The 2 branches on either side of this steep middle road also reach the top of the mountain, but they follow a more gradual ascent. Farther up the Kidron valley a Roman road to the Jordan climbed the w. slope of the ridge near 'Ain es-Šuwan, crossed the crest about half a mile n. of the top of Olivet, in the depression n. of Karem es-Šayyād, descended into the wadi and crossed it near the ruin Bukei'dan and, keeping the wadi Rawābeh hard by on the n., continued on to the Jordan.

Ol'iv-et (ōl'ī-vēt). See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

O-lym'pas (ō-līm'pās). A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. 16:15).

O'mar (ō'mēr). A descendant of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen. 36:11), and chieftain of a tribe of the name (v. 15).

O-me'ga (ō-mē'gá). The last letter of the Gr. alphabet, hence used figuratively for the last or for the end (Rev. 1:8, 17; 21:6; 22:13).

O'mer. A measure for dry articles. It contained a 10th part of an ephah (Ex. 16:36), and was therefore 100th of a homer (Ezek. 45:11). The omer contained 3.36 quarts. See MEASURE, III.

Om'ri (ōm'rī) [Cf. Arab. 'Umar, 'Omar].

1. A man of Benjamin, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

2. A man of Judah, family of Perez (I Chron. 9:4).

3. Son of Michael and prince of the tribe of Issachar in David's reign (I Chron. 27:18).

4. A king of Israel. Before gaining the throne he was commander of the Israelite army in the reign of Elah and not unlikely in that of Baasha also; and he may have subjugated Moab at this time (Moabite Stone, 7, 8; see MOABITE STONE). He was conducting the siege of Gibbethon, which belonged to the Philistines, when news arrived that Zimri had murdered Elah and usurped the throne. The army at once proclaimed Omri king of Israel. He accepted the honor and led his troops against the town of Tirzah, the national capital, where Zimri was. The latter, despairing of his ability to hold the throne, committed suicide (I Kings 16:15-20). But the nation was divided. One half adhered to Omri and the other half supported the claims of Tibni; and it was not until the death of Tibni 5 years later that Omri became the undisputed sovereign of all Israel (vs. 21-23). The statement of v. 23, "In the thirty and first year of Asa king of Judah began Omri to reign over Israel" (in Heb. simply "Omri reigned"), refers, not to the time of his proclamation by the soldiery and his assumption of the royal title (although the 12 years of his reign are counted from this event), but to his attainment of the sole authority in the kingdom (cf. vs. 15, 29). He transferred the seat of government from Tirzah to Samaria, which he built for the purpose (v. 24). He followed the idolatries of Jeroboam and acted in other respects more wickedly than any of his predecessors on the throne of the 10 tribes (I Kings 16:26; Micah 6:16). He died about 874 B.C. and was buried in Samaria. His son Ahab succeeded him on the throne (I Kings 16:28). Omri made an impression on history outside of Israel. Not only did the Moabites remember his name, but after his death and the annihilation of his family the Assyrians for a time still attached his name, which they wrote Humri, to the reigning monarch and land of Israel.

On, I (ōn) [strength]. A Reubenite chief who took part in the rebellion of Korah (Num. 16:1); see KORAH 4.

On, II (ōn) [Heb. ʾōn, from Egypt. ḥnw; cf. Coptic ōn]. An old and renowned city of Lower Egypt, on the e. of the Nile, in the Delta, several miles from the river and 19 miles n. of Memphis. It was the principal seat of the worship of the sun; hence called Heliopolis by the Greeks (cf. Ex. 1:11, LXX) and Beth-shemesh by Jeremiah (Jer. 43:13). It is not certain whether Isatah had this city in mind; a slight change in the 1st letter of the name (heres, sun; heres, destruction) would turn city of the sun into city of destruction, to denote the overthrow of idolatry

The Obelisk at Heliopolis (On), Erected by Senwosret (Sesostris) I, Second King of Dynasty XII

(Isa. 19:18; cf. marg.). With the temple of the sun were connected a training school for priests and a medical school, and these institutions were visited by all the Greek philosophers who went to Egypt to study. In Herodotus' day the priests of On were esteemed the most learned in history of all the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 3). It was the daughter of a priest of On whom Pharaoh gave to Joseph to wife (Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20).

O'nam (ō'nām) [strong, wealthy]. 1. A Horite (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40).

2. A man of Judah, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:26, 28).

O'nan (ō'nān) [strong]. A son of Judah by a Canaanitess. That his brother might have no heir, he sinned; but he himself died without male issue (Gen. 38:4-10; 46:12).

O'nes'i-mus (ō-nēs'i-mūs) [Gr., useful, profitable]. A slave of Philemon, whom Paul was the means of converting at Rome, and whom he sent back to his Christian master requesting that he might be received, not as a servant, but as a brother beloved (Philemon 10-19). He was a man of Colossae, and with Tychicus carried from Rome to that city the epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (Col. 4:7-9).

On'esiph'o-ru-s (ōn'ē-sīf'ō-rūs) [Gr., profit bringer]. A Christian whose home was probably at Ephesus (II Tim. 1:16-18). When he was at Rome he sought out the Apostle Paul, then a prisoner, and showed him great kindness. The members of his household were with Timothy, and Paul sent them his salutations (ch. 4:19).

O-ni'as (ô-ni'ās), in A.V. once O-ni'a-res (ô-ni'ā-rēz) (I Macc. 12:19). The form Oni-ares is an old corruption, in which the 2 names Onias Arius are blended (cf. Jos. Antiq. xii. 4, 10). A high priest of the Jews, who held office from c. 323-300 B.C. He was a contemporary of Arius, king of Sparta, who reigned from 309 to 265 B.C. (I Macc. 12:7, in A.V. Darius, a corruption of Arius, vs. 19, 20). Onias succeeded Jaddua, and was the father and predecessor of Simon the Just (Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 7; xii. 2, 5). He is probably referred to in Ecclus. 50:1. Josephus errs in regarding Onias III, a later pontiff, as the recipient of the letter from Arius.

For others of the name, see HIGH PRIEST.

On'ion. A plant, the bulbous root of which was much used in Egypt as an article of food (Num. 11:5; Herod. ii. 125). It is Allium cepa, called in Heb. bāṣāl. It has been cultivated from an early period in Egypt and other parts of the East.

O'no (ô'nō) [strong]. A town of Benjamin (Neh. 6:2; 11:35), built or rather rebuilt by a Benjaminite called Shamed (I Chron. 8:12). Some of its inhabitants returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37). It is considered to have been at Kefr 'Ana, about 7 miles inland e. by s. from Joppa.

On'y-cha. The rendering of Heb. sheheleth (Ex. 30:34). It was 1 of the ingredients in a perfume made for the service of the tabernacle. It is believed to have been the operculum (lid) of a shell mollusk called stromb or wing-shell, which being burned gave out a certain perfume.

On'yx [Lat. from Gr., finger nail, onyx]. The rendering of Heb. shōham. The Heb. word denotes a precious stone (Job 28:16, R.V. marg. beryl; Ezek. 28:13) which was found in the land of Havilah (Gen. 2:12). Two of these stones, each graven with the names of 6 Israelite tribes, were put on the shoulder pieces of the high priest's ephod (Ex. 28:9, 12), and another was the 2d stone in the 4th row on his breastplate (ch. 28:20). David gathered such stones for the service of the future Temple (I Chron. 29:2). The onyx is a cryptocrystalline variety or subvariety of quartz. It is in layers of different colors, which alternate with each other and bear some resemblance to the white and flesh-colored bands of the finger nail.

O'phel (ô'fēl) [swelling, bulge, hill]. The s. part of the e. hill at Jerusalem, enclosed by the city wall; perhaps originally a massive circular tower or projection in the fortifications at this point. The general locality is indicated by the proximity of the pool of Shehlah, i.e., doubtless Siloam, the court of the guard, the water gate, and the horse gate (Neh. 3:15-27; see JERUSALEM, II. 3); the pool of Siloam, the e. court of the Temple, and the Kidron valley (Jos. War v. 4, 1 and 2; 6, 1). Jotham built much on its walls, and Manasseh increased their height (II Chron. 27:3; 33:14). After the Exile, if not before, the Nethinim had their residence in this quarter, because of its convenience to the Temple (Neh. 3:26; 11:21). At the ophel, or hill, in Samaria Gehazi deposited the goods got by deceit from Naaman (II Kings 5:24, R.V. marg.); and in a city of Moab Mesha built the wall of the ophel (Moabite Stone, 22; see MOABITE STONE).

O'phir (ô'fēr). A tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:29; I Chron. 1:23), and the country which it inhabited. This region was celebrated for its gold (I Chron. 29:4; Job 22:24; 28:16; Ps. 45:9; Isa. 13:12), to obtain which, Hiram, in conjunction with Solomon, sent a navy from Ezion-geber (I Kings 9:28). The ships brought back algum or almag trees as well as gold (ch. 10:11), and probably also silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (v. 22; cf. ch. 22:48). Jehoshaphat attempted to imitate the enterprise, but his ships were wrecked at Ezion-geber (ch. 22:48). As this port was on the Gulf of 'Akabah, the route to Ophir was by the Red Sea and not by the Mediterranean. The voyage out and back in the ships of that day, with the peculiar winds of the Red Sea, and including the lying in port, lasted, it may be judged, 3 years (ch. 10:22; cf. ch. 22:48); see RED SEA.

It is not certain where Ophir was. Josephus says that it was the Golden Land in India (Jos. Antiq. viii. 6, 4), perhaps on the river Cophen (i. 6, 4); and hence it has been conjecturally located at the mouth of the Indus, in the region of the Abhira. Punt and s. Arabia have also been suggested, as well as e. Arabia on the Persian Gulf; it may have been on the African coast in the general region of Somaliland.

Oph'ni (ô'f'nī). A village of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24). Robinson suggests its identity with Gophna, on the highway from Samaria to Jerusalem, a day's march n. of Gibeah (Jos. War v. 2, 1); the modern Jifnā, 3 miles n.w. by n. of Beth-el. This identification assumes that the boundary of Benjamin turned n. near Beth-el, for Beth-el was on the n. boundary.

Oph'rah (ô'f'rā) [hind]. 1. A son of Menothai, of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:14).

2. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23), evidently n. of Michmash (I Sam. 13:17). According to the Onomasticon, of the 4th century A.D., it was a village then called Ephraim, 5 miles to the e. of Beth-el. Robinson identified it with et-Taiyibeh, about 4 miles n.e. by e. of Beth-el, with a splendid view from its summit. His opinion has been widely accepted.

3. A village w. of the Jordan, occupied by the Abiezrites, a family of Manasseh (Judg. 6:11, 15; cf. Josh. 17:1, 2). It was the home of Gideon, where he was called to his mission and built an altar, where he made an ephod to the ensnaring of Israel, and where he was buried (Judg., chs. 6 to 8). It may probably be identified with et-Taiyibeh, s. of Tūl-karem.

Or'a-tor. 1. The rendering of Heb. laḥash, an incantation, preceded by nēbōn, skillful in enchantment (Isa. 3:3). The R.V. accurately translates the phrase by "skillful enchanter."

2. The rendering of Gr. rhētōr, public speaker, pleader, in Acts 24:1, applied to Tertullus. He was a professional advocate engaged by Paul's Jewish enemies to prosecute the apostle before the Roman procurator.

Or'chard. See GARDEN.

O'reb (ô'rēb) [a raven]. 1. One of 2 Midianite princes defeated, captured, and put to death by Gideon. He was slain at a rock, which came to be called in consequence the rock of Oreb (Judg. 7:25; 8:3; Ps. 83:11; Isa. 10:26).

2. A rock on which the Midianite prince Oreb was killed by Gideon (Judg. 7:25; Isa. 10:26); doubtless it was w. of the Jordan near the river (Judg. 7:25; 8:4).

O'ren (ô'rēn) [a species of fir or cedar tree]. A man of Judah, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:25).

Or'gan. See PIPE 2.

O'ri'on (ô-rī'ōn). A constellation (Job 9:9; 38:31; Amos 5:8), in Heb. kēsīl, stupid fellow, fool; in religious sense, impudent, defiant, goddess. The Targums and the Peshitta render the word by giant; the LXX and Vulgate employ the name Orion. In classical mythology Orion is represented as a man of great strength, celebrated as a worker in iron and as a hunter. Being killed by the goddess Diana, he was transferred to the heavens and bound to the sky (cf. Job 38:31), and became the constellation Orion.

The constellation is visible in all latitudes. It disputes with the Great Bear the distinction of being the finest constellation of the sky. Two of its stars—Betelgeuse at the upper part of his right arm as he faces the spectator, and Rigel at his uplifted left foot—are of the 1st magnitude. About 100 stars in the constellation are visible to the naked eye, and 2,000 or more may be seen under the telescope.

Ornaments. Orientals adorn themselves with ornaments to an extent deemed excessive by Occidental taste. It has ever been so. Hebrews, Egyptians, Midianites, Syrians, both men and women, were fond of wearing ornaments (Gen. 24:22; Ex. 3:22; 11:2; 32:2; Num. 31:50). Women wore beads and pearls, and articles of gold, silver, and brass (S. of Sol. 1:10, 11; 1 Tim. 2:9); earrings, nose rings, pendants, necklaces, chains, brazen mirrors, armlets, bracelets, finger rings, anklets (Gen. 24:22, 47; 35:4; Ex. 35:22; Num. 31:50; Isa. 3:18-23). Men of all classes except the poorest wore seal rings (Gen. 38:18), which were useful in business as well as ornamental. Nor did they regard rings for the arms as effeminate. Saul, like the kings of Assyria, wore a ring about the arm or wrist (II Sam. 1:10). It was a national custom with the Ishmaelites for the men to wear earrings (Judg. 8:25, 26), and men among the Hebrews sometimes did so (Ex. 32:2). Men of high rank wore a gold chain as badge of office (Gen. 41:42; Dan. 5:29).

Ornaments were laid aside in time of mourning (Ex. 33:4-6).

Ornan (ôr'nân). See ARAUNAH.

Orpäh (ôr'pä) [neck, i.e., stubbornness]. The wife of Chilion, and the sister-in-law of Ruth. She consented to remain in her native country, Moab, when Ruth, drawn by affection to her mother-in-law Naomi, insisted on accompanying her to Palestine (Ruth 1:4, 14, 15; cf. ch. 4:10).

Or-thô-si'a (ôr'thō-si'ā), in A.V. Or-tho-si'as (ôr'thō-si'ās). A city of Phoenicia, between Tripoli and the river Eleutherus (I Macc. 15:37).

Os-nap'par (ôs-nāp'ēr), in A.V. As-nap'per [Biblical Aram. 'ās'nappār]. A high Assyrian dignitary called great and noble who settled various foreign tribes in Samaria (Ezra 4:10). Formerly it was supposed that he was either Esarhaddon or 1 of his officials (cf. vs. 2, 10). Scholars now identify him with Ashurbanipal, the son of Esarhaddon, who from c. 673 B.C. was his heir apparent; in 669 he became his successor on the Assyrian throne, and reigned until 626 B.C. Ashurbanipal records that he penetrated Elam, took Susa the capital, and carried off many of the inhabitants to Assyria (cf. Ezra 4:9, 10). His father, Esarhaddon, had conquered Egypt in 671. Rebellion occurred among the petty rulers, and assistance was rendered them by the able Tirhakah. To suppress this revolt, Ashurbanipal conducted 2 campaigns, in which on the whole he was successful, though Egypt was finally lost. In the later campaign, about 663 B.C., Thebes, then known as No, was captured and plundered (cf. Nahum 3:8-10). He had relations first friendly, but afterward the reverse, with Gyges, the usurping king of Lydia; see Gog 2. He had to crush a rebellion of Shamash-shumukin, his own brother, the viceroy of Babylon. By the Greeks, who called him Sardanapalus, he was considered effeminate. Modern scholars regard his memory with gratitude on account of the splendid library that he brought together. He had copyists incessantly at work, not merely transcribing Assyrian books, but also copying and translating works of value from Sumerian and Akkadian. Part of this library has been recovered, and it is from it that we derive most of our acquaintance with the Assyrian Empire and its kings.

Os'pray, obsolete form of Os'prey. The rendering of Heb. 'ōziyyāh (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12), an unclean bird. The LXX translates it haliaietos, that is, Pandion haliaëtus. It is a dark brown eagle widely distributed throughout the world, frequenting seacoasts and living on fish. In Palestine it occurs along the Mediterranean, especially in the lagoons at the mouth of the Kishon.

Ossifrage [Lat., bone breaker]. The rendering in A.V. of Heb. peres, breaker. It was an unclean bird (Lev. 11:13; and Deut. 14:12). The R.V. translates it gier eagle. It is believed to be the lammergeier, or bearded eagle (Gypaetus barbatus). The Eng. ossifrage and Heb. peres both refer to the fact that the bird delights in bones, snakes, and tortoises, which it breaks. This it sometimes does by taking them up to a great height in the air and dropping them on a stone. The ossifrage is 3½ feet high; the expansion of its wings is about 9 feet. Its claws are not adapted for carrying off living prey, and its disposition is cowardly. In Palestine the ossifrage is rare and tending to extinction, its chief haunts being the ravines of the Arnon, e. of the Dead Sea.

Ostrich. 1. The rendering of Heb. yā'ēn, fem. yā'ānāh, probably the voracious bird. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15), makes a mournful sound (Micah 1:8), inhabits the wilderness (Isa. 13:21; 34:13), and was believed to forsake its eggs (Lam. 4:3). The A.V. translates the masc. form by ostrich, the fem. form by owl.

2. The rendering of Heb. pl. renānim, utterers of tremulous sounds (Job 39:13, in A.V. peacock). The female deposits her eggs on the ground to be warmed in the dust; and it was popularly supposed that she abandoned them to their fate, forgetting that the foot might crush them or that the wild beast might trample them (vs. 14, 15). The speed of the ostrich is such that it distances a man on horseback (v. 18).

3. The A.V. inaccurately renders Heb. nōṣāh by ostrich in Job 39:13b. It means a feather, as in Ezek. 17:3, 7.

Ostrich

The ostrich (Struthio camelus) belongs to the aberrant subclass or division called Ratitae, or struthious birds. It is among the largest in size of the class, but are not able to fly, the deprivation being compensated by great power of running. The common ostrich is 6 or 8 feet high. The bird prepares a nest by rolling in the sand and scooping out a hole about 6 feet in diameter. An egg is laid every other day, until the eggs number 10, 12, or more. Each egg is about 3 pounds in weight. They appear to be hatched partly by the heat of the sun, but mainly by incubation, the male bird sitting on them for about 20 hours to the hen's 4. The male takes charge of the young brood. At night the bird utters a hoarse, complaining cry, alluded to in Micah 1:8. The ostrich is diffused over the greater part of Africa. It still occurs in Arabia, but its area there seems to have diminished since O.T. times.

Oth'ni (ôth'nî) [abbreviation of Othniel]. A porter, the son of Shemaiah (I Chron. 26:7).

Oth'ni-el (ôth'nî-ël) [perhaps, God is might]. A son of Kenaz and brother or half brother of Caleb, son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite (Josh. 15:17; I Chron. 4:13); see CALEB 2. Caleb promised to give his daughter Achsah in marriage to any hero who took the town of Debir or Kiriath-sepher. Othniel effected its capture and received Achsah (Josh. 15:15-17; Judg. 1:11-13). He subsequently delivered the Israelites from the tyranny of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, and became judge, and the land had rest 40 years (Judg. 3:8-11).

Ov'en. See BREAD.

Owl. 1. The rendering of Heb. bath hayya'ânâh (Lev. 11:16, A.V.). See OSTRICH 1.

2. The rendering of Heb. kôs, a cup, an owl. The owl was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16, little owl), and frequented waste places (Ps. 102:6). Probably the s. little owl (Athene glaux) is intended, which is universally distributed through Palestine, occurring in olive yards, rocks, thickets, and among ruins and tombs.

3. The rendering of Heb. yanshûph. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:16, great owl) and frequented waste places (Isa. 34:11; R.V. marg., bitter). It is rendered ibid in the LXX and Vulgate, and owl in the Targums and the Peshitta. Tristram believes that the species was the Egyptian eagle owl (Bubo ascalaphus). It lives in caves and among ruins, and is common about Petra and Beer-sheba.

4. The rendering of Heb. tinshemeth (Lev. 11:18; in A.V. swan). The LXX renders it purple coot or water hen, and the Vulgate swan.

5. The rendering of Heb. lîlîth, nocturnal specter (Isa. 34:14; in A.V. screech owl, in R.V. night monster). The screech or barn owl (Strix flammea) is found in Palestine frequenting ruins.

6. The rendering of Heb. kippôz (Isa. 34:15; in R.V. dart-snake).

Ox. The male of the species Bos taurus, though ox frequently signifies any animal of the kind, without respect to sex (Ex. 20:17), and the pl. oxen is often synonymous with cattle. The ox was early domesticated. Abraham had sheep and oxen (Gen. 12:16; 21:27); so had his contemporary Abimelech (ch. 20:14), and the Egyptians at the time of the 10 plagues (Ex. 9:3). The ox was used for plowing (I Kings 19:19), for dragging carts or wagons (Num. 7:3; II Sam. 6:6; etc.), and for treading out grain (Deut. 25:4). They were eaten (I Kings 1:25; cf. Matt. 22:4), and were largely sacrificed, especially in connection with the burnt offerings (Num. 7:87, 88; II Sam. 24:22; II Chron. 5:6; 7:5; etc.). A yoke of oxen was 2 oxen designed to be yoked together for the plow, for a cart, or for anything similar. Tristram says that the common cattle of s. and central Palestine are small in size, those of n. Palestine are larger. The largest herds are now beyond the Jordan.

The word t'ôd, rendered wild ox (Deut. 14:5, A.V.) and wild bull (Isa. 51:20, A.V.), is translated in R.V. by antelope (q.v.). See UNICORN.

Ox'goad'. See GOAD.

O'zem (ô'zēm) [cf. Arab. 'adam, anger].

1. A son of Jesse (I Chron. 2:15).

2. A son of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:25).

Ozi'as (ô-zî'ās). See UZZIAH.

Oz'ni (ôz'nî) [Jehovah has given ear; cf. Azaniah]. A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:16). He was either called also Ezbon (Gen. 46:16), or else on Ezbon's death he took his place and founded a tribal family, as did Hezron and Hamul in Judah (Num. 26:19-21).

P

Pa'a-rai (pā'ā-rī). One of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:35, most probably a diverse reading of I Chron. 11:37).

Pa'd'an (pā'd'an) and Pa'd'an-a'ram (pā'd'-ân-a'ram), in A.V. Pa'dan (pā'dān) and Pa'dan-a'ram (pā'dān-a'ram) [plain, plain of Aram, i.e., Syria]; see ARAM 2 (1).

Pa'don (pā'dōn) [ransom, redemption]. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

Pa'gi-el (pā'gi-ël) [perhaps, a meeting with God]. Head of the tribe of Asher in the wilderness (Num. 1:13; 2:27; 7:72, 77; 10:26).

Pa'hath-mo'ab (pā'hāth-mō'āb) [governor of Moab]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:6; 8:4; Neh. 7:11). Some of them married heathen wives, from whom Ezra persuaded them to separate (Ezra 10:30). The representative of the family signed the covenant (Neh. 10:14), and Hashub, a member of the family, rebuilt or replaced part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11).

Pa'i (pā'î). See PAU.

Paint. In ancient Egypt and Assyria the custom of painting a black rim around the eyes prevailed among the women. The Hebrews seem to have regarded the practice as a meretricious art, unworthy of a woman of high character (II Kings 9:30; Jer. 4:30; Ezek. 23:40; Jos. War iv. 9, 10). Doubtless various dye stuffs were used for the purpose. Antimony, burned to blackness and pulverized, was employed. Probably lead also was used, as it is in Persia. The ordinary kohl used by women in Egypt is a powder obtained from almond shells or by burning a fragrant resin. The powder was kept in small, covered jars and was applied, both dry and moistened with oil, by means of a probe made of wood, silver, or ivory, blunt at the end.

For cosmetics applied to other parts of the body, see HENNA; and for pigments used to color walls and other objects, see COLORS.

Pal'ace. David occupied a royal residence at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:9; 7:1, 2), but Solomon's commodious and magnificent abode was the first in Jerusalem to be constructed on a grand scale (I Kings 7:1-12). It was 13 years in course of erection, whereas the Temple was completed in 7 years (chs. 6:38; 7:1). It contained the house of the forest of Lebanon (vs. 2-5), which took its name from its numerous cedar pillars. This house was 100 cubits or 150 feet long, 50 cubits wide, and 30 cubits high. Its walls were of solid masonry. Within were 4 rows of cedar pillars. Probably 1 row ran parallel with each wall, and the 4 rows formed the 4 sides of a rectangular court, about 30 by 80 cubits in dimension; or else the pillars were disposed in 2 double rows parallel to the long sides of the building and left a court in the center. Beams extended from the pillars to the walls and supported 3 tiers of chambers. These chambers looked down into the court. This building was at once armory and treasure house (I Kings 10:17, 21; Isa. 22:8), and may have served other purposes as well. A hall of pillars was the reception and waiting room of the palace (I Kings 7:6). It was 50 cubits in length and 30 cubits in breadth, and had a portico in front of its portal. This portico was not unlikely the main entrance to the palace. Next came the hall of judgment (v. 7), open in front, but probably closed on the other 3 sides by solid walls pierced by doors only. It was the throne room. The great ivory throne overlaid with gold stood there (ch. 10:18-20). These 3 buildings probably opened on a rectangular court, the sides of which were the portal in the central part of the inner long wall of the house of the forest of Lebanon, the inner doors and wall of the hall of pillars, and the open front of the throne room. Behind the throne room was the inner court where the king dwelt. The principal entrance to it was probably through the throne room, so that the king pronounced judgment and granted audiences in the gate of his palace. This court was, of course, adorned with flowers and fountains, and surrounded by cloisters. The palace of Pharaoh's daughter (ch. 7:8) was next to the throne room, according to Josephus (Jos. Antiq. viii. 5, 2). Solomon's palace was constructed on the general model which prevailed in w. Asia, and which is now familiar from the remains of the royal abodes unearthed in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia. Some conception of its elegance and beauty may be formed from casual references in The Book of Esther to the palace of the Persian king at Shushan (Esth. 1:5, 6, 9; 2:3, 14; 5:1, 2; 7:7). See HOUSE; HASMONAENS, PALACE OF THE; HEROD, PALACE OF; and PRAETORIUM.

Pa'tal (pā'tāl) [(God) has judged, decided]. A son of Uzai. He helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25).

Pal'an-quin'. A covered conveyance, arranged both for sitting and reclining, and carried by means of poles on the shoulders of 2, 4, or 6 men or borne as a litter between 2 camels, horses, or mules. The royal palanquin, provided by Solomon for his bride, consisted of a frame made of cedar, with small ornamental pillars of silver, a bottom of gold, costly coverings of purple for the seat, and perhaps embroideries lovingly made by the daughters of Jerusalem (S. of Sol. 3:9, in A.V. chariot).

Pal'es-tine (pāl'ēs-tīn) (Joel 3:4) and Pal'es-ti-na (pāl'ēs-tī-nā) (Ex. 15:14; Isa. 14:29, 31), in R.V. always Philis'ti-a. In the O.T. the name denotes the country of the Philistines (cf. Herod. vii. 89). The name now designates a country in the s.w. corner of Asia, constituting the s. portion of Syria; for a long time it was in the possession of the Hebrews. That portion of this territory which lies w. of the Jordan the ancient Hebrews called Canaan as distinguished from the land of Gilead e. of the river. After the Conquest the entire country became known as the land of Israel (I Sam. 13:19; I Chron. 22:2; Matt. 2:20), but after the division of the kingdom this name was often given to the Northern realm. In The Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. 11:9) it is called the Land of Promise. Soon after the beginning of the Christian era Greek and Latin writers denominate it Palaestina. In the Middle Ages it became known as the Holy Land (cf. Zech. 2:12; II Macc. 1:7).

1. Boundaries and extent of Palestine. The Hebrews occupied the region from Kadesh-barnea and Wadi el-Arish on the s. to Mount Hermon on the n., and from the Mediterranean Sea on the w. to the desert on the e., except the plain of the Philistines and the country of Moab. In prosperous reigns powerful kings extended their sway beyond these limits and held dominion over Hamath and Damascus and beyond, as far as the river Euphrates, and over Ammon, Moab, and Edom. The Hebrews themselves were accustomed to say that their country extended from Dan to Beer-sheba, a distance of 150 miles. The s. boundary was then Wadi el-Fikrah and the river Arnon. These limits included the thickly populated portion of the land. Taking the smaller limits, which exclude most of the territory occupied by the tribe of Simeon and part of that occupied by Naphtali, the boundaries form a parallelogram, the altitude of which, measured by the latitudes of Dan and the s. extremity of the Dead Sea, is 145 miles, and the base 70 miles. The area is 10,150 square miles. This includes the Philistine country, which, at its utmost extent from Carmel to Beer-sheba, had an area of 1,765 square miles, leaving 8,385 square miles as the territory occupied by the Hebrews. The survey assigns to e. Palestine, from Hermon to the Arnon, about 3,800 square miles; and to w. Palestine, as far s. as Beer-sheba and including Philistia, 6,040 square miles.

2. Population of Palestine. The Hebrews at the time of the Conquest numbered 600,000 men, or else 600 clans (see THOUSAND). If the men alone numbered 600,000, the population was about 2,000,000, in a territory of 8,300 square miles. Massachusetts, with an area of 8,315 square miles, had a population of 4,312,332 in 1940, and New Jersey, with an area of 7,815 square miles, had a population of 4,148,562. David took the census of a much larger region. Modern Palestine (1940) with an area of 10,429 square miles has a population of 1,466,536. That it was formerly a populous country is evident from the statements of the Bible and Josephus, and from the numerous ruins of former towns. Scarcely a hilltop of the multitude always in sight but is crowned with a city or village, inhabited or in ruins.

3. The geology of Palestine. A band of Nubian or Petra sandstone extends along the e. coast of the Dead Sea and along part of the wall of rock flanking the Jordan Valley on the e., and appears on the w. slopes of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. It is generally of a dark red or blackish color. Above this lies the most important geological formation in Palestine, the cretaceous limestone which constitutes the main part of the tableland of the country both e. and w. of the Jordan. At Jerusalem there are 2 beds of the limestone, an upper or harder layer, called by the inhabitants mazi, and an inferior soft one, denominated malaki. The reservoirs, sepulchers, and cellars under and around the city have been excavated in the soft malaki, while the foundations of the buildings are on the hard mazi. The large quarries near the Damascus gate are in the malaki. From them came the stone of which the Temple walls were constructed. These beds of cretaceous limestone underlie a newer series which, commencing at Mount Carmel, runs nearly s. to Beer-sheba, from which it then curves in a s.w. direction parallel to the Mediterranean. Outliers of it exist also n.e., e., and s.w. of Jerusalem and around Shechem. From the abundance in them of the little foraminifera called nummulites, the beds are named the nummulitic limestone. They belong to the Eocene Tertiary, and probably to the Middle Eocene. This rock is so connected with the cretaceous limestone that the 2 are generally held to constitute but a single formation, called the cretaceo-nummulitic series. Flanking the nummulitic limestone on the w. a long continuous band of calcareous sandstone extends through the Philistine country and appears in scattered patches farther n., to near Mount Carmel. As a rule, it is porous and soft, and since it easily weathers away, it exposes the harder limestone of the tableland which dips beneath it, and makes the descent from the uplands to the lowlands of Judea and Samaria more abrupt than it otherwise would be. Between this sandstone and the Mediterranean lie raised beaches belonging to the upper Pliocene, or to recent times. All these are sedimentary beds. A few igneous rocks, however, exist in the land. A minute patch of very old igneous rocks, an outlier of the great mass of granite, porphyry, diorite, and felsite, which occurs farther s. in the 'Arabah and especially at Sinai, is combined with the carboniferous rocks. On the e. side of the Jordan, nearly all the way from the roots of Mount Hermon to s. of the Sea of Galilee, and e. and s.e. to the Hauran, beyond the limits of Palestine, the country is overspread by an immense mass of volcanic material, basalt, dolerite, felsite, none of it older, and some of it apparently more recent, than the Pliocene Tertiary. There are detached portions of the same volcanic rocks in w. Palestine, w. and n.w. of the Sea of Galilee, with fragments in other quarters. Along the Mediterranean coast of Palestine, wherever the ground is low and level, there is a row of sand dunes, some rising 200 feet in height. Those on the s.w. of the country may have been at least partly formed by the blowing of sand from the Egyptian and Sinaitic deserts. Those farther n. obtained the sand from the weathering of the calcareous sandstone of Philistia. They tend to encroach upon the cultivated parts adjacent, the wind continually blowing particles from them inland. Palestine lies in one of the lines in which earthquake action is potent; and both in ancient times and more recently portions of the country have been seriously convulsed. To recapitulate, the geological structure of Palestine consists of a layer of red sandstone over the primitive rocks; then comes the chalky limestone which forms the mass of the country, overlaid with nummulite limestone and alluvial soil; and lastly in the n.e. appear colossal erupted masses of volcanic rock.

4. The physical geography of Palestine. The physical divisions of Palestine are 5: the Maritime Plain, the Low County or Shephelah, the Central or Western Mountain Range, the Jordan Valley, and the Eastern Range. These form parallel zones, and with certain modifications extend through the entire length of the country from n. to s. In Samaria the Central Range falls directly into the Maritime Plain, which is called Sharon. These zones are broken by the Plain of Esdraelon, which lies athwart the mountain range and connects the seacoast with the Jordan Valley. 1. The Maritime Plain lies along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea for the entire length of the country, being broken only by Mount Carmel. N. of Carmel it is quite narrow, but s. of that mountain it is 6 miles wide and increases in width s. It is an undulating plain 100 to 200 feet above sea level, and very fertile. Between Carmel and the 'Aujah, which empties into the sea n. of Joppa, it was called Sharon; s. of Joppa it was occupied by the Philistines. 2. The Low Country or Shephelah is a region of low hills situated between the Maritime Plain s. of Carmel and the high Central Range. It forms a terrace with an elevation of about 500 feet above the sea level. The name is applied almost exclusively to that part of the low hilly country which extends from the latitude of Joppa s. to Beer-sheba, and which is sharply separated from the Central Range by a series of valleys running n. and s. 3. The Central Mountain Range is a continuation of the Lebanon Mountains. S. of the river Leontes the lofty ridge drops to a high plateau which reaches s. as far as the n. end of the Sea of Galilee and Acre. This is Upper Galilee. It contains a number of hills between 2,000 and 3,000 feet in elevation; while several rise considerably above that height, like Jebel Jermuk which is 3,934 feet. Lower Galilee is triangular, having the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan as far as Beth-shean on its e. side and the Plain of Esdraelon on the s.w. side. It consists of a series of low ridges running e. and w. Its elevation is considerably less than that of Upper Galilee, many of its hills being only 400, 500, or 600 feet high, though there are a few loftier peaks immediately w. of the Sea of Galilee. Southwest of the sea is Mount Tabor, 1,843 feet high; and farther s. Mount Gilboa, with one peak 1,698 feet and another 1,643 feet. The s. part of Lower Galilee descends into the Plain of Esdraelon, most of the places in which do not exceed 200 or 300 feet in height. South of the Plain of Esdraelon the range is broken by many wadies, mountains are scattered into groups, and its inner recesses are accessible from the Maritime Plain, Esdraelon, and the Jordan Valley. Carmel is thrust out as a spur toward the n.w. The average watershed is 2,000 feet high. But Mount Ebal rises 3,077 feet and its companion Gerizim 2,849. This was Samaria. From Beth-el to Hebron and almost to Beer-sheba, a distance of about 45 miles, the range forms 1 compact mass with precipitous sides on the e. and w. and with an average height of 2,200 feet. Beth-el, however, has an elevation of 2,930 feet above sea level, the highest part of Jerusalem 2,598, Bethlehem 2,550, and Hebron 3,040. About 15 miles s. of Hebron it slopes down to the desert of the wandering. The summit of the range is the narrow tableland which was occupied by the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. 4. The Jordan Valley is a remarkable chasm which begins near Hāshbaya at the w. foot of Mount Hermon, 1,700 feet above sea level, but with lofty mountains on each side, and grows rapidly deeper as it goes s. until at the surface of the Dead Sea it is 1,290 feet lower than sea level; see DEAD SEA and JORDAN. Though not an impassable barrier, it prevented free intercourse between the peoples who dwelt e. of it s. of the Jabbok as far as Edom, and the tribes of Judah and Benjamin on the w. 5. The Eastern Range is a great fertile tableland, much of it more than 3,000 feet in elevation, stretching from the bluffs which overlook the Jordan Valley to the Syrian desert. It is divided by the gorge of the Jabbok and the n. portion is further cleft by the Yarmūk, immediately s. of the Sea of Galilee.

5. The principal roads of Palestine. The physical structure determined the course of travel. The great commercial and military highway between Egypt and the empires of the East passed through Palestine. It crossed Wadi el-Arish near its mouth, followed the seacoast to Gaza, where it was met by a road from Elath and Arabia, and continued through the plain of the Philistines to Ashdod. Beyond Ashdod it forked. One branch followed the coast by Joppa and Dor, and avoided Mount Carmel by keeping to the seashore at the base of the headland; but the way is only 600 feet wide under the headland, and is broken by rocks. The other branch, and the main line of travel, continued from Ashdod through Ekron and Lod and crossed the mountains to the Plain of Esdraelon by 1 of 3 passes. The w. road emerged by Tell Keimun and led to Acre, Tyre, Sidon, and the n. The central road crossed to el-Lejjun (Megiddo), traversed the Plain of Esdraelon and Lower Galilee to the plain of Gennesaret, followed the Jordan n., and by one branch entered the valley of the river Litany between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and led to Hamath and the n. The other branch crossed the Jordan between the Lake of Huleh and the Sea of Galilee, and went n.e. to Damascus. The 3d and most frequented route from the Maritime Plain passed through the plain of Dothan to En-gannim, where it divided, one branch joining the aforementioned road across Lower Galilee, and the other leading to Beth-shean, and, dividing again, continuing to Gilead or to Damascus. By any of the n. routes Carchemish on the Euphrates might be reached.

There was another road from the Plain of Esdraelon to Egypt. It traversed the hill country, passing by Samaria, Shechem, Beth-el, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Hebron, and Beersheba. At this point the road branched, and there was a choice of routes; the highway along the seacoast might be gained by diverging to the w., or the journey might be continued by way of Rehoboth and 'Ain Muweileh, and thence across the desert to Egypt. A route from Beth-shean to Edom, which was also used by travelers to Jerusalem, passed down the Jordan Valley to Jericho, where persons going to Jerusalem took the steep road up the mountains to the capital. From Jericho the road continued along the w. shore of the Dead Sea to En-gedi, where it was joined by a road from Jerusalem and Bethlehem, and thence continued to Edom and Elath at the head of the Red Sea, where it joined the caravan routes from Egypt and Gaza to s. Arabia.

East of the Jordan a caravan route led from Damascus along the edge of the desert s. to Arabia; see DECAPOLIS. It was joined by roads running from Beth-shean across Gilead; by a road from Shechem down Wadi Fār'ah to the ford of the Jordan below the mouth of the Jabbok, and thence across Gilead to Rabbath Ammon; and by another from the ford at Jericho by way of Heshbon. West of the Jordan Galilee was crossed by a road running almost due e. from Acre, which joined the road to Damascus near the point where it crossed the Jordan, midway between the waters of Merom and the Sea of Galilee. The high tableland occupied by the tribes of Benjamin and Judah was not easy of access from the Maritime Plain. A way, however, led from the plain of Sharon and the Nahr el-'Aujah at Ras el-'Ain (Antipatris) s.e. into the hill country, and joined the road from Samaria to Jerusalem at a point 2 miles s.w. of Beth-el. From the seaport of Joppa a road led to Jerusalem by the valley of Ajalon and Beth-horon. From Ashdod the capital was most readily reached by Wadi es-Sārār and Beth-shemesh; but a route to Jerusalem and also to Bethlehem was afforded by Wadi es-Sanṭ past Socoh.

Access to the hill country in the vicinity of Hebron was had through Wadi el-'Afranġ by Beit Jibrin, and by Wadi el-Hasi by Tell el-Hasi.

6. The meteorology of Palestine. The great contrasts in physical features have given Palestine a remarkable range of climate, from the perpetual snow on Mount Hermon to the tropical heat of the Jordan Valley at Jericho and En-gedi. The average temperature at Jerusalem in January, which is the coldest month, is about 49.4° F., and the greatest cold 28°. In August the average is 79.3°, and the greatest heat is 92° in the shade. At Jericho the temperature in July is over 100° F., and it rises as high as 118° in August. See also YEAR.

7. The botany of Palestine. In consequence of the great diversity of surface and climate, the flora is extensive and plants of many latitudes flourish. Tristram showed that of 3,002 flowering plants and ferns known to exist in Palestine, a large number for so small a country, 2,563 are Palaearctic, and most of them belong to its Mediterranean section; 161 are Ethiopian, 27 Indian, and 251 peculiar. In the region which lies between the Taurus Mountains and the s. point of the peninsula of Sinai, and between the Mediterranean Sea and the Syrian desert, Dr. Post has found 850 genera and about 3,500 species.

8. The zoology of Palestine. The distribution of the several species of animals essentially agrees with that of the Palestinian plants. Of 113 mammalia known to occur in Palestine, Tristram found 55 to belong to the Palaearctic region, the same to which our European species belong; 34 were Ethiopian, 16 Indian, and 13 peculiar to the land. The same species sometimes belongs to 2 regions. Of 348 species of birds, 271 were Palaearctic, 40 Ethiopian, 7 Indian, and 30 peculiar. Of the 91 reptiles and amphibians, 49 were Palaearctic, 27 Ethiopian, 4 Indian, and 11 peculiar. Of 43 fresh-water fishes, 8 were Palaearctic, 2 Ethiopian, 7 Indian, and 26 peculiar. In the case of both plants and animals, the African and Indian types come chiefly from the low-lying region around the Dead Sea, and to a less extent from the low valley of the Jordan.

9. The ethnology of Palestine. The aboriginal inhabitants of Palestine were a tall, stalwart race, consisting of Anakim (Josh. 11:21, 22), Rephaim (Gen. 14:5), Emim, Zamzumim, and Horites (Deut. 2:10-23). Traces of the primitive population continued to exist as late as the time of the monarchy (II Sam. 21:16-22). When Abraham arrived, the country was occupied chiefly by the Amorites and other smaller tribes of Canaanites, but Philistines (an autochthonous group, not to be identified with those from Caphtor) and Phoenicians were settled on the seacoast and Hittites dwelt on the n. border and at Hebron. The Philistines came from the w., probably from Crete, about the 12th century B.C. The Canaanites, including the Phoenicians, spoke a Semitic language. These various peoples were conquered, but not utterly exterminated, by the Hebrews under the leadership of Moses and Joshua. The occasional introduction of Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites by conquest and immigration did not bring a new strain into the blood, for these peoples were Semitic and like the Hebrews descended from Abraham. The conquest of Aramaean tribes, so far as it resulted in adding foreigners to the commonwealth of Israel, added Semites. After the fall of Samaria, the Assyrians deported the n. and e. tribes of the Israelites and introduced colonists from Hamath, Babylonia, and Elam (II Kings 17:24; Ezra 4:9). They were largely Semites and Aryans. A large immigration of Greeks followed in the wake of the conquest of Alexander the Great, colonized Ptolemais, built the Greek towns of the Decap-olis, and introduced the Greek language, customs, and culture. Later, Roman officials and a Roman army of occupation were in the country, and ultimately Roman colonists came. Between A.D. 633 and 640 the country was subjugated by the Moslems. The decisive battle was fought at the Yarmūk (636); Jerusalem fell in 638. See JERUSALEM, III. 3. Since 1920 Palestine has been governed by Great Britain under a mandate from the League of Nations (approved July 24, 1922).

10. The history of Palestine. The early history of Palestine, before the arrival of Abraham, is involved in obscurity. The succession of races who inhabited the country may be gathered from the Hebrew records, as already pointed out. The kings of Babylonia early began their invasions of the w., and the campaign of Chedorlaomer in e. Palestine in the time of Abraham is described in Gen., ch. 14. The Babylonians impressed their culture, including the cuneiform script and their language as a medium of international communication, upon the inhabitants. After the expulsion of the Hyksos from the country of the Nile, the great Pharaohs of Dyn. XVIII extended their sway far into Asia. Thutmose (Thothmes) III conquered Canaan and exacted tribute from the nations dwelling as far as the Euphrates. During the reigns of Amenhotep (Amenophis) III and IV, who succeeded him after an interval, Canaan was garrisoned by Egyptian troops and governed by Egyptian officials. But in the latter reign the grasp of Egypt was evidently weakening. The Hittites were threatening the n. frontier, lawlessness prevailed in various parts of the land, travel was insecure, individual states were in a foment of discontent or in rebellion, and various tribes were extending their territory at the expense of Egypt. Under the succeeding dynasty Sethi I passed through Palestine and waged war with the Hittites on the Orontes; Ramesses II invaded Palestine, but in 1272 B.C. he made a treaty with the Hittites on terms of equality. There were revolts at the death of Ramesses II, but Merneptah once more pacified the country. For the Exodus, see EGYPT, III. 8. Under the leadership of Moses, the Israelites conquered the region e. of the Jordan; and in the following year, under Joshua, they crossed the river, and after repeated campaigns took possession of Canaan. From this time onward, until the fall of Jerusalem in the 1st century of the Christian era, the history of Palestine is largely the history of the Hebrew people. See HISTORY.

11. The topography of Palestine. As nearly as can be estimated, 622 towns w. of the Jordan are mentioned in the Bible and the Apocrypha. Of special importance for locating Palestinian places are the names of places recorded in the lists of Thutmose III, Sethi I, Ramesses II, and Sheshonk (Shishak) I at Karnak. They throw light on the topography of Palestine and The Book of Joshua. References to towns of Palestine in the time of Amenhotep (Amenophis) III and IV occur in the Tell el-Amarna letters. Later references are found in contemporary records of Assyria, especially in documents which relate to campaigns conducted in Palestine. Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea in the 1st half of the 4th century of the Christian era, wrote a tract concerning the names of places in the Scriptures. It was translated and enlarged by Jerome, resident at Bethlehem a century later. The work is commonly known as the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome. The notices regarding the situation of ancient places in Palestine, according to the information possessed by the learned authors, are often valuable, sometimes absurd.

The information gathered by Reland and published by him in 1714, and the travels of Seetzen and Burckhardt, especially e. of the Jordan, in the beginning of the 19th century, prepared the way for the systematic, scientific investigation conducted by Dr. Robinson. He visited Palestine in 1838, accompanied by a former pupil of his, Rev. Eli Smith, American missionary at Beirut, who greatly aided the inquiry by his knowledge of Arabic. They found by asking the natives what certain ruins or yet inhabited villages were called, that they often bore the old Hebrew names in modified form in modern Arabic. Their discoveries in the topography of Palestine were very important, and were given to the world by Prof. Robinson in 1841 in 3 octavo volumes. Returning from America, Dr. Robinson resumed his researches in Palestine in 1852, accompanied again by Rev. Eli Smith and others. He made fresh discoveries, embodied in his Later Biblical Researches, 1856. Dr. Robinson brought to bear on his inquiry not merely keen observation and sound judgment, but great learning; and many of his conclusions have been accepted. In 1848 Lieut. William F. Lynch was commander of the United States expedition to explore the Jordan River and the Dead Sea.

On June 22, 1865, a society, named The Palestine Exploration Fund, was formed in England to prosecute in a scientific spirit all branches of inquiry regarding the Holy Land. Since then it has conducted an ordnance survey of a great part of Palestine, and constructed a superb map of the country in 26 sheets. This result is a permanent and splendid achievement. The society has also carried on various excavations.

In 1895 Prof. Thayer in his presidential address to the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis made an appeal for the establishment of an American School of Oriental Study and Research in Palestine. Within 5 years Dr. Charles C. Torrey, of Yale, went forth as the 1st director. In 1921 a similar school was founded at Baghdad. The 2 institutions are now incorporated under the name of the American Schools of Oriental Research. In its 1st year the Jerusalem school excavated some Phoenician tombs at Sidon, and since that time it has excavated various places in Palestine. The American Schools of Oriental Research have issued regularly a series of scholarly publications: The Annual, The Bulletin, and The Biblical Archaeologist.

Pal'tu (pāl'û), in A.V. once Phal'tu (Gen. 46:9) [distinguished]. A son of Reuben, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:9; Ex. 6:14; Num. 26:5).

Palm. A tree, called in Heb. tāmār and tomer, and in Gr. phoinix. It is a tall tree (S. of Sol. 7:7, 8), straight and upright (Jer. 10:5). It is a fruit tree (Joel 1:12), and sufficiently ornamental to have been carved in various parts of Solomon's Temple and other sanctuaries (I Kings 6:29, 32, 35; Herod. ii. 169). Its great leaves were used as tokens of victory and peace (I Macc. 13:51; II Macc. 10:7; John 12:13; Rev. 7:9; imitated in II Esdras 2:43-47). These leaves are often popularly called branches; and this designation is employed in the Eng. versions (Lev. 23:40; Neh. 8:15; John 12:13), but is not botanically correct. Scarcely any palms have branches at all; and the date palm, the species grown in parts of Palestine, is not one of the few exceptions to the rule. The leaves are large and feathery, from 4 to 6 feet in length; they are quite accessible, as there are generally a number of young plants around the foot of the parent stem. Palm trees flourished on the banks of the Nile. They grew at Elilim, in the wilderness near the Red Sea (Ex. 15:27), and in Edom (Virgil Georg. iii.

12). They grew in various parts of Judea, as in the valley of the Jordan, at Jericho, and En-gedi, and on the coast of the Sea of Galilee (Gen. 14:7, in the proper name; Deut. 34:3; Eccus. 24:14; Jos. Antiq. ix. 1, 2; War i. 6, 6; iii. 10, 8); in the s. of Judah (Josh. 15:31, 49, in the names Sansannah and Kiriath-sannah, q.v.; in Mount Ephraim near Beth-el (Judg. 4:5; 20:33), near Jerusalem (Neh. 8:15; John 12:13). They grew also in the desert e. of Damascus, at the town named from them, Tadmor, Tamar, and Palmyra. They flourished also in the lower valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates (Herod. i. 193). The tree was regarded by the Greeks and Romans as peculiarly characteristic of Palestine and the neighboring regions. Phoenicia took its name in Greek from the date palm; and the coin struck at Rome to commemorate the capture of Jerusalem represented a woman, emblem of the country, sitting disconsolate under a date palm. The tree which was once so common has almost disappeared from Palestine, except in the Maritime Plain of Philistia and in the neighborhood of Beirut, but it is being cultivated anew near Jericho.

The palm tree in Scripture almost always means the date palm (Phoenix dactylifera), which grows about 60 or 80 feet high, having a single upright stem of uniform thickness through its entire length and marked by the scars of fallen leaves. The stem terminates above in a circle of great feathery leaves, perennially green. It is believed to attain a great age, from 100 to 200 years. The domestic uses of the palm are numerous. The leaves are employed for covering the roofs and sides of houses, for fences, mats, and baskets. When the tender part of the spathe is pierced, a sweet juice exudes, from which sugar is obtained by evaporation, and a strong drink called arrack by fermentation or distillation (Jos. War iv. 8, 3; Herod. i. 193). The fruit, which it produces annually in numerous clusters and great abundance, constitutes its chief value, being largely used as an article of food. Even the stony seeds are ground, and yield nourishment to the camel of the desert.

Pal'm'er Worm. The rendering of Heb. gāzām, devourer, an insect which devoured vines, fig trees, olive trees, and the produce of the gardens and fields generally (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Amos 4:9). Probably a kind of locust, or a locust in a certain stage of its growth (Joel 1:4, R.V. marg.). When the A.V. was made, palmer worm denoted a sort of hairy caterpillar which has no fixed abode, but wanders like a palmer or pilgrim from place to place.

Pal'sy. A partial or total loss of sensibility, voluntary motion, or both, in 1 or more parts of the body (Mark 2:3, 9-12; Acts 9:33-35). It is produced by disease of the brain, the spinal cord, or particular nerves. Under this term the ancients included a variety of diseases affecting the muscles.

Pal'ti (pāl'ti, in A.V. once Phal'ti (I Sam. 25:44) [abbreviation of Pelatiah]. 1. The representative spy from the tribe of Benjamin (Num. 13:9).

2. The man to whom Saul married Michal, David's wife, and from whom she was later wrested away and restored to David (I Sam. 25:44; II Sam. 3:15, where the unabbreviated form is used).

Pal'ti-el (pāl'ti-ēl), in A.V. once Phal'ti-el (II Sam. 3:15) [God has delivered]. 1. Prince of the tribe of Issachar and a contemporary of Moses (Num. 34:26).

2. The same as Palti 2 (II Sam. 3:15).

Pal'tite (pāl'tit). Probably one from Beth-pelet, a town in the extreme s. of Judah. To judge, however, from II Sam. 23:26 compared with I Chron. 27:10, the Palmites belonged to Ephraim. See PELONITE.

Pamphyl'ia (pām-fil'i-ā). A stretch of coast land in Asia Minor. It was bounded on the n. by Pisidia; on the s. by a gulf of the Mediterranean, called the sea of Pamphylia, across which Paul sailed (Acts 27:5); on the e. by Cilicia; and on the w. by Lycia. Pamphylia contained Jewish communities (ch. 2:10). Its towns, Perga and Attalia, were visited by Paul on his First Missionary Journey (chs. 13:13; 14:24, 25; 15:38).

Pan'nag. A product of Palestine which the Tyrians purchased (Ezek. 27:17). The R.V., following the Jewish Targum, suggests that perhaps it was a kind of confection. In Akkadian pannigu is a kind of cake.

Pa'per. See PAPHYRUS.

Pa'per Reed. Papyrus; the rendering in the A.V. of Heb. 'ārāh, bare place (Isa. 19:7); see PAPHYRUS. R.V. renders by "meadow."

Pa'phos (pā'fōs). A town (modern Kuklia) at the s.w. extremity of Cyprus, near Cape Zephyrion. It was called Old Paphos to distinguish it from the newer seaport town about 10 miles to the n.w. New Paphos was the capital of the Roman province of Cyprus, and the residence of the proconsul. In its vicinity was a celebrated temple of the Cyprian Aphrodite (Homer Odyssey viii. 362). The town was visited by Paul (Acts 13:6-13). The modern name of New Paphos is Baffo.

Pap'y'rus [Lat. from Gr., probably from Egypt. p'pr-], that of the Pharaoh; meaning perhaps, the royal plant, or rather referring to the royal manufacture of writing material from the papyrus plant]. The rendering of Heb. gōme'; a plant which grows in mire (Job 8:11, R.V. marg.; in Isa. 35:7 rendered rush), and of which the tiny ark of Moses (Ex. 2:3, R.V. marg.; in text, bulrushes) and also larger boats (Isa. 18:2, R.V.) were made. The plant referred to is the paper reed (Papyrus antiquorum). But the papyrus is not a grass, as the word reed might suggest; nor is it a rush. It is a giant sedge, with a triangular stock 8 or 10 feet high, terminating in a tuft of flowers. It grows in the plain of Sharon, near the Sea of Galilee, and in the waters of the Huleh, commonly thought of as Merom; and it formerly flourished on the Nile, though now almost extinct upon that river. Its use was widespread (II Esdras 15:2; III Macc. 4:20). The Egyptians made shoes, baskets, boats, and other articles of it; and used sheets, formed of strips of the pith, as writing paper. On such material, called in Gr. chartēs, the Apostle John wrote his 2d Epistle (II John 12).

Of special importance for the Biblical student is the use of papyrus as writing material, which goes back in Egypt as far as the 3d millennium B.C., if not earlier. The pith of the papyrus plant was cut into thin strips, which were laid down in layers at right angles to one another so that the fibres were horizontal on one side and vertical on the other. In the finished product the side on which the fibres are horizontal is called the recto; the other, the verso. The 2 layers were fastened together by pressure and glue. In this way sheets were formed which could be attached to each other so as to form a roll. Some rolls are 15 inches high, but for literary work those of 10 inches were generally used. Some Egyptian liturgical rolls have a length of 50 feet and more, while one is known of 133 feet. From the early part of the 2d century the Christians began to use papyrus in the codex form (the ancestor of the modern book), with leaves arrayed in quires or gatherings. To produce these a sheet of papyrus was taken and folded in the middle.

To the dry climate and sands of Egypt we owe the preservation of many papyri. The Nash papyrus, now at Cambridge University, is a small Hebrew fragment of the 2d century B.C. Of the same century are the small Greek fragments of Deuteronomy in the John Rylands Library. Reputed sayings (logia) of our Lord recorded on papyri were found at Oxyrhynchus. A papyrus in the John Rylands Library, the oldest extant MS. of any part of the N.T., contains John 18:31-33, 37, 38 and can be confidently assigned to the 1st half of the 2d century. See JOHN, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. The Freer Greek MS. at Washington contains portions of the Minor Prophets. The Chester Beatty papyri include portions of the Greek O.T. and N.T. The John H. Scheide Biblical papyri (Ezek., chs. 19:12 to 29:23, with some losses, in Greek), dating from the late 2d or early 3d century A.D., are now deposited at Princeton University; they have been edited and published by A. C. Johnson, H. S. Gehman, and E. H. Kase. The Elephantine papyri are Aramaic documents of various kinds, mostly of the 5th century B.C., of a Jewish garrison colony at Elephantine and Syene, where it was stationed from the 6th century to c. 400 B.C. for defending the S. frontier of Egypt.

Par'able. A method of speech in which moral or religious truth is illustrated from the analogy of common experience. The comparison may be expressed, as by the word like, or be implied. The limits between the parable and simile and metaphor are not well defined. Often there is scarcely any difference, except that the simile and metaphor are short and the parable comparatively long. "Ye are the light of the world" is a metaphor; "as a lamb before his shearer is dumb" is a simile; but "the kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till it was all leavened," is a parable (Matt. 13:33). The parable has certain advantages. One is, that this means of conveying truth makes it adhere to the memory much more than a plain didactic statement would do. For instance, no didactic statement as to the willingness of our Lord to receive penitent sinners would have had an effect at all equal to that produced by the parable of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:11-32). A 2d advantage in a parable is that when it is needful for a prophet or a preacher to censure a powerful personage, who will not allow himself to be directly found fault with, it is possible by a skillfully framed parable to make him not merely listen patiently, but condemn himself before he discovers that it is himself he is condemning. This was done with much skill by the Prophet Nathan when he went to reprove David for his great sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite.

The following are the chief parables in the O.T.: the Trees Anointing a King (Judg. 9:8-20), the Ewe Lamb (II Sam. 12:1-14), the Widow, one of whose 2 sons slew the other (II Sam. 14:4-20), the Soldier, who let his captive escape (I Kings 20:35-42), the Thistle, which asked for the cedar's daughter as a wife for his son (II Kings 14:9-11), the Vineyard (Isa. 5:1-7), the Two Eagles and a Vine (Ezek. 17:1-10), the Lion's Whelps (Ezek. 19:1-9), Oholah and Oholibah (Ezek. 23:1-49), the Boiling Pot (Ezek. 24:1-14).

An important part of our Lord's teaching was by means of parables; and when Scripture parables are spoken of, generally those of Jesus are meant. Christ used the parabolic form of teaching at every period of his public ministry (Mark 3:23; Luke 6:39; 7:40-50), but there came a time when a distinct change took place and he gave a larger place to parables in his public instruction (Matt. 13:3; Mark 4:2). Two reasons are assigned why he adopted this method of teaching to such an extent. One given by Matthew is that it was prophesied (Matt. 13:34, 35; cf. Ps. 49:4; 78:2, 3). The other, emanating from our Lord, explains the former. He used parables because it was not given unto his auditors to know the mysteries of the Kingdom of heaven, since seeing they saw not and hearing they did not understand (Matt. 13:10-16). This statement of Jesus has been interpreted to mean that he clothed the truths of the Kingdom in images in order to make them more intelligible to his hearers and to impress them indelibly on their memory. But this was true of a certain class of hearers only and in many cases, even in respect to them, only after the parable had been explained. Jesus rather meant that his auditors generally were unprepared to hear and heartily believe the spiritual truths of the Kingdom; and while the time had come to teach these doctrines to his followers who were to carry on his work after his departure (Mark 4:33, 34), the truth was henceforth hidden from those who had heard without repentance, was cautiously uttered in the hearing of obdurate enemies who were watching to seize upon his words and employ them against him, and was veiled from the fickle multitude who would refuse to listen to his words if they perceived the full import of them (Mark 4:11, 12).

E.S.G.

In interpreting the parables, rigid inquiry should be made into the circumstances under which each was delivered at first, and the doctrine or argument it was intended primarily to convey. This done, it is at once seen that the teaching of the parable is of universal application, suited for all analogous circumstances and for all succeeding time.

Par'a-clete (pär'-ä-klēt) [Gr. paraklētos, counsel for defense, advocate, intercessor]. The word occurs in R.V. in the marg. of John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7, where helper or advocate is given as the English equivalent. In the text of these passages the translation is comforter, but in I John 2:1 it is advocate. It is applied to:

1. The Lord Jesus Christ. He was the advocate, by implication in John 14:16, who guided, counseled, and strengthened the disciples while he was present with them, and he is now the Christian's advocate with the Father, and pleads the believer's cause with God (I John 2:1) as he did while on earth (Luke 22:31, 32; John, ch. 17).

2. The Holy Spirit, who is Christ's advocate with the believer, glorifying Christ and declaring him (John 15:26; 16:14), vindicating him from man's unworthy thoughts, and exhibiting him as man's great need; and he is the Spirit of truth, who teaches the believer and guides him into the truth (chs. 15:26; 16:13, 14), convicting of sin, righteousness, and judgment (v. 8), who teaches to pray and makes intercession with groanings that cannot be uttered (Rom. 8:26, 27).

Par'a-dise (pär'-ä-dīs) [Lat. paradisus, Gr. paradeisos (park, pleasure ground), from Avestan paii-daēza (enclosure)]. A pleasure ground, orchard, or park, in Heb. pardēs (Eccl. 2:5; S. of Sol. 4:13, R.V. marg.; in Neh. 2:8 rendered forest). Solomon's gardens at Etham and the hanging gardens at Babylon are called paradises in the Gr. text of Josephus (Antiq. viii. 7, 3; Apion i. 20), and the garden of Eden is called a paradise in Eden in the LXX (Gen. 2:8).

Paradise was the region of bliss which man had lost, and it naturally came to be a designation for the place of the righteous dead. The later Jews distinguished between a supernal and an infernal paradise, the former being a part of heaven, the latter a division of Hades assigned to the souls of the just.

In the N.T. paradise means heaven in 2 instances (II Cor. 12:4; cf. v. 2; Rev. 2:7; cf. 22:2); see HEAVEN. Accordingly it naturally denotes heaven in the remaining instance (Luke 23:43).

Pa'rah (pā'rā) [heifer, young cow]. A village of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23), identified with the ruins Fārah in Wādī Fārah, 5½ miles n.e. of Jerusalem.

Pa'ran (pā'rān). A wilderness between Mount Sinai, or more exactly between Hazeroth, several days' march from Sinai, and Canaan (Num. 10:12; 12:16). It was on the s. of Judah (I Sam. 25:1-5). Kadesh was situated in it (Num. 13:26), and apparently also Elath on the Red Sea (Gen. 14:6; see EL-PARAN). It lay e. of the wildernesses of Beersheba and Shur (Gen. 21:14, 21; cf. chs. 25:9, 12-18; 28:9). It included the wilderness of Zin, or insensibly merged itself in it without a sharply defined boundary (cf. Num. 13:26 with ch. 20:1). These data indicate the plateau or mountain land (Deut. 33:2; Hab. 3:3), lying s. of Canaan, and bounded on the other sides by the wilderness of Shur, the curved range of mountains known as Jebel et-Tih, and the Arabah. It is the wilderness where the Israelites wandered 38 years. Most of it is from 2,000 to 2,500 feet above sea level. There is a wadi, or valley, in the Sinaitic Peninsula, called Wādī Feiran, which looks very much like Paran altered. Niebuhr thought that they might be identified; but it is so difficult to harmonize the Scripture location of the place with this view that Robinson, Stanley, and most inquirers decline to accept the identification. Wādī Feiran is between Mount Sinai and the Red Sea. Paran is not reached till after the departure from Sinai in the opposite direction.

Par'bar (pār'bār) [probably, colonnade]. A precinct on the w. side of the outer court of the Temple (I Chron. 26:18). It contained chambers for officials and stalls for cattle (II Kings 23:11, where the pl. is rendered "suburbs" and "precincts").

Parched Corn. Roasted grain used as food (Lev. 23:14; Ruth 2:14; I Sam. 17:17). Thomson describes the method of preparing it. A number of the best ears of grain, not too ripe, are plucked, with the stalks attached. They are tied in small parcels and a blazing fire of dry grass and thorn bushes is kindled under them, which burns off the chaff and roasts the grain.

Parch'ment. The skin of sheep or goats prepared for use as a writing material or for other purposes. The skin is first soaked in lime to remove the hair, and is then shaved, washed, dried, stretched, and smoothed. Herodotus relates that the ancient Ionians used the skins of goats and sheep because of the scarcity of papyrus (Herod. v. 58). In Herodotus' own time papyrus was the common writing material. According to tradition parchment was 1st obtained at Pergamum; and when Ptolemy forbade the export of papyrus, Eumenes II, king of Pergamum (197-160/159 b.c.), adopted parchment for the books of his great library, and such skins became known as chartae pergamenae, whence the word parchment is derived. Some documents on vellum or parchment, however, were found in 1923 at Dura on the Euphrates, which bear dates equivalent to 196-195 and 190-189 B.C.; thus we know that the material was also in use at a place far distant from Pergamum. In the time of Josephus and earlier, parchment was used by the Jews for the MSS. of their sacred writings (Jos. Antiq. xii. 2, 11); and it was a provision of the Talmud that the Law should be written on the skins of clean animals, tame or wild, and even of clean birds. Papyrus was a common writing material (II John 12, paper), but Paul refers to parchments of his, about which he is especially solicitous (II Tim. 4:13).

Par'ents. The Fifth Commandment inculcates upon children the duty of reverencing their parents and attaches a promise to its fulfillment (Ex. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; Eph. 6:1, 2). Upon the parents rests the obligation of bringing up the children in the fear of the Lord, and not provoking them to wrath (Gen. 18:19; Deut. 6:7; Eph. 6:4). According to the Mosaic Law, a son that smote father or mother, or cursed them, was punished with death (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 27:16); and as an extreme measure, parents were enjoined to bring a stubborn and rebellious son before the elders for trial and execution (Deut. 21:18-21). The Mosaic Law thus regulated the power of parents. According to Roman law, as set forth in the 12 tables, the life and liberty of children were in the father's hands. In Hebrew law the right of life and death did not rest with the parents, but was vested in the judicial body. Custom permitted an impoverished parent to sell a daughter to be a maidservant, but the Mosaic Law carefully guarded her rights (Ex. 21:7-11). Israelitish custom further permitted a creditor to seize a bankrupt debtor and enslave his wife and children (II Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5; Isa. 50:1; Matt. 18:25); and in cases of grave sin the entire family was involved in the extermination of the offender (Josh. 7:24).

Par'lor. Eglon's summer parlor was an upper chamber exposed to the cool breezes (Judg. 3:20, cf. A.V. and R.V.). See HOUSE.

Par'mash'ta (pār-māsh'tā) [Old Pers., the very first]. A son of Haman (Esth. 9:9).

Par'me-nas (pār-mē-nās) [Gr., probably, steadfast]. One of the 7 men elected to look after the Greek-speaking widows and, apparently, the poor and financial affairs generally in the Apostolic Church (Acts 6:5).

Par'nach (pār'nāk). A Zebulunite (Num. 34:25).

Pa'rosh (pār'rōsh), in A.V. once Pha'rosh (Ezra 8:3) [a flea]. Founder of a family, members of which returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:3; 8:3). One of the clan was called Pedaiah (Neh. 3:25). Other members of it married foreign wives, whom Ezra induced them to put away (Ezra 10:25).

Par'shan-da'tha (pār'shān-dā'thā) [Old Pers., given to questions, inquisitive]. A son of Haman (Esth. 9:7).

Par'thi'ans (pār'thī-ānz). A people who, when first heard of, occupied a region nearly corresponding to the modern Persian province of Khorasan, a considerable distance s.e. of the Caspian Sea. The length of Parthia proper was about 300 miles, its breadth from 100 to 120, its area about 33,000 square miles, or slightly more than that of Scotland and nearly that of Indiana. The first mention of the Parthians is in the inscriptions of Darius Hystaspis. They revolted against the Persians, 521 B.C., but were soon subdued again. From the Persians they passed to Alexander the Great, and then to his e. successors, the Seleucidae. About 255 B.C. Bactria successfully revolted against Seleucid domination, and Parthia, under Arsaces I, immediately followed the example. His successors are generally known as the Arsacidae; the year 247 B.C. marks the era of Parthia, the year of its independence. Mithridates I, who reigned from c. 174 to c. 138 B.C., raised the kingdom founded by Arsaces into an empire, stretching 1,500 miles from e. to w., with a varying breadth from n. to s. of 100, 300, or 400 miles. It extended from the Caspian Sea to the Persian Gulf. The w. boundary was the Euphrates. The chief city was Ctesiphon on the Tigris, opposite Seleucia. After ridding themselves of the Macedonian-Greek domination, the Parthians came into frequent collision with the Romans, one standing bone of contention between them being the possession of Armenia. From 64 B.C. to A.D. 226 they set limits to the Roman Empire in the East. In 40-37 B.C. their armies overran Asia Minor and Syria, took and plundered Jerusalem, and placed Antigonus, the last of the Hasmonaeans, on the throne (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 13, 3; War i. 13, 1). Jews from Parthia were present at Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:9), and may have carried the gospel to Parthia when they returned home. After wielding power for nearly 500 years, the Parthians became enervated by luxury, and the Persians, under the leadership of Ardashir, family of Sassan, terminated the Parthian dominion, substituting the 2d Persian or Sassanian empire in its stead (A.D. 226). See PERSIA.

Partridge. A wild bird, called in Heb. kôrē', the crier or caller, in Gr. perdiā, which was hunted on the mountains of Palestine (I Sam. 26:20). The caged partridge was used as a decoy bird (Ecclus. 11:30). Jeremiah compares the amasser of ill-gotten wealth to the partridge which, according to the belief of the Israelites of his time, gathers young which it has not brought forth, or sits on eggs which it has not laid (Jer. 17:11, R.V. text and marg.). Two species are found in Palestine, the desert or Hey's sand partridge (Am-moperdiā heyi), which is the only species at

Partridge

En-gedi, in the wilderness where David was when he compared himself to a hunted partridge; and the chukar partridge (Caccabis chukar), which is abundant in all the hilly parts of Palestine. It has richly barred feathers on the flanks, deep red legs and bill, and deep black gorget. It is a large and fine bird, a variety of the Greek partridge (Caccabis saxatilis), but larger, and it exceeds the chukar partridge of India in size.

Pa·ru'ah (pā-rōō'ā) [sprouting, blooming]. The father of Solomon's purveyor in Issachar (I Kings 4:17).

Par·va'im (pār-vā'im). The place from which came gold for the ornamentation of Solomon's Temple (II Chron. 3:6). Glaser identified it with Sāk el-Farwain near Jebel Shammar in e. Arabia.

Pa'sach (pā'sāk) [perhaps Aram., divider]. An Ascherite, of the family of Beriah (I Chron. 7:33).

Pas·dam'mim (pās'dām'im). See EPHES-DAMMIM.

Pa'se'ah (pā-sē'ā), in A.V. once Pha·se'ah (Neh. 7:51) [lame, halting]. 1. A man of Judah, descended from Chelub (I Chron. 4:12).

2. The father of a certain Jehoiada, who repaired the old gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:6). He was the founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51).

Pash'hur (pāsh'hēr), in A.V. Pash'ur. (pāsh'ēr) [perhaps Egypt., portion of Horus]. 1. Son of Malchijah, and one of several officials who had influence with King Zedekiah and bitterly opposed the Prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 21:1; 38:1, 4; cf. ch. 21:9 with ch. 38:2). It is natural to suppose that his father is the Malchijah mentioned in ch. 38:6, a royal prince into whose dungeon the prophet was cast. His identity with the priest Pashhur, the son of Malchijah (I Chron. 9:12) is doubtful; especially since to his companion, but not to him, is given the priestly title (Jer. 21:1).

2. A son of Immer, a priest. He put Jeremiah in the stocks on account of his discouraging predictions (Jer. 20:1-6).

3. The father of an opponent of Jeremiah named Gedaliah (Jer. 38:1).

4. The founder of a priestly family, members of which returned from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 2:38; Neh. 7:41, and perhaps I Chron. 9:12). Some of his descendants married foreign wives, whom Ezra induced them to put away (Ezra 10:22).

5. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who, with others, sealed the covenant, made in the days of Nehemiah, by which it was agreed to forbid the intermarriage of their children with foreigners and to keep the Law of God (Neh. 10:3).

Pas'sa-ges, The. See ABARIM.

Pas'sion [Lat., passio, suffering]. The expression, "After his passion" (Acts 1:3), is a paraphrase of the Gr., "After he had suffered"; it is based on the Vulgate post passionem suam, and in Eng. goes back to Wycliffe. In this sense the term denotes the sufferings of Christ upon the cross, but more specifically it is applied to his sufferings subsequent to the Last Supper. Sometimes it is distinguished from those of the crucifixion, as in the Litany in The Book of Common Prayer; "By thy Cross and Passion." More properly the Passion of Christ includes his sufferings beginning with his agony in the Garden of Gethsemane and ending with his death upon the cross.

Pass'o'ver (pās'ō'vēr) [Heb. pesah from pāsah (to pass over, in sense of sparing); cf. Ex. 12:13, 23, 27; Isa. 31:5]. 1. The 1st of the 3 annual festivals at which all the men were required to appear at the sanctuary (Ex. 12:43; Deut. 16:1), known also as the feast of unleavened bread (Ex. 23:15; Deut. 16:16). It was instituted in Egypt to commemorate the culminating event in the redemption of the Israelites (Ex. 12:1, 14, 42; 23:15; Deut. 16:1, 3). That night was to be much observed unto the Lord, when he smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, but passed over the houses of the Israelites where the blood had been sprinkled and the inmates were standing, staff in hand, awaiting the deliverance promised by the Lord. The festival began on the 14th of Abib at evening, that is, in the beginning of the 15th day, with the sacrificial meal (Lev. 23:5 seq.). A lamb or kid was slain between the evenings, that is, toward sunset (Ex. 12:6; Deut. 16:6; cf. between the 9th and 11th hours, Jos. War vi. 9, 3). It was roasted whole, and was eaten with unleavened bread and bitter herbs (Ex. 12:8). The shed blood denoted expiation, the bitter herbs symbolized the bitterness of Egyptian bondage, the unleavened bread was an emblem of purity (cf. Lev. 2:11; I Cor. 5:7, 8). The Israelites pleading the blood, mindful of the afflictions from which they awaited deliverance, and putting away wickedness, were the people of the Lord in holy, glad communion before him. The supper was partaken of by the members of every household. If the family was small, neighbors joined until the company was large enough to consume the entire lamb (Ex. 12:4). The head of the household recited the history of the redemption.

At the first institution the participants stood; in later times they reclined. Other minor features were introduced: 4 successive cups of wine mixed with water, to which there is no reference in the Law; singing of Psalms 113 to 118 (cf. Isa. 30:29; Ps. 42:4); a dish of fruits reduced with vinegar to the consistency of lime as a reminder of the mortar used during the Egyptian bondage. The paschal supper was the introductory ceremony and chief feature of the festival, which lasted until the 21st day of the month (Ex. 12:18; Lev. 23:5, 6; Deut. 16:6, 7). That the event was to be commemorated by a festival of 7 days' duration (Ex. 12:14-20) was not communicated to the people until the day of the flight (ch. 13:3-10). They were directed regarding 1 evening only (ch. 12:21-23), and informed that the service was to be kept perpetually (vs. 24, 25). The attendance of the pilgrims was required at the supper only. They were at liberty to depart on the morrow (Deut. 16:7).

The 1st day, that is the 15th, was kept as a Sabbath and likewise the 7th; no work was done and there was a holy convocation (Ex. 12:16; Lev. 23:7; Num. 28:18, 25, of which only the last is emphasized in Ex. 13:6; Deut. 16:8). On the morrow after the Sabbath, that is, on the 2d day of the festival, a sheaf of the first-ripe barley was waved by the priest before the Lord to consecrate the opening harvest (Lev. 23:10-14; cf. Josh. 5:10-12, R.V.; LXX of Lev. 23:7, 11; Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 5); see WEEKS, FEAST OF. This was an incidental feature: the act consecrated the opening harvest, but it held a subordinate place; the 2d day, when it was performed, was not observed as a Sabbath; and altogether the relation of the passover to the agricultural year was less marked than in the festivals of weeks and tabernacles. During the passover day by day continually, in addition to the regular sacrifices of the sanctuary, 2 bullocks, 1 ram, and 7 lambs were offered as a burnt offering, and a he-goat as a sin offering (Lev. 23:8; Num. 28:19-23). During the 7 days also unleavened bread was eaten. The people had no leaven in their houses the night of the passover, and consequently the dough that they seized in their hurried flight was unleavened (Ex. 12:8, 34, 39). It was baked thus. Henceforth unleavened bread was associated in their minds, not only with the thought of sincerity and truth, which was the essential idea, but also with that of the hurried flight from Egypt (Deut. 16:3). It appears that originally the passover and the feast of unleavened bread were 2 distinct festivals: probably they were combined through their contiguity of time. The feast of unleavened bread is an agricultural festival, falling into line with the feasts of Pentecost and tabernacles.

Celebrations of the passover are recorded at Sinai (Num. 9:1-14), on entering Canaan (Josh. 5:11), under Hezekiah (II Chron. 30:1-27; with reference to Solomon in vs. 5, 26), under Josiah (II Kings 23:21-23; II Chron. 35:1-19), in the days of Ezra (Ezra 6:19-22). See also Matt. 26:17 seq.; Mark 14:12 seq.; Luke 22:7 seq.; John 18:28; Jos. Antiq. xvii. 9, 3; xx. 5, 3; War vi. 9, 3.

2. The lamb or kid killed at the festival of the passover (Ex. 12:21; Deut. 16:2; II Chron. 30:17). Christ is our passover (I Cor. 5:7). Like the paschal lamb, he was without blemish (cf. Ex. 12:5 with I Peter 1:18, 19), not a bone was broken (cf. Ex. 12:46 with John 19:36), his blood was a token before God (Ex. 12:13), and the feast was eaten with unleavened bread (cf. Ex. 12:18 and I Cor. 5:8).

Pat'ara (păt'ă-ră). A maritime city of s.w. Lycia. Paul took ship there for Phoenicia on his last voyage to Palestine (Acts 21:1). It possessed a famous oracle of Apollo.

Path'ros (păth'rōs) [Egypt., Southland]. The country of s. or Upper Egypt. It is mentioned between Egypt and Cush (Isa. 11:11). It was the original seat of the Egyptians themselves (Ezek. 29:14); and the 1st historical king of Egypt, Menes, is reported to have resided in Upper Egypt, in whose time all the lower country n. of Lake Moeris was a swamp (Herod. ii. 4, 15, 99). Isaiah foretold the dispersion of Israel to the remotest regions and their eventual return, among other places from Pathros (Isa. 11:11; cf. ch. 7:18). After the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Jews, probably refugees, were dwellers in Pathros (Jer. 44:1, 2, 15).

Path-ru'sim (păth-rōō'sim). One of 7 peoples proceeding from Mizraim. They are the inhabitants of Pathros (Gen. 10:14; I Chron. 1:12).

Pat'mos (păt'mōs). An island to which the Apostle John was banished for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ, and where he saw the visions recorded in the book of Revelation (Rev. 1:9). It is a small, rocky island, one of the Sporades, in the Greek Archipelago, and is now called Patino. It lies off the s.w. coast of Asia Minor, about 30 miles s. of Samos; and is about 10 miles long and 6 wide, and generally barren.

Pat'ri-arch [Gr., the father or head of a family, tribe, or race]. The father or chief of a race; a name given in the N.T. to the founders of the Hebrew race and nation. It is applied to Abraham (Heb. 7:4), to the 12 sons of Jacob (Acts 7:8, 9), and to King David (Acts 2:29). The title is commonly given to the godly men and heads of families, whose lives are recorded in the O.T. previous to the time of Moses, as the antediluvian patriarchs whose lineage is given in Gen., ch. 5. In the patriarchal system the government of a clan is regarded as the paternal right. It resides in the 1st instance in the progenitor of the tribe, and descends from him to the first-born son or eldest lineal male descendant. The head of each several family, into which the increasing tribe expands, exercises a similar government within his own limited sphere.

The patriarchal dispensation was the period before the establishment of the theocracy at Sinai, when each patriarchal head of a family was the priest of his own household, and God communed with him as such.

Pat'ro-bas (păt'rō-bās). A Christian at Rome, to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. 16:14).

Pa'u (pă'û) [groaning, bleating]. A town of Edom, the city of King Hadar (Gen. 36:39).

Called in I Chron. 1:50 Pai, waw or vau (w) and yodh or jod (y) being interchanged.

Paul (pōl) [Gr., Paulos, from Lat. Paulus, little].

1. Name and family. The great apostle to the Gentiles. His Jewish name was Saul (Heb. Shā'ul, Gr. Saulos). He is so called in The Acts until after the account of the conversion of Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus, from which point in the narrative (Acts 13:9) the name Paul alone is given him. In his epistles the apostle always calls himself Paul. It is not strange that some have supposed that he took the name Paul from the proconsul. But this is in reality quite improbable in itself and fails to observe the delicacy with which Luke introduces the apostle's Gentile name when his work among the Gentiles, by whom he was known as Paul, began. It is more probable that, like many Jews (Acts 1:23; 12:12; Col. 4:11), and especially in the Dispersion, the apostle had from the beginning both names. He was born in Tarsus, the chief city of Cilicia (Acts 9:11; 21:39; 22:3), and was of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5). It is not known how the family came to reside in Tarsus, though 1 ancient tradition represents it as having removed there from Gischala in Galilee after the latter place had been captured by the Romans. It is possible, however, that the family had at an earlier time formed part of a colony settled in Tarsus by one of the Syrian kings, or they may have voluntarily migrated, as so many Jews did, for commercial purposes. Paul seems, however, to have had a large and even influential family connection. In Rom. 16:7, 11 he salutes 3 persons as his kinsmen, 2 of whom, Andronicus and Junias (R.V.), are said to have been "of note among the apostles," and to have become Christians before Paul did. From Acts 23:16 we learn that his "sister's son," who seems to have resided, perhaps with his mother, in Jerusalem, gave information to the chief captain of the plot to kill Paul, from which it may be inferred that the young man was connected with some of the leading families. This is also confirmed by the prominence of Paul, though himself a young man, at the time of Stephen's death. He was apparently already a member of the council (Acts 26:10), and soon afterward the high priest entrusted to him the work of persecuting the Christians (chs. 9:1, 2; 22:5). His language in Phil. 3:4-7 further implies that he occupied originally a position of large influence, and that opportunities of honor and gain had been open to him. His family connections, therefore, cannot have been obscure. Though he was brought up in the strict observance of the Hebrew faith and traditions, his father having been a Pharisee (Acts 23:6), he was born a free Roman citizen. We do not know by what means his ancestor obtained citizenship. It may have been for service to the state or possibly by purchase. Its possession may have had some connection with the apostle's Roman name Paulus. But, however acquired, his Roman citizenship became of great importance in the prosecution of his Christian work and more than once saved his life.

2. Education. Tarsus was one of the intellectual centers of the East, and the seat of a famous school of learning in which Stoicism was the dominant philosophy. It is scarcely probable, however, that Paul came under these influences when a boy, for his parents were strict Jews, and he was early sent to Jerusalem to be educated. Like other Jewish boys he was taught a trade, which in his case was the manufacture of tents, such as were used by travelers (Acts 18:3). But, as he himself says (ch. 22:3), he was brought up in Jerusalem. He must, therefore, have been sent there when quite young. And his education in Jerusalem tended to deepen the hold upon him of his inherited Pharisaic traditions. He was instructed "according to the strict manner of the law of our fathers" (ibid.). He had for his teacher one of the most learned and distinguished rabbis of the day, Gamaliel, who was the grandson of the famous Hillel. It was this Gamaliel whose speech, recorded in Acts 5:34-39, prevented the sanhedrin from attempting to slay the apostles. Gamaliel, indeed, had some leaning toward Greek culture, and his speech in The Acts shows the reverse of a bitter, persecuting spirit. But he was famous for rabbinical learning, and at his feet the young man from Tarsus became versed not only in the teaching of the O.T., but in the subtleties of rabbinical interpretation, while it is plain also that his zeal for the traditions of the fathers and his narrow Pharisaism burned with the fiery intensity of youth. Thus the future apostle grew up an ardent Pharisee, trained in the religious and intellectual ideas of his people, and from his personal qualities, his course of education, and probably his family connections prepared to take a high position among his countrymen.

3. Persecution of Christians. He first appears in Christian history as the man at whose feet the witnesses who stoned Stephen laid their garments (Acts 7:58). He is described as being then a young man. The position he is here said to have occupied was not an official one. It seems to imply, however, especially when taken with the statement (Acts 8:1) that he "was consenting unto his death," that Paul was active in the persecution of the 1st Christian martyr. He was doubtless 1 of the Hellenists, or Greek-speaking Jews, mentioned in Acts 6:9 as the original instigators of the charge against Stephen. We cannot be wrong in supposing that Paul's hatred of the new sect had already been aroused; that he not only despised their crucified Messiah, but regarded them as being both politically and religiously dangerous; and that he was already prepared, with bitter but conscientious fanaticism, to oppose them to the death. So we find him, immediately after Stephen's death, taking a leading part in the persecution of the Christians which followed (Acts 8:3; 22:4; 26:10, 11; I Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13; Phil. 3:6; I Tim. 1:13). He did this with the fierceness of a misguided conscience. He was the type of the religious inquisitor. Not content with waging the persecution in Jerusalem, he asked of the high priest letters to the synagogues in Damascus that he might bring from there any Christian Jews whom he might find (Acts 9:1, 2). Large powers of internal administration were granted to the Jews even by the Romans, and in Damascus, which was under the control of Aretas, king of the Nabateans, the governor was particularly favorable to them (Acts 9:23, 24; II Cor. 11:32), so that Paul's persecution of the Christians is not in the least incredible. The important thing to observe, however, is that according to the express testimony of Luke and of Paul himself, he was filled with fury against them up to the very moment of his conversion, and believed that in persecuting them he was rendering the highest service to God.

4. Conversion. It was on the way to Damascus that his sudden conversion occurred (Acts 9:1-19). Paul and his companions, probably on horseback, had been following the usual road across the desert from Galilee to the ancient city. Damascus had been nearly reached. It was the hour of noon and the sun was blazing in the zenith (Acts 26:13). Suddenly a light from heaven, brighter than the sun, streamed round about them, and, overcome by its blinding brilliance, Paul fell upon the ground. His companions, too, fell to the ground (v. 14), though they appear afterward to have arisen while he remained prostrate (ch. 9:7). Out of the light he heard a voice, saying in the Hebrew language: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (ch. 26:14, R.V.). He replied: "Who art thou, Lord?" He heard in answer: "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest" (v. 15). "Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do" (chs. 9:6; 22:10). His companions heard the sound of the voice (ch. 9:7), but did not understand what was said (ch. 22:9). Paul, however, was found to be blinded by the light, so they led him by the hand into Damascus, where he lodged in the house of a certain Judas (ch. 9:11). For 3 days he remained blind and fasting, praying (vs. 9, 11) and meditating on the revelation which had been made to him. On the 3d day the Lord commanded a certain Jewish Christian, named Ananias, to go to Paul and lay his hands on him that he might receive his sight. The Lord assured Ananias, who was afraid of the persecutor, that the latter had already seen him in a vision coming to him. Thereupon Ananias obeyed. Paul confessed his faith in Jesus, received his sight, accepted baptism, and forthwith, with his characteristic energy and to the astonishment of the Jews, began to preach in the synagogues that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (ch. 9:10-22).

Such is the narrative of the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. Three recitals of it are given in The Acts; one by Luke (ch. 9:3-22); one by Paul himself before the Jews (ch. 22:1-16); again by Paul before Festus and Agrippa (ch. 26:1-20). The 3 accounts entirely agree, though in each of them particulars are dwelt on that are not found in the others. The story in each case is told with special regard to the purpose of the narrator. Paul in his epistles also frequently alludes to his conversion, attributing it to the grace and power of God, though he does not describe it in detail (I Cor. 9:1, 16; 15:8-10; Gal. 1:12-16; Eph. 3:1-8; Phil. 3:5-7; I Tim. 1:12-16; II Tim. 1:9-11). The fact, therefore, is supported by the strongest possible testimony. It is certain also that Jesus not only spoke to Paul but visibly appeared to him (Acts 9:17, 27; 22:14; 26:16; I Cor. 9:1). While the form in which he appeared is not described, we may be sure that it was a glorious one; so that Paul realized at once that the crucified Jesus was the exalted Son of God. He himself describes it as "the heavenly vision" (Acts 26:19), or spectacle, a word used in Luke 1:22 and 24:23 to describe the manifestation of angelic beings. There is no ground, therefore, for the allegation that it was an illusion of any kind. At the same time the mere appearance of Christ did not convert Paul. This was the work of the Spirit in his heart, enabling him to apprehend and accept the truth which had been revealed to him (see especially Gal. 1:15 seq.). Ananias also was evidently made use of in order to connect Paul's new life with the already existing Church.

The various rationalistic attempts that have been made to explain Paul's conversion without acknowledgment of the objective and supernatural interposition of the Lord are wrecked upon the testimony of Paul himself, that he had thought up to the time of his conversion, that it was his religious duty to persecute Christianity, and that his change was due to the sovereign exercise of God's power and grace. The expression, "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad," does not imply that he had been an unwilling persecutor or that he already believed that Christianity might be true, but describes the folly of any resistance to the purpose of God. At the same time his previous history had been an unconscious preparation for his future work. His Roman citizenship, his rabbinical training, as well as his natural qualities of mind fitted him for his life task. There is reason to believe also that with all his zeal he had not found spiritual peace in Judaism (Rom. 7:7-25). If so, the manner of his conversion must have made him realize vividly that salvation is alone through the grace of God in Christ. His religious experience, therefore, was also part of his preparation to become the great expounder of the gospel as providing justification for the sinner on the ground of Christ's merits received through faith alone.

As soon as he was converted Paul began evangelistic work. This was partly due to his natural energy, but also to the fact that it had been revealed to him that God's purpose in calling him was to make him a missionary and apostle (Acts 9:15; 26:16-20; Gal. 1:15, 16). He began work in the synagogues of Damascus and pursued it with success. This raised against him persecution from the Damascene Jews, who were aided by the governor of the city; so that he was compelled to flee secretly, being let down by his disciples in a basket from a window in the city wall (Acts 9:23-25; II Cor. 11:32, 33). Instead of returning to Jerusalem, however, he went to Arabia and afterward returned to Damascus (Gal. 1:17). We do not know where he went in Arabia, nor how long he stayed, nor what he did there. It is not improbable that the time was mainly spent in meditation upon the great change which had come over his life and the truth as it had now been revealed to him. But 3 years after his conversion he determined to leave Damascus and visit Jerusalem again. He tells us (Gal. 1:18, 19) that his main purpose was to visit Peter; that he remained in Jerusalem only 15 days; and that of the apostles he saw Peter only, though he mentions that he also saw James, the Lord's brother. Luke, however (Acts 9:26-29), gives further particulars.

It appears that the Christians in Jerusalem were afraid of him because of his former reputation and did not believe he was really a disciple; but that Barnabas, with that generosity of mind which was ever characteristic of him, took Paul to the apostles and related the story of his conversion and subsequent changed life. We are also told that Paul preached as fearlessly in Jerusalem as he had done at Damascus and directed his efforts especially toward his old friends, the Greek-speaking Jews (ch. 9:28, 29). These plotted at once against his life. The threatening danger caused the brethren to send him away, so they took him to Caesarea and sent him from there to Tarsus (Acts 9:29, 30; Gal. 1:21). He departed the more willingly because in the Temple the Lord had appeared to him in a vision bidding him go and telling him distinctly that his mission was to the Gentiles (Acts 22:17-21). The accounts in The Acts and the Epistle to the Galatians of this visit to Jerusalem have sometimes been thought inconsistent, but they may be naturally harmonized. It is highly probable that Paul would want to visit Peter in order that his work might proceed in unison with that of the original apostles, of whom Peter was the most prominent. It is equally natural that the Jerusalem Christians should be at first afraid of him; and the conduct of Barnabas, who was, like Paul, a Hellenistic Jew, is in keeping with his action throughout the whole history. Fifteen days, moreover, are not too short a time for the events described in The Acts. It is, in fact, confirmed by the Lord's command to Paul to depart quickly (Acts 22:18). Nor is Luke's statement that Barnabas brought Paul "to the apostles" inconsistent with Paul's statement that he saw Peter only, together with James. The reception of the new convert even by Peter alone, not to speak of James, who occupied almost an apostolic position (Gal. 2:9), was equivalent to apostolic recognition of him, and this is all that Luke's expression was meant to describe. It is further worthy of remark that it was now realized fully, by both Paul and the leaders in Jerusalem, that the new convert was a chosen apostle of Christ, and that his mission was to the Gentiles. At the same time the question does not appear to have been raised of what would be the relation of Gentile converts to the Mosaic Law. Neither did any foresee how important Paul's mission was to become. His commission, however, was admitted, and he was sent forth to Tarsus to engage in such work as might open before him.

Paul's stay in Tarsus is nearly a blank to us. It probably lasted 6 or 7 years; see the following "chronology of Paul's life." No doubt he engaged in missionary work, and probably founded the churches of Cilicia, which are mentioned incidentally in Acts 15:41. If at any time he felt the intellectual influences of Tarsus, this must have been the period. As already remarked, Tarsus was one of the centers of the Stoic philosophy, and Paul's appreciation of Stoicism plainly appears in his speech at Athens. While doubtless not inactive, Paul was waiting for the Lord by his providence to make plain the way in which his chosen ambassador was to go.

At length, however, the purpose of God began to appear. Some of the Greek-speaking Jewish Christians, who had been driven from Jerusalem by the persecution which followed Stephen's death, came to the great city of Antioch in Syria. It was situated on the Orontes, n. of the Lebanon range, had been the capital of the Syrian kingdom, and was then the residence of the Roman governor of the province. It was rated as one of the chief cities of the empire. Its mixed population and extensive commerce made it a center of wide influence. Lying just outside Palestine and at the entrance to Asia Minor, connected also by traffic and politics with the whole empire, it formed a natural base of operations from which the new faith, if it was to be separated from Judaism, could go forth to the conquest of the world. In Antioch the Christian refugees began, we are told (Acts 11:20), to preach to the Gentiles (A.V. Grecians; R.V. Greeks). There is a difficult question of the text in the original; but the context leaves no room for doubt that the work was among Gentiles. Many were converted, so that a distinctively Gentile church sprang up in the metropolis of Syria. When the fact was reported at Jerusalem, Barnabas was sent to investigate. With noble breadth of view he saw the Lord's hand in the new development in spite of the fact that the converts were uncircumcised. He seems also to have realized that this was the divine opening for Paul, for he went to Tarsus to seek him and brought him to Antioch. Together they labored for a year in Antioch. Many more Gentiles were converted, and the non-Jewish character of the Church was signalized by the fact that to the disciples in Antioch the name Christians was first given, evidently by their heathen neighbors. Thus began Paul's connection with Antioch. Thus also arose on the page of church history the first Gentile Christian organization. It was to be the starting point for Paul's mission to the pagan world.

While Paul was at Antioch, a prophet from Jerusalem, named Agabus, predicted in the Christian assembly that a famine was soon to occur. This was seized upon by the brethren at Antioch as an occasion for evincing their love to and fraternity with the Christians of Judea. The fact is a remarkable proof of the sense of obligation which these Gentiles had to those from whom they had received their new faith, as well as of the extent to which the gospel broke down at once the barriers which had existed between races and classes. Contributions for the relief of the Judean Christians were made at Antioch, and the same were sent to the elders at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Paul (Acts 11:29, 30). This visit of Paul to Jerusalem probably occurred in A.D. 44, or shortly after. It is not mentioned by Paul in Galatians, no doubt because he did not see any of the apostles. Some writers indeed have tried to identify it with the visit recorded in Gal. 2:1-10; but that plainly occurred after the dispute concerning the circumcision of Gentiles had sprung up, and Luke distinctly assigns the rise of that controversy to a later date (Acts 15:1). The purpose of Paul in Galatians was to recount the opportunities he had had of obtaining his gospel from the older apostles; and if on this occasion, as Luke intimates (Acts 11:30), he met only the elders of the church, and if the brief visit was purely on a matter of charity, his argument in Galatians did not require him to mention the journey. Barnabas and Paul soon returned to Antioch, taking with them John Mark (Acts 12:25).

5. First Missionary Journey. The time had at length arrived when Paul's historic missionary work to the Gentiles was to begin. It was indicated by the Spirit to the prophets belonging to the church in Antioch (Acts 13:1-3). They were directed to set apart 2 of their number, Barnabas and Paul, for the work to which God had called them. Thus by divine direction and under the auspices of the church at Antioch, the apostle's First Missionary Journey began. Its exact date is uncertain. We can only assign it to the years between A.D. 45-50; perhaps, 46-48. Neither is there any clear indication how long a time it occupied. Barnabas, who was the older, is mentioned as the leader; but Paul soon took the chief place. John Mark also went as their helper. The party went from Antioch to Seleucia, at the mouth of the Orontes, and thence sailed to Cyprus, the original home of Barnabas. Landing at Salamis, on the e. coast of Cyprus, they began work, as was natural, in the Jewish synagogues. Then they moved through the island from place to place until they reached Paphos on the s.w. coast. Here they attracted the notice of Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul, and were violently opposed by a Jewish sorcerer, Bar-Jesus, who called himself Elymas and who had previously won the patronage of the proconsul (Acts 13:6, 7). Paul, with much indignation, rebuked the sorcerer and smote him with blindness; and the effect of the miracle and of the missionaries' teaching was the conversion of Sergius (vs. 8-12).

Then leaving Cyprus, the party, of whom Paul was now the recognized head (v. 13), sailed n. toward Asia Minor and came to Perga in Pamphylia. There John Mark, for some unexplained reason, left them and returned to Jerusalem. Nor do Paul and Barnabas appear to have remained in Perga, but journeyed n. into Phrygia until they reached Antioch, called Pisidian because it lay toward Pisidia. This was the chief city of the Roman province of Galatia. There they entered the Jewish synagogue and, on invitation of the rulers of the synagogue, Paul made the great address recorded in Acts 13:16-41, the 1st recorded specimen of his preaching. After rehearsing the divine leading of Israel with a view to the coming Messiah, he related the testimony of the Baptist and the rejection of Jesus by the Jewish rulers, but declared that God had raised him from the dead, that in him the ancient promises to Israel were being fulfilled, and that only through faith in him could men be justified. He also warned the Jews not to repeat the crime of their rulers in Jerusalem. The speech aroused the enmity of the leading Jews; but it made an impression on some others, and yet more on those Gentiles who were already under the influence of the synagogue and who ever formed the connecting link for Paul between the synagogue and the pagan world. The next Sabbath the break took place between the missionaries and the synagogue, and the former began to address their work directly to the Gentiles. The chief people of the city, however, were excited by the Jews against the Christians, and Paul and Barnabas were expelled (Acts 13:50). From Antioch they went to Iconium, another city of Phrygia, where many converts, both Jewish and Gentile, were made (v. 51). But the Jews again succeeded in raising persecution, and the missionaries passed on to Lystra and Derbe, important cities of Lycaonia (ch. 14:1-6). At Lystra the miraculous cure of a lame man by Paul led to an attempt on the part of the heathen populace to offer worship to the missionaries, calling them Jupiter and Mercury; and this occasioned the 2d recorded speech of Paul (vs. 15-18), in which he reasoned against the folly of idolatry. At Lystra Timothy was probably converted (Acts 16:1; II Tim. 1:2; 3:11). The brief popularity of the apostle was, however, soon followed by renewed persecution under Jewish instigation (Acts 14:19), so that he was stoned, dragged out of the city, and left for dead. When he revived he departed with Barnabas to Derbe, which was probably at the s.e. limit of the province of Galatia (v. 20). It would have been possible for the missionaries to cross the mountains into Cilicia and so go directly, by way of Tarsus, back to Syrian Antioch. Their route had followed a rough circle. But they would not return until they had placed the new churches on a firm basis. Hence they returned from Derbe to Lystra, from Lystra to Iconium, from Iconium to Pisidian Antioch, and from Antioch to Perga, in each place organizing the Church and encouraging the disciples. At Perga they preached, as they had seemingly not done at the former visit; then, going to its seaport, Attalia, they returned to Antioch in Syria (Acts 14:21-26). Thus the First Missionary Journey of the apostle was completed. It covered the regions next toward the w. of those already occupied by the gospel. His method was to offer the gospel 1st to the Jews and then to the Gentiles. He found a large number of the latter already influenced by Judaism, and therefore somewhat prepared to receive Christianity. His method was to found churches in the principal cities, and his journeys were facilitated by the fine roads that the Roman government had made between the military posts. The Greek language also was everywhere understood. Providence had thus prepared the way for the prepared herald of the gospel to the world.

The success of Paul's work among the Gentiles led, however, to controversy within the Church. Certain strict Jewish Christians from Jerusalem went to Antioch and declared that unless the converted Gentiles were circumcised, they could not be saved (Acts 15:1). Some years before this time God had revealed to the Church through Peter that Gentiles were to be received without observance of the Mosaic Law (Acts 10:1 to 11:18). But the strict Jewish party, made up mostly of converted Pharisees (ch. 15:5), would not abide by this teaching; and the announcement of their doctrines in Antioch so disturbed the Church there that the brethren determined to send Paul and Barnabas, with others, to Jerusalem to consult with the apostles and elders about this question. This is the visit described in Acts, ch. 15, and Gal. 2:1-10. Both accounts are entirely harmonious, though written from different points of view. Paul tells us that a revelation from God directed him to go (Gal. 2:2). It was a great crisis. The whole future of the new religion was depending on the issue. But the result was a triumph of Christian loyalty and charity. Paul and Barnabas proclaimed to the mother church what God had done through them. When the strict Jewish Christians opposed them, a council was held of the apostles and elders (Acts 15:6-29). Peter reminded the church of God's will as shown in the case of Cornelius; Paul and Barnabas related the mighty attestations which God had given to their mission; James, the Lord's brother, pointed out that prophecy had foretold the calling of the Gentiles. It was resolved to recognize heartily the uncircumcised converts as brethren, but to direct them to avoid certain practices which were specially offensive to the Jews.

Paul tells us in Galatians that the church in Jerusalem stood by him against the "false brethren"; and also that James, Peter, and John gave him the right hand of fellowship, he to go to the Gentiles, they to the Jews. Thus Paul retained fellowship with the other apostles while at liberty to go on his own divinely appointed mission. How bitter the controversy was on the part of the Judaizers is shown by their subsequent hatred and hostility to Paul. But he had gained his point. The unity of the Church was preserved. The liberty of the Gentiles was preserved. A practical adjustment was made by which reasonable Jewish prejudice was conciliated, while the way was open for the carrying of the gospel to all peoples, unencumbered by Jewish ceremonialism. A brief reminder of the controversy occurred indeed soon after in Antioch, which ought to be mentioned (Gal. 2:11-21). Peter had gone there and, being in entire agreement with Paul, had lived in free association with the Gentiles. But when Jews from Jerusalem came to Antioch, Peter and even Barnabas withdrew from this association. This led Paul publicly to rebuke Peter, and in his rebuke he outlined the doctrinal ground on which he rested the rights of the Gentiles in the Church. Salvation is by faith alone, he said, because the believer has died with Christ to the Law; i.e., Christ by dying has met all the obligations of the Law for his people, and therefore nothing more than faith in Christ can be made the condition of anyone's becoming a Christian. We thus see that the rights of the Gentiles in the Church involved for Paul much more than a question of church unity. He saw that it involved the essential principle of the gospel. By his defense of this principle, as well as by his missionary work, Paul was the chief agent in the establishment of universal Christianity.

6. Second Missionary Journey. The council at Jerusalem was probably held in A.D. 50; see the chronology below. Not long after it Paul proposed to Barnabas a Second Missionary Journey (Acts 15:36). He was unwilling, however, that John Mark should again go with them, and this led to the final separation of the 2 great missionaries. Paul thereupon took with him Silas; see SILAS. They 1st visited the churches of Syria and Cilicia, and then passed n., through the Taurus Mountains, to the churches which had been founded on Paul's First Journey. They thus came first to Derbe, then to Lystra. At the latter place Paul determined to take Timothy with him, and circumcised him to prevent giving offense to the Jews, for Timothy's mother was a Jewess. Paul thus showed willingness to conciliate Jewish prejudice; though he would not yield an inch when the principles of the gospel were at stake.

From Lystra they appear to have gone to Iconium and Pisidian Antioch. Their movements here, however, are much disputed by scholars. Ramsay and others, who believe that the churches of the First Journey were the "churches of Galatia" to which the epistle with that name was afterward written (see GALATIA, GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THEE), hold that Paul went directly n. from Pisidian Antioch through the Roman province of Asia, but without preaching, since he was "forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia" (Acts 16:6); that when they came "over against Mysia" (v. 7) they attempted to go into Bithynia, but were again forbidden; then passing by (or, as the original may mean, neglecting) Mysia they turned w. through or alongside of Mysia to Troas. The commoner view is that from Pisidian Antioch the travelers moved n.e. into Galatia proper; that on the way Paul was for a while disabled by sickness, and that this led him to improve the opportunity, sick though he was, of preaching in Galatia and so of founding the "churches of Galatia" (Gal. 4:13-15); that this movement to the n.e. from Pisidian Antioch was due to the command not to preach in Asia; that when his work in Galatia proper was done, he attempted to enter Bithynia, but was again forbidden; and so, as on the former theory, he turned w. through or alongside of Mysia to Troas. This whole period is very briefly described by Luke. The Spirit was directing the missionaries to Europe, and Luke's narrative likewise hastens forward.

At Troas there appeared the vision of the man of Macedonia (Acts 16:9), in response to whose call the missionaries, now joined by Luke himself (cf. "we"), took ship for Europe, and, landing at Neapolis, went forward to the important city of Philippi. Here a church was founded (ch. 16:11-40), which ever remained specially dear to the apostle's heart (see Phil. 1:4-7; 4:1, 15). Here, too, Paul first came into conflict with Roman magistrates and found that his citizenship was a protection for his work (Acts 16:20-24, 37-39). From Philippi, where Luke remained, Paul, Silas, and Timothy went on to Thessalonica. The brief account in Acts 17:1-9 of the work done there is supplemented by the allusions made to it in his two epistles to that church. He had much success among the Gentiles; he laid with great care the foundations of the Church; and he gave the example of industry and sobriety by supporting himself by his trade while preaching the gospel (I Thess., ch. 2; etc.). But persecution arose, instigated by the Jews, so the brethren sent Paul to Berea, and from there, after marked success even in the synagogue, to Athens. His sojourn at Athens was rather disappointing, and is memorable chiefly for the address before the philosophers on Mars' Hill (Acts 17:22-31), in which Paul showed his appreciation of the truths which the gospel had in common with Stoicism, while he yet faithfully proclaimed to the members of a critical audience their duty to God and what God required them to believe.

At Corinth, on the contrary, to which he next went, he remained 18 months, and his work was most successful. Here he made the acquaintance of Aquila and Priscilla and abode with them (Acts 18:1-3). At first he preached in the synagogue, but afterward, because of the opposition of the Jews, in the house of a Gentile, Titus Justus, who lived next to the synagogue (vs. 5-7). In both Acts (ch. 18:9, 10) and I Cor. (ch. 2:1-5) there are allusions to the great anxiety of mind with which the apostle prosecuted his mission in Corinth, and to his earnest determination to proclaim in Greece as elsewhere the simple gospel of the Crucified; while I Cor. amply testifies both to his success and to the many temptations to which the Christians of Corinth were exposed, and which from the beginning occasioned the apostle special solicitude. The needs of other churches also pressed upon him, so that from Corinth he wrote the 2 epistles to the Thessalonians for the purpose of warning against certain doctrinal and practical perils by which that church was threatened. The hostility of the Jews also did not cease, and, on the coming to Corinth of the new proconsul, Gallio, they accused Paul of violation of the law. But the proconsul properly decided that the matter pertained to the synagogue itself and that the apostle had broken no law of which the government could take cognizance. The empire thus at this period protected the Christians from Jewish violence by identifying them with the Jews, and Paul was permitted to continue his work unmolested. His mission to Corinth was one of the most fruitful in the history of the Early Christian Church. At length, however, Paul turned his face again to the e. From Corinth he sailed to Ephesus. He did not remain there, however, but, promising to return, sailed to Caesarea, made apparently a hasty journey to Jerusalem, and, having saluted the church there, returned to Antioch, whence he had originally started (Acts 18:22). Thus was completed his Second Missionary Journey. Its result had been the establishment of Christianity in Europe. Macedonia and Achaia had been evangelized. The gospel had thereby taken a long step forward toward the conquest of the empire.

7. Third Missionary Journey. After remaining some time at Antioch, Paul, probably in A.D. 54, began his Third Journey. He first traversed "the region of Galatia, and Phrygia, in order, establishing all the disciples" (Acts 18:23), and then settled in Ephesus. It thus appears that the previous divine prohibition to preach in the province of Asia had been removed. Ephesus was the capital of Asia and one of the most influential cities of the East. Hence the apostle for 3 years made it his center of operations (Acts 19:8, 9; 20:31). For 3 months he taught in the synagogue (ch. 19:8), and then for 2 years in the school or lecture hall of a certain Tyrannus (v. 9). His work in Ephesus was marked by great thoroughness of instruction (ch. 20:18-31); by the exercise of astonishing miraculous power (ch. 19:11, 12); by great success, so that "all they that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord" (v. 10), and even some of the chief officers of Asia became Paul's friends (v. 31); yet also by constant and fierce opposition (Acts 19:23-41; I Cor. 4:9-13; 15:32); and finally, by the care of all the churches (II Cor. 11:28). This period of the apostle's life is especially rich in incidents. Much occurred of which The Acts tells nothing. Here Paul heard of attacks made on him and his doctrine by Judaizing teachers in Galatia; and in reply he wrote the famous Epistle to the Galatians, in which he defends his apostolic authority, and gives the 1st formal statement and proof of the doctrine of grace. The condition of the Corinthians also occasioned him much anxiety. In reply to inquiries from Corinth he wrote a letter, now lost, concerning the relations of believers to the pagan society about them (I Cor. 5:9). But later reports showed that more serious troubles had arisen. Hence our I Cor. was written, an epistle which finely exhibits the apostle's practical wisdom in the instruction and discipline of the infant churches. Even so, however, the seditious elements in the Corinthian church would not yield. Many think that Paul, after writing I Cor., himself made a hurried visit to Corinth for disciplinary purposes (cf. II Cor. 12:14; 13:1). At any rate, before leaving Ephesus he sent Titus to Corinth, probably with a letter, to secure the discipline of a refractory member of the church. Titus was to rejoin him in Troas. When he failed to do so, Paul passed on in much anxiety to Macedonia, whither Timothy and Erastus had preceded him (Acts 19:22). At length, however, Titus rejoined him (II Cor. 2:12-14; 7:5-16), with the good news that the Corinthian church had obeyed the apostle and were loyal in their love for him. Whereupon Paul wrote our II Cor., the most biographical of all his epistles, in which he rejoices in their obedience, gives directions concerning the collection he was making for the Judean saints, and once more defends his authority as an apostle of Christ. From Macedonia he himself went to Corinth and passed the winter of A.D. 57-58 there. No doubt he completed the discipline and organization of the Corinthian church; but the visit is most memorable because he then wrote the Epistle to the Romans. In it he states most completely the doctrine of the way of salvation. He evidently regarded Rome as the place where his labors should culminate. He could not, however, go there at once, because he felt it necessary to return to Jerusalem with the gifts of the Gentiles to the mother church. Christian work had already been begun at Rome and was being carried on mainly by Paul's own friends and disciples (cf. Rom., ch. 16). Hence, he sent the epistle from Corinth that the Christians of the capital might possess complete instruction in the gospel which Paul was proclaiming to the world.

Paul now set out on his last journey to Jerusalem. He was accompanied by friends who represented various Gentile churches (Acts 20:4). The apostle's work among the Gentiles had been much opposed by Judaizers, and even the ordinary Jewish Christians often regarded him and it with distrust. Hence arose his scheme of proving the loyalty of the Gentile churches by inducing them to send a liberal offering to the poor Christians of Judea. It was to carry this offering that he and his friends left Corinth for Jerusalem. His plan had 1st been to sail direct to Syria, but a plot of the Jews led him to change his route and to return by way of Macedonia (ch. 20:3). He lingered at Philippi while his companions went on to Troas, but he was rejoined at that place by Luke (v. 5). After the passover he and Luke went on to Troas, where the others were waiting for them and where all remained 7 days (v. 6). A church had grown up at Troas, and an interesting account is given by Luke of the events of the apostle's interview with it on the day and night before he left it (vs. 7-12). From Troas Paul went by foot about 20 miles to Assos, whither his companions had already gone by boat (v. 13). Thence they sailed to Mitylene, on the e. shore of the island of Lesbos, and then, coasting s., they passed between the mainland and the island of Chios, touched the next day at the island of Samos, and the day following reached Miletus (vs. 14, 15). The A.V. states (Acts 20:15) that they "tarried at Trogyllium" after leaving Samos; see TROGYLLIUM. The R.V. with the best MSS. omits this clause. Miletus was about 36 miles from Ephesus, and as Paul was in haste, he determined not to go to Ephesus, but to send for the elders of the church. At Miletus he took leave of them in the affectionate address recorded in Acts 20:18-35. No words could more strongly exhibit the apostle's devotion to his work, his love for his converts, and his realization of the spiritual perils to which they would be exposed. Leaving Miletus, the ship went with a straight course to Cos (Acts 21:1, in A.V. Coos), an island about 40 miles to the s.; then, the next day, Rhodes, an island and city about 50 miles s.e. of Cos, was reached; and from Rhodes the course lay e. to Patara, on the coast of Lycia (Acts 21:1). At Patara a ship for Phoenicia (Syria) was found and the party went on board (v. 2), and, passing w. of Cyprus, reached Tyre (v. 3). There they remained a week, and the disciples of Tyre urged Paul not to go to Jerusalem (v. 4); but after an affectionate farewell he sailed (vs. 5, 6) to Ptolemais, the modern Acre, and came the next day to Caesarea (vs. 7, 8). At Caesarea the company abode with Philip the evangelist. There too the Prophet Agabus, who at an earlier time had foretold the famine (ch. 11:28), bound his own hands and feet with Paul's girdle and predicted that so would the Jews bind Paul and deliver him to the Gentiles. But in spite of this warning and the lamentation of the brethren, Paul insisted on going forward (ch. 21:11-14). So, in company with a number of the disciples, he went on to Jerusalem, thus completing what is known as his Third Missionary Journey.

8. Paul in Jerusalem. The prediction of Agabus was soon fulfilled. Paul was at first indeed well received by the brethren in Jerusalem, and on the day following his arrival went to James, the Lord's brother, and the elders of the Church. When he had related his work among the Gentiles, they glorified God. At the same time they reminded him that many of the Jewish Christians had heard evil reports about him and doubted his fidelity to Moses. It was proposed, therefore, that he should give an ocular proof that he still held the Jewish customs in honor. He was to join with 4 men, who at that time were performing a Nazirite vow in the Temple. To this Paul assented, for he was ever anxious not to give needless offense to the Jews, and the observance proposed was probably little more than what he had done of his own will at Corinth (Acts 18:18). While Paul insisted that no Gentile should observe the Mosaic Law, and while he maintained that no Christian Jew was bound to observe it, he found no fault with Jews who chose to observe it, and held himself at liberty to observe its regulations or not as circumstances might seem to make expedient. His assent to this proposal, therefore, was not inconsistent with his action on other occasions. But the expedient proved unavailing for the purpose for which it was intended. Certain Jews from Asia saw him in the Temple and raised a tumult. They falsely charged him with having brought Gentiles into the Temple, and declared to the populace that he had everywhere taught men to dishonor both the Temple and the Law (ch. 21:27-29). A riot speedily ensued in which Paul would probably have been slain, had not the commander of the Roman garrison, Claudius Lysias, hastened with soldiers to quell the uproar. He was leading Paul, bound with 2 chains, into the castle for examination and the Jews were following with many outcries, when the apostle desired liberty to speak. The commander was surprised that the prisoner could use Greek, for he had supposed him to be an Egyptian insurrectionist who had recently given trouble to the government (v. 38). When Paul explained that he was a Tarsian Jew, Lysias allowed him to address the multitude. He did so in the Hebrew (Aramaic) tongue (ch. 22:2). He related his early life and the story of his conversion. They heard him till he uttered the word Gentiles, when the uproar was renewed, and Lysias withdrew him into the castle for safety and further examination. The examination would have been by scourging had not Paul remarked to the centurion that he was a Roman citizen (v. 25). When this was reported to Lysias, he unbound Paul and, feeling that the matter was a serious one, directed the priests to convoke the sanhedrin on the following day that the prisoner might be tried.

The appearance of Paul before the council led, however, to another tumult (Acts 23:1-10). The apostle was now fighting for his life. He had no hope of justice and, should the council condemn him, Lysias might give him over to execution. With much shrewdness he succeeded in dividing his enemies. He claimed to be a Pharisee and to be on trial for teaching the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. This was true, as far as it went, and it served Paul's purpose. The hatred of the Pharisees and Sadducees for each other was greater than their hostility to Paul, and the 2 sects quickly arrayed themselves on opposite sides. The commander feared that Paul would be pulled to pieces between his defenders and his opponents, so by his orders the soldiers removed the prisoner again to the castle.

9. Paul a prisoner in Caesarea. That night the Lord appeared to Paul in a vision and bade him be of good cheer, since he was certainly to bear his testimony at Rome (Acts 23:11). This consummation was to be effected, however, in an unexpected way. Some of the Jews formed a plot to kill Paul and, to accomplish this, it was determined to request the commander to bring the prisoner once more before the council. But Paul's nephew heard of the plot and managed to inform his uncle and the commander (vs. 12-22). Thereupon Lysias sent Paul under a strong guard to Caesarea with a letter to Felix, the procurator, referring the case to him. When Felix learned that the accused was from Cilicia, he declared that he would wait until the accusers came, and meanwhile placed Paul for safe keeping in Herod's palace, which was used as the praetorium or residence of the procurator. Then followed 2 years of imprisonment in Caesarea. When the Jews appeared before Felix, they made a general accusation against Paul of sedition and especially of profanation of the Temple, complaining of the violence with which Lysias had taken their prisoner out of their hands (ch. 24:1-9). To this Paul replied by an explicit denial and a demand that witnesses should be produced against him (vs. 10-21). Felix appears to have been sufficiently acquainted with the matters in dispute to perceive that Paul had not committed any crime worthy of punishment. He dismissed the accusers on the plea that he must learn further particulars from Lysias, and directed that Paul should be kept in confinement, but that his friends should be allowed to visit him freely. Felix and his wife Drusilla were also much impressed by what Paul had said and "heard him concerning the faith in Christ" (v. 24). In fact, the apostle seems to have exercised a strange fascination over the procurator, who trembled before his solemn preaching and promised to send for him again. He hoped also that Paul would pay for his liberty (vs. 25, 26). But the apostle would not bribe the procurator, and the latter deferred decision of the case, so that when, after 2 years, Porcius Festus succeeded Felix, Paul was still a prisoner (v. 27).

The Jews hoped that the new governor would prove more favorable to their desires than Felix had been. But Festus refused to send Paul to Jerusalem for trial, and required his accusers to confront him again in Caesarea (Acts 25:1-6). Again, however, they were unable to prove any crime against him, while he persistently maintained his innocence (vs. 7, 8). Festus, however, willing to please the Jews, asked Paul if he would go to Jerusalem to be tried. Paul knew that such a course would probably prove fatal to him. He availed himself, therefore, of his right as a Roman citizen and appealed unto Caesar (vs. 9-11). This took the case out of the procurator's hands and necessitated the prisoner's transmission to Rome. Before he could be sent, however, Agrippa II and his sister Bernice came to visit Festus, doubtless to congratulate him on his accession to office; and the procurator, who was not well versed in Jewish disputes and yet was bound to send to the emperor a full account of the case, related the matter to Agrippa, who expressed his desire to hear what the prisoner had to say. Forthwith it was arranged that Paul should state his case before the assembled company. Agrippa's familiarity with Jewish affairs would be of service to the procurator in preparing his report to the emperor (vs. 12-27).

Paul's defense before Agrippa forms one of his most notable speeches. In it he displayed the courtesy of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, and the fearlessness of a Christian. He reviewed his life in order to show that he had been governed only by the wish to obey the God of Israel, and maintained that his course as a Christian had not only been determined by God's direction, but had been the fulfillment of the Hebrew prophecies themselves (Acts 26:1-23). When Festus interrupted him with the exclamation that he was mad, Paul appealed earnestly to Agrippa. But the king was not disposed to be more than an observer and critic of what he deemed a new fanaticism. He replied with some contempt, "With but little persuasion thou wouldst fain make me a Christian" (v. 28, R.V.). Nevertheless he admitted that Paul had done no crime, and might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed unto Caesar (vs. 31, 32).

10. Journey to Rome. In the autumn of the same year, A.D. 60 (see following chronology), Paul was sent to Rome. He was committed, with other prisoners, to the care of a centurion, Julius, of the Augustan band or cohort. He was accompanied by Luke and Aristarchus, a Thessalonian (ch. 27:1, 2). The account of the voyage is related by Luke with singular detail and accuracy. The apostle was treated with notable courtesy by the centurion. Leaving Caesarea in a coasting ship of Adramyttium, they touched at Sidon and then sailed to Myra in Lycia. There they were transferred to an Alexandrian merchant ship bound for Italy. The wind, however, was not favorable. They were compelled at first to keep coasting n.w. until over against Cnidus on the coast of Caria. Then putting s., they rounded with difficulty Cape Salmone, on the e. extremity of Crete, and managed to reach Fair Havens, a port on the s. shore of the same island (Acts 27:3-8). It was now after the Fast, i.e., the 10th of Tishri or Day of Atonement (v. 9), when the season of navigation was drawing to a close. The weather also continued threatening. Paul counseled against sailing farther, but the centurion followed the advice of the master and the owner of the ship, who wished to go on to Phoenix, farther w. on the coast of Crete, where there was a better harbor (vs. 9-12). But when they had left Fair Havens, a fierce n.e. wind came down upon them and drove them to the s. Passing s. of Cauda (or Claudia, A.V., the modern Gozzo), and having lightened the ship, they were driven for 14 days before the gale in a w. direction. Paul alone maintained his courage and that of the rest, for an angel of the Lord assured him that no life would be lost (vs. 13-26). On the 14th night the sounding lead told of their approach to land; and, casting 4 anchors, they waited for the day. When daylight came, they perceived in the unknown land a small bay with a beach; so, cutting off their anchors, they hoisted the foresail to the wind and made for the beach (vs. 27-40). The ship, however, grounded, and soon began to break up under the violence of the waves. Thereupon the whole company cast themselves overboard and, as Paul had predicted, all reached land in safety (vs. 41-44). In this thrilling adventure, which Luke relates with so much detail, the conduct of Paul beautifully illustrates the courage of the Christian and the influence over others which a man of faith can exercise in times of peril.

The land on which they had been cast was the island of Melita, the modern Malta, which lies 58 miles s. of Sicily. The inhabitants kindly received the shipwrecked company, and Paul by his works gained special honor among them (Acts 28:1-10). After 3 months, however, the party were put on board another Alexandrian ship, which had wintered in the island, and, after touching at Syracuse and Rhegium, arrived at Puteoli, a harbor of s.w. Italy. There Paul found Christian brethren with whom he tarried 7 days (vs. 11-14). Meanwhile word of his arrival had reached the Christians in Rome, so that some of them went to meet him at the Market of Appius and The Three Taverns, 2 places distant from Rome about 43 and 33 miles respectively (v. 15). According to the A.V. (v. 16) the centurion delivered his prisoners to the captain of the guard, and this has been usually understood to mean the prefect of the Praetorian Guard, who at this time, A.D. 61, was the celebrated Burrus. The R.V., however, with the best MSS. omits this statement. Mommson, followed by Ramsay, thinks that the prisoners were delivered to the captain of another corps, to which Julius the centurion himself belonged, and whose duty it was to superintend the transportation of grain to the capital and to perform police duty. We really cannot tell into whose custody Paul was delivered. We know only that he was held in military confinement, chained to a soldier (Acts 28:16; Phil. 1:7, 13), but allowed to lodge by himself. Appeals to Caesar were slow processes. Paul soon hired a dwelling and continued in it for 2 years (Acts 28:30).

11. First imprisonment in Rome. The Acts closes with an account of how after 3 days he summoned the chief of the Jews, related the reason of his presence in the capital, and on an appointed day expounded to them the gospel; but that when they, like their countrymen elsewhere, disbelieved, Paul again declared that he would turn to the Gentiles. His imprisonment, therefore, did not prevent his missionary activity. The last verses of The Acts relate that for 2 whole years he received all who came to him and preached the Kingdom of God and the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ without hindrance from the authorities (Acts 28:17-31). But still more light is thrown on this period of Paul's life by the epistles which he wrote during it. They are those to the Colossians, to Philemon, to the Ephesians, and to the Philippians. The first 3 were probably written in the earlier part of the period and that to the Philippians toward its close. These epistles show that the apostle in Rome had many faithful friends working with him. Among these were Timothy (Col. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; 2:19; Philemon 1), Tychicus (Eph. 6:21; Col. 4:7), Aristarchus (Col. 4:10; Philemon 24), John Mark (Col. 4:10; Philemon 24), and Luke (Col. 4:14; Philemon 24). His friends had unhindered access to him; they acted as his messengers to the churches and also as his co-workers in Rome; and they made the imprisoned apostle the center and head of the Gentile Christian work throughout the empire. The epistles further show the personal activity of the apostle's life. With great zeal and success, in spite of his bonds, did he preach the gospel. He was an ambassador in bonds (Eph. 6:20). He desired his friends to pray that God would open for him a door of utterance (Col. 4:3). In Onesimus, the runaway slave, we see an example of the fruit of his labors (Philemon 10). As time went on the success of his work increased. He wrote to the Philippians (Phil. 1:12, 13, R.V.) that the things which had happened to him had fallen out unto the progress of the gospel, so that his bonds were manifest in Christ throughout the whole Praetorian Guard and to all the rest. He sent greetings also (ch. 4:22) from "them of Caesar's household." At the same time he was opposed even by some of the Christians, probably of the Jewish Christian type (ch. 1:15-18). But he regarded their opposition with equanimity, and was confident that he would finally be released (Phil. 1:25; 2:17, 24; Philemon 22). His imprisonment was only God's way of enabling his ambassador to fulfill to the uttermost his chosen mission. Finally, the epistles testify to the apostle's continued superintendence of the churches throughout the empire. New heresies had arisen in Asia. In the epistles of the imprisonment Paul gave his ripest instructions concerning the Person of Christ and the eternal purpose of God revealed in the gospel, while the practical directions which they contain disclose the breadth of his grasp on Christian duty and the fervor of his own Christian life.

12. Release from first Roman imprisonment. Although the book of The Acts leaves Paul a prisoner at Rome, there is reason to believe that he was released after 2 years' confinement and resumed his missionary journeys. The evidence for this may be summarized as follows: (1) The closing verse of The Acts accords better with this view than with the supposition that the imprisonment which has been described ended in the apostle's condemnation and death. Luke emphasizes the fact that no one hindered his work, thus certainly giving the impression that the end of his activity was not near. Moreover (2) Paul fully expected to be released (Phil. 1:25; 2:17, 24; Philemon 22), and this expectation was fully justified by the treatment which he had always received at the hands of Roman officials. It should be remembered that Nero's persecution of the Christians had not yet begun; that it was a sudden outbreak, preceded by no official ill-treatment of them; and that in the view of Roman law the Christians were as yet only a sect of the Jews, whose liberty to maintain their religion was fully recognized. It is therefore altogether probable that, when Paul's case came before the imperial tribunal, he was acquitted of any crime of which Roman law could take cognizance. No doubt, also, the report of Festus was a favorable one (see Acts 26:31); nor do the Jews appear to have sent any accusers to Rome to appear against him (ch. 28:21). (3) The tradition that he was released and resumed his journeys, and was again arrested dates from an early period. Clement of Rome, A.D. 96, seems clearly to imply that Paul went to Spain, for he says that in his journeys "he reached the limit of the West." His journey to Spain is also mentioned in the so-called Muratori Fragment, A.D. 170. The first 3 chapters of the Gnostic Acts of Peter (written not later than A.D. 200, probably by a resident of Asia Minor) relate in detail the preparations in Rome for Paul's journey to Spain. With the foregoing agrees Eusebius (H. E. ii. 22, 2), A.D. 324, who reports, as the common tradition, that "after he [Paul] had made his defense, the apostle was sent again on the ministry of preaching, and a second time having come to the same city [Rome], he suffered martyrdom." It must be admitted that this traditional evidence is not sufficiently strong to be absolutely demonstrative; but it is early and strong enough to confirm the rest of the evidence, and no sufficient counterevidence can be adduced. (4) The Epistles to Timothy and to Titus are most probably, on the basis of internal and external evidence, to be attributed to Paul. No place for them, however, can be found in the history of Paul related in The Acts. They must, therefore, have been written later, and that fact compels us to accept the tradition given by Eusebius.

13. Later missionary activities. We must, therefore, believe that Paul's appeal from Festus to Caesar resulted in his release. His subsequent movements can be inferred only from the allusions contained in the Epistles to Timothy and to Titus and from tradition. We may suppose that after his release he went, as he had intended (Phil. 2:24; Philemon 22), to Asia and Macedonia. From I Tim. 1:3 we learn that he had left Timothy in charge of the churches about Ephesus when he himself went to Macedonia. Where he was when he wrote I Tim. is not clear, but he hoped soon to be able to return to Ephesus (I Tim. 3:14). From Titus we learn that he had left Titus in charge of the churches of Crete, and expected to winter in Nicopolis (Titus 3:12). Though there were several cities by that name (see NICOPOLIS), it is probable that Nicopolis in Epirus was the one referred to. If we accept the early tradition that Paul went to Spain (see above), we may suppose that he did so after having been in Asia and Macedonia; that after that, on his return from Spain, he stopped at Crete and left Titus on that island; that then he returned to Asia, from which place he doubtless wrote the Epistle to Titus. We learn from II Tim. 4:20 that he had passed through Corinth and Miletus, the one in Greece, the other in Asia. There is nothing to show whether he carried out his intention of wintering in Nicopolis. Many suppose, however, that he did go to Nicopolis in Epirus, and was there rearrested and sent to Rome. But while the apostle's movements during this closing period of his life are somewhat uncertain, the epistles then written show that he occupied himself, in addition to evangelizing new regions, with the perfecting of the organization of the already existing churches. He evidently felt that his career must soon close, and that the churches would be exposed to new dangers, from both without and within. Hence the Pastoral Epistles, as they are called, round out the apostle's instruction of the churches by solidifying their organization and practically equipping them for their future work.

14. Final imprisonment and death. The release of Paul from his 1st Roman imprisonment probably occurred in A.D. 63, and his subsequent activity lasted about 4 years. According to Eusebius, his death took place in A.D. 67; according to Jerome, in A.D. 68. How he came to be rearrested we do not know. There are a few slight hints furnished, however, by the Second Epistle to Timothy, which was written from Rome shortly before Paul's death. We should remember, moreover, that in A.D. 64 Nero's persecution of the Christians in Rome broke out; and it was doubtless followed by sporadic outbreaks against them in the provinces (I Peter 4:13-19). It may be, as some have supposed, that Paul was informed against as a leader of the now proscribed sect by the Alexander mentioned in II Tim. 4:14. At any rate, and wherever he was arrested, he was sent to Rome for trial, either because, as before, he appealed to Caesar, or because he was charged with a crime committed in Italy, perhaps with complicity in the burning of Rome, or because the provincials wished to gratify Nero by sending so notable a prisoner to the capital. Only Luke, of his former friends, was with him when II Tim. was written (II Tim. 4:11). Some had even deserted him (II Tim. 1:15; 4:10, 16), while others had gone away on various errands (ch. 4:10, 12). Yet when arraigned before the tribunal he was at first not condemned (ch. 4:17), though he continued to be held on some other charge. Possibly he was able to disprove a charge of criminal conduct, but was retained in custody because he was a Christian. He speaks of himself as a prisoner (II Tim. 1:8) in bonds (v. 16), as if an evildoer (ch. 2:9), and regards his fate as sealed (ch. 4:6-8). No doubt he was finally condemned to death simply because he was a Christian, in accordance with the policy begun by Nero in A.D. 64. Tradition relates that the apostle was beheaded, as became a Roman citizen, on the Ostian Way.

15. Character, contributions, and theology of Paul. In giving this outline of the life of the Apostle Paul, we have necessarily followed the express testimony of The Acts and his epistles. But it should not be forgotten that many other events occurred in his active and checkered career. To some of these allusions are made in his epistles (Rom. 15:18, 19; II Cor. 11:24-33). Yet the well-known events of his life, taken with his epistles, make plain the character of the man and the supreme value of his work. It is difficult to gather into one picture the many features of his versatile character. He was by nature intensely religious and his religion controlled his whole being. This was true of him even as a Jew, and much more so after his conversion. Keenly intellectual, he grasped truth at its full value and logically wrought out its implications. Yet truth possessed his heart equally with his intellect, and his emotions were as fervid as his logical processes were vigorous. At the same time the practical aspects of truth were seen by him no less than the theoretical side. If on the one hand he fully wrought out dialectically the content of his doctrinal ideas, on the other hand he applied Christianity to life with the wisdom and completeness of a practical man of affairs. He was intense in his affections, at times ecstatic in his religious experiences, ever progressive in his statements of truth, capable of soaring to the loftiest heights of religious thought, and of embodying in action the truth for which he stood. This versatility, intensity, purity, breadth of mental and spiritual life, when used by the all-controlling Spirit of God, fitted Paul for the work for which the providence of God intended him.

And that work consisted in authoritatively interpreting to the Gentile world, in action and in written statement, the mission and message of Christ. How Paul did this in action is narrated in the book of The Acts. Through his agency the universalism of Christianity, its independence of the Jewish ritual, its adaptation to all mankind, was historically established. Other men also contributed to the result. But it was Paul's divinely given task to bear the burden of this achievement, and to him, as to no other man, Christianity owes its possession of a world-wide destiny. All this was done, of course, in accordance with the purpose of Christ and under his direction. But the student of Christian history must recognize in Paul the principal agent used to accomplish the result. On the other hand, the epistles of Paul disclose in written statement the doctrinal and ethical interpretation of Christ's word and work, which accompanied Paul's missionary activity and made it profound and permanent. It is, therefore, to Paul as a theologian that we rightly look with the greatest admiration. His theology took shape from the peculiar experience of his own conversion. By that sudden transition he was made to realize the impossibility of man's saving himself, the dependence of the sinner on the sovereign grace of God, and the completeness of the redeeming work which Jesus, the Son of God, had done through his death and resurrection. It followed that only by union with Christ through faith can any man be saved. Salvation consists in justification of the sinner by God on the ground of Christ's obedience, and when thus justified the sinner, being united to Christ, is made to partake of all the spiritual benefits, external and internal, in heaven and on earth, which Christ has purchased for him. The Spirit inspired Paul to set forth on this foundation the truth of Christ's whole work and person. In the Epistles to the Galatians and to the Romans the way of salvation itself is most fully elaborated, while in the epistles of the imprisonment the exalted dignity of Christ and the whole breadth and end of God's eternal purpose of grace in Christ and his Church find their full expression. Besides these principal themes, almost every phase of Christian truth and duty is touched upon in Paul's epistles. His is emphatically the theology of grace. He sounded the depths of this truth. He interpreted the Hebrew Messiah to the Gentile world. He was raised up to explain to the world the Saviour in whom it was invited to believe and the work which the Saviour had done. Paul was pre-eminently the theologian of the apostles as well as the most aggressive missionary. It is not possible to understand Christianity unless we unite with the teaching and work of Jesus Christ the interpretation thereof furnished by his apostle Paul.

16. Chronology of Paul's life. While the order of events in Paul's life and the relative dates of his epistles are in the main quite clear, there is some dispute concerning the precise years to which both events and epistles are to be assigned. In the book of The Acts 2 dates may be regarded as certain, viz., the ascension of Christ in A.D. 30 (though some scholars assign this to A.D. 29) and the death of Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:23), which all admit to have taken place in A.D. 44. Neither of these dates, however, is of much assistance in determining the absolute chronology of Paul's life. That depends mainly on the date assigned to the accession of Festus as procurator of Judea. According to the common and most probable opinion, Festus became governor (Acts 24:27) in A.D. 60. Josephus assigns nearly all the events during the governorship of Felix to the reign of Nero, which began in October, A.D. 54, and Paul (ch. 24:10) speaks of Felix as having been "of many years a judge unto this nation." It is hardly possible, therefore, to assign Paul's arrest when he appeared before Felix to a date earlier than A.D. 58. Then

Paul was kept 2 years in confinement in Caesarea, which would make the accession of Festus, who then succeeded Felix, to have taken place in A.D. 60. It can hardly have been later, since Festus was succeeded by Albinus in A.D. 62, and the events recorded of him imply that he was governor for more than a year. But if Festus became governor in A.D. 60, Paul was sent to Rome in the autumn of that year, and arrived at Rome in the spring of A.D. 61, having spent the winter on the way. Then the close of The Acts, and probably the apostle's release from his first Roman imprisonment, are to be dated in A.D. 63 (Acts 28:30).

For the earlier events of Paul's life, we date back from the accession of Festus. Assuming the latter to have been in A.D. 60, then Paul's arrest, which occurred 2 years before (Acts 24:27), was in A.D. 58. This was at the close of his Third Journey. The winter preceding his arrest he had spent in Corinth (ch. 20:3), the preceding autumn in Macedonia (v. 2), and before that, for 3 years, he had been in Ephesus (v. 31), to which he had gone from Antioch after a rapid tour through Galatia and Phrygia (ch. 18:23). Hence 4 years must be allowed for the Third Journey. If he was arrested in Jerusalem in the spring of A.D. 58, he must have begun this journey in the spring of A.D. 54. The Third Journey followed the Second by a moderate interval (ch. 18:23), and for the latter at least 2½ years must be allowed, since 18 months were spent at Corinth (v. 11), and the preceding events of the tour may fairly be supposed to have occupied a year more (chs. 15:36 to 17:34). If, therefore, the Second Journey closed in the autumn of A.D. 53, it probably began in the spring of A.D. 51. The Second Journey in turn began some days (ch. 15:36) after the council of Jerusalem. This latter epoch-making event may, therefore, be assigned to the year A.D. 50. The First Missionary Journey can be located only roughly between A.D. 44, the date of Herod's death (ch. 12), and A.D. 50, the date of the council (ch. 15). We may probably assign it to the years A.D. 46-48, though it is not possible to say how long a time it consumed.

For the date of Paul's conversion, we must combine the results given above with his statements in the Epistle to the Galatians. In Gal. 2:1 he says: "Then after . . . fourteen years I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas." This visit is probably the one to the council which we have located in A.D. 50. But from what event are these 14 years to be counted? According to some commentators, they are to be reckoned from his conversion mentioned in Gal. 1:15. If so, his conversion was in A.D. 36 or 37, according as we count the 14 years exclusively or inclusively of the first of them. But in Gal. 1:18 Paul notes that he first visited Jerusalem 3 years after his conversion. Hence it is more natural to date the 14 years of Gal. 2:1 from the close of the previously mentioned 3 years. In that case, according as we reckon exclusively or inclusively, his conversion was in A.D. 33 or 35. It is most in accordance with Hebrew custom to reckon inclusively. Hence we may assign his conversion to A.D. 35, his 1st subsequent visit to Jerusalem (Gal. 1:18) to A.D. 37, and the 14 years after (ch. 2:1) to A.D. 50. As already remarked, all these dates are disputed. Some assign the accession of Festus to A.D. 55, and therefore push back all the other dates 5 years earlier than those given above. Other scholars vary on special points. Some assign Paul's death to A.D. 64, supposing that he died in the 1st year of Nero's persecution. But the dates given above appear to be by far the most probable. They yield, with some other details, the following table:

Death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ A. D. 30	35(?)
Conversion of Paul
First subsequent visit to Jerusalem (Gal. 1: 18)	37
Paul at Tarsus	37-43
Visit to Jerusalem with the gifts from Antioch (Acts 11: 30)	44 or 45

Pave'ment. See GABBATHA.

Pē (pā). The 17th letter of the Heb. alphabet. It was pronounced like p, but single pe after a vowel is pronounced as ph. It heads the 17th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Peace Offer'ing. See OFFERINGS.

Pea'cock'. 1. The rendering of Heb. tuk-kiyyim; along with ivory and apes, tukkiyyim were imported by Solomon in ships of Tarshish (I Kings 10:22; II Chron. 9:21). Now the words for ivory and ape are of Indian origin, and tukki also finds a satisfactory origin in Malabar tōgā, tōghā, Old Tamil tokei, togel, a peacock. The peacock (Pavo cristatus) is a native of India, where it may be found in the jungles, generally running rapidly away when disturbed. Since the natives do not allow it to be molested, it often makes its way into the villages.

Another interpretation is from Egypt. t.ky (monkey); the letter t is the fem. article; this rendering implies 2 kinds of monkeys as is the case in certain Egyptian records, and also favors an African origin of the animal as well as an African location for Ophir.

2. See OSTRICH 2.

Pearl. A precious article of commerce (Matt. 13:45, 46; Rev. 21:21; also Job 28:18, in R.V. crystal), used as an ornament by women (I Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4). Pearls are found inside the shells of several species of Mollusca. They consist of carbonate of lime interstratified with animal membrane, and are formed by the deposit of the nacreous substance around some foreign body within the mantle lobes, such as a grain of sand, which acts as an irritant and serves as a nucleus. This substance is the same as the mother-of-pearl which forms the lustrous inner lining of the shell. Pearls of large size and fine quality are yielded by the pearl oyster (Pinctada margaritifera), which abounds in the Indian seas, especially in the Persian Gulf and near Ceylon.

Pēd'ah-el (pēd'ā-hēl) [God has ransomed]. A prince of the tribe of Naphtali in the wilderness (Num. 34:28).

Pē-dah'zur (pē-dā'zēr) [the Rock (God) has ransomed]. Father of the prince of Manasseh in the wilderness (Num. 1:10; 2:20).

Pē-dā'iah (pē-dā'yā) [Jehovah has ransomed]. 1. The father of Joel, prince of Manasseh (I Chron. 27:20).

2. A citizen of Rumah and maternal grandfather of King Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:36).

3. A brother of Shealtiel or possibly, though not probably, his son (I Chron. 3:18, 19). See ZERUBBABEL.

4. A descendant of Parosh. He rebuilt and repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25).

5. One of those, probably priests, who stood on Ezra's left hand when he addressed the people (Neh. 8:4).

6. A Benjamite of the family of Jeshaiiah (Neh. 11:7).

7. A Levite; one of those appointed by Nehemiah over the treasures (Neh. 13:13).

Pe'lah (pēkā) [(God) has opened (the eyes), sees]. Son of Remaliah. He was a captain under Pekahiah; but he conspired against his king, slew him, and reigned in his stead. He adhered to the calf worship of Jeroboam I (II Kings 15:25-28). When Jotham's reign was drawing to a close, Pekah entered into an alliance with Rezin, king of Syria, against Judah. They purposed to dethrone the king and place the crown on a creature of their own. The allied kings began their great invasion of Judah just as the reins of government passed from Jotham into the hands of Ahaz. The Syrians advanced through the country e. of the Jordan to Elath, intending to meet at Jerusalem. Pekah led his army directly toward the capital of Judah, burning and pillaging as he went. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were greatly alarmed. Isaiah, however, was directed to encourage the king and the people with the assurance that the plan of the enemy would fail, and to exhort them to put their trust in Jehovah. Ahaz spurned the advice, preferring to trust to the king of Assyria, and purchased the aid of Tiglath-pileser III. The advance of the Assyrian army through Galilee (II Kings 15:29) to Philistia, in 734 B.C., compelled the allied kings to withdraw their troops from Judah in order to protect their own dominions. Pekah carried off a multitude of captives as he departed; but on the remonstrance of the Prophet Oded, he clothed and fed them and sent them home (II Kings 16:5-9; II Chron. 28:5-15; Isa. 7:1-13). In 730 B.C. Hoshea murdered Pekah and ascended the throne in his stead (II Kings 15:30). This deed was accomplished with the connivance of Tiglath-pileser III. The present Heb. text assigns 20 years to the reign of Pekah (II Kings 15:27). It is impossible that he occupied the throne of Samaria during all these years, for Menahem, a predecessor of his, was on the throne about 738 B.C., in the reign of Tiglath-pileser III (II Kings 15:19). Critics of all schools accordingly admit that 20 years is much too long. There is a bare possibility, however, that the Hebrew writer, when he summarizes the reign of Pekah, and states that "in the fifty-second year of Uzziah Pekah reigned over Israel in Samaria—twenty years," does not mean that Pekah reigned all these 20 years in Samaria. Pekah was associated with Gileadites (II Kings 15:25). It is possible that he set up his authority in n. Gilead and Galilee in 749 B.C., during the confusion which accompanied the death of Jeroboam II, and maintained his power during the greater part of Menahem's reign, being the cause of Menahem's feeling of insecurity until Tiglath-pileser III invaded the n. and established Menahem's sway over the whole country (II Kings 15:19). Then Pekah probably abandoned opposition, professed loyalty, and was given a high military position in the service of the king to whom he had hitherto refused obedience. After Menahem's death and in the absence of Tiglath-pileser III, and perhaps backed by Rezin, Pekah seized the throne in the 52d year of Uzziah and again reigned. See CHRONOLOGY, IV.

Pek'a-hi'ah (pēk'ā-hi'ā) [Jehovah has opened (the eyes), sees]. Son and successor of Menahem in the Kingdom of Israel. He came to the throne c. 735 B.C., and reigned 2 years, adhering to the calf worship of Jeroboam I. He was assassinated in his palace at Samaria by Pekah, a captain of his, who then usurped the throne (II Kings 15:23-26).

Pe'kod (pē'kōd). The Pukūdu, a powerful Aramaean tribe inhabiting the plain e. of the Tigris, not far from its mouth. In Ezekiel's time they belonged to Nebuchadnezzar's empire (Jer. 50:21; Ezek. 23:23).

Pe-la'iah (pē-lā'yā) [Jehovah is wonderful]. 1. One of the Levites who with Ezra caused the people to understand the Law (Neh. 8:7) and sealed the covenant (ch. 10:10).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Shecaniah (I Chron. 3:24).

Pe-la'il'iah (pē-lā-lī'ā) [Jehovah has judged]. A priest descended from Malchijah (Neh. 11:12).

Pe-la-ti'ah (pē-lā-tī'ā) [Jehovah has set free]. 1. One of the Simeonite captains in the successful war between that tribe and the Amalekites (I Chron. 4:42).

2. A prince of Israel, and son of Benaiah. He misled the people. In vision Ezekiel saw him, and he prophesied against him, and Pelatiah suddenly died (Ezek. 11:1-13; cf. chs. 8:1, 3; 11:24).

3. A son of Hananiah, and a grandson of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:21). Perhaps he was the person of this name who was a chief of the people and with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:22).

Pe'leg (pē'lēg), in A.V. (Luke 3:35) Pha'lee [division]. A son or descendant of Eber (Gen. 10:25; 11:16). He takes his name from the fact that in his days the earth was divided. The division alluded to may be the separation of the descendants of Arpachshad from the Joktanide Arabs (ch. 10:24-29); or it may refer to the scattering of the descendants of Noah.

Pe'let (pē'lēt) [(God) has set free]. 1. A son of Jahdai, of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:47).

2. A Benjamite who joined David while he was at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

Pe'leth (pē'lēth) [cf. Arab. fulat, swift (of a horse)]. 1. A Reubenite, father of that On who joined in Korah's rebellion (Num. 16:1). 2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:33).

Pel'e-thites (pē'lē-thīts). Certain members of David's bodyguard. Apparently they were from the Philistine country, as were the Cherethites and the men of Gath, who were their comrades in arms. They were faithful to David during the calamities of his later years and took a prominent part in the war in which Absalom lost his cause and his life (II Sam. 15:18-22). They also helped in the fight with Sheba (ch. 20:7). The name which they bear is doubtless a gentile adjective, and some scholars regard it as a var. form of Pelishiti, Philistine. See CHERETHITES.

Pel'ican. The rendering of Heb. kā'ath, the vomiter. The word is twice translated cormorant in the text of A.V. (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14); but elsewhere pelican, as everywhere in R.V. The bird was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17), lived in the wilderness (Ps. 102:6), and frequented ruins (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14). It is probably the common or roseate pelican (Pelecanus onocrotalus), though rivers and lakes, rather than ruined cities, unless the ruins are interspersed with marshes, are its appropriate place of abode. Its 4 toes, being all connected by large webs, adapt it for aquatic life. It sometimes, however, perches on trees. Its bill is large and furrowed and has under it a large pouch in which the bird carries the fish on which its young feed. Its height is from 5 to 6 feet; the expansion of its wings 12 or 13. A few individuals are found on the Sea of Galilee; a much larger number on the shallow lakes of Egypt and on the Nile.

Pel'o-nite (pē'lō-nīt). A word in I Chron. 11:27; 27:10 corresponding to Palitite in II Sam. 23:26, and in I Chron. 11:36 apparently to Gilonite in II Sam. 15:12; 23:34. In I Chron. 27:10 the person who is designated by this epithet is further said to be of the children of Ephraim. No person or place is known from which this adjective could be derived; certainly not from Pallu, who was a Reubenite and whose descendants were called Palluites (Num. 26:5). In view of these circumstances, Pelonite is not unreasonably believed to be a corruption of the text. Hebrew pēlōnī, however, means "such and such a one" (e.g., I Sam. 21:2), and it may have been inserted in the passages mentioned by a scribe who could not read the original word in the text which he was copying.

Pen. 1. A stylus or graving tool made of iron and used by writers for cutting letters on stone (Job 19:24; Ps. 45:1; Jer. 8:8; 17:1). In Heb. it is called 'ēṭ and once heret (Isa. 8:1).

2. A reed pen used for writing with ink on papyrus (III John 13; cf. II John 12). The mention of a penknife or knife of a writer in Jer. 36:23, and of a roll in which the prophet's words were written, imply that reed pens had been introduced among the Israelites by the time of Jehoiakim.

The Heb. words rendered "pen of the writer" in Judg. 5:14, A.V., mean literally "staff of a marshal" or scribe (R.V.).

Pen'el (pē-nī'el). See PENEEL 1.

Pen'nin'nah (pē-nīn'ā) [coral]. One of Elikanah's 2 wives, the other being Hannah (I Sam. 1:2-6).

Pen'ny. The rendering of Gr. dēnariion. It was the denarius, a silver coin of the Romans (Matt. 22:19-21), worth about 17 cents in the time of Christ (ch. 18:28, R.V. marg.). See MONEY. It was the ordinary pay of an agricultural laborer for a day (Matt. 20:2, 9, 13). Two were given to the innkeeper by the Good Samaritan for looking after the wounded Jew, though he promised to supplement this sum if the expense should exceed it (Luke 10:35). The apostles calculated that 200 would be needed to buy sufficient bread to feed 5,000 people (Mark 6:37). This would be 1 denarius for each 25, or 2% of a cent to each person. The prices in Rev. 6:6 were those asked during a dearth.

Pen'ta-teuch (pēn'tā-tūk) [Gr. pentateuchos, consisting of 5 books]. The first 5 books of the O.T., viz., Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The word nowhere occurs in Scripture, the Israelites calling these books collectively the Law (Josh. 1:7; Matt. 5:17), the Law of Moses (I Kings 2:3; Ezra 7:6; Luke 2:22), the Law of the Lord (II Chron. 31:3; Luke 2:23), the Book of the Law (Josh. 1:8), the Book of the Law of Moses (Josh. 25:3, 4), the Book of the Law of Moses (Josh. 8:31), the Book of the Law of God (Josh. 24:26), the Book of the Law of the Lord (II Chron. 17:9). This fact suggests that the 5 books were considered as 1; and they still are so in Heb. MSS., though severally cited by their opening words. The division into 5 distinct books is mentioned by Josephus (Jos. Apion i. 8). It may have originated with the Greek translators or been ancient. But whether or not the LXX translators adopted or originated this fivefold division, from them at least emanated the modern names Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy.*

According to the traditional view, the events recorded in the 1st book of the Pentateuch were transmitted until the time of Moses, as is now known, by tradition oral and written; the subsequent occurrences fell under Moses' own observation, and he was himself an actor in the most stirring events. Writing was practiced long before the time of Moses. *The division of the Law of Moses into 5 books furnished the model, it is thought, for the similar division of the Psalter. If it did, it is ancient; for the Psalter was early divided into 5 books. Proof that it did is sought in the alleged discovery that the contents of each book are so arranged that the opening psalm shall correspond to the respective book of the Pentateuch. Psalm 1, with its comparison of the righteous to a tree planted by the rivers of water, is a reminder of the garden of Eden in the 1st book of the Pentateuch. Psalm 42, with which the 2d book of the Psalter opens, is the cry of a man in distress, oppressed by the enemy and thinking himself forgotten by God, but anticipating deliverance out of all his trouble. It recalls the affliction of Israel in Egypt and the deliverance as related in Exodus. In Psalm 73, with which the 3d book begins, the doubts of the psalmist regarding the justice of God's dealing with men vanish when he considers the end of the wicked. The psalm is supposed to reflect gratitude for God's goodness in giving the law of Leviticus, which was an abiding mercy. Psalm 90, a prayer of Moses, in which God is besought to teach us to number our days, corresponds to Numbers. Psalm 107, which begins the 5th book, speaks of the goodness of the Lord in the days of trouble, and is thus like Deuteronomy, which recapitulates the instances of God's loving-kindness to Israel. It must be confessed that the correspondence is rather fanciful; and if an editor set about securing correspondence, it is strange that he did not adopt a more appropriate arrangement. Psalm 8, with its reference to the heavens, the work of God's fingers, to the moon and stars which he ordained, and to man whom he made and to whom he gave dominion over all creatures, would have better corresponded with Gen., ch. 1. Psalm 66 of the 2d book, which tells of the works of God, how he turned the sea into dry land for the people to pass through, and how he tried the Israelites, laid sore burdens on them, and caused men to ride over their heads, and then brought them out into a wealthy place, should have opened the book. It has an obvious reference to the events recorded in Exodus, whereas Psalm 42 has not. Psalm 76 or 78 should form the opening of the 3d book in order to correspond appropriately to Leviticus.

may be dated in the 19th century B.C.; the Ras Shamra cuneiform alphabet was in use in the 16-14th centuries B.C. Akkadian was the international written language in the Tell el-Amarna period in Palestine and Syria. And the various forms of literature represented in the Pentateuch were familiar literary conceptions of Moses' time (see Moses). Though the 5 books themselves are not attributed as a whole to Moses in any verse which they contain, yet the Pentateuch testifies expressly to the Mosaic authorship of its contents. Two passages of the narrative portion are attributed to his pen: the account of the victory over Amalek (Ex. 17:14), and the itinerary of the march of the Israelites from Egypt to the plains of Moab opposite Jericho (Num. 33:2). A didactic song, reciting the dealing of the Most High with Israel, is declared to have been written and uttered by Moses (Deut. 31:19, 22, 30; 32:44); and a hymn of praise, evoked by the deliverance from Pharaoh at the Red Sea, is recorded as sung by Moses (Ex. 15:1-18; cf. v. 21). The legal portion consists of 3 distinct bodies of law. The 1st is entitled the Book of the Covenant, and comprises the Ten Commandments, which formed the fundamental law of the nation, and specific regulations based on them (Ex. chs. 20 to 23). This book Moses is expressly said to have written (Ex. 24:4). The 2d body of laws pertains to the sanctuary and service (Ex. chs. 25 to 31; 35 to 40; Leviticus; and major legal part of Numbers). This legislation is constantly declared to have been revealed by the Lord to Moses (Ex. 25:1, etc.). The 3d body of legislation expressly and repeatedly claims to be the address of Moses to the new generation of people on the eve of their entrance into Canaan. It contains a brief rehearsal of the way in which God has led them and then repeats sundry portions of the Law with the special object of exhibiting its spirituality, emphasizing the features which are of vital religious importance in the new circumstances in which the people will soon be placed, and modifying details to adapt the laws to the new requirements of the settled life in Canaan. Moses wrote this address and delivered it into the custody of the Levites (Deut. 31:9, 24-26). These are the explicit claims, scattered throughout the Pentateuch itself, to its Mosaic authorship.

The remainder of the O.T. refers to the Law as the work of Moses and written in a book (Josh. 1:7, 8; Ezra 6:18; Neh. 8:1, 18), and abounds in explicit references to the Law of Moses (Josh. 1:7, 8; 8:31-35; Judg. 3:4; I Kings 2:3; II Kings 18:6, 12; cf. Deut. 24:16; II Kings 21:7, 8; Dan. 9:11, 13; Ezra 3:2; 6:18; 7:6; Neh. 8:1, 18; Mal. 4:4). One feature of this law, namely, the law of the one altar, was in abeyance during the captivity and seclusion of the Ark after the Lord had forsaken Shiloh (I Sam. 4:11, 21, 22; 6:1; 7:2; Ps. 78:60; Jer. 7:12-15; 26:6). During this period the people under the leadership of Samuel sacrificed where they could (I Kings 3:2-4), as their fathers had done in the olden time before the covenant had been entered into between Jehovah and the Israelites, of which the Law and the Ark were the sign and pledge. Once again this specific law was in abeyance. The pious Israelites of the Northern Kingdom were prevented from going up to Jerusalem to worship. They had to choose between refraining from sacrifice altogether or worshipping God as did Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They properly chose the latter alternative. All other cases of sacrifice offered elsewhere than at the central sanctuary were strictly in accord with the law which expressly provided that wherever Jehovah manifested his name there sacrifice was fitting (Ex. 20:24; cf. Judg. 2:

1, 5; 6:19-24; 13:15-22; see ALTAR). The Law of Moses was known and its authority acknowledged even in the Northern Kingdom. The prophets Hosea and Amos, who labored among the 10 tribes of the North, although they do not mention the name of Moses, frequently refer to the laws recorded in the Pentateuch. At a still later time the Temple copy of the Book of the Law was unused and cast aside during the half century of Manasseh's reign when the religion of Jehovah was neglected; but when the Temple was being repaired, preparatory to the restoration of Jehovah's worship, this book was found, or so much of it at least as contained Deuteronomy (II Kings 22:8; 23:25); or, less likely, the book which the high priest found was a copy of the Law of God which had been embedded in the wall of the Temple as a record at the time of building the sanctuary. Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah allude to the written Law of Moses. That Moses was the author of the Pentateuch was the opinion of the Jews of Christ's time (Mark 12:19; John 8:5; Jos. Antiq., preface 4; Aption i. 8). Christ and the Evangelists call the Pentateuch Moses and the Book of Moses (Mark 12:26; Luke 16:29; 24:27, 44), and speak of its having been given by Moses and committed to writing by Moses (Mark 10:5; 12:19; John 1:17; 5:46, 47; 7:19).

The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, however, is not generally accepted by critics. The principal objections formerly urged against it were several verses in which reference has been found to times subsequent to the death of Moses: 1. In Gen. 12:6 we read: "And the Canaanite was then in the land" (cf. ch. 13:7). The meaning assigned to these words is that the Canaanites had ceased to be there when the writer lived. The words, however, actually state only that the Canaanites were in the country when Abraham was there, and were occupying the land promised to him. 2. In Gen. 14:14 we read that Abraham pursued the defeated confederates to Dan. In the patriarch's time, however, the place was called Laish, the name Dan not having been given it till the time of the Judges (Judg. 18:29). The question is, however, whether Dan in Genesis is the place mentioned in The Book of Judges. If it is, the more familiar name may have been substituted in the place of Laish in the course of repeated transcription for the sake of clearness. 3. In Gen. 36:31 the words occur: "Before there reigned any king over the children of Israel," as if the Hebrew monarchy under Saul had already been established when the author wrote. But the kings of Edom, mentioned in vs. 32-43, reigned before Moses; and Moses notes that the descendants of Esau already had kings, although the Israelites, to whom the promise had been given that kings should arise among them (Gen. 17:6, 16; 35:11), as yet had none. 4. Moses is said to be beyond Jordan, meaning e. of the river, as though the writer himself were in Canaan (Deut. 1:1). The expression, however, does not necessarily imply this. Canaan was the land that had been promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and which the Israelites accordingly regarded as their proper home. From his point of view the land e. of the river was "beyond Jordan." Moses was still beyond Jordan. No matter on which side of the river the people were, they designated the mountains e. of the Dead Sea Abarim (those beyond) and in later times they called the country between the Jabbok and the Arnon Perea (region beyond). 5. It is universally admitted that Deut. 34:5-12, in which the death of Moses is recorded and comparison made between him and prophets subsequently raised up (vs. 5, 10, etc.), cannot have been from his pen. But an addition of this sort does not militate against the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch as a whole.

The orthodox theologian and commentator Vitringa expressed the opinion in 1707, in the interest of the credibility of Genesis, that Moses edited and supplemented records left by the fathers and preserved among the Israelites. In 1753, Jean Astruc, a French physician of ability, but profligate, attempted to distinguish 2 leading authors in Genesis, whose writings Moses used and who are distinguished by their employment respectively of the words Elohim, that is God, and Jehovah. Besides the writings of these 2, he thought he could detect 10 minor documents relating chiefly to foreign nations and in which no name of God is found. This hypothesis was adopted by Eichhorn and elaborated with learning and ingenuity. He steadfastly insisted that Moses compiled Genesis and was the author of the rest of the Pentateuch. It was soon discovered, however, that the principles which govern the partition of Genesis were capable of being applied with similar results to the entire Pentateuch; and if so, the original documents covered the history of Moses' own time and were scarcely put together by Moses to form the present Pentateuch. In fact critics have applied the same principles to The Book of Joshua that they join to the Pentateuch, thus forming the Hexateuch. The grounds on which the partition is made are chiefly 4: 1. The alternate use of the divine names God and Jehovah in successive paragraphs or sections. 2. The continuity of each so-called document when taken separately. 3. The diversity of style, diction, and ideas in the different documents. 4. Repetitions or parallel passages, often contradictory, indicative of distinct documents. Starting in simple form, the hypothesis underwent constant modification under careful criticism in order to remove the difficulties that beset it.

The documentary theory of the formation of the Pentateuch is generally known as the Graf-Wellhausen or simply as the Wellhausen hypothesis. It represents the accumulation of the work of various men, among whom may be mentioned Spinoza (1670), Hobbes (1651), R. Simon (1678), H. B. Witter (1711), Astruc (1753), J. G. Eichhorn (1780-1783), DeWette (1806), W. Vatke (1835), H. Hupfeld (1853), K. H. Graf (1866), A. Kuenen (1861-1870), and J. Wellhausen (1876-1884). Many others published on the same theme both before and after the days of Wellhausen. We can hardly expect to find uniformity among the critics, but a popular form of the documentary hypothesis may be set forth in outline as follows. (There are, however, numerous disagreements among scholars on various points which cannot be discussed here.) The writer J or the author of the document J (so called because he refers to God as Jehovah) is supposed to have lived in Judah c. 950-850 B.C. Some, however, would divide J into J<sup>1</sup> and J<sup>2</sup> (or L, lay document, and J respectively). The language of J is free, flowing, and picturesque. E or the writer of the E document (here God is called Elohim, whence the designation E) is supposed to have lived c. 750 B.C. E is said to reflect a more advanced civilization, a more refined environment, a more thoughtful age, and a higher ethical standard than J. Sometime the Decalogue (Ex. 20:1-17) and the Book of the Covenant (chs. 20:22 to 23:33) were set within the E document. The next important step is the combination of J and E after the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.) by a redactor c. 650 B.C. The resultant document is JE. The critics maintain that the strata J and E can be detected, because the redactor did not rewrite his sources, but dovetailed selected material from the 2 documents. The greater part of Deuteronomy (chs. 5 to 26; 28) or D is assigned to the year 621 B.C., or perhaps rather a half century earlier (II Kings 22:8 seq.); on this document was based the reformation of Josiah or the Deuteronomic reformation (621 B.C.). The Law in Deuteronomy (cf. chs. 5:14 seq.; 15:12-18; 23:15 seq.; 24:19-22) receives a more sympathetic attitude and a more humane emphasis than in the Book of the Covenant. The Book of Deuteronomy would then represent the final result of a series of editorial expansions of D. From the point of view of the documentary hypothesis the 2d important growth of the Pentateuch was the addition of D to JE. In 597 B.C. Ezekiel was taken as an exile to Babylonia. The Holiness Code (Lev., chs. 17 to 26), known as H, may have been compiled after Ezekiel's work, about the middle of the 6th century. This code is supposed at some uncertain date to have been incorporated into P (the Priestly Code), the latest document of the Pentateuch, which is supposed to have been composed during the Babylonian Exile. P seems to have been based on written documents and represents a priestly point of view. It is exact in dates and genealogies; it is precise in cataloguing persons and things; it is punctilious and elaborate in dealing with essential details and is written in a stereotyped style. P begins with the creation of heaven and earth and includes an abstract of history to the time of Joshua; it calls God Elohim. Its aim is to give a systematic view of the origin and chief institutions of the Israelitish theocracy. Ezra returned to Jerusalem in 458 B.C., and Nehemiah in 444. According to the critics the 3d main stage in the growth of the Pentateuch was the joining of P to JED. Again the redactor did not rewrite but combined the various sources; thus the critics believe that they can detect the original underlying documents and the points of juncture. The general view of critics is that P was the foundation document of the Pentateuch and that it was supplemented by an editor by the addition of JED and possibly other elements. While it may be taken for granted that Ezra used the entire Pentateuch, it is generally assumed that he read P (Neh. 8:1-8) and that the final redaction of the Pentateuch took place later, probably shortly before 400 B.C. It is evident that there is much uncertainty as well as conjecture in this theory.

Objections may be raised: 1. This theory involves the denial of the truth of the historical narrative in the O.T., not the assertion of occasional or minute inaccuracies, but the rejection of the credibility of the O.T. narrative almost as a whole. Wellhausen makes no concealment of the fact. 2. Furthermore, to date the so-called documents so late is forbidden by the fact of the development of doctrine. In the Pentateuch the conceptions entertained and the doctrine taught concerning the future state, divine retribution, the spiritual character of true worship, angels, and the Messiah are rudimentary. They appear in developed form in late books, in Job, The Psalms, and the prophets. This is a strong argument that the writer of the Pentateuch lived at an earlier age and in a different intellectual environment. Dillmann, while accepting the existence of documents, opposed Wellhausen's arrangement, insisting that history required the existence of the Levitical legislation before that of Deuteronomy, and so far he is more in accord with the teaching of Scripture. 3. The early existence of the laws and institutions of the Pentateuch is attested by the traces of them in the writings of the early prophets. Now, it is possible to admit the genuineness of the passages where these traces are found, but to deny that they were derived from Deuteronomic or priestly documents by assuming that the prophets were acquainted with old customs and unwritten laws which traditionally went back to Mosaic times. Furthermore the concession that the Pentateuchal law and organization were in existence in the 8th century B.C. is avoided by declaring that these references are late interpolations in the genuine writings of the prophets. As a rule no proof for such a declaration is offered. Believers in the Mosaic authorship of the Levitical and Deuteronomic law point with confidence to the evident indissolubleness of these references from the context and their inseparable connection with the original argument, which show that they are not interpolations, but an essential part of the discourse of the prophets of the 8th century. 4. The theory of the late origin of Israel's institutions asserts, as a fundamental postulate, that the Law and the elaborate ritual of Israel were the result of a gradual development. The Wellhausen hypothesis was formed under the influence of Hegelian philosophy and assumes 3 stages of evolution: pre-prophetic, prophetic, and legal. As in nature, so in art, law, and ritual, the simple ever precedes the complex, and the rude the refined. The thesis, as a general principle, is demonstrable and is universally accepted; and it is true also in the case of the civil law and the worship of Israel. But there is another truth, to speak of but one, namely, that Israel was the heir of the ages. When Wellhausen published his Prolegomena in 1878, archaeology had shed practically no light upon the Bible. Now the science of archaeology has vastly extended our knowledge of ancient history and the milieu in which lived the Israelites. The social psychology and thought patterns of the ancient Egyptian and Mesopotamian world stand in striking contrast to those of Israel as postulated and reconstructed by the followers of the Wellhausen school. Development in law and in the ritual of divine worship had been going on for centuries. The Israelites did not begin with nothing, any more than do the founders of a modern state or the framers of a modern constitution. Under Moses they appropriated the mature fruits of man's labor and man's experience. Among the nations with whom they were in close touch in the Mosaic era, among the Babylonians from the midst of whom their forefathers had emigrated and the Egyptians with whom they had sojourned, the development of the forms of worship had reached maturity in an elaborate refinement; and the legal sense of the Semites had developed so far as to discern a unity underlying manifold laws and to adopt the principle of codification. The statutes organized as a body of law and incorporated in the Book of the Covenant, the sanctuary as described in Exodus, and the ritual that is outlined in Leviticus were not strange novelties to the people assembled at Sinai, but were familiar conceptions and already full of significance, appealing to the sense of justice and appreciation for the rights of the lowly and helpless which the Semites possessed long before the days of Moses, representing types of sacred architecture and ritual approved by the most refined contemporary peoples, embodying lofty ideals possessed in common with the ethnic religions of the day, employing a symbolism that was, as it were, the universal religious speech among the men of that age, and giving expression to the common innate sense of propriety in the worship of God. The whole was molded and dominated by the truth of only one God, holy, gracious, and spiritual. The civil law of Israel and the sanctuary, priesthood, and ritual, rich, refined, elaborate, are not things new under the sun; but Moses, a statesman and religious leader, in long and intimate communion with God and under direct divine teaching and control, selected suitable materials from the legal and ritualistic wealth of the age and organized them into a vehicle that was a perfect expression of God's will for quickening, fostering, disciplining, and guiding the moral and religious consciousness of Israel and giving a proper and intelligible display of those great truths concerning God which Israel held and for which Israel was to bear witness among men. The law and worship of Israel as exhibited in the legislation at Sinai, however long the period of development may have been that preceded them, were timely, in entire harmony with the conceptions of the Mosaic age. If the documentary hypothesis be accepted without qualification, it involves a reversal of the facts of history by placing the prophets before the Pentateuch. See MOSES, ALPHABET, ALTAR, HAMMURABI, PRIEST, TABERNACLE, THEOCRACY.

Turning to the literary aspect of the question, what are the objections to the theory of documents? 1. The impossibility of separating the documents from each other in strict adherence to the principle that certain words are characteristic of the several writers. To take an example from the use of different divine names, which is the starting point of the hypothesis and the phenomenon most evident to English readers, the name Jehovah, which in A.V. is generally translated LORD, betokens J, and should not occur, according to the theory, in the book of Genesis in the documents E and P. But the critics maintain that the divine names are not the sole criterion in determining the documents. Thus Jehovah occurs in P (Gen. 17:1; 21:1b); in E (chs. 21:33; 22:11, 14; 28:21); also Elohim (God) is found in J (chs. 4:25; 6:2, 4; 7:9; 9:27; 33:5, 11). Here are a few instances in Genesis alone where the critical principle fails in respect to but 2 characteristic words. The compiler is said to have introduced the awkward words arbitrarily or from another document. In some cases J is said to have used the name God discriminatively, but this seems to be a virtual abandonment of the theory. If the writer used the divine name discriminatively in some cases, he may have done so in all, as the defenders of the Mosaic authorship maintain. On the theory of the Mosaic authorship, these words are in place; and it is ordinarily apparent that they are discriminatively employed. Elohim (God) denotes the divine being in his relation to the universe at large as creator, preserver, and governor of all his creatures and all their actions. Jehovah denotes God as he reveals himself to man, especially in grace. 2. The continuity of the documents is frequently interrupted. Thus Gen., ch. 5, is a P chapter, but v. 29 is assigned to J; in ch. 7, vs. 1-5 belong to J, but v. 6 is P. J is resumed in v. 7 and continues to the end of v. 10, but in v. 9 "two and two," "male and female," and "God" belong to P. Verse 11 is P, but "six hundredth year," "second month," "seventeenth day of the month" belong to J; v. 12 belongs to J. Verses 13-16a are P, but 16b is J. Verse 17a is P, but "forty days" is J; 17b is J. Verses 18-21 are P; vs. 22, 23 are J, and v. 24 is P. J's narrative embraces chs. 10:21, 24-30; 11: (1-9) 28-30; 12:1-4a. P narrated chs. 1:1 to 2:4a, concluding with the emphatic declaration that "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." Then after listing the genealogy of Adam (ch. 5:1-28, 30-32), he suddenly writes: "And the earth was corrupt before God" (ch. 6:9-22). Again, P's narrative of the early history of Abraham appears as follows: chs. 11:27, 31, 32; 12:4b, 5; 13:6, 11b, 12a; 16:1a, 3, 15, 16; 17. What is not P in those chapters is assigned to J. Over against this complication in the hypothetical documents, believers in the Mosaic authorship are able to show unity of theme, unbroken continuity of thought, balanced treatment of the parts, and progressive narrative. See GENESIS. 3. The theory that there are parallel accounts marked by difference of style fails as a trustworthy principle in the only case where it can be tested by external evidence. It is asserted that in the narrative of the Flood the storm which produced the Deluge is described twice in 3 successive verses: "The same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened" (ch. 7:11, P), and "It came to pass after the seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth, . . . and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights" (vs. 10, 12, J). It is urged also that there are 2 literary styles apparent here: the former exuberant, vivid, poetic, the latter a bald statement of the facts in simple prose. On the theory of Mosaic authorship, there is no difficulty in accounting for difference of style. Different themes require different statement. Dates, genealogies, and the like do not call the imagination into exercise. Vivid and picturesque description belongs to the narration of lively and vivid incidents. 4. The critical theory that there are parallel accounts of the same event which are marked by contradictions likewise fails to stand the test of external evidence. It is contended that according to P God forewarns Noah of an impending destructive flood of waters, but does not reveal to him whether it will be caused by melting snows or continuous rains or tidal wave; and thus P contradicts J, who states that the Lord bade Noah enter into the ark, because in yet 7 days he would cause it to rain upon the earth. But again the Babylonian account shows that the Hebrew narrative does not embody 2 divergent accounts but is the record of successive progressive events. For according to it, as in Genesis, man was first warned of coming destruction and bidden to build a boat. The ruin was, accordingly, to be wrought by a flood of water, but whether the deluge would be due to rain, or a freshet, or the inflowing sea was not disclosed. When the appointed time approached, however, the prophecy became definite and foretold rain. The Hebrew account, with its present material and the present arrangement of that material, is essentially the ancient account handed down from the fathers. Nor can ch. 7:12 (J) and ch. 7:24 (P) be shown to be contradictory. According to those who hold to the traditional Mosaic authorship, the criticism which distributes the narrative among different writers on the ground of differences of style or alleged contradictions is demonstrably invalid.

The present trend in O.T. studies is away from the earlier and rather hypothetical criticism. Wellhausen lived before the time of archaeological contributions to the study of the O.T.; in consequence his point of view is antiquated and his picture of the development of Israelitish institutions sadly distorted. The old and fast literary criticism is now receiving severe blows; it was too formal and assumed an exactness that did not correspond to the situation in life. In 1921 R. Kittel said that the building lacked a foundation and that the architects were without standards. In 1931 Pedersen of Copenhagen stated that the beautiful and methodical regulation of the various strata as presented by Wellhausen and his generation rests upon an illusion. Yet there is no harm in subjecting the Pentateuch to the same methods that are applied to other literature. When the Pentateuch is studied in the light of all our historical, linguistic, archaeological, and critical knowledge, our understanding of it is bound to be increased, and our appreciation of it is enhanced.

A belief in the Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch, however, does not necessarily require that the Pentateuch come from the hand of Moses in its present form. The development and changes of languages are well-known, and from our knowledge of Semitic and other tongues it is hardly probable that the Hebrew of Moses' day was like that of Biblical Hebrew. Yet if Hebrew scribes "modernized" the language of Moses, the Pentateuch as a work would still remain Mosaic. It cannot be emphasized too strongly that there is hardly any evidence at all in the ancient Near East for documentary or literary fabrications. Sacred and profane documents in that region were transcribed with greater care than is true of copying in Greco-Roman times. Another important observation is that in the ancient Near East the scribes did not leave obvious archaisms in spelling or grammar, but they revised ancient literary and other writings periodically. There was a tendency among ancient Oriental scribes and compilers to add rather than to subtract. Thus if there be documents like J and E, the divergencies between them should be considered not as average variation, but rather as maximum variation. As is well-known, the power of the Oriental memory is prodigious; it is possible that many of Moses' decisions and statements were handed down for generations by memory. If they were recorded in later times and added to Moses' written works, they would in reality be a part of the work of Moses. Probably oral composition and transmission of literature played a far greater role in antiquity than is generally supposed. A study of the code of Hammurabi and other legal codes of the ancient Near East shows the antiquity of the Mosaic laws. Several types of laws are recognized in the Pentateuch: testimonies, statutes, ordinances, and commandments. According to Jirku (1927) there is nothing to oppose the view that Moses composed and promulgated a code of laws by using existing laws and following an ancient Oriental genre. For the solemn proclamation of the Law, cf. Deut. 27:1-4; 31:10-12; Josh. 8:33 seq.; apparently there were assemblies every 7 years where the Law was read. According to Alt (1934) nothing contradicts the view that the first of these assemblies coincided with the conclusion of the Mosaic covenant in the wilderness. The constitutional law of Israel is of necessity Jehovistic; so we must go back to Moses and his work with the tribes in the wilderness.

Many scholars, however, continue to recognize the 4 main documents JEDP, but they give them a different interpretation from what was implied in the Wellhausen theory of development. They would accept the antiquity of the contents by regarding the material as considerably older than the time of composition of JEDP. Some would assign these documents to schools rather than to individual writers; thus these documents might be considered as recensions of Mosaic material in vogue in various centers in Palestine, as Kadesh, Shechem, Shiloh, and Jerusalem. Duplications and various points of view within the Pentateuch could then be explained as being due to editors who later placed together documents which represent various recensions of the work of Moses. W. F. Albright (1940) places the Deuteronomistic movement in the late 7th century B.C., but he arrives at this date without following the paths of Wellhausen. He considers the Deuteronomistic reaction not as exclusively a local phenomenon, but as part of a movement throughout the ancient Near East; he refers to the imitation of the past in the Saite Dynasty in Egypt and the copying of ancient Babylonian tablets for Ashurbanipal's library at Nineveh. In the same way he supposes that the book of Deuteronomy represents an attempt to return to the spirit of Moses. This principle could be applied to various parts of the Pentateuch by regarding additions to the original work of Moses as being made in the spirit of the founder of the code. Such a view allows for normal legal development from a Mosaic nucleus after the settlement in the Land of Canaan; in such a case the development of the Mosaic Law would be analogous to what is found in other lands.

The development of the religion of Israel demands that the Pentateuch precede the prophets, and such is the Biblical presentation. In order to understand the religious history of Israel it is necessary to retain the view of the Pentateuch that Moses was a monotheist and that his God was Jehovah. Moses was the framer of the religious system of Israel and the founder of the Hebrew commonwealth, and he remains, whether in a direct or more or less indirect sense, the author of the Pentateuch. Even though various scholars find documents or strata in the Pentateuch (and their views are far from agreeing on this point), archaeological, philological, and historical studies support the verisimilitude of the Pentateuch.

Pen'te-cost (pën'të-köst). See WEEKS, FEAST OF.

Pe-nu'el (pë-nū'el) and once Pe-ni'el (Gen. 32:30) [face of God]. 1. Originally an encampment e. of the Jordan, first named by Jacob because he had there seen God face to face, yet his life had been preserved (Gen. 32:30, 31). In the time of the Judges there was a tower there, which Gideon broke down, and a city, the inhabitants of which he slew (Judg. 8:8, 9, 17). It was fortified by Jeroboam I (I Kings 12:25).

2. A man of Judah, and the ancestor of the inhabitants of Gedor (I Chron. 4:4).

3. A Benjamite, family of Shashak (I Chron. 8:25).

Pe'or (pë'or) [an opening, a cleft]. 1. A mountain in Moab looking toward the desert, or Jeshimon (Num. 23:28). From it the camp of Israel at Shittim was in full view (ch. 24:2). A mountain still bore the name in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. It stood opposite Jericho, on the road to Heshbon, above or to the e. of Livia, now Tell er-Râmeh. Accordingly Peor was a peak of the Abarim range near Wadi Hesban.

2. A Moabite divinity worshiped in Mount Peor, and often called Baal-peor; cf. Num. 25:18; 31:16; Josh. 22:17. See BAAL-PEOR.

Pe-rae'a (pë-rë'a) or Pere'a (pë-rë'a) [Gr., the land beyond]. The region between the Jabbok and the Arnon, beyond Jordan (Jos. War iii. 3, 3); cf. signification and location of Abarim. The name was, however, used in a wider sense; for Josephus calls Gadara, on the banks of the Yarmük, the capital of Perea (Jos. War iv. 7, 3).

Per'a-zim (pë'rä-zim). See BAAL-PERAZIM.

Pe'res (pë'rës). See MENE.

Pe'resh (pë'rësh) [distinction, separation, dung]. A man of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:16).

Pe'rez (pë'rëz), in A.V. of O.T. Pha'rez except thrice (I Chron. 27:3; Neh. 11:4, 6); in A.V. of N.T. Pha'res [a breach]. A son of Judah, 1 of twins whom Tamar bore (Gen. 38:24-30). He became the founder of a tribal family which took its name from him, and of 2 other tribal families which sprang from his sons and were named from them (Num. 26:

20, 21; I Chron. 2:4, 5). He was an ancestor of David and consequently of Christ (Ruth 4:12-18; Matt. 1:3).

Pe'rez-uz'za (pě'rěz-űz'á) and Pe'rez-uz'zah (pě'rěz-űz'á) [breach of Uzza]. The name given by David to the place where Uzza was struck dead for touching the Ark (II Sam. 6:8; I Chron. 13:11). Exact situation unknown.

Per-fum'ery. Spices of various kinds, such as aloe, cassia, cinnamon, myrrh, frankincense, spikenard, which were raised in the Jordan Valley or imported from Arabia and elsewhere, formed the basis of perfumery (Ecclus. 24:15). The spice was compelled to yield its fragrance by at least 4 different methods. It was tied in a bundle or enclosed in a bag (S. of Sol. 1:13); it was reduced to powder and burned as incense (ch. 3:6); its aromatic matter was separated by boiling, and the extract was carried as scent in smelling-bottles suspended from the girdle, or was mixed with oil and used as an ointment (S. of Sol. 1:3; Isa. 3:20; John 12:3). Frequently several spices were compounded (Ex. 30:23, 24; John 19:39). Perfumery was applied to the person and garments and furniture (Ps. 45:8; Prov. 7:17; S. of Sol. 4:11). It was used in the Temple service both as incense and as ointment (Ex. 30:22-38).

Per'ga (pŭr'gá). A town in Pamphylia, and under the Romans the capital of the province, on the right bank of the river Cestrus, 7½ miles from the mouth. Paul and Barnabas visited the town on the First Missionary Journey, both going and returning (Acts 13:13, 14; 14:25). In the vicinity was a celebrated temple of the goddess Artemis of the Asiatic type (see DIANA), who was known as the queen of Perga.

Per'ga-mum (pŭr'gá-mŭm), in A.V. Per'ga-mos (pŭr'gá-mōs). The most important city of Mysia, situated 3 miles n. of the river Caicus, about 15 miles from the sea. It was once the capital of a wealthy kingdom ruled over by a dynasty of kings, several of them called Attalus. The first of these kings, Attalus I, came to the throne in the year 241 B.C. He defeated the Gauls and settled them in the district henceforth known as Galatia. His son Eumenes, who succeeded him, 197 B.C., adorned the city and founded a celebrated library, which ultimately was 2d only to that of Alexandria. Attalus III, who died in the year 133 B.C., bequeathed his property to the Romans, but granted independence to Pergamum and some of the surrounding country. The Romans erected the kingdom into the province of Asia (129-126 B.C.) and made Pergamum the capital. Mark Antony gave the library of 200,000 volumes to Cleopatra and had it removed to Egypt, where it was added to the renowned Alexandrian library. The acropolis of Pergamum crowned a steep hill that rose 1,000 feet above the plain. Near the summit stood an immense altar to Zeus, erected by Eumenes II to commemorate the victory won by his father over the Gauls; and at a short distance from this altar there was an elegant temple of Athene. In the Roman period a temple to the divine Augustus was also built on the acropolis. Outside the city was a famous shrine of Asklepios (Æsculapius), god of medicine, to which people from all quarters flocked for healing. Parchment, called in Lat. pergamena, and in Gr. pergamēnē, was so named because it was first obtained at Pergamum. The 3d of the 7 churches of Asia addressed in the book of Revelation was that at Pergamum. It is said that Satan's seat was there, and that a faithful martyr, Antipas, had been put to death in the place. It must, therefore, have been a stronghold of anti-Christian idolatry (Rev. 1:11; 2:12-17). It is now called Bergama.

Peri'da (pě-rĭ'dá). See PERUDA.

Per'iz-zites (pěr'i-zīts) [dwellers in the open country]. An important section of the Canaanites, often enumerated as one of the tribes of Palestine (Gen. 15:20; Ex. 3:8; Josh. 9:1), and perhaps, like the Rephaim, an aboriginal people who were of different race from the Canaanites and in the land before them (cf. Gen. 13:7; Josh. 17:15; and the omission of them in Gen. 10:15 seq.). They were in the country as early as the days of Abraham and Lot (Gen. 13:7). In Joshua's time they inhabited the mountain region (Josh. 11:3), dwelling in the territory afterward given over to the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh (Josh. 17:15), and Judah (Judg. 1:4, 5). They were not extirpated, but, contrary to the Law of Moses (Deut. 7:3), allowed to enter into marriage alliances with their conquerors, seducing them into idolatry (Judg. 3:5, 6). Solomon imposed upon these Perizzites a yoke of bondservice (I Kings 9:20, 21; II Chron. 8:7).

Per'seus (pŭr'sŭs). Son and successor of Philip III, and last king of Macedon. In 171 B.C. he resumed the war with the Romans which his father had waged; but, after 3 years of desultory fighting and occasional success, he was completely defeated (I Macc. 8:5) by L. Aemilius Paulus in the battle of Pydna (168 B.C.), which ended the Macedonian monarchy.

Pers'ia (pŭr'zhá). Persia proper, the seat of the Persians when they first became known to the Western nations as a settled people, lay s.e. of Elam and nearly corresponded to the province of modern Persia called Fars, or Farsistan, a modification of the original native name Pārsa. Persia, in this limited sense, was bounded on the n. by Great Media (Media Magna), on the s.w. by the Persian Gulf, on the e. by Carmania (now called Kerman), and on the n.w. by Susiana. Its length was at most about 250 miles; its average breadth about 200; its area considerably less than 50,000 square miles. In looser usage, the term Persia denoted the plateau of Iran, the region bounded by the Persian Gulf, the valleys of the Tigris and the Cyrus, the Caspian Sea, the rivers Oxus, Jaxartes, and Indus (I Macc. 6:1; II Macc. 1:19). But when the Persian Empire was at the height of its power, it stretched from the empire of India on the e. to the Grecian Archipelago on the w.; and from the Danube, the Black Sea, the Caucasus, and the Caspian Sea on the n., to the Arabian and Nubian deserts on the s. (Esth. 1:1; 10:1); and it was nearly 3,000 miles long, with a varying breadth of 500 to 1,500 miles. It had an area of 2,000,000 square miles, half that of Europe. The race inhabiting Persia proper was Aryan, closely related to the Median race.

The Persians are not mentioned in the table of nations (Gen., ch. 10). About 700 B.C. Persia, was one of the allies of Elam. But soon Teispes, a chief of the tribe and a member of the family of the Achaemenidae, conquered Elam and established himself as king in the district of Anshan. His descendants branched into 2 lines, 1 reigning in Anshan and the other remaining in Persia. His great-grandson, Cyrus II, became king of Anshan (c. 558); united the divided power; conquered Media c. 550 B.C., Lydia in Asia Minor in 546, and Babylonia in 539. He allowed the Hebrew exiles to return to their own land; see CYRUS. Dying in 529 B.C., he was succeeded by his son Cambyses, who became jealous of his brother Smerdis (Bardiya) and had him privately put to death. In 525 the king conquered Egypt and remained there for 3 years. In the meanwhile a Magian, Gaumāta by name, personating Smerdis made himself king and ruled for 7 months, 522 B.C., the year in which Cambyses died. It is not certain whether the latter committed suicide. Gaumāta was slain in the autumn of 522. Darius I, son of Hystaspes, apparently the next heir to the throne when the family of Cyrus became extinct, began to reign in 521 B.C. The accession of the new king was the signal for a general revolt of the provinces, but the insurrection was suppressed, and Darius organized a new empire which extended from India to the Grecian Archipelago and the Danube; he divided it into 20 satrapies. It was under Darius that the Temple at Jerusalem was rebuilt. He died 486 B.C.; see DARIUS 2. His son and successor was Xerxes I, the Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther and probably of Ezra 4:6. He reconquered the Egyptians; and he attempted an invasion of Greece, but was repulsed with great loss to the Persians; see AHASUERUS 2. After a reign of 21 years, he was assassinated in 465 B.C. His son and successor, a much more respectable character, but still fickle and feeble, was Artaxerxes (I) Longimanus. He was not unfriendly to the Jews. He allowed Ezra to lead a large number of them back to Jerusalem, and he permitted Nehemiah to rebuild the walls of the city; see ARTAXERXES. He reigned 40 years, dying in 424 B.C. His successors were Xerxes II, 424; Sogdianus, 424; Darius (II) Nothus (the Illegitimate), 423-404; Artaxerxes (II) Mnemon (of good memory), 404-359/8; Artaxerxes (III) Ochus, 359/8-338/7; Arses, 338/7-336/5; and Darius (III) Codomannus, 336/5-331. The last king was conquered by Alexander the Great in 331 B.C., and with him the first Persian empire passed away. See DARIUS 3.

The royal residences were Persepolis (II Macc. 9:2), Susa, i.e., Shushan (Neh. 1:1; Esth. 1:2), Ecbatana, i.e., Achmetha (Ezra 6:2; Jos. Antiq. x. 11, 7), and to an extent Babylon (Ezra 6:1).

When Cyrus the Great allowed the Jews to return to their own land, 538 B.C., he did not grant them their independence. They were placed under governors appointed by the Persian emperor (Neh. 3:7), and formed part of the satrapy Beyond-the-river (Ezra 8:36) which consisted of Syria, Palestine, Phoenicia, and Cyprus (Herod. iii. 91). They were subjects of Persia for 207 years, from 539, the year in which Cyrus entered Babylon, to 332, that in which Alexander the Great completed the conquest of Palestine.

The religion of the empire was a dualism, Zoroastrianism, so named after its founder Zarathustra (Zoroaster); no effort, however, was made to enforce it on the subject peoples. It was a spiritual religion, recognizing the distinction between God and nature, between spirit and matter, and consequently being averse to images of God. Its fundamental ethical principle was the essential contradiction between good and evil, light and darkness. It conceived of 2 realms of spirits: 1 with a hierarchy of angels and archangels, where Ahuramazda or Ormazd the all-wise lord, God in the fullest sense, presides over the 7 holy spirits, who are his ministers and the expression of his attributes, and over thousands of worthy ones; and another realm of evil spirits ruled over by Ahriman, the spiritual enemy. It taught the duty of man to eradicate evil and cultivate good, and to strive after holiness in thought, word, and deed, which will be rewarded by immortality and heaven. Fire, air, earth, and water are considered the creation of Ahuramazda and consequently are holy. See MAQI. Later Judaism shows traces of Persian influence.

What once had been Persia passed first to the Macedonian Greeks and their successors of the same race. Then it became part of the Parthian Empire. In A.D. 208 Ardashir laid the foundations of a new Persian sovereignty, ruled by a dynasty called after his family Sassanian. In 224 he defeated and slew Artabanus V, the last Parthian king. In A.D. 226 Ardashir took the title of King of Kings of Iran. The Sassanian dynasty became powerful, met the Roman armies on equal terms, and set limits to the extension of their sway in the East. In A.D. 637 and 641, Yazdagird III, the last of the dynasty, was defeated by the Moslems, and Persia came under Mohammedan rule, which has continued till now. Some of the bolder spirits refused to submit to Mohammedan domination, and fled to the deserts and the mountains. Finally, a number of Persian refugees in the 8th century found a home in India. Their successors constitute a limited but important section of the Indian community. They are called Parsees. The modern name of Persia is Iran.

Per'sis (pūr'sis) [Gr., Persian]. A Christian at Rome who labored diligently in the Lord, and to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. 16:12).

Peru'da (pē-rōō'dā), Peri'da [divided, separated]. A subdivision of the children of Solomon's servants who returned from captivity (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57).

Pes'tilence. An infectious or contagious disease, a plague. While the sending of pestilence is frequently mentioned as from God (Ex. 9:15; Lev. 26:25; Deut. 28:21), he very often, if not in all cases, uses secondary causes for its production. The punishment which is threatened is often described as the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, and these words tend to stand in this order (Ezek. 6:11). There is reason for this order. War breaks out. The people of the invaded country cannot cultivate their fields, or, if they do, they find their crops reaped or destroyed by the enemy. Besiegers invest the cities and intentionally cut off supplies with the object of forcing a surrender. Famine ensues in country and town. The starvation, the carnage, and the unsanitary condition of the cities crowded during the siege bring a pestilence.

Pē'ter (pē'tēr) [Lat. Petrus, from Gr. Petros, a rock]. A translation of Aram. Cephas, a rock (John 1:42; I Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal. 1:18; 2:9, 11, 14), which Christ bestowed upon Simon or, more properly, Symeon or Simeon (Acts 15:14; II Peter 1:1, R.V. marg.) on his first appearance before him (John 1:42), and afterward explained more fully in its prophetic import (Matt. 16:18 seq.; Mark 3:16). Simon was the son of a certain John (John 1:42, R.V.; 21:15, 16, 17, R.V.) or Jona (Matt. 16:17, probably an equivalent of John), who, with his sons, Andrew and Peter, followed the trade of a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee in partnership with the sons of Zebedee (Matt. 4:18; Mark 1:16; Luke 5:3 seq.). He was a native of Bethsaida (John 1:44), and subsequently dwelt with his family at Capernaum (Matt. 8:14; Luke 4:38).

Peter was probably a disciple of John the Baptist, and was in the 1st instance brought to Jesus by his brother Andrew, who was 1 of the favored 2 disciples of John whom he pointed to Jesus immediately after his return from the temptation in the wilderness. With prophetic insight into Simon's character, Jesus at once conferred upon him the surname of Cephas, or Peter, that is, "Rock" (John 1:35-42). In common with the earliest followers of Jesus, Peter received 3 separate calls from his Master: 1st, to become his disciple; 2d, to become his constant companion (Matt. 4:19; Mark 1:17; Luke 5:10); and, 3d, to be his apostle (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:14, 16; Luke 6:13, 14). Peter's ardor, earnestness, courage, vigor, and impetuosity of disposition marked him from the first as the leader of the disciples of Jesus. He is always named 1st in the lists of the apostles (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:16; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). In the more intimate circle of the most favored 3 disciples, he is likewise always named 1st (Matt. 17:1; Mark 5:37; 9:2; 13:3; 14:33; Luke 8:51; 9:28). He was the natural spokesman of the apostolic band. He was the 1st to confess Jesus as the Christ of God, but was equally forward to dissuade him from his chosen path of suffering, receiving from Christ the appropriate praise and blame (Matt. 16:16-23; Mark 8:29-33).

Peter's life exhibits 3 well-marked stages. 1. The period of training, as exhibited in the Gospel narrative. During these years of personal association with Christ, he learned to know both Christ and himself. And though he brought them to an end in a threefold denial of the Master whom he had boasted that he at least would never forsake (Matt. 26:69 seq.; Mark 14:66 seq.; Luke 22:54 seq.; John 18:15 seq.), Jesus closed them with a loving probing of his heart and restoration of his peace and confidence (John 21:15 seq.). 2. The period of leadership in the Church, as exhibited in the earlier chapters of The Acts. During these years Peter justified his surname, and fulfilled the prophecy that on him should the edifice of the Church be raised (Matt. 16:18). It was by his bold and strong hand that the Church was led in every step. It was he who moved the disciples to fill up the broken ranks of the apostolate (Acts 1:15); it was he who proclaimed to the assembled multitudes the meaning of the Pentecostal effusion (ch. 2:14); he was the leader in the public healing of the lame man and in the subsequent sermon and defense (chs. 3:4, 12; 4:8); it was by his voice that Ananias and Sapphira were rebuked (ch. 5:3, 8). Above all, it was by his hand that the door of salvation was opened alike to the Jews in the great sermon at Pentecost (ch. 2:10, 38) and to the Gentiles in the case of Cornelius (ch. 10). 3. The period of humble work in the Kingdom of Christ, exhibited in the Epistles of the N.T. When the foundations of the Church had been laid, Peter took a subordinate place, and in humble labors to spread the boundaries of the Kingdom disappeared from the page of history. In the Church at Jerusalem James takes henceforth the leading place (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; Gal. 2:9, 12). The door had been opened to the Gentiles, and Paul now becomes the apostle to the Gentiles (Gal. 2:7). As the apostle to the circumcision (Gal. 2:8), Peter prosecuted henceforth his less brilliant work, wherever Jews could be found, and contentedly left Jerusalem to James and the Gentile world to Paul. The book of The Acts closes its account of him at the meeting at Jerusalem (ch. 15), when his policy of breaking down the barriers for the Gentiles met with universal acceptance. We hear of him afterward at Antioch (Gal. 2:11), possibly at Corinth (I Cor. 1:12), and certainly as prosecuting his work through missionary journeys, taking his wife with him (I Cor. 9:5). Finally he glorified God by a martyr's death (cf. John 21:19). Beyond this, Scripture tells us nothing of his fortunes, labors, sufferings, or successes, except what can be learned from his 2 epistles. In them he stands before us in a singularly beautiful humility, not pressing the recognition of personal claims to leadership upon the Christian community, but following up the teaching of Paul or of Jude with his own, and exhorting his readers to hold fast to the common faith.

Few characters in Scripture history are drawn for us more clearly or strongly than Peter's. In the Gospels, in The Acts, and in the Epistles it is the same man who stands out before us in dramatic distinctness. Always eager, ardent, impulsive, he is pre-eminently the man of action in the apostolic circle, and exhibits the defects of his qualities as well as their excellences throughout life (Matt. 16:22; 26:69-75; Gal. 2:11). His virtues and faults had their common root in his enthusiastic disposition; it is to his praise that along with the weed of rash haste there grew more strongly into his life the fair plant of burning love and ready reception of truth. He was treated with distinguished honor by his Lord; he was made the recipient of no less than 3 miracles in those early days of the Gospels; he was granted a special appearance after the resurrection (I Cor. 15:5); Jesus could find time in his Passion and while saving the world to cast on him a reminding glance and to bind up his broken heart. Accordingly the life of Peter is peculiarly rich in instruction, warning, and comfort for the Christian, and his writings touch the very depths of Christian experience and soar to the utmost heights of Christian hope.

Authentic history adds but little to our knowledge of Peter's life beyond what we glean from the N.T. Conformably to the prophecy of his martyrdom in John 21:19, we are credibly told that he died by crucifixion about the time of Paul's death by the sword, that is about A.D. 68. The place of his death is not incredibly witnessed to be Rome. Legend was early busy with his life; the Roman legend of his 25 years' episcopate in Rome has its roots in early apocryphal stories originating among the heretical Ebionites, and is discredited not less by its origin and manifest internal inconsistencies than by all authentic history.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER

The author of this epistle announces himself as the Apostle Peter (ch. 1:1); and the whole internal character of the letter as well as exceptionally copious historical attestation bears out the assertion. It is addressed "to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" (ch. 1:1), which evidently refers to the whole body of Christians inhabiting the region comprised in modern Asia Minor. That the readers in the mind of the author were largely of Gentile origin is clear from such passages as chs. 1:14; 2:9, 10; 3:6; 4:3. These were churches founded and nurtured in large part by the Apostle Paul, and to them Paul had written his letters to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Colossians; Peter writes to them as those who owed their conversion to others than himself (ch. 1:12, 25), and in order to testify that the gospel they had received was "the true grace of God" and to exhort them to "stand . . . fast therein" (ch. 5:12). Thus he publishes his hearty agreement with the Apostle Paul and at the same time pens what is pre-eminently the epistle of hope. The place of its composition was probably Rome, for Babylon (ch. 5:13) according to early patristic tradition was a mystic name of the new center of persecution of the people of God. Its date is set by its copious use of The Epistle to the Ephesians on the one side, and the death of Peter on the other, as between A.D. 63 and A.D. 67; it is most probable that it was written about 64 or 65. Allusion is made to the epistle as being Peter's in II Peter 3:1 (cf. ch. 1:1); it is unmistakably quoted by Polycarp, a disciple of the Apostle John; it is definitely quoted also as the writing of the Apostle Peter by Irenaeus and Tertullian in the closing decades of the 2d century; and from the very beginning it has always held a secure place in the Christian Bible in every part of the world, and has always been in the fullest use by Christians of every land.

The style in which the letter is written is at once simple, striking, and forcible, abounding in sudden and abrupt transitions and admirably reflecting the character of the writer. The whole mode of presentation of its matter is special and characteristic, though the doctrine presented is distinctly the same as that of the epistles of Paul, set forth here with prevailing reference to the grace of God and the future hope.

The epistle is filled to a remarkable degree with reminiscences of earlier Christian writings, particularly of the Epistles to the Romans and to the Ephesians and The Epistle of James (cf. I Peter 2:6, 8 with Rom. 9:32, 33; I Peter 2:5; 3:8, 9; 4:7-11 with Rom. 12:1, and vs. 16, 17, and vs. 3, 6; I Peter 2:18 and ch. 3:1-7 with Eph. 6:5 and ch. 5:22, 23; I Peter 1:1, 6, 7, 23 and ch. 5:6 with James 1:1, 2, 3, 18 and I Peter 4:10). It is remarkable for the combined depth and beauty of its Christian teaching. After the greeting (I Peter 1:1, 2) there follows an introductory section (ch. 1:3-12) in which God is praised for the blessings of salvation. The body of the letter (chs. 1:13 to 5:11) consists of: (1) a series of exhortations to a diligent Christian walk, correspondent to the teaching its readers had received (chs. 1:13 to 2:10); (2) a number of particular directions for the special relationships of life (chs. 2:11 to 4:6; and (3) some closing instructions for the present needs of the readers (chs. 4:7 to 5:11). It ends with salutations and announcements (ch. 5:12-14).

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER

Critics are not agreed concerning the date and authorship of this epistle. The author describes himself as "Symeon Peter, a bond-servant and apostle of Jesus Christ" (II Peter 1:1, R.V. marg.), and represents himself as having been present at Christ's transfiguration (ch. 1:16), and as having received from him a prediction regarding his death (ch. 1:14; cf. John 21:19), and also as standing on an equality with the Apostle Paul (II Peter 3:15). Yet many difficulties confront the acceptance of this testimony. In the first place, a lack of simplicity in the style and of ease in expression exhibited in II Peter is in striking contrast with the simplicity of style in I Peter. As early as Jerome's time this difference was made an argument for diversity of authorship. Furthermore, many scholars are loath to believe that in the lifetime of Peter the epistles of Paul could have been put on a par with the O.T. Scriptures (II Peter 3:15 seq.). Moreover, the uncertainty in some quarters of the Early Church regarding its authenticity (cf. Eusebius H.E. iii. 3, 1-4; vi. 25, 8) and the fact that the Syrian Church did not receive it into the canon until early in the 6th century deserve serious consideration. Calvin entertained doubts as to its genuineness, and most modern scholars regard it as the work of an unknown author, who c. A.D. 150 wrote in the name of the great Apostle Peter in order to secure a wider hearing.

In defense of its Petrine authorship, however, a few first-class scholars explain the difference in style by supposing that II Peter reflects the rugged diction of the apostle himself, while I Peter was freely composed by an amanuensis, Silvanus (I Peter 5:12), albeit under Peter's supervision. Moreover these scholars point out certain similarities between the two epistles: both manifest a fondness for the pl. of abstract nouns, and there is noticeable in each the habit of presenting both the negative and positive aspect of a thought (e.g., I Peter 1:12, 14 seq., 18 seq.; and II Peter 1:16, 21; 2:4 seq.; 3:9, 17). These men furthermore interpret the doubts entertained in the Early Church concerning the authorship of II Peter as evidence of the strictness which was maintained in refusing to admit as canonical any writing that was not definitely apostolic; that it was finally approved by the Church is a token of its genuineness. In conclusion, while perplexing doubts arise still there is sufficient evidence for believing that II Peter is genuine.

The form of its address is quite general: "to them that have obtained a like precious faith with us" (II Peter 1:1); but ch. 3:1 shows that the same readers, or some one territorial group among them, are the ones to whom I Peter had been sent. The place from which it was written cannot be confidently ascertained; if the allusion in ch. 1:14 implies that Peter was on the verge of his martyrdom, we may think of Rome. In that case the letter should be dated in A.D. 68; and the nature of the errors rebuked in it, and its probable use of The Epistle of Jude as well as its allusion to I Peter, will accord with this date.

Its object, as is declared in II Peter 3:1, 17, 18, was to stir up the minds of its readers to remember what had been taught them, to the end that they might be saved from the errors now becoming prevalent and might grow in grace and the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. It was written, in other words, to rebuke the nascent Gnosticism creeping into the churches, and to build up Christians in true knowledge and purity. The contents of the letter are in full accord with its object. After the usual apostolic greeting (ch. 1:1, 2), it passes insensibly into an earnest exhortation to growth in grace and knowledge (vs. 3-11), and thence into a reminder of the grounds on which this knowledge, itself the basis of piety, rests (vs. 12-21), and a denunciation of the false teachers (ch. 2:1-22). The readers are then reminded of the nature and surety of the teaching given them as to the 2d advent and the end of the world (ch. 3:1-13); and the letter closes with an exhortation to them to make their calling and election sure, including a commendation of Paul's letters, and concludes with a doxology (vs. 14-18).

B. B. W. (rev., H. S. G.)

Peth'a-hi'ah (pěth'-ā-hī'ā) [Jehovah opened (the womb)]. 1. A descendant of Aaron whose family became the 19th course of priests (I Chron. 24:16).

2. A Levite who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23). He was probably the Levite of the name who assisted Ezra in his religious work (Neh. 9:5).

3. A man of Judah, family of Zerach, and an official of the Persian king for all matters concerning the people (Neh. 11:24).

Pe'thor (pě'thōr). A town near the Euphrates (Num. 22:5), by the mountains of Aram or Mesopotamia (Num. 23:7; Deut. 23:4). The town was captured by Shalmaneser II of Assyria from the Hittites, who called it Pitru; long before that time it appears in Thutmose III's list of Syrian towns. It was situated on the w. bank of the Euphrates, near the river Sagura, now Sajur, a few miles s. of Carchemish.

Pe'thu'el (pě-thū'ēl). Father of the Prophet Joel (Joel 1:1).

Pe'tra (pě'trá). See SELA.

Pe-ul'lethai (pē-ūl'ē-thī), in A.V. Pe-ul'thai (pē-ūl'thī) [Jehovah is a reward, or reward of Jehovah]. A Levite, a doorkeeper, son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:5).

Pha'lee (fā'lēk). See PELEG.

Phal'tu (fāl'tō). See PALLU.

Phal'ti (fāl'tī). See PALTI.

Phal'ti-el (fāl'tī-ēl). See PALTIEL.

Pha-nu'el (fā-nū'ēl) [Gr. from Heb., face of God]. An Asherite, the father of Anna (Luke 2:36).

Phar'ao'h (fār'ō) [Egypt. pr-ʿ, great house]. A title used as the general designation of the sovereign of Egypt, both with and without the personal name attached.

Of the Pharaohs mentioned in the Bible, several, among whom are the Pharaohs of

Statue of Ramesses II, One of the Pharaohs

Abraham and Joseph, cannot be identified with any degree of certainty. For the Pharaoh of the oppression and the one of the Exodus, see EGYPT, III. 8.

1. SHISHAK. Called in Egyptian Sheshenk or Sheshonk, the 1st ruler of Dyn. XXII, the 1st of the Libyan period. An account of his expedition into Palestine (I Kings 14:25, 26; II Chron. 12:2-9), with the usual embellishments and exaggerations, is found on the s. wall of the temple at Karnak. He was probably an able statesman, since he was able to avoid a rupture with Solomon while keeping Solomon's enemy as a guest (I Kings 11:40). He shrewdly took advantage of the unsettled state of affairs in Palestine after the division of the kingdom, to make his invasion at that time when resistance to an enemy was necessarily weakened by dissensions at home. Jeroboam took refuge at his court some time after the 25th year of Solomon (I Kings 6:38; 7:1; 9:10, 24; 11:27), and the invasion of Judah took place in the 5th year of Rehoboam. Shishak reigned from 945 to 924 B.C.

2. ZERAH the Cushite, who undertook an expedition against Judah in the reign of Asa, leading an army composed of Ethiopians and Libyans, doubtless in addition to the Egyptian troops. His forces were routed at Maresah (II Chron. 14:9-15; 16:8). The monuments do not mention this military expedition, as it is their custom to pass over in silence their own defeats. Zerah is commonly identified with Osorkon I (924-895 B.C.), successor of Shishak in Dyn. XXII, or Bubastite Dynasty. Some scholars regard this identification as absurd and connect him with Arabia. The name occurs in S. Arabic inscriptions, and we may have here a reference to an Arabian invasion. Cush was the ancestor of Sheba and other Arabian divisions (cf. Gen. 10:7; II Chron. 21:16).

3. So, contemporary of Hoshea, king of Israel (II Kings 17:4); see So.

4. TIRHAKAH (Taharka in Egypt.), 3d and last king of Dyn. XXV, or Ethiopian Dynasty. As a youth of 20 he went n. from Napata, the capital of Ethiopia, with a king, probably his uncle Shabaka, when the latter invaded Egypt. A decade later this nephew was in command of the Egyptian and Ethiopian forces which were marching against the Assyrians. Sennacherib, king of Assyria, advancing through Philistia in the direction of Egypt in 701 B.C., heard a report that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, was coming against him (II Kings 19:9). In his own account of the affair Sennacherib, without mentioning their personal names, says that the kings of Egypt and the archers, chariots, and horses of the king of Ethiopia met him in battle at Eltekeh. About 688 B.C. Tirhakah became the Pharaoh. In 671 B.C. Sennacherib's son, Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, penetrated into the midst of the country, defeated Tirhakah, whom he calls king of Ethiopia, took Memphis, and made Tirhakah's son a captive. Tirhakah found refuge in Ethiopia, and on Esarhaddon's death in 669 B.C., returned to Egypt. Ashurbanipal sent an army against him, styling him king of Egypt and Ethiopia, and defeated his troops at Karbanit, near the mouth of the Canopic branch of the Nile. Tirhakah retired to Thebes. He still had the support of several minor kings of Egypt, among whom was Necho. Ashurbanipal afterward pursued him thither and took Thebes. This event occurred about 663 B.C.

5. Neco, also called Pharaoh-necho, Pharaoh-neco, A.V. Necho, Pharaoh-nechoh, son of Psamtik (Psammetichus) I. He was the 2d ruler of Dyn. XXVI and reigned from 609 to 593 B.C. He attempted to complete a canal connecting the Red Sea with the Nile, and sent a successful expedition to circumnavigate Africa (Herod. i. 158; iv. 42). He slew King Josiah at Megiddo (608) as the latter opposed his march toward Assyria. On Josiah's death the people set up his son Jehoahaz, but Pharaoh dethroned him and carried him off to Egypt, setting up in his stead his elder brother, Jehoiaquim (II Kings 23:29-34; II Chron. 35:20 to 36:4). Necho seems to have left his army at Carchemish and gone back to Egypt. In 605 B.C. he returned to his army, the object being to protect the interests of Egypt w. of the Euphrates. But he found himself opposed by Nebuchadnezzar; he was utterly routed by him, and lost all of Egypt's Asiatic possessions (II Kings 24:7).

6. PHARAOH-HOPHRA, the Ha'abrē' of the Egyptians, the Ouaphris of Manetho, and the Apries of Herodotus. He was the 2d successor of Necho, separated from him by the short reign of Psamtik II. He reigned 19 years, from 588 to 569 B.C. He was on the throne while Jeremiah and his fellow fugitives from Palestine still lived. The prophet intimated that Pharaoh-hophra should be given into the hands of his enemies, as Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, had been (Jer. 44:30). He was a warrior and appears to have conquered the combined fleets of Cyprus and Tyre, and he took Sidon. He failed at last in an attack on the Greek colony of Cyrene. He was killed in a revolt and was succeeded by Amasis (Ahmose II).

Phar'a-thon (fär'á-thŏn). See PIRATHON.

Pha'res (fär'réz) and Pha'rez (fär'réz). See PEREZ.

Phar'isees (fär'i-sēz) [Gr. from Aram. pārīshā, separated]. One of the 3 chief Jewish parties, the others being the Sadducees and the Essenes. It was the strictest group (Acts 26:5). In all probability the Pharisees originated in the period before the Maccabean war, in a reaction against the Hellenizing spirit which appeared among the Jews and manifested itself in the readiness of a part of the people to adopt Greek customs. Those who regarded these practices with abhorrence and their spread with alarm were incited to strict and open conformity to the Mosaic Law. They were drawn yet more closely together as a party by the fierce persecution which Antiochus Epiphanes, 175-163 B.C., set on foot against the faithful Israelites who would not abandon Judaism and accept the Greek faith, when he attempted to destroy the holy Scriptures, and commanded that whosoever was found with any Book of the Covenant or consented to the Law should be put to death (I Macc. 1:56, 57). The Hasidim (the Pietists) or Hasidaeans, who were mighty men of Israel, even all such as were voluntarily devoted unto the Law (ch. 2:42; cf. ch. 1:62, 63), participated in the Maccabean revolt as a distinct party. They probably were the forerunners of the Pharisees, although they did not bear that name. When the war ceased to be a struggle for religious liberty and became a contest for political supremacy, they ceased to take an active interest in it. They are not mentioned during the time that Jonathan and Simon were the Jewish leaders, 160-135 B.C. The Pharisees appear under their own name in the time of John Hyrcanus, 135-105 B.C. He was a disciple of theirs, but left them and joined the Sadducees (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 10, 5 and 6); and his son and successor, Alexander Jannaeus, endeavored to exterminate them by the sword. But his wife, Alexandra, who succeeded him in 78 B.C., recognizing that physical force is powerless against religious conviction, favored the Pharisees (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 5; 16, 1). Thenceforth their influence was paramount in the religious life of the Jewish people.

The Pharisees held the doctrine of foreordination and considered it consistent with the free will of man. They believed in the immortality of the soul, in the resurrection of the body, and in the existence of spirits; that men are rewarded or punished in the future life, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; that the souls of the wicked shall be detained forever in prison under the earth, while those of the virtuous rise and live again, removing into other bodies (Acts 23:8; Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 3; War ii. 8, 14). These doctrines distinguished them from the Sadducees, but did not constitute the essence of Pharisaism. Pharisaism is the final and necessary result of that conception of religion which makes religion consist in conformity to the Law and promises God's grace only to the doers of the Law. Religion becomes external. The disposition of the heart is less vital than the outward act. The interpretation of the Law and its application to the details of ordinary life accordingly became a matter of grave consequence, and expositions of the Law by recognized authorities grew to a body of precepts of binding force. Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, describes them as not merely accepting the Law of Moses, and interpreting it more skillfully than others, but adds that they had delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from the fathers which are not written in the Law of Moses (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 10, 6), these being the traditional interpretations of the elders, which our Lord pronounced to be of no binding authority (Matt. 15:2, 3, 6).

At first, when one incurred great danger in joining the party, the Pharisees were men of strong religious character; they were the best people in the nation. Subsequently Pharisaism became an inherited belief, the profession of it was popular, and men of character very inferior to that of the original members joined its ranks. With the lapse of time also the essentially vicious element in the system developed and laid the Pharisees, as commonly represented by the members of the party, open to scathing rebuke. John the Baptist called them and the Sadducees a generation of vipers; and it is well-known how severely our Lord denounced them for their self-righteousness, their hypocrisy, their inattention to the weightier matters of the Law, while being very particular as to minute points, with other faults (Matt. 5:20; 16:6, 11, 12; 23:1-39). They became a cunning body of men (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 2, 4). They took a prominent part in plotting the death of Christ (Mark 3:6; John 11:47-57). Yet they always numbered in their ranks men of perfect sincerity and the highest character. Paul in his early life was a Pharisee and was accustomed to bring forward the fact when he was reasoning with his countrymen (Acts 23:6; 26:5-7; Phil. 3:5). His teacher, Gamaliel, was of the same sect (Acts 5:34).

Pha'rosh (fär'rösh). See PAROSH.

Phar'par (fär'pär) [cf. Arab. farfar, haste]. Presumably the less important of the 2 rivers of Damascus, for Naaman mentions it only 2d (II Kings 5:12). According to the local tradition, which can be traced back to the middle of the 16th century, the Pharpar is the Taura, 1 of 7 canals which are drawn off from the Barada as it nears Damascus. It is more common, however, outside of Damascus, to identify the Pharpar with the A'waj, the only independent stream except the Barada within the territory of Damascus, but distant a ride of 3 hours from the city. It is formed by the confluence of several streams which take their rise in Mount Hermon. It pursues a tortuous course through the plain to the s. of the city and finally enters the most s. of 3 inland lakes. In dry weather its waters are sometimes absorbed before they even enter the lake.

Pha'se'ah (fä-sē'á). See PASEAH.

Pha'se'lis (fä-sē'lis). A city of Lycia, on the gulf of Pamphylia, with 3 excellent harbors. It enjoyed considerable commerce in early times (Herod. ii. 178). It was independent (I Macc. 15:23) until the war of 78-75 B.C., when the Romans destroyed it because it had become a center of organized piracy. It was rebuilt, but did not rise to importance again. It was a bishopric in the Byzantine period.

Phas'i-ron (fäs'i-rŏn). A Bedoun chief, or rather a Nabataean tribe (I Macc. 9:66).

Ph'e'be (fē'bē). See PHOEBE.

Phen'i'ce. See PHOENICIA and PHOENIX.

Phenicia (fê-nîsh'î-â). See PHOENICIA.

Phicol (fî'kôl), in A.V. Phicol (fî'kôl). The captain of the army of Abimelech, king of Gerar; present when treaty was made between Abimelech and Abraham, and between Abimelech or his successor with like title and Isaac (Gen. 21:22; 26:26).

Phileadelphia (fil'â-dêl'fî-â) [Gr., brotherly love]. 1. A city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, 28¼ miles s.e. of Sardis, in the plain of the Hermus. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, on a part of Mount Tmolus. In A.D. 17 it was destroyed by an earthquake, but was soon rebuilt. It was the seat of 1 of the 7 churches of Asia addressed in the book of Revelation (chs. 1:11; 3:7-13). Unlike most of the 7, it receives commendation and encouragement, unmixed with censure. It is now called Ala-Sheher.

2. A later name of Rabbah of the Ammonites. See RABBAH 1.

Philemon (fî-lê'môn) [Gr., loving]. A convert of the Apostle Paul's (Philemon 19), who resided in the same city with Archippus and from which Onesimus had come, viz., Colossae (cf. Philemon 2 with Col. 4:17; and Philemon 10 with Col. 4:9). There was a church in his house (Philemon 2). Paul calls him a fellow worker (v. 1) and speaks of his kindness to the saints (vs. 5-7). As Paul had never been in Colossae (cf. Col. 2:1), we may suppose that Philemon was converted in Ephesus during the apostle's ministry there (cf. Acts 19:10). It is not improbable that Archippus was Philemon's son and Apphia his wife (Philemon 2).

The Epistle of Paul to Philemon is the brief letter sent by Paul, in conjunction with Timothy, to Philemon. The latter's slave, Onesimus, had run away, perhaps taking with him some of Philemon's money (vs. 18, 19); and, having made his way to Rome, had there been converted through the instrumentality of the apostle (v. 10). Paul would gladly have retained him as a free attendant, but did not feel at liberty to do so without Philemon's consent (vs. 13, 14). He doubtless felt too that Onesimus, as a Christian, ought to seek the forgiveness of his master; and he was equally anxious that Philemon should both forgive and receive the converted wrongdoer. So he sent Onesimus back to Philemon, urging the latter to receive him as a brother beloved (v. 16), telling of the love he himself bore toward the convert (vs. 10, 12), and offering to repay Philemon for whatever loss Onesimus had caused him (vs. 18, 19). The letter is an exquisite production. It reveals the delicacy of Paul's feeling and the graciousness of his relations with his friends. It also illustrates the effect of Christianity on social relationships generally, the spirit of love and justice which were destined to reorganize society. When Onesimus carried this letter to Philemon, he accompanied Tychicus, who also bore the Epistle to the Colossians (Col. 4:7-9) and that to the Ephesians (Eph. 6:21, 22). All 3 epistles were written at the same time, probably c. A.D. 62, and from Rome.

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Philetus (fî-lê'tûs) [Lat. from Gr., worthy of love]. One who joined with Hymenaeus in propagating the error that the resurrection is already past (II Tim. 2:17, 18).

Philip (fil'ip) [Gr., fond of horses]. 1. Father of Alexander the Great of Macedonia (I Macc. 1:1). He took charge of the government in 359 B.C., as regent for Amyntas, the son of his brother Perdiccas, and by skillful negotiations and successful war delivered the country from the danger which beset it by reason of the hostility of the Paenionians, Illyrians, and Athenians. In view of these difficulties the Macedonians obliged him to take the monarchy himself. He captured Amphipolis and annexed it to his dominions in 357, and crossing the river Strymon, he took possession of Thracian territory and occupied Crenides, which he renamed Philippi (356). These achievements marked only the beginning of his unchecked career of conquest in Greece, by which he raised Macedonia from an obscure state to be the dominant power in Greek affairs. He was assassinated in 336 B.C., and was succeeded by Alexander.

2. Another king of Macedon, and 5th of the name. He entered into an alliance with Hannibal against the Romans in 215 B.C., but they held him in check with the co-operation of the Aetolians, who in 206 made a separate peace with him. In 200 B.C. the Romans invaded his kingdom. He successfully resisted them for 2 years, but in 197 he was completely defeated (I Macc. 8:5) by the Roman general Flaminius at Cynocephalae in Thessaly, and forced to conclude a humiliating peace. He died in 179 B.C.

3. Foster brother of Antiochus Epiphanes (II Macc. 9:29), and 1 of his privileged friends (I Macc. 6:14). When Antiochus was in Persia, high unto death, he appointed Philip regent during the minority of the young Antiochus (v. 15). Lysias, however, who was in Syria, usurped the position (v. 17). Philip returned in haste and obtained temporary possession of Antioch, the capital (vs. 55, 63). But Lysias succeeded in capturing the city. According to Josephus (Jos. Antiq. xii. 9, 7) Philip was executed, but perhaps he escaped and fled to Egypt before the city fell (II Macc. 9:29).

It has been conjectured, on insufficient grounds, that he is identical with Philip, the Phrygian who was made governor of Judea by Antiochus (II Macc. 5:22), and that he was the master of the elephants at the battle of Magnesia (Livy xxxvii. 41).

4. A son of Herod the Great, and the 1st husband of Herodias and brother or half-brother of Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:3; Luke 3:19). He is not called the tetrarch, and there is reason to believe that he was a different person from Philip the tetrarch, half-brother of Herod Antipas. In giving the genealogy of a portion of Herod the Great's family, Josephus states that Herodias married Herod, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, daughter of the high priest Simon; that she left him to live with Antipas his half-brother; and that her daughter Salome married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, and after Philip's death took another husband (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4). Thus, according to Josephus, the 1st husband of Herodias was a different person from Philip the tetrarch. The writers of the N.T. agree with Josephus in that they make Herodias' 1st husband a brother of Herod Antipas the tetrarch, and do not identify him with Philip the tetrarch, whom they also know (Luke 3:1). They differ as to his name. It is commonly believed that both authorities are right, and accordingly the 1st husband of Herodias is often designated Herod Philip. For among the children of Herod the Great 2 sons, born of different mothers, were named after Herod's father Antipas or Antipater. Three of his sons, born of 3 different mothers, were called Herod; one of whom, however, had a 2d name Antipas, and was spoken of indifferently either as Herod or Antipas (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; xviii. 5, 1; 6, 2). One of the sons whom his wife Cleopatra of Jerusalem bore was called Philip; and it is probable that Mariamne's son, who is called Herod by Josephus, had the name of Philip also. Herod Philip after the execution of his half-brothers Alexander and Aristobulus, was next in order of birth to Antipater, Herod the Great's first-born, and for a time he was recognized as next in succession to the throne (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 3, 2); but he was passed over in Herod's later will.

5. Philip the tetrarch. One of the 2 sons of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. He was brought up at Rome with his half-brothers Archelaus and Antipas (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; War i. 28, 4). In A.D. 4 he advocated the claims of Archelaus to succeed their common father, and was himself appointed by the emperor Augustus to be over Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and certain parts of Zeno's house about Jamnia (Jos. War ii. 6, 1-3; cf. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4). He was still tetrarch of the region of Iturea and Trachonitis in the 15th year of Tiberius Caesar when John the Baptist began his public life (Luke 3:1). He married Salome, the daughter of Herod, Mariamne's son, and Herodias (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4). He enlarged the town of Paneas, at the source of the Jordan, and named it Caesarea. It was afterward often spoken of as Caesarea Philippi (Matt. 16:13), to distinguish it from Caesarea on the sea. He also raised the village of Bethsaida to the dignity of a city and called it Julius, in honor of Julia, daughter of Augustus and wife of Tiberius (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; War ii. 9, 1). He reigned from 4 B.C. to A.D. 34, dying in the 20th year of Tiberius Caesar. His character was excellent, and his rule was mild and just (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 6). His dominions were annexed to the province of Syria, but in A.D. 37 were assigned to Herod Agrippa I, who in A.D. 41 absorbed them into his larger Jewish kingdom.

6. Philip the apostle. One of the 12 apostles (Matt. 10:3). His home was in Bethsaida, on the Sea of Galilee, and he was a fellow townsman of Andrew and Peter. Jesus met him at Bethany beyond the Jordan, where John was baptizing, won his faith, and called him to be a disciple. He found Nathanael and brought him to Jesus, in the conviction that an interview with the Master would convince Nathanael that Jesus was the Messiah. His confidence was justified (John 1:43-48). A year later Jesus chose him to be an apostle. When our Lord was about to perform the miracle of feeding the 5,000, he first proved Philip, and awoke a conception of the magnitude of the miracle by asking Philip: "Whence are we to buy bread, that these may eat?" (John 6:5, 6). On the day of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, certain Greeks desired to see Jesus, and applied to Philip, who put them in communication with Jesus (John 12:20-23). In making the acquaintance of Christ, the disciples had been making acquaintance with the Father; but when Christ spoke to them about their having known and seen the Father, Philip appeared not to understand and said: "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us" (John 14:8-12). He is named after the resurrection as one of the apostles who met in the upper chamber (Acts 1:13). This is the last authentic notice we have of him.

7. Philip the evangelist. He was 1 of the 7 men of good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom, chosen to be deacons to look after the interests of the Greek-speaking widows and probably the poor generally in the church at Jerusalem, and is mentioned next in order to the martyr Stephen (Acts 6:5). Persecution followed the death of Stephen, and the Christians were scattered abroad. Philip became an evangelist. He visited Samaria, preached the gospel, wrought miracles, and made many converts (chs. 8:4-8; 21:8); among them was Simon the sorcerer, popularly known as Simon Magus (ch. 8:9-25). Afterward, by direction of an angel, Philip went along the road from Jerusalem to Gaza, on which, after a time, he met, preached to, and baptized the Ethiopian eunuch (ch. 8:26-39). He afterward visited Azotus (Ashdod), and then went on preaching till he reached Caesarea (v. 40). He was still in that city years afterward when Paul passed through it on his last journey to Jerusalem. The fact is noted that Philip had 4 virgin daughters who had the gift of prophecy (ch. 21:8, 9).

Phil-ipp'i (fi-lip'i). A Macedonian city, called originally Crenides (Krenides, place of small fountains). It was within the limits of ancient Thrace, but in 356 B.C. Philip II of Macedon annexed the country as far as the river Nestus and thus took in the town, which he enlarged and strengthened and called after his own name. In its vicinity were rich gold and silver mines, the produce of which greatly aided Philip in carrying out his ambitious projects. In 168 B.C. the Roman consul Aemilius Paullus inflicted at Pydna a decisive and very sanguinary defeat on Perseus, the last of the Macedonian kings; and Philippi, with the rest of the territory, fell into the hands of the victors. In 42 B.C. 2 decisive battles took place in the neighborhood between Brutus and Cassius, 2 of Caesar's leading assassins, and Octavian and Antony, his chief avengers. After Octavian had become Augustus Caesar he took an interest in the place where he had gained the victory, and sent a Roman colony to Philippi. Luke refers to it as a colony (Acts 16:12). It was the 1st city of the district; not the capital, which was Amphipolis, but either the place of 1st importance or the 1st city reached by a traveler from the sea. About A.D. 52 Paul visited the city, making various converts, of whom the chief were Lydia of Thyatira, the damsel possessed with the spirit of divination, and the Philippian jailer (Acts 16:12-40). The 2d of these successes had brought on persecution and imprisonment of the evangelists or they would not have had access to the jailer to do him spiritual good (1 Thess. 2:2). Paul had to leave the place abruptly on this occasion, but he visited it again at a future period, sailing thence en route to Syria (Acts 20:3-6).

Philippi lies inland about 10 miles n.w. of its seaport Neapolis, the 2 being separated by a mountain range, the pass over which is about 1,600 feet above the sea level. The 2 towns were connected by a part of the great Egnatian Road. At first Philippi was confined to a small hill rising from the midst of a plain; an immense marsh lay directly s. of the town, fed by springs which gave it the older name of Crenides. The plain is connected with the basin of the Strymon by the valley of the Gangites, now called Angista.

Phil-ipp'i-ans (fi-lip'i-anz). The natives or inhabitants of Philippi (Phil. 4:15). The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians was written by Paul, associating also Timothy with him, "to all the saints in Christ Jesus that are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons" (Phil. 1:1); a Christian community of which Paul himself had gathered the nucleus, and the first of the churches which he had founded in Europe. When Paul wrote the epistle, he was a prisoner (ch. 1:7, 13, 14, 16). But where, in Caesarea, or Ephesus, or Rome? He was apparently in the custody of the Praetorian Guard (ch. 1:13, R.V.), and he sends salutations from the saints that are of Caesar's household (ch. 4:22). Many about him were actively engaged in propagating Christianity (ch. 1:14-18). These references, as well as the whole tone of the letter, make it probable that the epistle was written from Rome during the apostle's first Roman imprisonment; see PAUL. It is also most probably to be dated toward the close of that period, in A.D. 63. This follows from several facts: 1. He had been for some time at the place of composition, probably in Rome (ch. 1:12 seq.). 2. He was expecting his release (chs. 1:25; 2:23, 24). 3. The Philippians had sent him a gift (ch. 4:10) by the hands of Epaphroditus (ch. 2:25); Epaphroditus, however, had been taken sick in Rome, the Philippians had heard of it, and Epaphroditus had learned of their sorrow over his illness (ch. 2:26). A considerable time, therefore, had elapsed since Paul had reached the capital.

The epistle was written primarily to acknowledge the gift which the Philippians had sent to Paul. Contrary to his custom, he had more than once received such gifts from them (ch. 4:15). But the apostle also seized the opportunity to tell them about himself and to warn them against error. It is the letter of a pastor to his flock. It was not called forth, like many of his epistles, by any crisis in the Church. It abounds in spiritual advice for the Christian life. At the same time it is valuable for the light it throws on Paul's situation in Rome. It was sent by the hand of Epaphroditus (ch. 2:25, 30) who, having recovered from his illness, was about to return to Philippi. It may be divided into the following sections: 1. Introduction (ch. 1:1, 2). 2. Gratitude for their fidelity; expression of his love for them; prayer for their sanctification (ch. 1:3-11). 3. Account of how God had used him, though a prisoner, to extend the gospel; of the opposition to him on the part of some, but of his own contentment; of his wish at times to die, but of his devotion to them and confidence that he would be spared to them; and of his earnest desire that they might stand firm (ch. 1:12-30). 4. Appeal to them for spiritual unity, through self-forgetfulness and love, after the example of Christ, that they may perfect the work of service which he had ever set before them (ch. 2:1-18). 5. Promise to send to them Timothy and, if possible, to go himself shortly; meanwhile he will send Epaphroditus (ch. 2:19-30). 6. Exhortation to pursue with joy the Christian life, based on his own joy in self-surrender to Christ and in the eager pursuit of the reward which Christ offers; to which he adds a warning against those who misuse the freedom of the gospel that they may indulge their fleshly appetites (ch. 3). 7. Concluding exhortations to individuals and to all, the keynotes of which are joy, contentment, holiness (ch. 4:1-9). 8. Final acknowledgment of the gift they had sent him and of his joy in their love, with a few parting salutations (ch. 4:10-23).

Some scholars interpret the sharp break in thought in ch. 3 between vs. 1 and 2 as evidence for the hypothesis that 2 letters have been joined together. An informal letter like Philippians, however, must not be dealt with as if it were a treatise constructed in accord with strict logic. In writing down his ideas as they came to him, Paul may well have turned abruptly from one subject to another. The epistle as it stands yields a satisfactory analysis, and there is no need for a partition theory.

Philis'tia (fi-lis'ti-á). A word occurring in poetical passages of the O.T. (Ps. 60:8; 87:4; and R.V. of Isa. 14:29), and meaning the land of the Philistines. It was mainly that part of the Maritime Plain of Canaan which lies between Joppa and Gaza, approximately 50 miles in length and 15 in breadth. The greater portion is very fertile, bearing heavy crops of grain, as well as oranges, figs, olives, and other fruits. The coast line has a row of sand dunes, and the sand continually encroaches on the cultivated districts. Of the 5 dominant towns (Josh. 13:3; 1 Sam. 6:17) 3, Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ashdod, were on the coast, Ekron about 6 miles inland, and Gath was situated among the hills of the lowland. All were walled.

Philis'tines (fi-lis'tínz). A people mentioned in Gen. 10:14, and tabulated with descendants of Mizraim; this connection with Egypt is political rather than racial. They went forth from Casluhim, and were a remnant of the isle or seacoast of Caphtor (Jer. 47:4; Amos 9:7); see CAPHTOR. Apparently they came from Crete in the 1st quarter of the 12th century B.C. The country near Gaza was inhabited first by the Avvim, but settlers from Caphtor destroyed these aborigines and dwelt in their room (Deut. 2:23). Philistines were in the region about Gerar and Beersheba as early as the time of Abraham (Gen. 21:32, 34; 26:1, unless, as seems more probable, the name is here used proleptically). In 1194 B.C. Ramesses III defeated at the Delta an attack of the "Peoples of the Sea"; in c. 1190 he repelled from Syria a land and sea attack of these invaders, among whom were the Pulesati (Philistines) and others apparently identified with the Carians, Lycians, Achaeans, and groups with Greek affinities. The Philistines probably are Mediterraneans of Lycian-Carian origin (s.w. Asia Minor), who invaded Minoan Crete and settled for a while in the e. part of the island. Thence they took part in the great movement which ended in defeat by Ramesses III, but some of the invaders remained in Syria and eventually reached Philistia. Or there may have been a peaceful migration of Cretans and Philistines to Palestine.

For travelers leaving Egypt the shortest way into Canaan was along the coast; but after the desert was passed the road was flanked by the fortified towns of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, and Ekron. At the Exodus from Egypt the tribes of Israel, migrating with their women, children, and cattle, were ill prepared for war and might well hesitate to fight their way; and they were directed to go by another route (Ex. 13:17, 18). A generation later Joshua, with an army under his command, did not attack the cities on the coast or Gath in the lowland (Josh. 13:2, 3; Judg. 3:3). But the tribe of Judah, when it settled in its allotted territory, took Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron (Judg. 1:18). Shamgar slew 600 Philistines with an oxgoad (ch. 3:31). Not long after this Israel, on account of its idolatries, was given into the hands of the Philistines (ch. 10:6, 7). It was delivered (v. 11), but sinning again came under the same domination for 40 years. From this they were delivered by Samson, but the Philistines ultimately proved his ruin (chs. 14 to 16). Early in Samuel's public life they defeated the Israelites, slaying, among others, Hophni and Phinehas, Eli's sons, and capturing the Ark of God (I Sam., chs. 4 to 6). Twenty years later Samuel defeated them in battle at the same place, which he called Ebenezer, the stone of help, because Jehovah had helped him there (ch. 7:3-12). It was an overwhelming defeat. The Israelites had recovered their border from Ekron to Gath, regaining possession of the Shephelah or lowland, and the Philistines did not again dispossess them (ch. 7:13, 14).

The Philistines had control of the manufacture of iron tools and weapons (I Sam. 13:19-21). Iron was just coming into general use in the 11th century B.C., and the iron monopoly was not only an aid to Philistine superiority in arms, but also a commercial advantage. The power of the Philistines was formidable during the reign of Saul (chs. 10:5; 12:9; 14:52), but he and his son Jonathan smote them at Geba and Michmash (chs. 13:1 to 14:31). They soon appeared again within the territory of Judah, near Socoh; but fled when their champion Goliath was slain (chs. 17:1-58; 18:6; 19:5; 21:9; 22:10). Saul and David had various encounters with them (chs. 18:27, 30; 19:8; 23:1-5, 27, 28); but at length to escape Saul David twice sought refuge in their country (chs. 21:10-15; 27 to 29; Psalm 56, title). On the 2d occasion the king of Gath placed the town of Ziklag under David's authority (I Sam. 27:6). The Philistines had penetrated to the very heart of Canaan when they defeated the Israelites on Mount Gilboa and slew Saul and his sons (I Sam. 28:4; 29:11; 31:1-13; I Chron. 10:1-14). David, when king, repelled invasions of the Philistines and also fought against them in their own country (II Sam. 3:18; 5:17-25; 8:1; 19:9; 21:15-22; 23:9-17; I Chron. 11:13; 18:1; 20:4, 5). After his death the Philistines are less frequently mentioned, as if their power was waning. Under Nadab, the son of Jeroboam I, and some other short-lived kings, the Israelites besieged Gibbethon, a Philistine city (I Kings 15:27; 16:15). The Philistines sent presents to Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:11); but they invaded Judah in the reign of his successor, Jehoram (ch. 21:16), and also in that of Ahaz (ch. 28:18). Uzziah and Hezekiah successfully invaded Philistia (II Kings 18:8; II Chron. 26:6, 7). Judgment against them is frequently threatened by the prophets (Isa. 11:14; Jer. 25:20; 47:1-7; Ezek. 25:15-17; Amos 1:6-8; Obad. 19; Zeph. 2:4, 5; Zech. 9:5-7). Many Philistines accompanied Gorgias, the Syrian general of Antiochus Epiphanes, in his invasion of Judah (I Macc. 3:41). Judas Maccabaeus afterward captured Azotus (Ashdod) and other Philistine cities (ch. 5:68). Jonathan Maccabaeus burned Azotus, with the temple of Dagon, and the city of Ashkelon (ch. 10:83-89). He also burned the suburbs of Gaza, but took no further hostile measures, as the city itself was surrendered on his demand (ch. 11:60, 61). The Philistines are not mentioned by name in the N.T., and seem ultimately to have merged in the Jewish nation.

The Mediterranean is once called the sea of the Philistines (Ex. 23:31).

Phil-lo'o-gus (fī-lŏ'ŏ-gŭs) [Gr., fond of learning]. A Christian at Rome, apparently the head of a Christian household (Rom. 16:15).

Philos-ophy [Gr., love of wisdom]. The spirit of pure philosophy, which seeks to penetrate to the essence of things in themselves, is foreign to the Eastern mind. The great distinction between Eastern and Western philosophy historically has been that Oriental reasoning remained in the sphere of religion and was never divorced from religious axioms, while Occidental investigation came to be conducted, even by profoundly religious minds, in a far wider sphere than religion and by the reason unassisted by the postulates of religion. Moral philosophy has characterized the East, metaphysics the West. For the Biblical student the contrast between Greek and Hebrew thought, their separate development, their eventual contact, and their mutual influence are important.

The Hebrew mind reflected on the view of the world which is presented by revelation. It drew wisdom from the experience of former generations, which was handed down by the ancients, from observation of human life and the results of conduct, and from the study of the adaptations of nature to an end. It thus gained true principles for the government of conduct, it sought to discover to what extent religious truth was approved by the test of human experience, and it wrestled with the paradoxes of the moral government of God, especially with the question of the sufferings of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked. From these varied sources and manifold investigations the Hebrew wise man was confirmed in the conviction that the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. Hebrew philosophy, or wisdom as the Bible calls it, received a great impulse through the interest of Solomon, who both gathered the maxims of other men and out of his own shrewd observation and varied experience gave utterance to new proverbs. The proverbs of Solomon largely concern conduct in relation to the individual and to God, such as chastity, temperance in meat and drink, self-control, honesty, suretyship, behavior in the presence of the mighty. From these things Hebrew thought proceeded to view morality in larger relations. From the consideration of apparent exceptions to its conclusions, it advanced to moral questions, and looked upon events not in their immediate personal results, but in the light of their effect upon posterity and of divine retribution in time to come. The Hebrew philosopher further studied nature, and saw that a divine purpose exists everywhere (Ps. 104:24). Everywhere is the impress of thought. Intelligence is involved in the creation and preservation of the universe (Prov. 3:19). He found wisdom to be an attribute of God, which is everywhere revealed in nature. It existed before God proceeded to create. He personified wisdom (Prov. 1:20-33; 8:12), and represented it as existing from everlasting, as brought forth before the creation of the world, as present with God when he established heaven and earth, and ordained to rule in the created universe (Prov. 8:22-31; Job 28:12-27). Wisdom was not itself a person, but it was looked upon as objective to God, as "the reflection of God's plan of the world," as the principle which God ordained for the world. By later writers the thought was developed and wisdom was still further distinguished from God (Wisd. of Sol. 7:22 to 8:5; 9:4, 9); see WISDOM.

Greek philosophy is usually said to begin with Thales about 640 B.C. Three main periods are distinguished: 1. The pre-Socratic schools which arose among the Greek colonies of Asia Minor. The great subject of inquiry was the constitution of the universe. Is there one underlying element, such as moisture, or the subtle and all-pervading air, or one eternal, infinite, immovable, unchangeable Being, or the instantaneous balance of power? 2. The Socratic schools represented by Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, 469-322 B.C. Athens was the center of philosophic thought, and inquiry was directed to ideas, form (or essence) of things. But it was not a barren metaphysics that was cultivated; a lofty morality was inculcated. Socrates used inductive reasoning by which he sought to discover the permanent element underlying the changing forms of appearances and opinions; and the truth which he thus discovered he attempted to fix by a general definition or statement. Aristotle allowed absolute authority to the reason alone, and accepted nothing which he could not prove by logic. 3. The post-Socratic schools. Philosophy had culminated in Aristotle, and discussion reverted to ethics founded on metaphysics. Epicurus (342-270 B.C.) declared that the character of actions is determined by their result, and that permanent pleasure is the highest good. Zeno the Stoic (c. 336-264 B.C.) taught that moral character resides in the act itself, independent of the result, and inculcated the obligation of absolute obedience to the commands of duty. The Skeptics taught that certainty is not attainable in human knowledge; and early members of the school held that when we are convinced that we can know nothing, we cease to care, and in this way attain happiness.

Alexander the Great died in 323 B.C. and Aristotle in 322. Thus when Greek philosophy had reached its climax, Greek culture began to be introduced into Palestine and among the Jews of the Dispersion. Epicureanism and Stoicism were developed in Greece during the period of the first close contact of Greek and Hebrew, but they exercised little influence on Hebrew thought compared with the power exerted by Plato and Aristotle. The influence of the Socratic schools was seen in the Sadducees perhaps, who seem like Aristotle to have rejected everything which unaided reason did not teach, although they professed to be governed by a different principle. The influence of the Socratic schools was seen in the Alexandrian school of Jewish thinkers, whose prominent representative was Philo, a contemporary of Christ. They held to the teaching of Moses; but at the same time they took what they approved of in Greek philosophy, learning especially from divine Plato, and endeavored to show that it was already taught in the O.T. They combined the doctrines of the Greek sage and of Moses into a new system, and removed inconsistencies by arbitrarily allegorizing Scripture, even down to its geography. The influence of the Greek philosophy was seen in the improved methods and enlarged scope of debate. Paul advances a formal philosophic argument in his address in the midst of the Areopagus and in the beginning of his Epistle to the Romans (Acts 17:30; Rom. 1:19, 20). The influence of Greek philosophy was seen further in borrowed ideas, such as the pre-existence of the soul (Wisd. of Sol. 8:19, 20); in new words and new content of words, as in the use of the word form in the Aristotelian sense of essence or sum total of attributes (Phil. 2:6); and in nice discrimination of thought and precision of definition. Gnostic speculations later came from the East; and the attempt to combine Gnosticism with Christianity led Paul to combat it by representing the true relation of Christ to God and the world in the Epistle to the Colossians.

Phin'e-has (fin'ê-ăs), in A.V. of I Macc. Phin'e-es (fin'ê-ēs) [Egypt. pî-nḥsy, the Nubian]. 1. Son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron (Ex. 6:25). He ran a spear through an Israelite and a Midianite woman who had come into the camp at Shittim together, this summary punishment terminating a plague which was then raging as a judgment against the idolatries and impurities into which the Midianitish women were leading the Hebrews. An everlasting priesthood was therefore promised to him and his descendants (Num.

25:1-18; Ps. 106:30; I Macc. 2:54). With a short interruption when the house of Eli, of the lineage of Ithamar, officiated as high priests, Phinehas and his sons held the office until sacrifice ceased with the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple by the Romans in A.D. 70. Phinehas went as priest with the army on the punitive expedition against the Midianites (Num. 31:6), and was sent with 10 princes to remonstrate with the tribes E. of the Jordan on their erection of an altar, erroneously supposed to be for schismatic worship (Josh. 22:13). He received as his share of the Promised Land a hill in Mount Ephraim (Josh. 24:33). Through him the Israelites inquired of the Lord whether they should attack the Benjamites for condoning the sin of the inhabitants of Gibeah (Judg. 20:28).

2. The younger of Eli's 2 degenerate sons. He was killed in the battle with the Philistines in which the Ark of God was taken; and when the news of the catastrophe arrived, it so affected the feelings of his wife that the pains of premature childbirth came upon her and she died (I Sam. 1:3; 2:34; 4:11, 19-22).

3. Father of a certain Eleazar (Ezra 8:33), evidently a priest.

Phē'gon (fē'gōn) [Gr., burning, scorching]. A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. 16:14).

Phoe'be (fē'bē), in A.V. Phē'be [Gr., pure, bright, radiant]. A servant or deaconess of the church at Cenchreae, the E. port of Corinth. On her removing to Rome, Paul cordially commended her to the Christians there; for she had been a helper or patron of many, a term which may imply that she made it a duty to stand by foreigners in their civic helplessness (Rom. 16:1, 2). See DEACONESS.

Phoenic'ia (fē-nish'ī-ā), in A.V. once Phenic'ia (Acts 21:2), and twice Phen'ice (fē-ni'sē) (chs. 11:19; 15:3) [from Gr., phoinix, purple-red, purple, or crimson]. A narrow strip of territory between the Mediterranean Sea on the W. and on the E. the crest of the Lebanon range and the detached hills running S. from it. The N. limit may be regarded as Arvad. Southward, after the settlement of the Hebrews on the coast, Phoenicia practically terminated at the Ladder of Tyre, about 14 miles S. of Tyre, although Phoenicians still dwelt in Achzib and Acco (Judg. 1:31). In the time of Christ Phoenicia extended S. as far as Dor, about 16 miles S. of Carmel. The distance from Arvad to the Ladder of Tyre is about 125 miles. The chief cities were Tyre and Sidon, of which Sidon was the first to rise to celebrity. Phoenicia was called Canaan by the ancient Hebrews (Isa. 23:11), and its inhabitants were reckoned as Canaanites (Gen. 10:15). According to their own tradition, they had migrated from the Erythraean Sea, by way of Syria, to the coast of Canaan (Herod. i. 1; vii. 89). According to Arabian authors, the migration was across the N. Arabian desert. The Phoenicians thus traced their origin to the neighborhood of the Persian Gulf; in other words they came from Arabia, the cradleland of the Semites.

The territory which the Phoenicians inhabited had good natural harbors; Mount Lebanon afforded them an almost inexhaustible supply of timber, with which ships were constructed, and they became the most skillful navigators known to antiquity. They not merely traded with distant countries accessible by Mediterranean routes, but they colonized spots favorable for commerce, some of which afterward rose to importance. Their most celebrated colony was Carthage, on the African coast, near modern Tunis, which was long a rival of Rome, by which it was at last destroyed. Of the Carthaginian leaders who figured in the Punic wars, some, if not all, had names purely Phoenician, which is very close to Hebrew. Thus, Hannibal means "the grace of Baal," and Hasdrubal, "a help is Baal." When our Lord visited the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he was within the Phoenician territory (Matt. 15:21; Mark 7:24, 31). Various Christians who were scattered abroad, owing to the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen, found their way to Phoenicia (Acts 11:19). Paul and Barnabas went through it on their way from Antioch to Jerusalem (ch. 15:3). Paul, on his last voyage to Jerusalem, sailed in a Phoenician vessel, which brought him to Tyre (ch. 21:2, 3). See ALPHABET, TYRE, BAAL, ETHBAAL, JEZEBEL, and HIRAM.

Phoe'nix (fē'nīks), in A.V. Phe'nice (fē'nīs) [Gr., date palm]. A haven in Crete (Acts 27:12), safe throughout the year because the entrance to its harbor opens toward the n.e. and s.e. (R.V., cf. text and marg.). It is now called Loutro, and is the only harbor on the s. of Crete which is safe at every season of the year.

Phryg'ia (frīj'i-ā). A large and important province of Asia Minor, which, after its original boundaries were curtailed by the disseverance from it of Galatia, was bounded on the n. by Bithynia; on the s. by Lycia, Pisidia, and Isauria; on the e. by Lycaonia and Galatia; and on the w. by Caria, Lydia, and Mysia. The region is a high tableland between the chain of Taurus on the s., Olympus on the n., and Temnus on the w. Of its towns, 4 are mentioned in the N.T., Laodicea, Colossae, Hierapolis, and Antioch of Pisidia. At this period Phrygia had ceased to be a province and was merely a local name. Antiochus the Great settled 2,000 Jewish families from Babylonia and Mesopotamia in Lydia and Phrygia (Jos. Antiq. xii. 3, 4), and Jews from Phrygia were present at Jerusalem on that Day of Pentecost signaled by the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:10). Phrygia was traversed by Paul on his Second and Third Missionary Journeys (chs. 16:6; 18:23).

Phu'rah (fū'rā). See PURAH.

Phut (fūt). See PUT.

Phu'vah (fū'vā). See PUVAH.

Phy'ge'lus (fi-jē'lūs), in A.V. Phy'gel'us (fi-jē'l'ūs). A Christian in the province of Asia who, with others, deserted the Apostle Paul in the latter part of his life (II Tim. 1:15).

Phylac'tery [Gr., safeguard, amulet; so called because it was supposed to guard the wearer against malign influences]. A prayer band consisting of short extracts from the Law of Moses, and worn on the forehead or on the arm (Matt. 23:5). The phylactery eventually assumed the form of a small case, made of parchment or black sealskin. The one for the forehead contained 4 compartments, in each of which was placed a strip of parchment inscribed with a passage of Scripture. The 4 passages were Ex. 13:1-10, 11-16; Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21. It was fastened with straps on the forehead, just above and between the eyes. The other case, which was bound on the left arm, contained but 1 compartment, in which a strip of parchment was placed bearing the same 4 quotations from the Law. The first 3 of these were interpreted as enjoining the custom, but are rather to be understood figuratively (see FRONTLET). Phylacteries are worn by every male Jew during the time of morning prayer, except on the Sabbath and festivals, which days are themselves signs and render phylacteries unnecessary (cf. Ex. 13:9).

Phylacteries

Phy'si'cian. See MEDICINE.

Pi-be'seth (pi-bē'sēth) [Egypt., pr-b; s.t.t., house of the goddess Bast]. An Egyptian city (Ezek. 30:17), in Gr. form written Bubastos or Bubastis (Herod. ii. 59, 137). It is now called Tell Basta, and is on the Delta near Zagazig, on the w. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. It is about 45 miles n.e. by n. of modern Cairo, and 30 s.w. by s. of ancient Zoan. Among the ruins are the remains of a once splendid temple of red granite, dedicated to the cat-headed goddess Bast.

Piece. In the O.T., when piece refers to money and is not italicized, it denotes a certain amount of precious metal, whether coined or uncoined (Gen. 33:19; I Sam. 2:36). The word piece was chosen by the translators because it is vague, and they did not know the value of the money indicated by the several Hebrew words. Piece is also employed by the translators where the unit of weight or the coin is not expressly mentioned by the Hebrew writer, but where he ordinarily means a shekel (Judg. 17:2; II Sam. 18:11, in A.V. shekel; cf. Deut. 22:19; I Kings 10:29, where both versions have shekel). In the N.T. also a piece of silver commonly denotes the shekel or its equivalent (cf. Matt. 26:15 with Matt. 27:9 and Zech. 11:12); but in Luke 15:8 it is a drachma, worth about 16 cents.

Pi'ety. Filial piety, dutifulness in the family (I Tim. 5:4).

Pi'geon. See DOVE.

Pi'ha-hi'roth (pi'hā-hi-rōth). The last station of the Israelites on leaving Egypt, near Baal-zephon and Migdol, and on the sea (Ex. 14:2, 9; Num. 33:7, 8). The site is uncertain, but Père Abel locates it in the swamps of Jeneffeh at the edge of the pass between the mountain and the Great Bitter Lake.

Pi'late (pi'lāt) [Lat., armed with a javelin, or wearing the pilleus or felt cap which was worn by a manumitted slave as the emblem of liberty]. Pontius Pilate, 5th Roman procurator in Judea after the deposition of Archelaus in A.D. 6. See PROCURATOR. Through the influence of Sejanus he was appointed by the emperor Tiberius procurator of Judea about

A.D. 26, in succession to Valerius Gratus. He arrived in Judea the same year. He was accompanied by his wife (Matt. 27:19). For a long time it was illegal for a Roman governor who was appointed to a dangerous province to take his wife with him, but since the time of Augustus it had been permitted (Tacitus Ann. iii. 33).

Pilate sent a detachment of troops into Jerusalem by night, carrying with them their ensigns, which had hitherto always been left outside the city. On these ensigns were silver eagles and small images of the emperor, and they gave great offense to the Jews. Deputations of Jews went to Caesarea, the official residence of the procurators, to urge the removal of the ensigns, and Pilate, after vainly attempting to intimidate the petitioners, was obliged at last, upon seeing their willingness to die, to comply with their request (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 3, 1; War ii. 9, 2 and 3). Some time afterward, taking the sacred money called Corban, he began to expend it in making an aqueduct to bring water into Jerusalem from the uplands s. of the capital. The Jews considered that this was applying to secular uses money which had been dedicated to God; and on Pilate's visiting Jerusalem they beset his tribunal with much clamor and tumult. Having been told beforehand that such an occurrence was likely to happen, he had taken the precaution of mingling his soldiers in disguise among the multitude, armed with sticks, if not with concealed daggers. When the tumult was at its height he gave them a signal to attack the rioters with the sticks, which they did so vigorously that some were killed and the rest, fleeing in panic, trampled many of their number to death. The riot seems not to have been renewed, and the aqueduct was made; but the affair increased the disfavor with which the people regarded Pilate (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 3, 2; War ii. 9, 4). Pilate attempted to dedicate some gilt shields in honor of the emperor Tiberius and place them within Herod's palace at Jerusalem. They were inscribed with the imperial name but were without the imperial portrait. Still they gave offense. The people appealed to him in vain to forbear. Then the influential men of the city forwarded a petition to the emperor, who ordered Pilate to take the shields back again to Caesarea (Philo Legat. ad Gaium xxxviii.). In narrating this event, Philo, or rather Agrippa I, in a letter which Philo cites, describes Pilate as a man of inflexible disposition, and merciless as well as obstinate. He also says that he feared they might complain to the emperor about Pilate in respect to his corruption and his acts of violence, and his habit of insulting people, and his cruelty, and his continual execution of people untried and uncondemned, his never-ending and gratuitous and most grievous inhumanity. Pilate was in office when John the Baptist and our Lord began their respective ministries (Luke 3:1). It was the custom of the procurators to go up to Jerusalem when the immense gatherings took place at the leading Jewish festivals. On these occasions they took up their residence in the palace of Herod. It was probably at one of these that Pilate fell upon the Galileans, and mingled their blood with their sacrifices (Luke 13:1, 2). The Galileans were a turbulent class of men, prone to misbehave when they came up to the festivals (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 10, 2 and 9). There is no reason to believe that Pilate would have treated them as he did unless they had first broken out into riot. It is probable that Herod Antipas took offense at the summary way in which his subjects were slain by Pilate on this occasion; but whatever may have been the origin of the variance between the 2, Herod's ill-will was appeased by Pilate's acknowledgment of the tetrarch's jurisdiction in Galilean affairs (Luke 23:6-12) on the day when our Lord was put to death.

The character of Pilate, which these various incidents of his official career reveal, is seen in his treatment of Jesus also. Pilate was a worldling, willing enough to act justly if this could be done consistently with his interests, and to avoid criminal acts provided that this could be done at small cost; but if heavy payment were needed, Pilate was not the man to give it. His secret question to himself was not, What is my duty? but, What is my interest? He acquitted our Lord of evil, was desirous of releasing him, and was aware that justice required that this should be done, but he knew also that it would further increase his unpopularity; so to please the Jewish people he gave orders to scourge Him in whom he had just before declared that he had found no crime. He allowed the Roman soldiers, whom a single word from him would have restrained, to inflict new tortures on the already lacerated body of Jesus, and, after many more insults and injuries to the uncomplaining sufferer, finally answered the Jewish clamors for the crucifixion of the Son of God by giving sentence that it should be as they required (Matt., ch. 27; Luke, ch. 23).

Pilate's government ended abruptly. A Samaritan impostor promised his countrymen that, if they would go to the top of Mount Gerizim, he would show them where Moses had hidden certain golden vessels of the tabernacle. Moses never was at Mount Gerizim; he had not crossed the Jordan; yet a deluded multitude gathered at a village at the foot of the mountain in order to go up. Unfortunately they carried arms. Pilate, therefore, seized all the ways to Gerizim with horsemen and foot soldiers, attacked the mass of the professed treasure-seekers, slew many, and made prisoners of others and sent them to execution. The Samaritans forwarded a complaint against Pilate to his immediate superior, Vitellius, the legate of Syria. Vitellius appointed a new procurator and ordered Pilate to proceed to Rome to answer to the emperor for his conduct. Before Pilate arrived Tiberius had died, March 16, A.D. 37 (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 4, 1 and 2). It is reported that Pilate was banished to Vienne, on the Rhone, in the s. of France, and ultimately committed suicide.

Various Acta Pilati, Acts of Pilate, are extant, but no 2 of them agree, and all are considered to be spurious.

Pil'dash (pil'dāsh). A son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. 22:22).

Pil'ha (pil'hā), in A.V. Pil'e-ha (pil'ê-hā) [millstone; plowing]. One of those who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:24).

Pill. To take the skin or rind off, to peel (Gen. 30:38, R.V., peel).

Pil'lar. 1. A stone erected as a sign of the holiness of a place (Gen. 28:18), as a memorial of some person or event (Gen. 31:45; Josh. 4:5-9; 1 Sam. 7:12; II Sam. 18:18; and see GARRISON), or as a representative of parties present (Ex. 24:4). Isaiah prophesied that the time is coming when the converts to the true faith in Egypt shall erect an altar and a pillar to the Lord (Isa. 19:19), as Abraham and Jacob did of old in Canaan. The pillar was used by the heathen. The Canaanites erected pillars in connection with the worship of Baal. The Israelites were strictly enjoined, in the oldest legislation, to break them and overthrow the altars (Ex. 23:24, R.V.), and they were forbidden to erect similar pillars beside the altar of the Lord (Deut. 16:22, R.V.). Pillars, however, found favor among the apostate Israelites of the Northern Kingdom (Hos. 3:4; 10:1, 2, R.V.), and even in Judah (Micah 5:13, R.V.).

2. A support, much used in ancient architecture for upholding roofs and curtains (Ex. 26:32; Judg. 16:26). The earth and the heavens were often spoken of poetically as supported by pillars (I Sam. 2:8; Job 9:6; 26:11). Strong men and fundamental principles are figuratively called pillars (Gal. 2:9; I Tim. 3:15).

Pil'low. See BOLSTER.

Pil'tai (pil'ti) [deliverance]. A priest, head of the father's house of Moadiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17).

Pim (pim) [Heb. payim, dual of peh (mouth, in sense of part), two thirds. Or it may be derived from Akkad. šinipū (from Sumerian šanabi), two thirds. If Akkad. šinipū were wrongly analyzed as šinā (two) + pū, \**pū* would be understood as third, whence the Heb. dual payim, two thirds]. The word occurs in J.V., I Sam. 13:21, "And the price of the fling was a pim for the mat-tacks, and for the coulters, and for the forks with three teeth, and for the axes; and to set the goads." The pim (or payim) was  $\frac{2}{3}$  of a shekel. Some of these weights in cubic form have been found in Palestine; one weighed 117.431 grains, and another 114.81 grains. Apparently the standards were not exact.

Pine and Pine Tree. 1. The rendering of Heb. tidhār, the name of a tree in Lebanon (Isa. 41:19; 60:13).

2. The rendering of 'ēš shemen, oil tree (Neh. 8:15, in R.V. wild olive). See OIL TREE.

Pin'na-cle. A part of the Temple, the edge of which was at a great height above the ground (Matt. 4:5). Exact identification is impossible. The Gr. word pterygion, like pin-nacle which is used to translate it, literally means a little wing; and it denotes in the LXX the fin of a fish, the border of a garment, or the end of the breastplate (Lev. 11:9; Num. 15:38; Ex. 39:19 = LXX, Ex. 36:27). It may be simply the edge of the roof or court. Lightfoot, influenced by the meaning of the Gr. word, suggested the porch which projected on each side of the Temple like wings (Jos. War v. 5, 4). Others have thought of the royal porch which adjoined the Temple and towered 400 cubits above the valley of the Kidron (Jos. Antiq. xv. 11, 5; xx. 9, 7). The golden spikes which were erected on the roof of the Temple to prevent birds from alighting, have been thought of also as most nearly resembling slender towers or pinnacles in the modern sense; but they were many, and the Evangelists speak of the pinnacle as if there were but one (R.V.).

Pi'non (pi'nōn). A chieftain of Edom (Gen. 36:41; I Chron. 1:52), probably catalogued by the name of his town (Gen. 36:40); see PUNON.

Pipe. 1. A wind instrument, called in Heb. hālil, pierced instrument, and in Gr. aulos. It is possible that hālil is a general term for a wood-wind and may include the double clarinet. The single pipe or reed was held vertically and blown by a mouthpiece at the end. A different kind was held and blown like a flute. The double pipe consisted of right and left tubes, which were blown at the same time and played each with the corresponding hand. The hālil probably was a double oboe; the word means flute in modern Heb. It was used in orchestra or was played alone (I Sam. 10:5; I Kings 1:40), and it accompanied merry song, religious praise, and the funeral dirge (Isa. 5:12; 30:29; Matt. 9:23; 11:17). See MUSIC.

2. A wind instrument of ancient origin, called ūgāb (Gen. 4:21), which was used in merrymaking (Job 21:12; 30:31), and was deemed worthy of employment in the praise of God (Ps. 150:4). According to the Targums it was a pipe. The Vulgate and, in Psalm 150, the LXX explain it as a wind instrument, the organon. The A.V. always translates it organ, doubtless in the sense of mouth organ or set of pipes. The R.V. uniformly renders it pipe.

It is uncertain whether nekeb (Ezek. 28:13) denotes a pierced instrument (E.V. pipe) or a perforated gem.

Pi'ram (pi'rām) [probably, wild ass]. A Canaanite king of Jarmuth, one of those defeated by Joshua before Gibeon (Josh. 10:3).

Pir'a'thon (pi'r'ā-thōn), in R.V. of I Macc. 9:50 Phar'a'thon [height; cf. Arab. far', summit]. In A.V. of I Macc. the adjective Pharathoni is used. A town in the mount of the Amalekites, in the Ephraimite territory. Abdon, the judge, and Benajah, the military official, were Pirathonites (Judg. 12:13-15; I Sam. 23:30; I Chron. 27:14). It was fortified by Bacchides (I Macc. 9:50; cf. Jos. Antiq. xiii. 1, 3). Robinson identified it plausibly with Fer'ata, on a hill about  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles w. by s. of Shechem.

Pis'gah (pi'z'gā) [a part, piece, division]. That part of the Abarim range of mountains near the n.e. end of the Dead Sea (cf. Deut. 34:1 with chs. 3:27; 32:49). The Dead Sea was under its slopes (Deut. 3:17). Its top looked down upon the desert (Num. 21:20). The field of Zophim on its top was visited by Balaam and Balak (Num. 23:14). From its summit, called Nebo, a large part of Canaan w. of the Jordan was visible, and from it Moses viewed the Promised Land (Deut. 3:27; 34:1-4); see NEBO 2. It was on the s. border of the realm of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. 12:2, 3). As late as the time of Eusebius, the mountainous country adjacent to Mount Peor was called Phasgō. The name Ashdod-Pisgah occurs in A.V. (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 12:3; 13:20).

Pi'shon (pi'shōn). See EDEN 1.

Pis'id'ia (pi-sīd'i-ā). A district of Asia Minor, bounded on the n. by Phrygia, on the s. by Lycia and Pamphylia, on the e. by Lycania, and on the w. by Caria. On the e. it ran in a vague and indefinite way into Isauria. It formed a part of the Roman province of Galatia. The mountain chain of Taurus runs through it, and its turbulent inhabitants were so brave that they were never entirely subdued either by the Persians or by the Romans. Its chief town was Antioch, visited by Paul (Acts 13:14).

Pi'son (pi'sōn). See EDEN 1.

Pis'pa (pi's'pā), A.V. Pis'pah (pi's'pā). An Asherite, son of Jether (I Chron. 7:38).

Pit. A large deep hole in the ground. It may be either natural or artificial (Gen. 14:10; 37:20, 24).

Figuratively it is used for the grave or death (Job 33:18, 24), and it is employed thrice to render she'ol (Num. 16:30, 33; Job 17:16); see HELL 1 and ABYSS.

Pitch. 1. The rendering of Heb. kōpher (cf. Akkad. kupru, asphalt). The ark of Noah was daubed over with it to render the junction of wooden planks impervious to water (Gen. 6:14). It was probably asphalt from Hit, in Babylonia. See BITUMEN.

2. The rendering of Heb. sepheth, liquid. The ark of Moses was covered over with it (Ex. 2:3). The streams in the land of Edom were to become pitch of this character (Isa. 34:9). The last passage suggests that it also was asphalt from some locality. See BITUMEN.

Pitch'er. A water jar of earthenware (cf. Judg. 7:19), in the East generally having 1 or 2 handles. See JAR.

Pithom (pī'thōm) [Egypt. pr-ṯtm, house of Atum (Tum, Tem), who was an Egyptian god, the setting sun; Coptic, Peithom, Peithom; Gr. Patoumos]. One of the 2 store cities which the Israelites while in bondage in Egypt built for Pharaoh (Ex. 1:11). Excavations, made under the auspices of the Egyptian Exploration Fund, by Edouard Naville at Tell el-Maskhūṭah, led to identifying this with ancient Pithom. It is on the s. side of the sweet-water canal which runs from Cairo to Suez through Wadi Tumilat. There seems to have been at the spot an ancient shrine dedicated to Atum, and the antiquity of the place is confirmed by inscriptions from Dyn. VI and fragments from Dyn. I. Inscriptions dug up indicate, however, that the city and fortifications did not come into existence till the time of Ramesses II. To the n.e. of the temple of Tum are extensive subterranean buildings. The walls are 9 feet thick, built of crude bricks joined by thin layers of mortar. A most interesting observation was made that some bricks had been manufactured without straw (cf. Ex. 5:10-12). The walls enclosed a number of rectangular chambers not communicating with each other, the only access to them being from above. Naville believes that they were storehouses or granaries, into which the Pharaohs gathered the provisions necessary for armies or even for caravans about to cross the desert into Syria. In the Ptolemaic period Pithom received the new name of Heroopolis, city of heroes, which may be a Gr. popular ety. derived from Egypt. ḥṣr (container or measure of corn). It was in the land of Goshen; for Goshen the LXX substitutes Heroopolis, into the land of Ramessē (Gen. 46:28). More recently an identification with Tell Retabeh has been favored. See SUC-COTH 2.

Pi'thon (pī'thōn). A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:35; 9:41).

Plague. An infliction sent by God as a punishment for sin. In most of the cases mentioned in the Bible the infliction is an epidemic or other disease, but it may also be a judgment of a different character. A disease to be a plague need not be miraculous. The particular disease which God has attached as a penalty for the violation of this or that physical or mental law may be properly called a plague, if the act has moral quality. And even a disease which arises from ignorance of sanitary laws and from a violation of nature in no wise criminal, and which in itself is without moral significance, may become in God's hands an instrument for the punishment of evildoers, God pre-termining and arranging for the time and place of its outbreak with this end in view. What is called in English by way of emphasis the plague is a highly malignant form of typhus fever, due to neglect of sanitary precautions, which has frequently originated at Cairo, in Egypt, and spread to Syria, Asia Minor, and adjacent regions. It is probable that it has been used in times past as a chastening rod.

The first plague mentioned in Scripture was that sent on Pharaoh, Abraham's contemporary, for the protection of Sarah, the patriarch's wife (Gen. 12:17). The next plagues in point of time were the 10 inflicted on Egypt. They were not phenomena with which the Egyptians were previously unacquainted; but in most cases, if not in all, they were distresses common to the country. Yet they were not mere natural phenomena in aggravated form; they exhibited unmistakably miraculous features; see EGYPT, III. 6. The 1st consisted in the change of the river water into blood or something like it (Ex. 7:14-25); the 2d, in the vast multiplication of frogs (ch. 8:1-15); the 3d, in lice, sand flies, or fleas, produced from the dust (vs. 16-19); the 4th, in swarms of flies (vs. 20-32); the 5th, in murrain on the cattle (ch. 9:1-7); the 6th, in boils and blains on man and beast (vs. 8-12); the 7th, in a destructive hail-storm (vs. 13-35); the 8th, in locusts brought by the e. wind (ch. 10:1-20); the 9th, in dense darkness (vs. 21-29); and the 10th, in the death of all the first-born (chs. 11:1 to 12:30). A plague was sent upon the Israelites for making and worshiping the golden calf (Ex. 32:35); and another for murmuring against the sustenance provided for them by God (Num. 11:33, 34); another slew the spies who had brought up "an evil report of the land" (Num. 14:37); another raged among the people for murmuring at the righteous punishment of the rebels Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. In this visitation 14,700 perished (Num. 16:46-50). In another plague sent upon the people on account of the idolatries and impurities at Baal-peor 24,000 died (Num. 25:9; Josh. 22:17; Ps. 106:28-30). The infliction of the emerods, or piles, upon the Philistines is called a plague (I Sam. 6:4). A plague or pestilence, in which 70,000 perished, followed on David's numbering the people (II Sam. 24:13-25; I Chron. 21:12-30). A plague was threatened against Jehoram, king of Judah, and his people (II Chron. 21:14, 15).

Sometimes the word plague is used for diseases which are not epidemic; it is applied, for instance, to an issue of blood (Mark 5:29, 34, literally scourge), to leprosy in individuals (Lev. 13:3-6), and even to the spreading of some inferior forms of vegetation on the walls of presumably damp houses (Lev. 14:35).

Plain. In the A.V. 7 different words are rendered "plain." Three of these deserve special notice, shēphēlāh, kikkār, and ārābāh. The term shēphēlāh, or lowland, as R.V. renders it, was the technical designation for the districts of s. and in part of central Palestine, between the higher hills on the e. and the low-lying plain along the Mediterranean on the w. In Josh. 15:33-47, 42 towns of Judah, with their villages, are enumerated as being within its bounds. Joshua 15:33-36 gives a total of 14, but lists 15 names; LXX, with a slightly different text, reads: "Gederah and its farm houses [farms, or camps]"; thus it lists only 14 names. The totals in the Hebrew text accordingly are correct. Some of these were, however, generally in Philistine hands, and hence Obad. 19 mentions the lowland of the Philistines. See LOWLAND.

Kikkār, which means circle, circuit, was applied especially to the plain of the Jordan from at least Succoth on the n. to Sodom and Gomorrah on the s. (Gen. 13:10-12; 19:17, 28; Deut. 34:3; II Sam. 18:23; II Chron. 4:17). The valley as far n. as the Sea of Galilee was probably included in the designation (Jos. War iv. 8, 2).

The word ‘arābāh, which is rendered plain in A.V. of Deut. 2:8; 3:17; etc., is generally left untranslated in R.V. See ARABAH 1.

Plane. The rendering of Heb. ‘armōn, naked or bare (Gen. 30:37; Ezek. 31:8). So R.V. and the ancient versions, except that the LXX in Ezekiel renders it "pine." The A.V., following the rabbinical interpretation, calls it chestnut. The Oriental plane tree (Platanus orientalis) grows from 70 to 90 feet high. It has palmately lobed leaves, resembling those of the sycamore maple, which is the reason why the latter tree is sometimes called a plane, and has the name Acer pseudo-platanus. The Oriental plane is indigenous in s. Europe and w. Asia. In Palestine it is wild by the side of mountain streams, besides being cultivated in many places.

Plas'ter. See MORTAR, II.

Pledge. See LOAN.

Ple'ia-des (plē'yā-dēz). Hebrew Kimāh is the name of a brilliant star or constellation (Job 9:9; 38:31; Amos 5:8, in A.V. the 7 stars), and in the opinion of the majority of ancient writers it denotes the Pleiades.

The Pleiades are a cluster of stars in the constellation Taurus (the Bull), in the shoulder of the animal. For some unknown reason they were anciently said to be 7; and since only 6 were usually seen, the notion arose of a lost Pleiad. Six stars are visible to the naked eye on ordinary nights, but more may be seen by persons of very good sight. With the aid of a telescope 100 stars may be counted. Josephus uses the setting of the Pleiades as a note of time (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 2).

Plow. In Palestine the plow is of primitive character. It consists of a pole or the branch of a tree, to one end of which the yoke is attached, while from the other end a small branch projects or else through the end a beam is thrust which is sheathed in a thin plate of iron and forms the share (Isa. 2:4). In the Bronze Age the plowshare was of wood. It is possible that the Philistines introduced iron plowshares (I Sam. 13:20). The plow was dragged by oxen or cows, and was guided by the hand (Job 1:14; Eccles. 38:25, 26; Luke 9:62). Such an implement can do little more than scratch the surface of the ground. When Elisha was plowing with 12 yoke of oxen there were probably 12 plows, each with its pair of bullocks and its man, Elisha being the last of the 12 (I Kings 19:19, 20).

Poch'ereth-haz-zeb'a'im (pōk'ê-rēth-hā'zē-bā'im) [binder (fem.) of the gazelles]. Name of a division of Solomon's servants, members of which returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59). The A.V. divides the name, makes the latter part a place, and calls the man Pochereth of Zebaim.

Po'et-ry. Poetry is one of the earliest forms in which the literary taste of a people begins to express itself. It is rhythmical and regular in form, like the motions of the dancer which it so frequently accompanied in ancient times (Ex. 15:20, 21). It is naturally born of the emotions, and is called forth by individual or national joy or sorrow or deep concern. The imagination also and the habit of expressing thought in vivid language borrowed from nature, which are vital elements in poetry, come to manifestation during the childhood of a people. The Hebrews formed no exception to the rule. The words of Sarah at the birth of her son have the poetic ring (Gen. 21:6, 7). The blessing which Jacob bestowed on his sons at the time of his death approached was couched in the sententious and picturesque form of Semitic poetry (Gen., ch. 49). The song of Moses and Miriam (Ex. 15:1-21), when they beheld the overthrow of Pharaoh's host in the sea and discerned the moral effect which it would have on the nations of Canaan, was also an utterance born of strong feeling and cast into the simple form of Hebrew poetry.

Ancient Semitic poetry does not rhyme. Poems have been discovered which show a certain caesural arrangement, but this feature is not essential. Assonance, alliteration, and rhyme, so common in Occidental poetry, occasionally occur in Hebrew poetry, but they also are not essential and they are extremely rare. Nor is there a regular recurrence of long and short syllables or feet; but the rhythmical tendency was strongly felt and unconsciously led to producing lines of nearly the same number of words or word-groups, or, to state the matter somewhat differently, the same number of main accents, including at times a secondary accent. The line, moreover, was made to end at a break in the sense except in extremely rare cases, such as Ps. 96:12.

The essential formal characteristic of Hebrew poetry is parallelism. By this is meant that the sentiment of one line is echoed in the next. The name was given to this feature by Bishop Robert Lowth in 1753, who investigated the phenomenon and drew attention to synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic parallelism. Parallelism is of various kinds:

1. Synonymous, when the thought of the 1st line is repeated in other words in the 2d line, as in Gen. 4:23:

Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech.

The couplet:

For I have slain a man to my wounding [or, for wounding me],
And a young man to my hurt [or, for bruising me],

likewise exhibits synonymous parallelism; and at the same time it shows the exegetical

Plowing and Sowing in Ancient Egypt importance of an acquaintance with this principle, for Lamech must not be understood to speak of 2 murders. He mentions killing but 1 man. This principle also enables the expositor of Scripture to interpret ambiguous words; for example, in Ps. 22:20:

Deliver my soul from the sword,
My darling from the power of the dog, the parallelism determines that the darling referred to is not a dear friend, but means the psalmist's soul or his life (cf. R.V. marg.).

2. Progressive, in which the 2d line expresses a new idea more or less closely related to the 1st; as in Job 3:17:

There the wicked cease from troubling;
And there the weary are at rest.

3. Synthetic or constructive, in which there is parallelism of structure only, while the thought of one line serves as the foundation upon which to build a new thought; as Ps. 25:12:

What man is he that feareth Jehovah?
Him shall he instruct in the way that he shall choose;

or Prov. 26:4:

Answer not a fool according to his folly,
Lest thou also be like unto him;

or Ps. 24:9:

Lift up your heads, O ye gates;
Yea, lift them up, ye everlasting doors:
And the King of glory will come in.

4. Climactic, in which the characteristic words are repeated and form the ladder on which the thought climbs to completion or to emphatic reiteration; as in Ps. 29:5:

The voice of Jehovah breaketh the cedars;
Yea, Jehovah breaketh in pieces the cedars of Lebanon;

and in Ps. 121:3, 4:

He will not suffer thy foot to be moved:
He that keepeth thee will not slumber.
Behold, he that keepeth Israel
Will neither slumber nor sleep.

5. Antithetic, in which the thought is made more clear by contrast; as in Prov. 10:1:

A wise son maketh a glad father;
But a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother;

and in Matt. 8:20:

The foxes have holes,
And the birds of the heaven have nests;
But the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.

6. Comparative, in which the thought is explained by comparison with something else that is familiar; as in Ps. 42:1:

As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after thee, O God.

The parallelism usually yields a distich, but tristichs are not uncommon, as may be seen from the examples already cited. Tetrastichs and pentastichs also occur (Ps. 1:3; 27:4, 9; 37:7, 14, 20, 25, 28, 34, 40). The stanza is not essential to Hebrew poetry. It is used, however, in Psalms 42; 43, which form 1 poem, divided into 3 equal parts by a recurring verse. Psalm 46 consists of 3 groups of 3 verses each, the conclusion of each group being marked by Selah, and the last 2 groups closing with a refrain. There are also alphabetical psalms, in which in the Hebrew the principle is more or less fully observed of beginning the successive verses with the letters of the alphabet in consecutive order (Psalms 25; 34; 37). Psalm 119 consists of 22 groups of 8 verses each. The number of groups equals the number of letters in the Heb. alphabet, and the initial letter of each verse in a group is in the original that letter of the alphabet which numerically corresponds to the group. The book of Lamentations is constructed on a similar alphabetical plan; see LAMENTATIONS.

Poetry is usually classified as epic, dramatic, lyric, and didactic. Neither the epic nor the drama is found in the Bible; but The Book of Job has a semi-dramatic form, for there is action, which forms the basis of drama, in the prologue and epilogue, and there is a regular alternation of speakers throughout. See also SONG OF SOLOMON. The lyrics are the most numerous poems. No period of Israelitish history after the Exodus is without them. They consist of triumphal odes which celebrate the deliverance wrought by Jehovah, like the song of Moses at the Red Sea and the song of Deborah; psalms of the penitent suing for mercy or expressing the joy of forgiveness (Psalms 32; 51), and of the poor and needy crying out in distress, calm in faith, or praising God for succor (Psalms 38; 3; 23; Hab., ch. 3; and I Sam. 2:1-10; Isa. 38:10-20; Luke 1:46-55); and plaintive elegies, as the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan, the songs of mourning for Judah, and the lamentations (II Sam. 1:17-27; Psalms 44; 60; 74).

Poison. Any substance, vegetable, animal, or mineral, which produces a morbid or deadly effect when introduced into the animal organism (II Kings 4:39, 40; Rom. 3:13). The venom of serpents is denoted in Heb. either by hemāh, heat (Deut. 32:24, 33; Ps. 58:4), a general word which is also used for hot passion and the heat produced by wine, or by ro'sh (Deut. 32:33; Job 20:16), which also signifies a bitter herb; see GALL 2. The custom of anointing arrows with the poison of snakes is probably alluded to in Job 6:4. It was a practice of great antiquity and considerable extent (Homer Odyssey i. 261, 262; Pliny Hist. Nat. xi. 115; xviii. 1). Vegetable poison was also employed for this purpose, as that obtained from the yew tree (Hist. Nat. xvi. 20). The Gauls used a poisonous herb called limeum, perhaps leopard's bane (Hist. Nat. xxvii. 76).

The suicide of Ptolemy Macron by poison, the alleged murder of Pheroras by poisoned food, and the fame of Arabian women for skill in preparing poisonous potions (II Macc. 10:13; Jos. Antiq. xvii. 4, 1), serve to show that the crimes prevalent at that time in Rome were not left uncommitted in Judah and the East (cf. Mark 16:18); but the absence of direct mention of them in the Bible indicates that they were not common among the Jews.

Pol'lux (pōl'ūks). See CASTOR AND POLLUX.

Pome'gran'ate. The pomegranate (Punica granatum), in Heb. called rimmōn, is a tree from 12 to 15 feet high, having oblong-oblancoolate entire leaves, without dots. There and there on the branches occasional thorns are found. The flowers generally have scarlet petals proceeding from a large leathery calyx. The fruit is about the size of an orange, and has a hard, red rind, filled with numerous seeds enveloped in bright red pulp. The pulp is most refreshing to the taste. The pomegranate is wild in n. Africa and w. Asia, and possibly so in Gilead. It was largely cultivated in Palestine in Biblical times (Num. 13:23; 20:5; Deut. 8:8; I Sam. 14:2; S. of Sol. 4:3, 13; 6:7, 11; 8:2; Joel 1:12; Hag. 2:19). The expressed juice of the fruit made a pleasant drink (S. of Sol. 8:2). Pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet stuff alternating with bells made of gold were put along the skirts of the robe connected with the high priest's ephod (Ex. 28:33, 34; 39:26). Each of the chapters of the 2 pillars at the porch of Solomon's Temple had around it two rows of 100 pomegranates each (I Kings 7:20; II Kings 25:17; II Chron. 3:16). The fruit is still much cultivated in Palestine.

Pomegranate Branch

Pom'mel. Rounded portion or bowl of a chapter (capital) (II Chron. 4:12, 13; in R.V. and in I Kings 7:41, 42, bowl).

Pon'tius (pŏn'shūs). See PILATE.

Pon'tus (pŏn'tūs) [Gr. and Lat., the sea]. The e. half of the coast of Asia Minor on the Pontus Euxinus, or Black Sea, from the 1st word of which the name of the province was derived. It may be described as reaching from the valley of the Phasis in Colchis to the river Halys, and extending inland s. across the mountains to Cappadocia. Six of its successive kings were called Mithridates; the founder of the dynasty ruled in Cius on the Propontis (337-302 B.C.). The last of them maintained (121-63 B.C.) a fierce struggle with the Romans, who reduced the kingdom to the position of a protected state, united it with Bithynia, and formed the province of Bithynia and Pontus. Jews resided in Pontus (I Peter 1:1). Jews from Pontus were at Jerusalem during the Pentecostal effusion of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:9). Aquila the Jew was born in the province (ch. 18:2).

Pool. A reservoir for water, supplied by rain or else by springs, like the pool of Siloam. From the pool the water was sometimes conducted in channels to town and garden (Eccl. 2:6; Ecclesi. 24:30). The pools of Bethesda, Siloam, and Gihon were at Jerusalem, and water was also conducted to the city from the reservoirs at Etam; and there were pools at Gibeon, Hebron, Samaria, and Heshbon (II Sam. 2:13; 4:12; I Kings 22:38; S. of Sol. 7:4). The king's pool (Neh. 2:14; 3:15; II Kings 20:20) is probably identical with the pool of Siloam (John 9:7). Near by was the king's garden (II Kings 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7), which was in all probability just outside the walls and irrigated by overflow water from the pool of Siloam.

Poor. The unequal distribution of the blessings of life is not ideal in the sight of God. Now God gave Canaan to his people (Ex. 6:4, 8). Accordingly the Mosaic Law provided for a general participation of the people in the ownership of the land; and while it permitted freedom of sale, it secured a readjustment of property and a return to each family of its inheritance in Canaan every 50 years (Lev. 25:13, 23). But notwithstanding all that law and instruction can do, the poor are always present, sometimes through sins of their own or their ancestors, sometimes through the inscrutable but wise providence of God. The poverty which springs from indolence or personal crime was theoretically excluded from Israel, the kingdom of God; and its poor were regarded from the standpoint of the theocracy as the unfortunate and chastened but beloved children of God. All the poor, especially widows, orphans, and strangers, enjoyed the care of God and the godly, and all were specially favored by the Law. Every hungry person had the right to pluck and eat for present need in the vineyard or grainfield of another (Deut. 23:24, 25). Every poor person was authorized at harvest to glean after the reapers, to cut the grain that was left standing at the edge of the field, and to take any forgotten sheaf which remained in the field when the harvest was over. At the vintage and in fruit-picking time what was left hanging on the branches belonged to the poor (Lev. 19:9, 10; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-21). In the 7th year and 50th year the land was not tilled, and what grew of itself was not harvested, but was free to all to eat (Lev. 25:4-7, 11, 12). The poor man in his extremity might sell his services to a master for a term of years, but regained his freedom in the year of release (vs. 38-42). If a loan were required by a poor man, it was to be bestowed, even though the near approach of the release of the 7th year would soon give him the legal right of not repaying the debt (Deut. 15:7-10). The poll tax, which each man had to pay for the ransom of his soul or life on the taking of a census, was the same in amount for both rich and poor, being half a shekel; but in offerings presented at the tabernacle or Temple, a cheaper form of gift was sometimes prescribed for the poorer worshiper (Lev. 12:8; 14:21; 27:8). The prosperous were encouraged to invite the poor to the sacrificial feasts and to remember them on other joyous occasions (Deut. 16:11, 14). There are many beautiful examples of kindness shown to the needy (Job 31:16-22). There were also warnings in the Law against the oppression of the poor (Ex. 22:21-27). At the same time, justice must not be violated. A judge must not give a verdict in favor of a man because he was poor; the claims of justice were to be paramount over every other consideration (Ex. 23:3; Lev. 19:15). The kindly provisions of the Law, however, were frequently ignored in times of religious declension, and the prophets had occasion to rebuke hard-heartedness and injustice toward the poor (Isa. 1:23; 10:2; Ezek. 22:7, 29; Mal. 3:5). There were also abuses of the good Law itself. There were those who obeyed the letter, but not the spirit, who bestowed alms to be seen of men (Matt. 6:1). Many gracious promises are made to the pious poor, and the divine procedure to them is shown to be that of loving care (I Sam. 2:8; Job 5:15; 34:28; 36:15; Ps. 9:18; 10:14; 12:5; 34:6; 35:10). Blessings are also promised to the man who pities the poor (Ps. 41:1; Prov. 14:21, 31; 29:7; etc.). Our Lord in the course of his ministry showed his great love for the poor (Matt. 19:21; Luke 18:22; John 13:29; etc.), and it was a special characteristic of his ministry that to the poor the gospel was preached (Matt. 11:5; Luke 14:21-23). The Early Church considered it one of its most sacred duties to look after its poor and, as far as its limited resources would allow, the poor also outside its communion (Acts 2:45; 4:32; 6:1-6; 11:27-30; 24:17; I Cor. 16:1-3; Gal. 2:10; I Thess. 3:6).

The poor in spirit are the humble, whether rich or poor in this world's goods (Matt. 5:3).

Pop'lar. The rendering of Heb. libneh, white, applied to a tree (Gen. 30:37). It ranked with trees of which the shadow is good (Hos. 4:13). If it is the poplar, the species is Populus alba, a tall tree with white wood, and the leaves white and cottony on the lower side. In the 1st passage the R.V., following the LXX, has storax-tree in the marg., referring to Styrac officinalis, sometimes called libna in Arab., a resinous shrub from 10 to 20 feet high, a native of the Levant; see STACTE. The LXX understands the white poplar to be meant in Hos. 4:13.

Por'a'tha (pō-rā'thā) [Old Pers., giving much, liberal]. One of Haman's sons (Esth. 9:8).

Porch. A walk protected by a roof supported by pillars; a colonnade; a portico. There were often porches of this character in royal or other mansions (I Kings 7:6, 7), and there was a notable one on the e. front of Solomon's Temple (I Kings 6:3; Ezek. 8:16; Joel 2:17). Sometimes there was a colonnade on an upper floor (Judg. 3:23). The porches of the pool of Bethesda, and Solomon's porch connected with the 2d Temple, were also colonnades (John 5:2; 10:23), called in Gr. stoa. The porch where Peter's 2d denial took place was doubtless the passage from the street to the court of the house; and in the parallel passage it is styled the fore-court (Matt. 26:71; Mark 14:68, R.V. marg.).

Por'ci-us (pōr'shī-ūs). See FESTUS.

Por'cu-pine. The rendering of the R.V. in Isa. 14:23; 34:11; Zeph. 2:14 of Heb. kippōd, the one rolling itself together. The corresponding word in other Semitic dialects denotes both the hedgehog and the porcupine. The European porcupine (Hystrix cristata) is common in Palestine, especially in the gorges leading down to the valley of the Jordan. A brush-tailed porcupine (Atherura hirsutirostris) has also been found in Judea. The A.V. translates kippōd by bittern, and this is retained by J.V.

Por'poise. The rendering of tahash in R.V. marg. of Ex. 25:5 and elsewhere where the text has seal and A.V. has badger. This marginal rendering is based on Arab. tukhas (dolphin). It may, however, be a loan word from Egypt. ṭḥš (leather).

Pos'ses'sion. See DEMONIAIC.

Por'ter. A gate keeper (I Chron. 9:22-24; 16:38, in R.V. doorkeeper). Keepers were stationed at the city gate (II Sam. 18:26; II Kings 7:10), at the doors of the Temple (I Chron. 9:22), at the entrance of private houses (Mark 13:34). When David organized the Levites for the service of the tabernacle, he assigned the duty of acting as doorkeepers to a large section of them, 4,000 in number. They were not all needed at once, so he distributed them into courses, officiating in succession (I Chron. 23:5; 26:1-19).

Post. 1. The upright timber at the side of a door (I Kings 6:33, door-post, R.V.). A stone pillar sometimes took the place of wood. A Hebrew slave who did not desire to embrace the opportunity of freedom afforded by the arrival of the 7th year, but preferred to remain permanently in the master's house, allowed an awl to be thrust through his ear into the door or door-post (Ex. 21:6; Deut. 15:17) as a sign of attachment to the house.

2. A courier (Esth. 3:13; Job 9:25).

Pot. The most frequent word is Heb. sir, a vessel made in various sizes, large and small (II Kings 4:38), and of different materials, earthenware and metal (Ex. 38:3), and used for manifold purposes, such as for boiling flesh (Ex. 16:3; II Chron. 35:13; Job 41:31; Ezek. 24:3-5, in R.V. caldron), for washing (Ps. 60:8), for refining metals (Prov. 27:21). The term dūd might also designate a similar pot (Job 41:20; in I Sam. 2:14 rendered kettle; in II Chron. 35:13 rendered caldron); so also might kallāhath, which is rendered caldron (I Sam. 2:14; Micah 3:3). In Job 41:20 the word translated caldron in A.V. should be rushes. Water for domestic purposes was kept in earthen pots (John 2:6).

Pot'i-phar (pōt'i-fēr) [Egypt., that one whom Re (the sun-god) has given]. The captain of Pharaoh's guard and owner of Joseph. His wife attempted to seduce the young slave from the path of virtue, and when she failed she induced Potiphar to imprison him on a charge which she knew to be false (Gen. 39:1-20).

Potiph'era (pō-tif'ēr-ā) in A.V. Potiph'era-ah (pō-tif'ēr-ā) [see Potiphar]. A priest of On, or Heliopolis, the city of the sun. He was the father of Asenath, who was given in marriage to Joseph (Gen. 41:45-50; 46:20).

Pot'ter. One who makes earthenware pots and similar vessels. The clay was trodden by foot of man to reduce it to a paste (Isa. 41:

Potters at the Kiln in Ancient Egypt

25; Wisd. of Sol. 15:7). It was then placed on a horizontal wheel, before which the potter sat, turning the wheel with his hand as he shaped the vessel, or keeping the wheel in motion with his foot, while he fashioned the revolving clay with his hand and arm. The finished work was glazed and baked in a furnace (Jer. 18:3, 4; Ecclus. 38:29, 30). The ability of the potter to mold the clay into any shape he desired is used in Isa. 45:9; Jer. 18:5-12; Rom. 9:20-25 to illustrate God's sovereignty over man. God, of course, in the exercise of sovereignty acts only in accordance with his infinite perfections of wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth.

Pot'ter's Field. See AKELDAMA.

Pound. See MONEY and WEIGHTS.

Pow'der. The fine particles into which any substance is crushed or ground (Ex. 32:20). Pulverized spice of any kind, intended to be burned as incense (S. of Sol. 3:6).

Prae'tor [Lat., one going before]. One of the chief civil magistrates in a Roman colony, in Gr. commonly designated stratēgos (Acts 16:12, and vs. 20, 35, R.V. marg.). There were usually 2 (Lat. duoviri) elected annually by the colonists. Two lictors attended each praetor, cleared the way before him, saw that due respect was shown him by the public, and executed his orders (Acts 16:35, 38, R.V. marg.).

Prae'to'rium [Lat., pertaining to a praetor]. The tent of a general; the official residence of a provincial governor; a palace. In the N.T. it denotes:

1. The palace occupied by Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem, in which his judgment seat was erected (Mark 15:16; and marg. of R.V. of Matt. 27:27; John 18:28, 33; 19:9, cf. v. 13). Some have taken it to be the castle of Antonia; but Herod's palace was the building occupied by the procurators. See HEROD, PALACE OF.

2. Herod's palace at Caesarea, in which Paul was confined (Acts 23:35, R.V. marg.; in text, palace; in A.V., judgment hall).

3. The Praetorian Guard at Rome, the duty of which was to guard the imperial palace and its occupant, the emperor (Phil. 1:13; A.V., palace; A.V. marg., Caesar's court).

Prayer. Prayer is communion with God. It implies that God is a person, able and willing to hear us, who has created the universe and still preserves and governs all his creatures and all their actions. He is not the slave of his own laws. He can produce results by controlling the laws of nature or co-operating with them as readily as a man can; in fact, more so, since he is God. He can influence the hearts and minds of men more readily than even a man can induce his fellow men to action. God has foreordained both the prayer and its answer. He has had a plan from the beginning; and he accomplishes this plan both by the manner in which he established the universe and the laws which he set in operation, and also by his constant presence in the universe, upholding it and controlling it.

Prayer is instinctive with man. In his extremity of need he cries out to God. And God requires prayer of all men; but to pray to God implies a right relation to him. Acceptable prayer can be offered unto God by the righteous only. The prayer of the wicked is abomination unto him (Prov. 15:29; 28:9). Only those who have forsaken sin are authorized to draw nigh unto God in prayer. Those who have rebelled against the authority of God can approach him only with renunciation of their rebellion and a petition for pardon. Prayer is the communion of the child of God with his Father in heaven. It consists of adoration, thanksgiving, confession, and petition (Neh. 1:4-11; Dan. 9:3-19; Phil. 4:6). It has been engaged in by God's people from the beginning.

Prayer is thus the natural expression of the religious feelings; and God's blessings are given in answer to prayer (I Kings 9:3; Ezek. 36:37; Matt. 7:7). God is attentive to every prayer that is rightly offered to him. He hears the young ravens when they cry; and God's people have the promise that he will answer their prayers (Ps. 65:2). James, citing history, says, "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working" (James 5:16). Christ speaking to his disciples said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do" (John 14:13). God's people present their petitions to God and leave it to him to decide whether it is wise to grant the request or not. They know that God alone can tell whether the granting of the prayer would be for their own good or for the welfare of the Kingdom of God or for God's glory. The Apostle John, writing to believers, states the doctrine of prayer with its necessary condition when he says, "This is the boldness which we have toward him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us" (I John 5:14). "The answer will be such as we, if duly enlightened, would ourselves desire." God often blesses his children best when he denies their requests. And when they pray they desire him to deny their requests if in his sight it is best to do so.

We must pray in the name of Christ, because sinful man cannot approach God. We must draw near, not claiming any inherent right of our own to come, but in the name of him who hath washed us from our sins in his blood and made us to be priests unto God.

Prayer is addressed to God in his fullness, as the triune God. Prayer to each of the 3 persons in the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is involved in the apostolic benediction: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, be with you all" (II Cor. 13:14). Prayer was addressed to the risen Christ. Christians called upon his name (I Cor. 1:2). Stephen petitioned him, Paul besought him and rendered thanks to him, the redeemed ascribe glory and dominion to him (Acts 7:59, 60; II Cor. 12:8, 9; I Thess. 3:11; I Tim. 1:12; Rev. 1:5, 6).

Prep'a-ra'tion. The day before the Sabbath (Mark 15:42; John 19:31; Jos. Antiq. xvi. 6, 2; cf. Judith 8:6). The preparation for the Sabbath of the passover was the eve of a peculiarly high day (John 19:14, 31).

Pres'by'ter'y [Gr. presbyterion]. The whole body of presbyteroi, elders in a church (I Tim. 4:14). See ELDER, LAYING ON OF HANDS.

Pres'ents. See GIFTS.

Priest [contracted from Lat., presbyter, Gr. presbyteros, elder]. An authorized minister. It sometimes denotes a minister of state or responsible adviser of the king (II Sam. 8:18; see R.V. marg.). In II Sam. 20:26 the official is described as priest to David (see R.V. marg.), and in I Chron. 18:17 as chief about the king. In I Kings 4:5 the title is qualified and explained by "friend of the king" (see FRIEND OF THE KING). Very frequently the ministers at the sanctuary are described as Levitical priests, as though the designation kōhēn, minister, priest, rather needed descriptive qualification.

An authorized minister of a deity who, on behalf of a community, officiates at the altar and in other rites. The essential idea of a priest is that of a mediator between man and God. The priests formed a distinct class in the nations of antiquity generally; as in Egypt, Midian, Philistia, Greece, Rome (Gen. 47:22; Ex. 2:16; I Sam. 6:2; Acts 14:13).

In the absence of a regularly organized priesthood, priestly functions were exercised from time immemorial by private individuals, as Cain, Abel; and by patriarchs in behalf of a family or tribe, as Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job. The natural head of a body of people acted as priest. There were those among the Israelites at the time of the Exodus who possessed this prerogative by natural right, and who had been influenced by the pressure of increasing priestly duties, arising from the growth of the Hebrew population, and by the spectacle of the Egyptian priesthood, to devote themselves professionally to priestly functions (Ex. 19:22). Even after the organization of the Levitical priesthood priestly prerogatives existed outside of that order. When God himself dispensed with the mediation of the ordained priests and manifested himself immediately to a man, that man recognized his right to offer sacrifice at once without the intervention of the regularly constituted mediators (Judg. 6:18, 24, 26; 13:16); and when for political reasons it became impossible for those in the Northern Kingdom who feared God to avail themselves of the offices of the Levitical priests, the primitive law was recalled and the father of the family or other person indicated by ancient custom erected the altar and offered sacrifices to Jehovah (I Kings 18:30).

When the Hebrew nation was organized at Sinai, a national sanctuary and service were projected on a noble scale, such as became the essential dignity of Jehovah, and appeared to no disadvantage when brought into comparison with the purest worship of the most cultured nations of that age. Priests were needed for its altar. Aaron and his sons were appointed to that office, and the priesthood was made hereditary in the family and restricted to it (Ex. 28:1; 40:12-15; Num. 16:40; chs. 17; 18:1-8; and cf. Deut. 10:6; I Kings 8:4; Ezra 2:36 seq.). All the sons of Aaron were priests unless debarred by legal disabilities (Lev. 21:16 seq.). Accordingly when they are referred to as a class, they are mentioned either simply as the priests or as the priests the sons of Aaron, in allusion to their descent as a family (Lev. 1:5; II Chron. 26:18; 29:21; 35:14; cf. Num. 3:3; 10:8; Josh. 21:19; Neh. 10:38), or as the priests the Levites, in allusion to the tribe to which they belonged (Deut. 17:9, 18; 18:1; Josh. 3:3; 8:33; II Chron. 23:18; 30:27; Jer. 33:18, 21; cf. Ex. 38:21), or later as the priests the Levites the sons of Zadok, as designation of a branch of the family (Ezek. 44:15; cf. 43:19). This method of designating the priests, as will be seen from the passages cited, was in vogue at a time when beyond all question the distinction between priest and Levite was firmly established. The distinction is recognized in history: the ministers at the altar of the tabernacle and Temple and the users of Urim and Thummim always belonged to the family of Aaron.

The duties of the priests were mainly 3: to minister at the sanctuary before the Lord, to teach the people the Law of God, and to inquire for them the divine will by Urim and Thummim (Ex. 28:30 and Ezra 2:63; Num. 16:40; 18:5; II Chron. 15:3; Jer. 18:18; Ezek. 7:26; Micah 3:11). The priest was subject to special laws (Lev. 10:8 seq.); and in respect to marriage, he could take to wife only one of his own nation, a virgin or a widow who had not been divorced, and her genealogy in the ancient records must be as regular as that of the priest himself (Lev.

21:7; Ezra 10:18, 19; Jos. Apon i. 7). His dress when on duty consisted of: 1. Short breeches, reaching from the hips to the thighs. 2. A coat fitting close to the body, woven in 1 piece without seam, and, at least in later times, extending to the ankles. It was gathered about the loins with a symbolically ornamented girdle. 3. A cap shaped like a cup. These several articles were made of white linen (Ex. 28:40-42; Jos. Antiq. iii. 7, 1-3). Priests and others officially connected with the solemn service often wore a linen ephod; but it was not prescribed and it was not made of varied and costly materials like that worn by the high priest (I Sam. 2:18; 22:18; II Sam. 6:14).

On the Conquest of Canaan, in view of the present needs of the descendants of Aaron, who were then doubtless in the 3d generation, but more especially with a view to future demands, 13 towns were designated where residence and lands for pasturing cattle were legally the priests' (Josh. 21:10-19). In the course of centuries they increased to a numerous body. Accordingly David divided them into 24 courses. Except during the great festivals, when all the courses were employed, each course officiated for a week at a time, the change being made on the Sabbath before evening sacrifice (I Chron. 24:1-19; II Kings 11:5, 9; Jos. Antiq. vii. 14, 7). Four only of these courses appear to have returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:36-38); but the old number was eventually reconstructed (cf. Luke 1:5, 9). There were distinctions in rank among the priests. The supreme pontiff was the high priest (q.v.). Next to him stood the 2d priest (II Kings 25:18), who was probably the same as the ruler of the house of God (II Chron. 31:13; Neh. 11:11) and the captain of the Temple (Acts 4:1; 5:24). The chief priests who are mentioned in the N.T. were the officiating high priest, former high priests still alive, and members of their families. They were an anomaly of the times. The law which regulated the succession to the high priesthood had come into abeyance through political confusion and foreign domination. High priests were made and unmade at the will of the rulers.

Prince. A person of chief rank or authority in any official relation; as the king of a nation (I Kings 14:7), satrap over a province (Dan. 3:2, A.V.), head of a tribe (Num. 1:16) or of a tribal family (Num. 24:14), a sheik (Gen. 23:6), a chief officer over the servants of a king (Dan. 1:7). "Prince" is the rendering of various Heb. and Gr. words.

Seven princes of Media and Persia had access to the king's presence and held the highest official position after the throne (Esth. 1:14). Apparently they were the 7 counselors of the king (Ezra 7:14). In the year 521 B.C. an event occurred which perhaps explains the origin of these privileges. Seven men of the 1st rank in Persia (Herod. iii. 77), having slain the false Smerdis, entered into a compact with one another, as they were about to choose 1 of their number to be king, that each of the 7 should have liberty to enter the palace without being announced, and that the king should not be allowed to marry outside of these 7 families (Herod. iii. 84).

Pris'ca (prís'ká) and Pris-cil'la (prí-sil'á) [Lat., old woman and little old woman]. The wife of Aquila, who went with him in his wanderings and showed at least equal zeal with her husband in advancing the Christian cause. Paul's estimate of her was high (Acts 18:1-3, 18, 26; Rom. 16:3; II Tim. 4:19), and in 3 out of 5 verses she is named before her husband. See AQUILA.

Pris'on. A special place was set apart in Egypt for the confinement of criminals. It was under the charge, and in the house, of a military officer, and the prisoners were often bound as well as kept in ward (Gen. 40:3, 4; 42:16, 17). The prison was an institution among the Philistines also; Samson was imprisoned, blinded, bound with fetters, and compelled to labor (Judg. 16:21).

Among the Hebrews there was a prison in Samaria in the reign of Ahab, which was under the charge of the governor of the city (I Kings 22:27). Later there is notice of the detention of prisoners at Jerusalem in the court of the guard (Jer. 37:21), and in the dry cistern that was in the court (ch. 38:6); but private houses were also used for the purpose (ch. 37:15). The prison fare was bread and water (I Kings 22:27). In the Roman period the procurator's palace at Caesarea on the sea, the castle of Antonia, and doubtless the palace of Herod at Jerusalem, had rooms where accused persons were confined (Acts 23:10, 35). The prison at Jerusalem into which Herod Agrippa I cast Peter was protected by iron gates, and important prisoners were bound with chains and guarded by soldiers in the cell, while other soldiers kept watch before the door (Acts 12:6, 10).

The Mamertine Prison at Rome, where Jugurtha was left to starve to death, and where according to tradition Peter was confined, is on the slope of the Capitoline Hill toward the Forum. It dates from the earliest ages of the city. It consists of 2 cells, 1 over the other. The lower one is 19 feet long, 10 wide, and 6½ high. It is entirely underground. It is vaulted, the walls gradually contracting. To judge by the slope of the walls, the chamber was originally about 10 feet in height, and was closed by a conical vault, arched in shape, but not constructionally an arch. Entrance to it was originally obtained only through a hole in the ceiling, through which criminals were let down. The floor is the native rock, from which a spring bursts, said in the legend to have been miraculously caused to flow by Peter in order to baptize his jailers.

Proch'o-rus (prōk'hō-rūs) [Gr., leader in a choric dance]. One of the 7 men elected to look after the Greek-speaking widows and probably the Christian poor at Jerusalem (Acts 6:5).

Pro-con'sul [Lat., one acting for a consul]. The governor of a Roman province which was administered by the senate (Acts 13:7; 18:12; 19:38, R.V.). He was appointed for 1 year, exercised in this province all the powers of a consul, and was attended by quaestors, who collected the revenues and paid them into the treasury managed by the senate.

Procu'ra-tor [Lat., manager, administrator]. The agent of the Roman emperor, who resided in imperial (as distinct from senatorial) provinces, received the revenues and paid them into the emperor's private exchequer. The military governor and chief magistrate was called propraetor or legate; but in the smaller imperial provinces and sometimes in parts of larger ones the office of legate was dispensed with, and the entire government civil and military was intrusted to a procurator. Such was the case in Judea. When Archelaus was deposed by the emperor Augustus in A.D. 6, Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea were erected into a division of the prefecture of Syria, called the province of Judea, and placed under procurators (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4; 13, 5; Tacitus Ann. xii. 23; Hist. v. 9). They were successively Coponius (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 1; 2, 2; War ii.

8, 1); Marcus Ambivius; Annus Rufus, in whose time the emperor Augustus died; Valerius Gratus, who held office 11 years (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2); Pontius Pilate, who was appointed by the emperor Tiberius, deposed after 10 years, and arrived at Rome just after the death of Tiberius, which occurred in March, 37 (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 2; 4, 2; 6, 5; War ii. 9, 2; Tacitus Ann. xv. 44; Luke 3:1); Marullus, appointed by the emperor Caius (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 6, 11), and after an interval which concluded with the 3-year reign of Herod Agrippa over Judea (Acts 12:1-23); Cuspius Fadus, who was appointed by the emperor Claudius; Tiberius Alexander (Jos. Antiq. xix. 9, 2; xx. 1, 2; 5, 2; War ii. 11, 6); Cumanus, appointed after the death of Herod, king of Chalcis and later recalled by the emperor Claudius (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 2; 6, 2 and 3; War ii. 12, 1 and 6); Felix, appointed by Claudius (Jos. Antiq. xx. 7, 1; War ii. 12, 8; Tacitus Hist. v. 9); Porcius Festus, sent out by Nero (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 9; War ii. 14, 1; Acts 24:27); and on the death of Festus, Albinus (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1; War ii. 14, 1); and finally Gessius Florus, appointed by Nero shortly before the 12th year of his reign (Jos. Antiq. xx. 11, 1; War ii. 14, 2 seq.; Tacitus Hist. v. 10).

As appears from the cited passages and their context, these procurators were subject to the governor of Syria; but in Judea itself their authority was supreme. The Roman garrison stationed in the province stood at their command; all important matters came before their judgment seat; they had the power of life and death (Jos. War ii. 8, 1); and their sentence was executed by the soldiers. They commonly resided at Caesarea by the sea; but they were wont to go up to Jerusalem at the feasts and sometimes to winter there (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 3, 1), and they visited various cities of their dominion as occasion required. When in Jerusalem, they were accustomed to occupy the palace of Herod. See HEROD, PALACE OF.

Proph'et. An authoritative and infallible teacher of God's will; cf. the expression, "Thus saith the Lord." Speaking of the order of prophets conceived of as a unity, God promised to raise them up from among the chosen people, qualify them by putting his words into their mouth, enable them to speak all that he commanded them, and maintain the authority of his word which they should speak (Deut. 18:18, 19). Every prophet of God, and pre-eminently Christ, was like unto Moses (Deut. 18:18; Acts 3:22, 23), in similarity of endowment, of doctrine, of attitude toward the Law, of didactic work. The same authoritative and representative character of the prophet is referred to by Zechariah. Words are given to the prophet by God, and the prophet cannot resist the Spirit (Jer. 20:7-9; Amos 3:3-8; cf. Balaam, Num., chs. 22 to 24). The words are sent by his Spirit to the prophets, are given to be taught to the people, and have been accredited in the past by their fulfillment (Zech. 1:6; 7:12; also Neh. 9:30). The same facts regarding the prophet are abundantly illustrated in individual instances. The prophets did not inherit the office, nor receive it by human appointment, but were chosen, prepared, and called of God; and the call was often soul-searching (Ex. 3:1 to 4:17; I Sam. 3:1-20; Jer. 1:4-10; Ezek. 1:1 to 3:15). The word of the Lord came to them in various ways. They were commanded to proclaim it. They were accredited by signs, by the fulfillment of their predictions, and by the conformity of their teaching to the Law. And God held man accountable for obedience to their word (Deut. 13:1-5; 18:18-20).

But there were also false prophets. Besides heathen prophets who spoke in the name of an idol (Deut. 18:20; I Kings 18:19; Jer. 2:8; 23:13), there were false prophets who spoke in Jehovah's name (Jer. 23:16-32). They were of 2 classes: 1st, conscious impostors, enticed to claim the gift by the consideration and influence which true prophets enjoyed, and courted on account of their smooth words (I Kings 22:5-28; Ezek. 13:17, 19; Micah 3:11; Zech. 13:4); and probably, 2d, sincere and even godly men, whose doctrine might be based on the Law of God, but who were self-deceived in that they had not been called to the prophetic office by God and were not infallible religious guides. Tests were therefore established for distinguishing the true from the false. The true prophet was recognized: 1. By signs (Ex. 4:8; Isa. 7:11, 14). But signs alone were not sufficient, for they might occasionally come to pass accidentally or be wrought by artifice (Deut. 13:1, 2; cf. Ex. 7:11, 22; I Thess. 2:9). 2. By the fulfillment of his predictions (Deut. 18:21, 22). This credential gains in evidencing power as time goes on and the historic events and developments take place which the prophet foretold of old. 3. By his teaching (Deut. 13:1-5; Isa. 8:20). If the doctrine taught by the claimant of a call from God led men away from the Ten Commandments, the speaker was manifestly not a man of God. The true prophet's teaching was found to agree with the doctrine of the Law concerning God, his nature, character, and worship, and concerning the conduct of man. But there was more than mere servile agreement with the Law of God. Planting themselves on the doctrines of the Law, the prophets unfolded its principles in their application to human conduct and in their revelation of God. And among the sages of all history the prophets whom Israel accepted tower aloft and stand alone in the purity, value, and fitness of their teaching.

Prophecy included the prediction of future events (Isa. 38:5, 6; 39:6, 7; Jer. 20:6; 25:11; 28:16; Amos 1:5; 7:9, 17; Micah 4:10). Prediction was an important part of the prophet's work, but more important still the prophet had to deal with the present and the past, and to instruct men in God's ways (Isa. 41:26; 42:9; 46:9). The use of the Eng. word prophet must not be permitted to emphasize unduly the predictive side of prophecy. The Eng. word is derived from the Gr. prophētēs. In classical Gr. mantis is the ecstatic announcer of oracles, and prophētēs is their sober-minded interpreter, who makes the dreams, visions, or enigmatic utterances of the frenzied mantis intelligible. The prophētēs, accordingly, is not a predictor, but one who speaks forth that which he has received from the divine Spirit. The prefix pro is not temporal. The prophet speaks for, or in behalf of, another; he is the mouthpiece or the spokesman of God. He is a forth-teller rather than a fore-teller.

The Heb. word nābī', which is translated prophet, means one who announces. It seems to have been a comprehensive general term at first. In the Hebrew Scriptures Abraham is called a prophet (Gen. 20:7). Between him and God there was direct personal intercourse, with him was the secret of the Lord, to him God revealed himself and his purposes (Gen. 15:1-18; 18:17); he was able to teach his descendants the true knowledge of God (ch. 18:19), and he had power of intercession with God (vs. 23-32). Miriam, who expressly claims that the Lord had spoken by her, was a prophetess (Ex. 15:20; Num. 12:2, 6). Aaron as the spokesman of Moses is called his prophet (Ex. 7:1; cf. ch. 4:16).

The nābī', or prophet, was a person qualified by God to be his spokesman to men. And this is the fundamental idea which underlies the term as used in Deut. 18:18.

One of the qualifications was prophetic vision (I Sam. 3:1). Looked at in this aspect, the prophet was sometimes called a seer (I Sam. 9:9, in Heb. ro'eh; Isa. 30:10, in Heb. hōzeh). And when this was the main aspect in which he was regarded by the people, and this qualification was the one of highest value in popular estimation, seer was the designation in vogue among the people. This was the case for a considerable period in the early history of Israel. Samuel and Gad and Iddo were known by this title. But Samuel ceased to be merely a seer to whom the people resorted when they would inquire of the Lord, desiring to know God's will as to duty, or seeking direction in national affairs, or craving light upon private matters. Samuel went out among men as an authoritative teacher of the nation sent by God, and this public proclamation was the distinctive idea in prophecy (I Sam. 10:10-13; 19:20). The teaching function, as seen in Moses, became prominent again; and beginning with Samuel and his followers, and with renewed force several centuries later, the prophet became a constant presence in the national life, an ambassador of heaven to the kingdom of Israel, an authoritative preacher of righteousness, an interpreter of past and present history on its moral side, an admonisher of the consequences which God the Judge has annexed to conduct, a forewarner of the certainty of the divine judgment on sin, and a fosterer of fidelity toward Jehovah. To foretell the future and make known the secret counsel of God, as did Nathan when he forbade David to build the Temple and announced God's purpose to establish David's throne forever, remained functions of the prophet; but they became a comparatively small part of his work.

With Samuel, however, we have a step forward in the history of prophecy. We have a new beginning in an ancient institution (I Sam. 9:9). Samuel was called a seer by his contemporaries, but his great successors, whom God raised up and inspired to teach the nation, were commonly designated prophets by the men of their generation. Seer was not banished from use, but the title of prophet, which had never been entirely disused (Judg. 4:4; I Sam. 10:10-13; 19:20), was raised again to its former prominence (I Sam. 3:20). Amos had prophetic vision (Amos 1:1; 8:1; 9:1) and was derisively called a seer by Amaziah, the priest of Beth-el (ch. 7:12); but he had a call from God to prophesy, and he did so (ch. 7:15).

Referring to the prophet's special endowment from on high, he was called a man of the Spirit (Hos. 9:7). In common with other ministers of God, official or private, he is a man of God, a servant of God, a messenger of the Lord, a shepherd of God's people, a watchman, an interpreter.

That the prophet was to be raised up from the people of Israel alone did not prevent God, who worketh when and where he will, in caring for his Kingdom to send a dream to a Philistine, an Egyptian, a Midianite, a Chaldean, a Roman (Gen. 20:6; 41:1; Judg. 7:13; Dan. 2:1; Matt. 27:19). Even Balaam, who was a soothsayer, and as such was invited by the king of Moab to curse Israel, was temporarily used by God. These foreigners were in momentary contact with the Kingdom of God. In the case of Balaam we see a man acting as the mouthpiece of God (Num., chs. 22 to 24).

The prophets were taught of the Spirit of God (I Kings 22:24; II Chron. 15:1; 24:20:

Neh. 9:30; Ezek. 11:5; Joel 2:28; Micah 3:8; Zech. 7:12; I Peter 1:10, 11). In this God worked in accordance with the psychological nature of man. An audible voice or an angelic messenger occasionally came (Num. 7:89; I Sam. 3:4; Dan. 9:21), but the instruction was ordinarily imparted by dreams, visions, and inward suggestions recognized by the prophets as not of themselves. They were not under the permanent influence of the Spirit. The word of the Lord came unto them. They waited for revelation (Lev. 24:12). And their natural mental discernment is distinguished from the divine word which came to them. Samuel's private thought is distinguished from God's (I Sam. 16:6, 7). Nathan at first approved of David's purpose to build a temple for the Lord, but afterward told the king that God had forbidden its construction (II Sam. 7:3). The prophets did not exercise the prophetic power at all times, but when God told them to speak.

From the time of Samuel the office was regularly transmitted. Though the prophets who are mentioned by name are few, there were many anonymous ones (I Kings 18:4; II Kings 2:7-16). The office seems not to have ceased until the death of Malachi. At the approach and Advent of Christ the tongue of prophecy was again loosed (Luke 1:67; 2:26-38). In the Church of the N.T. also there were prophets (I Cor. 12:28). They were not an order, like apostles and elders. They were men and women (Acts 21:9), and they were specially illumined expounders of God's revelation. They spoke by the Spirit, occasionally foretold the future (Acts 11:27, 28; 21:10, 11), and taught and exhorted to great edification (I Cor. 14:3, 4, 24). Paul ironically gives the title to a heathen writer, who so correctly described the immoral character of the Cretans that he had proved himself to that extent a mouthpiece of the truth (Titus 1:12).

The call of the prophets came immediately from God himself (Amos 7:15). The prophet was aware of a definite moment when the call came. Moses was called at the bush to his comprehensive work (Ex. 3:1 to 4:17). Samuel had a special revelation in his youth (I Sam. 3:1-15), which was the beginning of his reception of revelation (chs. 3:19 to 4:1). Elisha knew when he was called to the office, and also when he was qualified for the work (I Kings 19:19, 20; II Kings 2:13, 14). The vision seen by Isaiah in the year that Uziah died (Isa., ch. 6) is generally supposed to have been his original call. Elijah's inaugural call is not mentioned, but he was afterward commissioned at Horeb for a special work (I Kings, ch. 19). Jeremiah knew when he was called, and interposed objections (Jer. 1:4-10). Hosea refers to the time when Jehovah spoke at the first by him (Hos. 1:2). In the call of the prophets human instrumentality is mentioned but once, namely, in the case of Elisha (I Kings 19:16, 19). Evidence that the prophets were anointed with oil and inducted into office has been sought in Ps. 105:15, but the psalmist is speaking of the patriarchs. He speaks in the name of God, and uses the language of his own time in alluding to them as prophets, who were anointed with the Spirit. Accordingly the term is applied to the patriarchs as bearing the seal of a divine consecration in virtue of which their persons were sacred and inviolable. The anointing referred to in Isa. 61:1 is the unction of the Spirit. The case of Elisha has also been appealed to (I Kings 19:16), where Elijah is told to anoint Elisha to be prophet in his stead. But there is no evidence that even Elisha was ever anointed with oil. Elijah carried out the command by casting his cloak upon Elisha. Figuratively speaking, he anointed Elisha when he cast his mantle upon him (cf. I Kings 19:15 with II Kings 8:13, where the command to anoint is fulfilled by speaking a word). The prophet's cloak was the sign of the prophet's vocation (II Kings 1:8; 2:9, 13-15), so that throwing it to him was a symbol of the call to the prophet's office.

To the prophets' mode of life there is only incidental allusion. Evidently in most respects it was like that of other men. As an appropriate dress for their work a garment of hair was frequently worn by them (II Kings 1:8; Zech. 13:4; cf. Matt. 3:4); not as an ascetic's habit, but as a mourner's garb, symbolic of mourning for the sins of the people. Sackcloth also was worn for the same purpose (Isa. 20:2). The rough garment was not worn next to the skin, after the manner of ascetics, but was a mantle, cast about the shoulders over other raiment. For the subsistence of the prophets wild fruits were at their disposal (II Kings 4:39; Matt. 3:4). Contributions were made for their support (I Sam. 9:8; I Kings 14:2, 3; II Kings 4:42). Hospitality was shown them (I Kings 17:9; 18:4; II Kings 4:8, 10). Some were Levites, and shared in the Levitical revenues. Some had private means, as Elisha and Jeremiah (I Kings 19:19, 21; Jer. 32:8-10). Perhaps some were supported at court by royal bounty, like Gad, the king's seer, and others who bore the same title (II Sam. 24:11; I Chron. 25:5; II Chron. 35:15). The prophets usually dwelt in houses like other men (I Sam. 7:17; II Sam. 12:15; I Kings 14:4; II Kings 4:1, 2; 5:9; 22:14; Ezek. 8:1). See also PROPHETIC ASSOCIATIONS.

Literary activities and duties devolved upon the prophets, as historians and writers of prophecy. The events of the reigns of David and Solomon were recorded in the histories of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer, and in the prophecy of Ahijah (I Chron. 29:29; II Chron. 9:29). Events of the reign of Rehoboam were written in the histories of Shemaiah the prophet and Iddo the seer (II Chron. 12:15), and of Jeroboam in the vision of Iddo the seer (ch. 9:29), of Abijah in the commentary of Iddo the prophet (ch. 13:22), of Jehoshaphat in the history of Jehu, son of Hanani (cf. ch. 20:34 with ch. 19:2), of Uziah first and last and of Hezekiah in the writings of Isaiah (Isa. 26:22; 32:32). The 4 great historical works, the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, were classed by the Jews as the Former Prophets in the canon. In the time of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah the prophets entered upon their great careers as writers of prophecy. They committed their prophetic utterances in summary, or in considerable detail, or as isolated and individual prophecies, to writing.

Spiritually the prophets were prepared to receive divine communications. They were holy men, men who were surrendered to God's service and who lived in communion with God, men of habitual prayer (like Samuel, I Sam. 7:5; 8:6; 12:23; 15:11), who retired at times to their watchtowers, that is, composed their minds and gave themselves up to quiet contemplation, in order to wait for revelation (Isa. 21:8; Hab. 2:1). Moses withdrew for 40 days and nights into the quiet and solitude of Mount Sinai for communion with God (Ex. 24:18). Occasionally, in the early period, music was employed to stimulate devotion and awaken religious feeling (I Sam. 10:5), or to soothe the mind and attune the heart for meditation, when the will of the Lord was sought (II Kings 3:15). It was perhaps not accidental that the prophets were sometimes by a river's side and soothed by the steady flow or the placidity of the stream, when the communication came (Ezek. 1:1, 3; Dan. 10:4), and that Samuel heard the Lord speak when night had fallen (I Sam. 3:2-10). By these various means the prophet's soul was kept or made ready for the operation of the Holy Spirit. God in holding communication with men worked in accordance with the laws of man's mind.

There were men who possessed and exercised the prophetic gift who were not officially prophets. We notice a prophetic spirit in various parts of the Pentateuch and also in The Psalms. Daniel had the gift of prophecy in an eminent degree; but he did not devote his life to teaching the people; he was officially a statesman and governor under Chaldean (Neo-Babylonian) and Persian kings. His writings, like those of David, were placed among the Hagiographa or sacred writings, and not with the works of official prophets. See CANON.

The term Former Prophets is applied in the Hebrew canon to the historical books of Joshua, Judges, I and II Samuel, I and II Kings; the strictly prophetic books beginning with Isaiah are called the Latter Prophets. The designation does not refer to the time when the books were composed, but to the respective places of these 2 groups of books, Kings, for example, being written after Isaiah, but holding a place among the Former Prophets. There were great prophets, like Elijah and Elisha, who did not commit their discourses to writing. They are termed oral prophets by modern scholars. The literary productions of other prophets who recorded their prophecies are cited, excerpted from, and incorporated in the books of the Former Prophets and other Scripture.

Of the Latter Prophets, Hosea, Amos, and Jonah (in addition to Nineveh, II Kings 14:25) labored in the Northern Kingdom; the rest exercised their office among the people of Judah and Benjamin, either in Palestine or in the land of exile. Classified chronologically, and including Daniel, they are: 1. In the Assyrian period, from shortly before the accession of Tiglath-pileser, 746/5 B.C., to the decay of the Assyrian power, about 625 B.C., Hosea, Amos, and Jonah in the N., and Isaiah, Micah, and Nahum in Judah. 2. During the Chaldean or Neo-Babylonian period in Judah, from 625 B.C. to the fall of Jerusalem, in 586 B.C., Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah. 3. During the Exile in Babylonia, Ezekiel and Daniel. 4. During the period of the restoration, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The dates of Obadiah and Joel (q.v.) are uncertain.

Prophet-ess. 1. A woman called of God to the prophetic office. Miriam was a prophetess (Ex. 15:20, 21; Num. 12:2; Micah 6:4). So was Deborah (Judg. 4:4). The Israelites resorted to her for judgment, and the Lord revealed his will through her to the nation (Judg. 4:5, 6, 14). So was Huldah. She was consulted by the high priest at the command of the king in regard to the teaching of Deuteronomy, and she declared the counsel of the Lord (II Kings 22:12-20). Four virgin daughters of Philip the evangelist prophesied (Acts 21:9).

2. A prophet's wife, as is probably meant in Isa. 8:3.

Prophetic Associations. The presence of a company of prophets at Gibeah of God, the home of Saul, is mentioned in I Sam. 10:5. Whether they were a wandering band of prophets, going from town to town, or formed a community of prophets resident at Gibeah, cannot be determined. The designation of the place as the hill of God was probably derived, not from the abode of these prophets, but from the high place of worship that was upon it (I Sam. 10:5). The word rendered company in A.V., band in R.V., is hebel; the word translated company in ch. 19:20 is lahāḳāh; the phrase is not definite, but is merely "a band of prophets."

Samuel dwelt at Ramah (I Sam. 7:17; 28:3), where he was the head of a company of prophets (ch. 19:18-20). More definitely, he was at Naioth, in Ramah, a building or locality in the town of Ramah inhabited by this community of prophets (see NAIOTH). Jewish tradition is represented by the Targum of Jonathan, which renders the word Naioth by "house of instruction"; and this translation has given rise to the phrase "school of the prophets." The prophets who gathered together naturally employed their leisure hours in the study of things pertaining to God; but there is no hint in the narrative that they were at school or were novitiates in training for the prophetic office. The word and the narrative indicate that there was at Ramah a community of men already endowed with the prophetic gift and with power, in co-operation with God, spiritually to affect those who came in contact with them (I Sam. 10:10; 19:20-23); who dwelt together at or round about Samuel's house; under his conduct engaged in worship, giving utterance in praise and exhortation to their exalted religious feelings and apprehension of truth (cf. prophesying, I Sam. 10:5; I Chron. 25:1-3), and doubtless standing likewise under his direction in whatever other religious duties devolved upon them as prophets. The situation may be conceived thus: Shiloh, the religious meeting place of Israel, had been forsaken of God. The prophets gathered about God's great representative and the chief spiritual force of the time in order to cultivate their own spiritual life in common worship, to praise God together as the Spirit gave them utterance (I Sam. 19:20), to engage in united prayer in behalf of the nation (chs. 12:23; 15:11, 35; 16:1), and to go forth in companies for the revival and instruction of the people (ch. 10:5, 10). They sought on the one hand to benefit themselves by religious fellowship, holding prolonged communion with God amidst favorable surroundings, and thereby not only to satisfy their spiritual longings, but also to quicken their spiritual apprehension and to qualify themselves for God's use of them as his spokesmen; and they sought on the other hand to afford a center of reformation in the midst of great apostasy.

Two hundred years later, in the Northern Kingdom, prophetic communities made their appearance for a brief while. They were probably founded by Elijah, on the model of the earlier society under the presidency of Samuel. The members were designated "sons of the prophets." The name denotes that they belonged to the prophetic order; just as a son of the apothecaries was one who followed the trade of an apothecary, a son of the goldsmiths was a professional practitioner of the goldsmiths' art, and sons of the singers were members of the singers' guild (Neh. 3:8, 31; 12:28). The members of the prophetic order were called prophets and sons of the prophets indifferently, and the word of the Lord was revealed to them (I Kings 20:35-38, 41; II Kings 2:3, 5; 9:1). The associations which they formed were comparatively large (II Kings 2:7, 16; 4:42, 43), occupied a common building or compound (chs. 4:38; 6:1-4), and were located at Beth-el, Jericho, and Gilgal (chs. 2:3, 5; 4:38). Beth-el was a prominent seat of idolatrous worship, and Jericho was hard by another such place; and the establishment of an organized society of prophets at them shows that the founder intended the prophetic community to be a counterpoise to apostate worship and a center of reformation. Elijah, and after him Elisha, stood at the head of these communities, visited them in turn (chs. 2:1, 2, 4; 4:38), was looked up to with respect and called master (ch. 6:5). Elisha was regarded with peculiar affection; they desired his presence with them, sat before him as having him for their president (and perhaps teacher), referred their plans and their difficulties to him, and were sent forth by him to perform prophetic functions (chs. 4:38, 40; 6:1-7; 9:1). Though not without revelation themselves they could learn much of the will of God from the greater prophet, as Miriam and Aaron did from Moses (chs. 2:15-18; cf. sitting before a prophet as equivalent to inquiring of God, Ezek. 8:1; 14:1-7; 20:1). The spiritual condition even of prophets could be promoted by the use of the means of grace, and meditation on God's Law could benefit even inspired men of God.

There is no evidence either in Isa. 8:16 or in Amos 7:14, that these societies existed after the time of Elisha. Huldah the prophetess was not connected with such a society; she did not dwell in the college, as the A.V. renders, but in the 2d quarter of the city (II Kings 22:14, R.V.).

Pros'elyte. In the N.T., a convert to Judaism. The Pharisees were very zealous to make 1 proselyte (Matt. 23:15). The Roman poet Horace mentions the trait as characteristic of the Jews (Horace Sat. i. 4, 142 and 143). Proselytes were present when the Pentecostal effusion took place (Acts 2:10). One of the men chosen to look after the poor in the Early Christian Church was Nicolaüs, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts 6:5). Proselytes were quite numerous in Antioch (Jos. War vii. 3, 3). At Damascus great numbers of women were converts to Judaism (Jos. War ii. 20, 2). The chamberlain of Queen Candace was evidently a convert (Acts 8:27), and the royal family of Adiabene, e. of the Euphrates, adopted the Jews' religion (Jos. Antiq. xx. 2-4). At Antioch, in Pisidia, many proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:43). The rabbis recognized 2 orders of proselytes. One was proselytes of righteousness. They consented to be circumcised and baptized and to offer sacrifice. They adopted Judaism in its entirety. The proselytes of the gate or of sojourning were much less advanced. They agreed to observe what were called the 7 precepts of Noah (see NOAH), but declined to be circumcised or to embrace Judaism.

Prov'erbs, The. A poetical book on practical piety. The Heb. word māshāl, which has been rendered proverb, embraces more than a maxim. It includes also the fable, the riddle, the satire, the parable (Num. 23:7; Judg. 14:14, 18; Isa. 14:4; Ezek. 16:44; 17:2). The several parts of the book of The Proverbs are:

I. Title, Prov. 1:1-6, descriptive of the entire book; declaring the purpose of the collection to be "to know wisdom and instruction; . . . the words of the wise, and their dark sayings," and designating it the proverbs of Solomon, son of David, king of Israel. This title, however, does not affirm that the book in all its parts is from Solomon (cf. Ps. 72:20, although each psalm in the book is not thereby ascribed to David; see titles of Psalms 42 to 50).

II. Main contents. 1. Praise of wisdom, Prov. 1:7 to 9:18; a didactic poem in the form of addresses by a father to his son, and specially designed for young men. 2. The proverbs of Solomon, chs. 10 to 22:16; maxims arranged in no precise order and consisting in each case mostly of 2 contrasted sentences. 3. Without formal superscription, but which may be called from the opening verse, compared with ch. 24:23, the words of wise men, chs. 22:17 to 24:22. Among these words is a poem on the drunkard's woes, supplemented by the sayings of the wise, ch. 24:23-34, including an ode on the sluggard. 4. Proverbs of Solomon copied out by the men of Hezekiah, chs. 25 to 29; having all the characteristics of the popular proverb, and consisting of pithy sentences not only of 2, but also of 3, 4, or 5 parallel clauses each.

III. Three appendices—as follows: 1. The words of Agur, ch. 30; enigmatical sayings in which numbers play a significant part. 2. The words of King Lemuel, ch. 31:1-9; maxims on practical life addressed to him by his mother. 3. Praise of the virtuous woman, ch. 31:10-31; a poem in which each of the 22 verses begins with a letter of the Heb. alphabet in regular order.

The particular ascription of certain sections of the book of Solomon, and of other sections apparently to other authorship, indicates that Solomon was not the author of the entire work; and the title of the 4th section, "These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out," is valid evidence that the book of The Proverbs did not receive its present shape before the reign of Hezekiah. The brief introduction (ch. 1:1-6) fittingly describes the entire book, and the poem in praise of wisdom (chs. 1:7 to 9:18) is not ascribed to Solomon, and forms the preface to the proverbs of Solomon, which immediately follow, or more probably to all the maxims of wisdom which constitute the remainder of the book. The introduction and poem may, therefore, be safely attributed to the hand and brain of another literary man than Solomon, and dated not earlier than the reign of Hezekiah. The 2d and 4th sections, chs. 10:1 to 22:16 and chs. 25 to 29, or nearly  $\frac{2}{3}$  of the book, are ascribed to Solomon. The absence of a polemic against idolatry has been urged as evidence that the proverbs in these sections originated or were collected after the cessation of the great struggle which the prophets carried on with encroaching heathenism. It may with equal justice be advanced as proof that these sections antedate that struggle. If the absence of polemic proves anything, it affords evidence that these proverbs were collected either before the division of the kingdom and the encroachments of idolatry, or after the Exile, when idolatry had lost its attractiveness. The language of these sections favors, though it does not establish, the ascription to Solomon, for it is pure Hebrew. It is free from foreign orthography and forms, such as are found in some books which were written immediately before the Exile or subsequently to it. Furthermore, proverbial literature is very ancient. It appeared early among the Hebrews also (I Sam. 24:13; 18:7). That Solomon composed and collected proverbs has early attestation (Prov. 25:1; I Kings 4:32; 10:1 seq.; Eccles. 47:13-17). The titles, therefore, which attribute the maxims in these 2 sections of the book of The Proverbs, may safely be regarded as authentic.

Prov'ince. The rendering of Heb. and Aram. mēdināh, jurisdiction, and Gr. eparcheia, government. The young men or servants of the princes of the provinces, who fought under Ahab against Ben-hadad (I Kings 20:14), were not Israelites (v. 15). They probably served the chieftains who ruled various districts in Gilead and the Hauran, and made common cause with Israel in resisting the encroachment of the Syrians upon the country s. of Damascus.

The provinces of the Babylonian and Persian Empires were divisions of the realm for administrative purposes (Dan. 2:49; 3:3). Darius the Great, who as king of Persia had dominion from India to Ethiopia (Herod. iii. 90-94), divided this great empire into 20 governments called satrapies (i. 192; iii. 89); see SATRAP. These satrapies or large provinces were subdivided into smaller governmental districts, which the Jews designated likewise by the general term province (Ezra 8:36; Neh. 2:7, 9; Esth. 3:12; 8:9; cf. Herod. iii. 120, 128; vi. 42; with iii. 127; v. 11, 27, 30; see also DARIUS 2). In the days of Ahasuerus these minor provinces numbered 127 (Esth. 1:1). During the Persian period Judah was at first under the jurisdiction of the governor "beyond the River" (Ezra 5:3, 6), but by royal decree it was made a separate province and granted a governor of its own (chs. 2:63; 5:8).

The provinces of the Roman Empire were of 2 classes, imperial and senatorial. The imperial provinces were under the direct and sole control of the emperor; they comprehended all the frontier provinces which were supposed to need the presence of an army of occupation to hold them in subjection; they were governed by a military officer called a legate, who was appointed by the emperor; their revenues were received by imperial agents termed procurators and were paid into the private exchequer of the emperor. The smaller imperial provinces, and parts of larger ones like the subprovince of Judea, were ruled by a procurator only, the presence of a legate not being deemed necessary. Cilicia (Acts 23:34), Galatia, and Syria, of which Judea was a part, were imperial provinces. The senatorial provinces were administered by the senate; they did not require to be kept under control by military force; their governor was styled a proconsul. He was attended by quaestors, who received the revenues and paid them into the public treasury, which was managed by the senate. Cyprus (Acts 13:4, 7), Macedonia (ch. 16:12), Achaia (ch. 18:12), and Asia (ch. 19:10) were senatorial provinces.

Psalms, The. A collection of religious poems which were specially employed in the public worship of the God of Israel. In Hebrew it is called Book of Praises. The title in the English version is borrowed from the Greek translation (cf. Luke 20:42). The general designation Psalms of David is derived from the number of psalms, 73 in all, expressly ascribed to David in the Hebrew titles (cf. Heb. 4:7).

The psalms number 150. They are divided into 5 books, in imitation, it is thought, of the fivefold division of the Pentateuch; this division is ancient. It is indicated in the LXX, and is marked by headings in the Hebrew text. These books begin respectively with Psalms 1; 42; 73; 90; 107. Each book is arranged to close with a doxology. In the 1st book all the psalms are attributed to David except 4 (Psalms 1; 2; 10; 33). These are so-called orphan psalms; that is, they are anonymous. In the LXX all except Psalm 1, which is introductory, and Psalm 2 are ascribed to David, Psalm 10 being united to Psalm 9 and Psalm 33 bearing the title "To David." The divine name Jehovah is generally employed in the psalms of this book. In the 2d book, of the 31 psalms the first 8 are a collection of songs of the sons of Korah. Seven are expressly ascribed to them; and Psalm 43, whether written by them or not, was composed as the conclusion of Psalm 42. This group is followed by a psalm of Asaph. Then comes a group of 20 psalms attributed to David with the exception of 2 (Psalms 66; 67). Of the 2 exceptions, however, Psalm 67 is ascribed to David in the LXX. The book closes with an anonymous and a Solomonic psalm (Psalms 71; 72). In this book the divine name is prevalently Elohim, God; and 2 psalms duplicate 2 of the 1st book, substituting the word God for Jehovah (Psalms 53; 70; cf. Psalms 14; 40:13-17). The 3d book contains 17 psalms. The first 11 are attributed to Asaph, 4 to the sons of Korah, and 1 each to David and Ethan. This collection of psalms was gathered after the destruction of Jerusalem and burning of the Temple (Ps. 74:3, 7, 8; 79:1). The 4th book likewise contains 17 psalms. The 1st is ascribed to Moses, 2 to David; and the remaining 14 are anonymous. The LXX gives 11 to David, leaving only 5 anonymous (Psalms 92; 100; 102; 105; 106). The 5th book has 28 anonymous psalms, while 15 are assigned to David and 1 to Solomon. The ascriptions differ considerably in the LXX. This collection was made late, for it includes psalms which refer to the Exile (Psalms 126; 137). It will be seen that the composition of the psalms ranges over a long period of time. That David was the author of psalms is supported by abundant early testimony, direct and indirect. See DAVID.

The titles of the psalms are ancient. They were not only in their place when the Greek version was made, but they were old at that time, for musical and other terms which occur were not understood by the translators. As they stand, they are not infallible, Psalm 88, for example, having 2 titles. The titles have been exposed, like the rest of the text of the Old Testament, to the ordinary vicissitudes of transmission, and errors have doubtless crept in during the process of copying which must be discovered and removed by textual criticism. In the titles the Heb. preposition le constantly occurs. It is translated "to" in the phrase "to the chief musician" (Psalm 4, title, in R.V. for), and "of" in such expressions as a "psalm of David" (Psalm 3), a "Michtam of David" (Psalm 16), "a psalm of the sons of Korah" (Psalm 47), "a psalm of Asaph" (Psalm 50), "a song of David" (Psalm 65), "a prayer of Moses the man of God" (Psalm 90), "a prayer of the afflicted" (Psalm 102), and "a psalm of David" (Psalm 11), "a psalm of the sons of Korah" (Psalm 44), "a psalm of Solomon" (Psalm 72), and simply "of David" (Psalm 122), "of Solomon" (Psalm 127); and "for" in "a song for the Sabbath day" (Psalm 92), "a psalm for the thank-offering" (Psalm 100, R.V. marg.). The force of this preposition in Hebrew was manifold. In the titles prefixed to poems 3 important meanings must be borne in mind by the interpreter. It may denote: 1. Possession, belonging to (Ps. 24:1, represented by the possessive case). 2. Authorship (Hab. 3:1). 3. Intended purpose. When the preposition is employed several times in a title, it may, of course, be used each time in a different sense (Psalm 4, rendered "for . . . of," in A.V. "to . . . of"; Psalm 18, "for . . . of . . . unto"; Isa. 5:1, "for" or "of," and "touching"). The simple phrases "of David" (Psalm 11), "of Asaph" (Psalm 81), and the Hebrew order of the words "of David, a psalm" (Psalm 24), "of the sons of Korah, a Michtam" (Psalm 44), "of the sons of Korah, a psalm" (Psalm 47), suggest that the word psalm or Michtam or prayer (Psalms 4; 16; 17) is an epithet descriptive of the poem, and in these and similar cases might be separated by a comma or other punctuation from the prepositional phrase that follows, thus "a psalm; of David," "a song; for the Sabbath day." Further, the preposition seems often to refer to a collection to which the particular psalm originally belonged, as in the phrase "of the sons of Korah." This clue leads to the belief that the similar phrase "of David" refers to a collection prepared by David.

The book of The Psalms, as at present constituted in the O.T., was the hymn book of the 2d Temple. Its rich devotional songs were also sung in private gatherings for the worship of God (Matt. 26:30; see PASSOVER 1). Like modern hymn books, it was composed of the hymns of the ages, and in many cases the source from which these psalms were derived is stated in the titles. From these it appears that there were collections in use before the present Psalter was compiled. 1. The collection of David. Seventy-three psalms of the completed Psalter belonged originally to this earlier book of praise, according to the notes in the Hebrew text (Psalms 3 to 9; 11 to 32; 34 to 41; 51 to 65; 68 to 70; 86; 101; 103; 108 to 110; 122; 124; 131; 133; 138 to 145). In the Greek version the note is not found with Psalms 122; 124, and occurs with Psalms 33; 43; 67; 71; 91; 93 to 99; 104; 137, in addition to the psalms provided with it in the Hebrew text. In this collection a number of psalms were provided with a prose introduction stating the occasion; and all that had this preface, or at least 13 of them, were taken over into the completed book of The Psalms (Psalms 3; 7; 18; 34; 51; 52; 54; 56; 57; 59; 60; 63; 142). No psalm of the completed Psalter has an introduction of this kind, except those that are marked "of David." To judge from the name, from the definite ascription of the authorship to David by means of a relative clause in the title of certain psalms thus marked (Psalms 7; 18), from David's known possession of poetic gifts, and from the ancient testimony to his interest in the musical service of the sanctuary (see DAVID), this collection was formed by David, and was the psalm book of the Temple in pre-exilic times. Probably it contained both sacred poems of David's own composition and psalms selected by him from various sources; and it would be quite in accordance with the history of hymnody if this collection of sacred songs, used by many generations in public and private worship, received additions of appropriate hymns as time went on, yet retained its original title of Prayers of David (Ps. 72:20). The present book of The Psalms, although it contains sacred poems written after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, nevertheless is often entitled the Psalms of David. When the contents of this Davidic collection were combined with other collections, each of its psalms was marked as taken from the book of David. Writings of prophets, priests, and poets who lived before the Babylonian Exile survived that calamity, and it is not surprising that a body of religious songs should have outlived the catastrophe and been ultimately incorporated in the new hymnal. 2. A collection used by the sons of Korah, a family some of whom were officially connected with the sanctuary as singers (see KORAHITE). Eleven psalms are attested as having belonged to this collection (Psalms 42; 44 to 49; 84; 85; 87; 88). 3. A collection arranged by Asaph or members of his family, who were official musicians and singers at the sanctuary (see ASAPH 1). Twelve psalms are known to have belonged to this body of hymns, and in all the divine name kept prominent is God (Psalms 50; 73 to 83). Besides these 3 collections there were many fugitive hymns which in course of time received the approval of the religious authorities for use in public worship. But the 3 primary collections supply  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the psalmody admitted into the completed Psalter.

After these collections had been formed 3 minor groupings of psalms came into exist-tence: 1. By culling mainly from the 3 primary collections a group of psalms was assembled in which the prominent thought is God in the fullness of his attributes (Psalms 42 to 83). Because the word God, in Heb. Elohim, predominates, these psalms are sometimes designated as Elohistic. The group contained the collection of Asaph, perhaps the whole of it, consisting of 12 numbers, 7 Korahite psalms, about a score from the psalter of David, and 1 from a book of Solomon's. It was made for the purpose of meeting a felt need in the worship; and it included, 1st, psalms that were written originally in adoring contemplation of God, in the fullness of the conception; and, 2d, psalms in which the divine name, if it was not originally God, was Jehovah, and was changed to God or Lord in order to adapt the psalm to the special use (cf. Psalm 14 with Psalm 53, and Ps. 108: 1-5 with Ps. 57:7-11; Jehovah being changed to God or Lord or vice versa). Scarcely an Elohistic psalm is found in the Psalter outside of this group. The group was given a place as a whole, and, so far as known, without diminution of number, in the completed Psalter; but the division of the Psalter into 5 books cut this section in two. 2. A collection of 15 psalms was formed from various sources, mostly from fugitive pieces, and entitled Songs of Ascents (Psalms 120 to 134). It, too, was kept intact in the final arrangement of the Psalter. 3. Further, and mainly from the 3 primary collections, a selection was made by the chief musician. It contained 55 psalms which appear in the completed Psalter; namely, 39 from the collection of David, 9 from that of the sons of Korah, and 5 from that of Asaph, with 1 or 2 from anonymous sources (Psalms 66; 67, unless the latter is Davidic, see Codex Vaticanus). To these 55 the LXX adds Psalm 30, from David's collection. The prayer of Habakkuk was also included (Hab. 3:19). All the psalms in the present Psalter that are provided with musical directions once belonged to this collection. Not all the psalms that once had a place in it, however, have musical notes. This latter fact, rather than the former, indicates a collection, since the musical notes might conceivably be mere instructions to the director of the Temple music and account for the mention of him. The fact that a psalm had belonged to the chief musician's collection is noted in connection with it in the completed Psalter.

Internal evidence for the date of a psalm may come from several sources: 1. Diction and grammatical constructions. The inquiry along these lines demands caution in view of the limited amount and scope of the literature available for comparison, the draughts upon the common Semitic stock of words enforced on the poet by the insistent call for synonyms in the parallelism of Hebrew verse (cf. Ps. 19:2-4), the vocabulary of poetry, which is characteristically rich in unusual words and constructions, and the dialects among the Hebrews in Palestine with their different content of words and forms (cf. Judg., ch. 5; I Kings, ch. 17, to II Kings, ch. 8; Hosea; Jonah). 2. Historical events and conditions reflected in the psalm. Unless an occurrence of known date is explicitly mentioned (Psalm 137), the evidence is inconclusive; for a suitable occasion which is familiar to the modern interpreter (as for Psalm 46, the deliverance from Sennacherib) may not have been in the mind of the psalmist at all. The critical question must ever be: Are the terms of the description so specific as to determine the event with certainty and render negligible the consideration of other similar crises? 3. The stage of religious development which the psalm reveals. The argument from this source is apt to turn on theories regarding the date of the documents contained in the Pentateuch or other O.T. literature, or on opinions about the insight into spiritual things and the depth of religious experience possessed by earnest men in the early days of the monarchy. There are writings, however, which are acknowledged by scholars to be earlier than David, others contemporary with him, and yet others not later than the 8th century. These writings afford a common though limited ground on which to discuss the extent of the religious knowledge and experience of individual men. 4. The fact that the speaker in the psalm, who uses the pronoun of the first person sing. or pl., in many instances represents the community, and is not the psalmist voicing his own personal emotions. The individualization of the nation, however, was common from the earliest times to the latest in Israel. It is found in the Ten Commandments and their preface, and frequently in the prophets. Hence its employment in a psalm is practically no aid toward determining the date of composition (cf. first person sing., Deut. 7:17; 8:17; 9:4; Isa. 12:1, 2; Jer. 3:4; 10:19, 20; 31:18, 19; Hos. 8:2; 12:8; 13:10; Micah 2:4). Moreover, these various criteria determine the date of those sections only to which they apply (Ps. 19: 7-14; 51:18, 19), and do not necessarily fix the date of the entire psalm. The cautious investigator discovers that in many cases a negative result only is attainable, namely, that sufficient reason does not exist for denying the authenticity of the title; or the outcome of the inquiry, stated positively, may be that the contents of the psalm are suitable to the occasion attested by the title.

Technical terms used are Neginah, a stringed instrument, and its pl. Neginoth; and Nehiloth, wind instruments (Psalms 4; 5; 61). Terms probably musical: Alamoth, maidens, perhaps maiden or treble voices (Psalm 46; I Chron. 15:20); Gittith, probably a vintage song, or perhaps a cither of Gath, or a march of the Gittite guard (Psalms 8; 81; 84); Selah, an orchestral interlude or a change from piano to forte (Ps. 3:2); Sheminith, the eighth (Psalms 6; 12; I Chron. 15:21). Terms indicative of the character of the psalm: Maschil, a didactic or reflective poem (Psalm 32, and 12 others); Michtam, perhaps epigrammatic (Psalms 16; 56 to 60); Mizmor, a lyric poem, regularly translated psalm (Psalm 3, et passim); Shiggaion, probably a wild dithyrambic (Psalm 7; Hab. 3:1, Shigionoth). Other terms are understood to indicate familiar melodies: Aljeleth hash-Shahar, "hind of the dawn" (Psalm 22); Jonath elem rehovim, "the silent dove of them that are afar off," or, changing the pronunciation of the 2d word, "the dove of the distant terebinths" (Psalm 56); Mahalath, "sickness" (Psalms 53; 88); Muth-labben (Psalm 9); Shoshannim (Shoshanim, Psalm 45) and Shoshannim Eduth and Shushan Eduth (Psalms 45; 60; 80, cf. R.V. marg.). The songs of ascents or degrees were probably designed for pilgrims going up to Jerusalem.

Psalter'y. The usual rendering of Heb. nebel, when a musical instrument is intended. In 4 passages it is translated viol (Isa. 5; 12, in R.V. lute; 14:11; Amos 5:23; 6:5). Nebel became the Gr. nabla, which was reputed to be of Sidonian origin; and it is usually translated by this Gr. word in the LXX (I Sam. 10:5; II Sam. 6:5; I Chron. 13:8; 15:16, 20). The body of the instrument was made of wood (II Sam. 6:5; II Chron. 9:11), or, later, of metal (Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 8). The strings were of gut and their number in the common instrument is unknown, but in a special variety they were 10 (Ps. 33:2; 92:3). The psaltery was tuned to the soprano register (I Chron. 15:20). It could be carried about while it was played (I Sam. 10:5). The name psaltery, which is occasionally given to this instrument in the LXX (Ps. 33:2; 57:8), has been thought to identify it with the sanfir of the Arabs; but the history of the sanfir and its name seems to be as follows: The Assyrians used a musical instrument consisting of a long, low, horizontal body over which strings were strung. It was played with a plectrum. The Greeks adopted it as the 20-stringed magadis and the 40-stringed epigoneion. Later the magadis received the name psalterion, and was apparently borrowed with its new name from the Greeks by the Aramaeans (Dan. 3:5, pesanterin) and by the Arabs. By the latter it was called sanfir. In the light of this probable history of the sanfir, the identity of its name with psaltery is seen not to identify it with the Heb. nebel. The tradition regarding the nebel indicates that it was a kind of harp. Josephus says that the difference between the kinura [Heb. kinnôr, lyre (harp)] and the nabla was that the former had 10 strings and was played with the plectrum, while the latter had 12 notes and was played with the fingers (Jos. Antiq. vii. 12, 3). According to Eusebius, the psalterion was called nabla by the Hebrews and had the metallic sounding-board above; and Augustine on Psalm 42 describes it as having the sounding-board above the strings, and not below as in the cither, the strings of the psaltery being stretched between a curved arm and the drum or resonance box in which it terminates above. Isidorus and Cassiodorus describe the psaltery as triangular in shape, like the Gr. letter delta. If they do not confound it with the trigonon, which had a triangular frame, and if they correctly give the shape of the psaltery, it appears to have resembled the upright harp which Assyrian musicians carried while they played it. The original form of the sounding-board and the arm probably bore resemblance to a skin bottle and its neck, and obtained for the musical instrument its name of nebel, bottle. It was one of the instruments which the company of prophets whom Saul met were playing when he came in their way (I Sam. 10:5), and one of those used at David's removal of the Ark to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:5). When David permanently organized the instrumentalists into an orchestra for the sanctuary, some were appointed to perform on the psaltery (I Chron. 15:16, 20, 28; 16:5; 25:1, 6); and it was subsequently in continual use for divine worship (II Chron. 5:12). It was played also at festive gatherings (Isa. 5:12; Amos 6:5). It was often combined with the harp (I Sam. 10:5; II Sam. 6:5; II Chron. 9:11; Ps. 81:2; 108:2). For its use in the sanctuary, see Music.

Ptol'e-ma'is (tôl'ê-mā'is). See Acco.

Ptol'e-my (tôl'ê-mî). The name borne by all the male rulers of Egypt of the house of Lagus, which began with Ptolemy Soter (died 283 B.C.), one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and lasted until the Roman conquest of Egypt and the death of Cleopatra. The next 2 were Ptolemy (II) Philadelphus (285-246), coregent for 2 years, and Ptolemy (III) Euergetes I (246-221). The early Ptolemies, especially the first 3, were wise and efficient rulers and raised Egypt to a high position of power and influence. They held many foreign possessions, among which were Phoenicia, Coele Syria, Cyprus, and Cyrenaica, and for a while Palestine. They patronized art, letters, and science, and raised Alexandria, their capital, to be the leading university center of Greek culture. They were friendly to the Jews, encouraging them to settle in Alexandria, granting them special privileges, and giving to many of them high civil and military positions.

The later rulers of this house were, however, weak and wicked. Wars with their neighbors were frequent, revolts on the part of their people at home became common, incest and the murder of relatives were well known in the palace, and the loss of all the foreign possessions heralded the loss of the throne itself.

Three of the rulers of this line and several men of humbler rank are mentioned in the Books of the Maccabees:

1. PTOLEMY IV, called Philopator (221-203 B.C.). He was suspected of causing the death of his father, and his 1st act on coming to the throne was the murder of his mother and younger brother. His whole reign was a series of debaucheries and crimes. Encouraged by the weakness and profligacy of Ptolemy, Antiochus III, king of Syria, made war on him with a view to wresting Phoenicia from

Ptolemy Philopator

Egypt, but was utterly defeated by the Egyptian army at the battle of Raphia, 217 B.C. (III Macc. 1:1-5). After this battle, Ptolemy sacrificed in Jerusalem, but being prevented from entering the Holy of Holies, attempted to assassinate all the Jews in Alexandria in revenge. A somewhat fanciful account of this is found in the Third Book of Maccabees.

2. PTOLEMY VI, called Philometor (181/0-145), began to reign at the age of 7, under the regency of his mother, Cleopatra. He reigned for some years alone and for some years conjointly with his brother, Physcon, called Ptolemy VII. Later the kingdom was divided between them, Physcon ruling over Cyrene and Libya, and Philometor over Egypt and Cyprus. His generals invaded

Ptolemy Philometor

Syria and so came into contact with Antiochus Epiphanes, by whom they were completely defeated at Pelusium 169 B.C. Cyprus also was taken by Antiochus, and Alexandria would doubtless have fallen but for the interference of the Romans, who began at that time to exercise a quasi protectorate over Egypt. Philometor interfered frequently in the affairs of Syria, siding one time with the pretender Alexander Balas (I Macc. 10:51-57) and afterward with Alexander's rival, Demetrius Nicator (ch. 11:1-18). While engaged in battle in Syria, he fell from his horse, and died shortly afterward from the effects of the injury, 145 B.C. Ptolemy showed special favor to the Jews. It was by his permission that Onias built a Jewish temple at Leontopolis copied after the Temple at Jerusalem.

3. PTOLEMY VII, Physcon, also called Euergetes II, was first co-regent with his brother Philometor, 169-164 B.C., but after the death of the latter reigned alone, 145-116 B.C. The early part of his reign was a series of crimes against his own family and such debauchery as alienated and disgusted his subjects, who revolted several times. Like his predecessors, he interfered in the affairs of Syria. He is mentioned (I Macc. 15:16) as in correspondence with Rome, and it is probably he who is meant in I Macc. 1:18.

4. PTOLEMY, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes (II Macc. 4:45; 6:8; 8:8). He took part in the expedition which Lysias organized against Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 3:38). It is possible that he is identical with Ptolemy Makron (II Macc. 10:12), who first served Ptolemy Philometor in Cyprus, then passed into the service of Antiochus Epiphanes and later into that of Antiochus Eupator. Falling into disfavor with the latter, he ended his life by taking poison, 164 B.C.

5. PTOLEMY, son-in-law of the high priest Simon. He murdered his father-in-law and 2 of his brothers-in-law in the stronghold of Dok, near Jericho (I Macc. 16:11 seq.).

Pu'a (pū'á). See PUVAH.

Pu'ah (pū'á). One of the Hebrew midwives who disobeyed the command of the Egyptian king to kill the male children at their birth (Ex. 1:15).

For others called Puah in the Eng. versions, but which is a different word in Heb. see PUVAH.

Pub'li-can [Lat., pertaining to public revenue]. A farmer of the Roman taxes and customs. In place of appointing revenue officers to raise fixed taxes from the community, the Romans and their deputy princes like the Herods were accustomed to put up to auction the privilege of farming the public revenues, or some specified part of them, in the several provinces, cities, towns, and districts. Those who bid at the auction were necessarily wealthy men, or representatives of wealthy companies; for they undertook to pay a given sum into the treasury, and they were obliged to give security to the government for the sums they promised to pay. In some cases they in turn sold the right of farming portions of the revenue to subcontractors, in others they engaged a number of subordinate agents to do the actual work of collecting the taxes. They themselves were generally Romans of equestrian rank, while their subordinates, of course, were of inferior dignity. The subordinates or actual collectors of the taxes and customs are called publicans in the Eng. version of the N.T. It was understood that the farmers were to repay themselves for their labor and the risk they had undertaken by taking from the taxpayers a fraction more than they paid over to the government. No proper means were adopted to prevent that fraction from assuming great proportions. With a few honorable exceptions, the publicans, great and small, were extortioners (cf. Luke 3:12, 13; 19:8). They were unpopular among all classes in the provinces, except, perhaps, with the Roman governors, who often received part of the plunder for conniving at the oppressions practiced. Sometimes the subcontractors, and in most cases the subordinate taxgatherer, in the conquered countries belonged to the native population. Thus Zacchaeus, a Jew, seems to have been a subcontractor for the revenues of Jericho (Luke 19:1, 2), and Matthew, or Levi (also a Jew), apparently a tax collector paid by the farmer for the revenues of Capernaum (Matt. 9:9; Mark 2:14; Luke 5:27). It added to the unpopularity of the Jews who accepted office as the agents of the Roman publicans, or themselves became farmers of the revenue from particular towns, that they raised taxes for a foreign and heathen government. They were not admitted into society; in fact, it was considered disreputable for anyone to be their friend and associate. It was one of the charges brought against our Lord that he ate with publicans and sinners (Matt. 9:10-13) and that he was their friend (ch. 11:19). He honored them by choosing one of their number as an apostle (chs. 9:9; 10:3). Quite agreeing with popular opinion as to the low moral state of the average publican (chs. 5:46, 47; 18:17), he still invited them as freely as he did others into the Kingdom of God. His kindness touched their hearts, and not a few of them were baptized (Matt. 21:31, 32; Luke 3:12; 7:29). He introduced a penitent publican into his parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Luke 18:9-14).

Pu'blius (pū'b'lī-ūs). The chief man and a land owner on the island of Melita, when Paul was there. He entertained the apostle and his companions for 3 days. He was rewarded; for Paul by prayer and the laying on of hands cured the father of Publius of fever and dysentery (Acts 28:7, 8). His name suggests that he was a Roman; and his title, which is also found in inscriptions relating to Malta, seems to mean that he was the highest Roman official on the island.

Pu'dens (pū'dēnz) [Lat., bashful, modest]. A Christian at Rome who joined Paul in sending salutations to Timothy (II Tim. 4:21).

Pu'hites (pū'hīts). See PUTHITES.

Pul (pūl). 1. An African country and people. The latter are coupled with Tarshish and Lud, apparently all 3 being skillful in archery (Isa. 66:19). One opinion is that Pul is the island of Philae on the Nile in Upper Egypt on the confines of Ethiopia. It is, however, more probably a copyist's error for Put (q.v.); cf. LXX, Phoud.

2. A king of Assyria; see TIGLATH-PILESER.

Pulse. Leguminous plants or their seeds, specially peas and beans, which are eminently nourishing. On these Daniel and his companions desired to be fed (Dan. 1:12, 16, R.V. marg., herbs). Parched pulse is mentioned in II Sam. 17:28, but the word pulse is plausibly supplied by the translators; it is not in the original.

Pun'ish-ment. The penalty due for sin inflicted for the satisfaction of justice. So Adam, Eve, and Cain were punished by God. Punishment is not inflicted for the good of the offender, but the idea may be present incidentally. The destruction of the men of Sodom for their wickedness was not intended to benefit them. The execution of the murderer does not aim at his reformation. Chastisement, on the other hand, is intended to reform the offender. Nor is punishment primarily inflicted with a view to the prevention of crime, although this is a great end. The civil authority enforces law by penalty for the protection of the state, since purely moral considerations, such as the inherent righteousness of an act or the sense of justice, fail to prevent men from violating the rights of others. One object in the infliction of punishment in the Mosaic code was to restrain the wicked, but it was not the principle on which the Law was based (Deut. 13:11; 17:13; 19:20; 21:21). Yet the chief end of punishment is not to restrain the criminal from further crime, nor to deter others from doing similar acts of violence. Sin ought to be punished irrespective of the effect which the punishment may have in preventing others. The indignation which men feel toward the offender himself, when they witness a flagrant act of wrongdoing, such as murder, oppression, or cruelty, and the demand which they instinctively make for his punishment show that they discern guilt in the sinner and that they do not think in the first instance of the need of deterring others from the commission of like crimes. The wrongdoer is punished because he deserves to be. So, under the Mosaic Law, the state must execute justice and punish the offender, or be held guilty of participating in and condoning the crime (Lev. 20:4, 5; Num. 25:4, 11; Deut. 21:8; Josh. 7:11-15). The people must cleanse Jehovah's land from the blood of murder. The execution of the murderer was an expiation of the land (Num. 35:33, 34; Deut. 21:8 seq.).

The majesty of the law is maintained only when the punishment bears an adequate proportion to the crime committed, neither too little nor too much. The penalty need not be, and seldom is, an exact equivalent. The penalty for theft is not the restitution of the stolen property or its exact value in money. Enforced restitution does not clear the thief. Law has been violated, guilt incurred, and punishment is demanded.

The laws of the Hebrews were stern, but the punishments were not cruel. In rare cases the family of the criminal was extirpated by the immediate act of God or by his express command (Num. 16:32, 33; Josh. 7:24, 25; II Kings 9:25, 26); but this extent of punishment was recognized as extraordinary; it was not appointed by the Law as the prescribed penalty for any crime, and the Law expressly forbade that fathers should be punished for the children (Deut. 24:16). For a special case of impurity, the heinousness of which was aggravated by the relation of the party concerned to the sanctuary of God, and for incestuousness of peculiar abhorrence, the penalty was burning with fire (Lev. 20:14; 21:9; cf. Gen. 38:24). But there was no cruelty involved. The guilty ones were not burned alive; they were first stoned to death, and then their bodies were consumed by fire (cf. Josh. 7:15, 25). The hand of a woman who had used it in a shameless act to assist her husband in his struggle with an adversary was cut off (Deut. 25:11, 12). Retaliation for bodily injury, when inflicted willfully and not in a quarrel, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, was legalized. So it was by ancient Greek law and by the Roman laws of the 12 tables. In the later Jewish law (Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 35), and perhaps in the earlier law as well, a ransom in lieu of the maiming might be accepted by the injured person. This exemption was based on Ex. 21:29, 30 on the principle that, since in so great a matter as the infliction of death by one's ox, a fine might take the place of the surrender of the owner's life, in all lesser cases of injury a fine might also be accepted. In its humanity the Hebrew administration of justice compares favorably with Roman methods. Unlike Roman law, the Hebrew penal code did not authorize the punishment of the parricide by scourging him to the effusion of blood and then sewing him up in a sack and drowning him; nor did it sanction the torture of witnesses, who were slaves, and of accused persons to extract testimony (Acts 22:24 seq.); the punishment of the condemned by stocks and cruel scourging (Matt. 27:26; Acts 16:24; Jos. War ii. 14, 9), the mockery of those about to be executed (Matt. 27:27-31), crucifixion (Matt. 27:26, 32, 44; Jos. Antiq. xvii. 10, 10), condemnation of criminals to fight with each other as gladiators or with wild beasts (I Cor. 15:32; Jos. War vi. 9, 2; vii. 2, 1), scourging to death, starving to death (see PRISON), and burning to death, not infrequently by clothing the victim in a shirt steeped in pitch and setting it on fire.

The Hebrew law did not rudely abolish established usage, even when custom fell short of the standard erected by God (see SLAVE, CONCUBINE, DIVORCE); it recognized the people's hardness of heart (Mark 10:5); but it brought custom under law, checked excesses, reformed abuses; it took solemn account of man's conception of right and justice as prevalent in that age, guarded against vengeance and vindictiveness, satisfied the sense of justice, and thus maintained the august majesty of law; and it set higher standards before man and was a distinct advance toward perfection. The form of punitive justice was further determined by the essential idea of the theocracy, which required that not only crimes against the state and society, but also violations of religious ordinances should be punished. The relation of the Israelites to their divine King resulted in God's punishing sin when man failed to do so, and in God's reserving to himself the right to punish certain specified sins, e.g., to inflict childlessness (Lev. 20:4-6, 20, 21). Furthermore, the administration of justice was a matter in which the entire community was concerned, and consequently the people participated in its execution. The people stoned the criminal condemned to death.

The offenses mentioned in the penal law were:

1. Violation of the religious duties of the covenant. There were: 1. capital offenses, which the human tribunal punished with death. They were 5: sacrifice to idols (Ex. 22:20; Lev. 20:2; Deut. 13:6-17; 17:2-7); sorcery, professed intercourse with a familiar spirit, soothsaying (Ex. 22:18; Lev. 20:27); profanation of the Sabbath (Ex. 31:14, 15; 35:2); blasphemy (Lev. 24:10-16); and false prophecy, whether uttered in behalf of heathen deities or in the name of Jehovah (Deut. 13:1-5; 18:20). The penalty was death by stoning. Instances of the infliction of the death penalty on persons charged with these offenses are recorded in history: for sacrificing to idols (II Kings 10:18-25; 11:18; 23:5, 20), for exorcising the dead (I Sam. 28:3, 9), for profaning the Sabbath (Num. 15:32-36), for blasphemy (I Kings 21:13), for uttering false prophecy (I Kings 18:40; 20:27, 28). 2. Offenses punishable by cutting off the offender from his people. They endangered covenant institutions and the fundamental ordinances of worship. They were refusal to receive circumcision, the sign of the covenant (Gen. 17:14), neglect of the passover, the covenant sacrifice, and consumption of leavened bread during the feast of unleavened bread (Ex. 12:15; Num. 9:13), performance of work and refusal to fast on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:29, 30), use of blood or fat for food, since they belonged to sacrifice and atonement (Lev. 7:25-27; 17:14), offering elsewhere than at the sanctuary (ch. 17:4), slaughtering sacrificial animals without making a peace offering, and eating the peace offering after the prescribed limit (Lev. 7:18; 17:9; 19:8), use of the holy anointing oil and the incense for common purposes (Ex. 30:33, 38), neglect to purify one's self from defilement, and eating sacrifice in an unclean condition (Lev. 22:3; Num. 19:20). The punishment of cutting off is in some instances accompanied by the death penalty or by threat of divine judgment. When accompanied by the death penalty, the execution of the offender was committed to man. The threat of divine judgment reserved the infliction to God himself. The question whether the punishment of cutting off in all cases implied death, even when the death penalty was not expressly annexed, has given rise to much debate. The phrase has been interpreted to mean excommunication, as rabbinical writers understand; or loss of the rights belonging to the covenant; or death, which in breaches of the ritual was intended to be commuted to banishment or deprivation of civil rights, or death in all cases, either invariable and without remission, or else voidable by repentance and use of the means of propitiation for ceremonial defilement. It probably means expulsion from the fellowship of Israel or, as is otherwise stated, the congregation of Israel (Ex. 12:15, 19; Num. 16:9; 19:13), and, whether specifically stated or not, includes divine intervention for the extermination of the evildoer (cf. Gen. 17:14 with Ex. 4:24; Lev. 17:10; 20:3, 5, 6; 23:30). Accidental breach or mere neglect did not involve this dire punishment (Num. 15:27 seq.; Lev., ch. 4). Only when a person offended with high hand and showed bold contempt for the law was he cut off from his people (Num. 15:30, 31).

2. Unchastity. 1. Abominations that defile the people and the land. The penalty was death. They were adultery and the seduction of a betrothed virgin, not a slave girl (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:21-27), unnatural lust, both bestiality and sodomy (Ex. 22:19; Lev. 20:13, 15, 16), incestuous relations with mother-in-law or daughter-in-law (Lev. 20:11, 12, 14). Unchastity on the part of a priest's daughter, since it defiles at the same time the father who was set apart to holy service, was punished not only by death, but also by burning the body (Lev. 21:9). 2. Unclean, but less repugnant, conjugal relations were punished by cutting the offenders off from their people or by childlessness (Lev. 20:17-21). 3. The hand of a woman which was used in a shameless and unchaste act to distress the adversary of her husband, was to be cut off (Deut. 25:11, 12). 4. Unchastity which is neither adulterous, unnatural, nor incestuous. The seduction of a virgin entailed marriage, the payment of the usual price for a wife, and in certain cases a fine (Ex. 22:16, 17); and the ravisher was obliged to marry the maid and pay her father 50 shekels, and forfeited the right of divorce (Deut. 22:28, 29).

3. Insubordination to the constituted authorities. The penalty was death. 1. Impiety toward parents: striking or cursing father or mother (Ex. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9), incorrigibility coupled with habitual drunkenness (Deut. 21:18-21). 2. Refusal to submit to the decree of the priest or judge (Deut. 17:12). 3. Treason, which is not treated in the law, but, according to history, was punished by death and confiscation of property (I Sam. 20:31; 22:16; II Sam. 16:4; 19:29; I Kings 2:8, 9; 21:13, 15).

4. Crimes against the person, life, character, and property of another. 1. Willful murder and man-stealing were punished by death (Ex. 21:12, 16; Deut. 24:7); see MURDER. 2. Bodily injury, inflicted intentionally or through carelessness, was punished according to circumstances by compensation or retaliation, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth (Ex. 21:18-36). 3. A false witness incurred the penalty of the crime for which the accused was on trial (Deut. 19:16, 19), and a false accusation against a young wife's honor was punished by chastisement, a fine of 100 shekels, and forfeiture of the right of divorce (Deut. 22:13-19). 4. For injury to property the law required, according to circumstances, either simple compensation or a fine paid to the owner and amounting to several times the value of the stolen goods (Ex. 22:1-15).

The punishments recognized by the Mosaic Law were death, chiefly by stoning, and in extreme cases the burning or hanging of the body; chastisement, the stripes not to exceed 40 (Deut. 25:3); retaliation, compensation, which is scarcely a punishment, and fine; forfeiture of rights; and in a special case the loss of a hand. Death was sometimes inflicted by the sword, spear, or arrow, but without the forms of Hebrew law and in extraordinary cases (Ex. 19:13; 32:27; Num. 25:1-8; I Kings 2:25). The sword of the magistrate did not symbolize Hebrew judicial authority. Imprisonment, chains, and stocks were used by the authority of priests and kings, but they were not an institution of the early days of the Hebrew nation (Ezra 7:26; Jer. 20:2; Acts 5:40). See LAW, SIN, I.

Pū'nōn (pū'nōn). A station of the Israelites in the wilderness not long before their arrival in Moab (Num. 33:42, 43). Identified with Feinan, on the e. side of the Arabah, about 5½ miles s.s.e. of Khirbet Nahas and about 4½ miles s.s.e. of Khirbet Nekeib Aseimer; it is in a region where copper and iron were mined. See PINON.

Pū'rah (pū'rā), in A.V. Phu'rah. The servant, doubtless armor-bearer, of Gideon (Judg. 7:10, 11).

Pū'ri-fi-ca'tion. Under the Mosaic Law these were of 4 kinds:

1. Purification from uncleanness contracted by contact with a corpse (Num., ch. 19; cf. ch. 5:2, 3), not a carcass (Lev. 5:2). For this purpose the ashes of a heifer were required, a female animal as in the case of the sin offering for the common people. It was necessary for the heifer to be red, the color of blood in which the life resides, to be without blemish, and never to have been used in the service of man. It was slain without the camp, its blood was sprinkled toward the sanctuary, and the carcass was burned together with cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. The ashes were gathered and preserved without the camp. When needed, they were mingled with living water; and a clean person, with a bunch of hyssop, sprinkled them upon the unclean on the 3d and 7th day. It only remained for the defiled to wash his clothes and bathe, in order to be ceremonially clean. The defilement of a Nazirite, whose consecration had been interrupted by contact with a corpse, was of greater moment, for he was specially dedicated to ceremonial purity. After a week's separation, on the 7th day he shaved off his hair, the sign of his vow. On the 8th day he brought the same offerings as a man who had been defiled by an issue or as a mother might after childbirth (Num. 6:9-12). A guilt offering followed (v. 12), preparatory to his reinstatement as a Nazirite; cf. the guilt offering of the leper.

2. Purification from uncleanness due to an issue (Lev., ch. 15; cf. Num. 5:2, 3). On the 7th day after recovery, the unclean person after bathing in living water and washing the raiment was clean; and on the 8th day he repaired to the sanctuary and offered 2 doves or young pigeons, 1 for a sin offering, the other for a burnt offering. Uncleanness due to contact with a person having an issue, or with anything rendered unclean by such a person, was in ordinary cases cleansed by a bath, the uncleanness remaining until evening (Lev. 15:5-11).

3. Purification of a mother after childbirth. After the days of uncleanness, which were 7 for a man child and 14 for a female child, were over, those of purification followed, during which she touched no hallowed thing, lest she defile it, and for the same reason was forbidden access to the sanctuary. For a son these were to continue 33, and for a daughter 66 days, after which she brought a lamb of the 1st year or, in case of poverty, 2 pigeons or 2 doves for a burnt offering and a young pigeon or dove for a sin offering (Lev. 12:8; Luke 2:21-24).

4. Purification of the leper (Lev., ch. 14). The candidate for purification presented himself on the appointed day at the gate of the camp, later at that of the city. The priest killed a clean bird, holding it so that the blood flowed into an earthen vessel of living water. He made a sprinkler by binding a bunch of hyssop with a scarlet cord on a cedar handle, and dipped the sprinkler and a living bird into the bloody water, sprinkled the person undergoing purification, and released the bird; see AZAZEL. This much of the ritual was also performed in purifying a house of leprosy. The candidate was then pronounced clean; and having washed his clothes, shaved off all his hair, and bathed, he might enter camp or city, but must remain outside his habitation 7 days. On the 7th day he again washed his raiment, shaved and bathed, and was clean. On the 8th day he appeared at the sanctuary with 2 male lambs and a ewe lamb of the 1st year or, if his means were limited, with 1 lamb and 2 doves or pigeons, together with a meal offering and a measure of oil. One he-lamb was taken for a guilt offering. The priest put some of its blood on the candidate's right ear, right thumb, and right great toe. He did likewise with some of the oil, after sprinkling a little of it before the Lord, and poured the rest on the candidate's head. The ceremony was completed by offering the remaining lambs or pigeons for a sin offering and a burnt offering.

Pū'rim (pū'rim) [Heb. pūr (pl. pūrim), lot; cf. Akkad. pūrum, lot; and also Akkad. purrumum, to destroy]. A Jewish festival, instituted to celebrate the deliverance of the exiles in Persia from the wholesale massacre of their race planned by Haman. He had cast pur (a lot) to ascertain a favorable day for carrying out his scheme. The festival was kept on the 14th and 15th days of the month Adar, approximately February (Esth. 9:20-28). In II Macc. 15:36 it is called the day of Mordecai. Josephus mentions that in his time all the Jews of the inhabited world kept the festival (Jos. Antiq. xi. 6, 13). Some have thought that the feast of the Jews mentioned in John 5:1 was that of Purim; but the statement that Jesus went up to Jerusalem is opposed to this view, for Purim was celebrated throughout the land, and only at 3 great feasts was a visit to Jerusalem compulsory. Purim was not one of the 3. From the time of its institution it has enjoyed great popularity among the Jews. The celebration has assumed a fixed form. The 13th of Adar they keep as a fast day. In the evening, which is the beginning of the 14th day, they assemble in their synagogues. After the evening service the reading of The Book of Esther is begun. When the name of Haman is reached, the congregation cry out, "Let his name be blotted out," or "The name of the wicked shall rot," while the youthful worshippers spring rattles. The names of Haman's sons are all read in a breath, to indicate that they were hanged simultaneously. Next morning the people repair again to the synagogue and finish the formal religious exercises of the festival. They then devote the day to mirth and rejoicing before the Lord, the wealthy giving gifts to the poor. The keeping of the Purim festival on the 14th of Adar from age to age is a strong argument for the historic character of the incidents recorded in The Book of Esther. Attempts at finding a Babylonian or Persian origin of the festival have not been convincing. See ESTHER.

Purple. A color which in ancient and modern usage comprehends violet and all the hues intermediate between violet and crimson. In ancient times it included crimson and other reds (Pliny Hist. Nat. ix. 61, 62; cf. Mark 15: 17 with Matt. 27:28). Purple raiment was costly, and consequently its use was the privilege of the rich exclusively. It was worn by persons of wealth and high official position (Esth. 8:15; cf. Mordecai's elevation to office, Esth. 8:2; Prov. 31:22; Dan. 5:7; I Macc. 10:20, 62, 64; II Macc.

4:38; cf. v. 31; Luke 16:19; Rev. 17:4), and especially by kings, as by the kinglets of Midian (Judg. 8:26). It was a sign of royalty (I Macc. 8:14; Homer Iliad iv. 141-145), and was put on Jesus in mockery of his claims. Rich cloths of purple were used as coverings for the seats of princely palanquins (S. of Sol. 3:10), awnings for the decks of luxurious ships (Ezek. 27:7), and drapery for idols (Jer. 10:9). Purple was largely employed in the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. 25:4; 26:1, 31, 36), and in the garments of the high priest (Ex. 28:5, 6, 15, 33; 39:29). The Jews interpreted the color symbolically (Jos. War v. 5, 4).

Purple dye was obtained from various kinds of shell fish (I Macc. 4:23; Jos. War v. 5, 4), and was yielded by a thin fluid, called the flower, secreted by a gland in the neck. The amount yielded by each fish was very small, much labor was required to collect it in quantity, and the price was correspondingly great. The larger purples were broken at the top to get at the gland without injuring it, but the smaller ones were pressed in mills (Pliny Hist. Nat. ix. 60). Two species of Murex were used by the ancient Syrians, Murex trunculus and Murex brandaris, and yielded crimson. The Murex is common throughout the Mediterranean Sea, but the shade of color varies with the coast. Murex shells were found at Minet el-Beida, the seaport of ancient Ugarit (Ras Shamra), showing that purple was made there in the 2d millennium B.C.

Purse. A bag for carrying money (Luke 10:4; 12:33; 22:35), which, however, was not a necessity, as money was often carried in the girdle (Matt. 10:9, R.V. marg.). The purse or common treasury of the disciples was in charge of Judas (John 12:6; 13:29, R.V. marg., box); the same word was used to describe it as that which designated the chests for offerings at the Temple. Before coins came into use, pieces of silver and gold of various sizes and shapes were tied in a bag or in the girdle, or rings of the precious metal were strung on a cord (Gen. 42:35; Prov. 7:20), and weights and scales were carried for weighing out the desired quantity (Deut. 25:13; Micah 6:11).

Put (püt), in A.V. Phut (Gen. 10:6; Ezek. 27:10; 38:5 marg.). A people related to the Egyptians (Gen. 10:6), and the country inhabited by them. Put is mentioned in association with Egypt and other African countries, especially with Lubim (Nahum 3:9) and Lud (Ezek. 27:10; and Isa. 66:19 in LXX; between Cush and Lud, Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 30:5); it is rendered Libyans by the LXX in Jeremiah and Ezekiel; it is also identified with Libya by Josephus (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 2); but Put is distinguished from the Libyans (Nahum 3:9). The latest view connects Put with Punt. Punt lay s. or s.e. of Cush, and is commonly identified with Somaliland in Africa. According to Glaser the name first referred to E. Arabia, was then transferred to the S. Arabian incense coast, and was eventually applied to the African coast of Somaliland.

Puteoli (pū-tē'ō-lī) [Lat., little wells]. A seaport in Italy which Paul's vessel reached the day after it had been at Rhegium. The apostle found Christians there, and enjoyed their hospitality (Acts 28:13). Founded in the 6th century B.C., it was originally called Dicaearchia, and was the ordinary landing place of travelers to Italy from Egypt and the East (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 12, 1; xviii. 7, 2; Life 3). It was on the n. shore of the Bay of Naples, near the site where the modern city of that name now stands. Its old name of Puteoli still exists, little changed, as Pozzuoli. The whole region round is volcanic, and the crater of the Solfatara rises behind the town.

Pu'thites (pū'thīts), in A.V. Pu'hites. A family in Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:53).

Pu'tiel (pū'tī-ēl) [etym. uncertain, afflicted by God; or perhaps with first component Egypt, he whom God gave]. Father-in-law of Eleazar, Aaron's son (Ex. 6:25).

Pu'vah (pū'vā) and Pu'ah; instead of first form A.V. has Phu'vah (Gen. 46:13), Pu'a (Num. 26:23). 1. A son of Issachar and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23; I Chron. 7:1).

2. A man of Issachar, son of Dodo, and father of the judge Tola (Judg. 10:1).

Py'garg. The rendering of Heb. dishōn, the name of a clean animal (Deut. 14:5). The pygarg of the ancients was a white rumped antelope. It seems to have been the addax (Antelope addax, or Addax nasomaculatus). The horns, which exist in both sexes, are twisted and ringed. It has a white patch on the forehead, and the hinder parts are grayish-white. It is about the size of a large ass. It is a native of n.e. Africa (cf. Herod, iv. 192), but its range extends to the s.e. frontier of Palestine.

Pyrrhus (pir'ūs) [Gr., flame-colored, red]. The father of Sopater (Acts 20:4, R.V.).

Q

Qoph (kōf). See קוֹפֶה.

Quail. A bird which the Children of Israel twice during their journeying near Sinai providentially had for food in great abundance. In the wilderness of Sin the birds covered the camp on one evening (Ex. 16:12, 13); at Kibroth-hattaavah they were driven in by the s.e. wind from the sea, and fell in vast quantities in and around the camp, lying in places 3 feet deep (Num. 11:31-34; Ps. 78:26-31). Each time it was the spring of the year. The bird was called in Heb. šēlāw, and the similarity between the Heb. word and Arab. salway, a quail, proves that to be the bird intended. It is the quail of Europe, not of America, is called Coturnix dactylisonans, or communis, and is placed in the Tetraonidae or grouse family, and the Perdiciinae, or partridge subfamily. It is the smallest species of the partridge type, being only about 7½ inches long. Its general color is brown, with buffy streaks above and buff below. It is migratory, arriving in Palestine from the s. in immense numbers in March, and going s. again at the approach of winter. Quails fly rapidly and well, and take advantage of the wind; but if the wind changes its course, or the birds become exhausted from long flight, the whole immense flock is apt to fall to the ground, where the birds lie stunned (cf. Jos. Antiq. iii. 1, 5). In this condition they are captured in great quantities on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean Sea. The Israelites spread the quails, which they could not eat at once, round about the camp (Num. 11:32) in order to dry them in the sun and air, as the Egyptians did with fish (Herod. ii. 77).

Quar'tūs (kwōr'tūs) [Lat., fourth]. A Corinthian Christian who joined with Paul in sending a salutation to the church of Rome (Rom. 16:23).

Quar'ter'nion. Four united persons or things; a guard of 4 soldiers (Acts 12:4). Four quaternions, i.e., 4 companies, each of 4 soldiers, 16 in all, were set to look after Peter when he was in prison at Jerusalem, each quaternion discharging the duty for 1 watch of 3 hours. During the night watches, 2 soldiers slept with the apostle in his cell, while the other 2 mounted guard before the door.

Queen. The consort of a king, or a woman who reigns by her own right. Vashti and Esther were queen consorts (Esth. 1:9; 2:22). Even after the death of the king her husband, the queen, especially if mother of the new monarch, retained respect and influence (II Kings 10:13); for the practice of polygamy made the position of even the chief wife precarious, and at any time the king might capriciously promote over her head some one of her rivals; but the queen mother, i.e., the mother of the king, had an unalterable relation to the monarch, and was often the most potent female personage (cf. I Kings 2:19; 15:13; II Kings 24:8, 15). Three queens regnant or women who occupied the throne are mentioned in Scripture: Athaliah, who, after perpetrating a massacre of the seed royal, usurped the throne of Judah; the queen of Sheba (I Kings 10:1-13; II Chron. 9:1-12); and Candace, queen of the Ethiopians (Acts 8:27). The last 2, it is believed, came to their high dignity in a perfectly legitimate way.

The queen of heaven was a false divinity in honor of whom the Jews in Jeremiah's time made cakes, burnt incense, and poured out drink offerings (Jer. 7:18; 44:15-30). She was probably the Phoenician goddess Ashtoreth (q.v.), or a mother-goddess, whose figurines have been found in Palestine.

Quick'sand'. A sandbank which moves, quick being used in the sense of living. The quicksands of which the sailors on board Paul's ships were afraid (Acts 27:17), and which were the terror of ancient mariners, were 2 in number, the Greater and the Lesser Syrtis, the former constituting the s.e., and the latter the s.w. part of that great indentation in the n. African coast s. of Sicily. The Greater Syrtis, now called the Gulf of Sidra, curves inward on the African coast for about 126 miles, and measures 264 miles between the 2 promontories at its mouth. It is shallow and full of quicksands. The Lesser Syrtis does not run so far inland. At its mouth it measures about 69 miles from the island of Kerkenna on the n. to that of Jerba on the s. It is dangerous to navigate, owing to its winds and tides. It is now called the Gulf of Gabes.

Qui-rin'i-us (kwī-rīn'ī-ūs), in A.V. Cy-re-ni-us; the former being the original Lat. name, the latter its modification in Gr. A Roman who was governor (legatus Augusti) of Syria in A.D. 6 (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 1) and who may have exercised authority over Syria as governor or as military commander prior to 2 B.C. According to Luke (ch. 2:1-5) an enrollment was made which led Joseph to go with Mary his espoused wife to Bethlehem. This visit to Bethlehem took place in the reign of Herod the Great, at the close of the year 5, or beginning of 4, B.C. The enrollment was not a local affair but was made in pursuance of a decree of the Roman emperor Augustus that all the world should be taxed. "This was the first enrollment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria."

Luke's account has presented historians with serious problems. Archaeology has solved certain of them: e.g., it now is known that during the 1st century of our era a census was taken in the Roman Empire every 14 years, that this system was certainly in operation as early as A.D. 20 and probably still earlier, and that it was customary (at least in Egypt) for people to go to their ancestral homes for enrollment. The most troublesome problem which remains involves Luke's chronology, for it makes Quirinius governor of Syria during the lifetime of Herod. From evidence derived from contemporary coins and from the historians Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 5, 2, etc.) and Tacitus (Hist. 5, 9), it is learned that Sentius Saturninus governed Syria 9-6 B.C. and that Quintilius Varus was in office from 6 B.C. to after the death of Herod (April, 4 B.C.), since he put down a sedition which arose when Herod died. Thus apparently no time is left for the governorship of Quirinius prior to the birth of Jesus in 5 or 4 B.C.

Conservative scholars adopt 1 of 2 theories, each of which is closely connected with a fragmentary Lat. inscription from Tivoli. This fragment, which refers to but does not preserve the name of a legate of Syria, is restored by some first-class scholars (including Mommsen, Ramsay, and Roos) to refer to Quirinius as governor of Syria in 3-2 B.C. Then Luke 2:1 is substantially accurate and is to be interpreted to mean that the command for the enrollment was issued prior to Herod's death (i.e., while Varus was governor) but was actually brought to completion while Quirinius was governor of Syria. The other theory which is favored by most conservatives supposes that while Quirinius was military commander of the troops of Syria (and it is known that some time after c. 11 B.C. he carried on a war with the Homanadenses of Cilicia), he also shared civil duties and prerogatives with Varus. It is further supposed that Quirinius was commissioned by Varus to conduct a census in his (Varus') province. But it must be admitted that this involves assumptions regarding an overlapping of authority that do not possess high probability.

Many scholars believe that Luke mistakenly antedates the enrollment made under Quirinius A.D. 6-7 after Judea had been incorporated into the Roman Empire, an act which was resented as a mark of servitude and occasioned disturbances stirred up by Judas, a Galilean (Acts 5:37; Jos. Antiq. xvii. 13, 5; War ii. 8, 1). But since Luke's accuracy has been many times vindicated, it is doubtless wisest to await further light from discoveries that may solve the difficulties.

Quiv'er. A case for containing arrows (Isa. 49:2; Lam. 3:13). The Assyrian archers on foot carried the quiver on the back, with the opening usually at the right shoulder, but archers who fought from chariots hung the quiver at the side of the vehicle. The Egyptians also slung the quiver across the back, but they seem to have allowed it to hang horizontally and to have drawn out the arrows from beneath the left arm.

R

Ra'a-mah (rā'ā-mā), in R.V. once Ra'ama (rā'ā-mā) (I Chron. 1:9), the Heb. spelling in this instance [cf. Arab. raghama, to constrain, humiliate]. Collective name for a Cushite people, associated with Sheba (Gen. 10:7; I Chron. 1:9). Men of the 2 tribes brought precious stones and gold to the markets of Tyre (Ezek. 27:22). Raamah is mentioned in inscriptions of Sheba as a place near Ma'in, in s.w. Arabia; called Regma in LXX and Vulgate.

Ra'amī'ah (rā'ā-mī'ā) [perhaps, Jehovah has thundered]. See REELIAIAH.

Ra-am'ses (rā-ām'sēz). See RAMESES.

Rab'bah (rāb'ā), in A.V. twice Rab'bath (Deut. 3:11; Ezek. 21:20), the Heb. form when joined with a following word [great, i.e., the capital]. 1. A city at the headwaters of the Jabbok, 23 miles e. of the Jordan. It was the chief city of the Ammonites. When David was king, the Ammonites defied Israel, prepared for war, and hired auxiliaries from the Aramaeans. The hired army marched to the town of Medeba (I Chron. 19:7; or perhaps "waters of Rabbah"). Joab and the Israelites were encamped before the gate of Rabbah, and presently the Aramaeans pitched camp behind them in the open field. The Israelites were beset before and behind (II Sam. 10:8, 9; I Chron. 19:9). By dividing his forces Joab met and defeated both enemies (II Sam. 10:13, 14). The next spring Joab besieged Rabbah again. During a sally from the gate, Uriah the Hittite was killed. That part of the city lying between the citadel and the river, and called the city of waters, fell into the hands of Joab, but the citadel held out. David was sent for to complete the conquest and associate it with his name. He came, took the city, and condemned the inhabitants to forced labor (II Sam. 11:1; 12:26-31; I Chron. 20:1-3). In time the Ammonites recovered the city. Judgments were denounced against it by Jeremiah (Jer. 49:2-6) and Ezekiel (Ezek. 21:20). It was embellished by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.), and in his honor named Philadelphia. This city was the e. limit of Perea (Jos. War iii. 3, 3), and the most s. of the 10 cities of the Decapolis. The commercial highway between Damascus and Arabia which skirted the desert passed through it, and there was also a trade road from Philadelphia by way of Gerasa and Pella to Scythopolis. The modern name is 'Ammān, an echo of Ammon.

2. A city, with dependent villages, in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:60); probably near Jerusalem and corresponding to Rubute of the Tell el-Amarna tablets.

Rab'bath (rāb'āth). See RABBAH.

Rab'bi, and Rab-bo'ni. A doctor, teacher, or master; a respectful term applied by the Jews to their spiritual instructors (Matt. 23:7; John 1:38). The later Jewish schools are said to have had 3 grades of honor: rab (master), the lowest; rabbi (my master), the 2d; and rabboni (my lord, my master), the highest of all. When John wrote, the first person suffix (-i) had lost its especial significance as a possessive pronoun, for John explains rabbi and rabboni as meaning simply master (John 1:38; 20:16).

Rab'biṯh (rāb'īth) [multitude]. A frontier village of Issachar (Josh. 19:20). Conder identifies it with the present village of Rāba, among hills 8 miles s. of Mount Gilboa, and 7 s.e. of Jenin.

Rab-bo'ni. See RABBI.

Rab-mag (rāb'māg). A title of high office, borne by Nergal-sharezer, a chief officer in Nebuchadnezzar's army (Jer. 39:3). The exact meaning is uncertain, but it is probably derived from Akkad. rab-mugi, and means great prince.

Rab-sa-ris (rāb'sā-rīs) [probably from Akkad. rab sha rēshu, chief who is head, the latter 2 words being modified, to suit the Hebrew ear, into sāris, eunuch]. An official title. A rab-saris accompanied the armies of Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 18:17; Jer. 39:3). The officer at Nebuchadnezzar's court who is called master of the eunuchs in the Eng. version and whose title is given in Heb. as rab sārisim perhaps held the same office (Dan. 1:3).

Rab'sha-keh (rāb'shā-kē) [Akkad. rab-shākū, chief cupbearer, head officer, general]. Title of a military official, associated with the tartan and the rab-saris of Sennacherib in command of an expedition against Jerusalem (II Kings 18:17). On this occasion he conducted the parley with the officials of Hezekiah (vs. 19, 26, 27, 37), and was perhaps head of the expedition (ch. 18:8).

Ra-ca' (rā-kā') [Aram. rēkā, empty, worthless, good-for-nothing]. An expression of contempt (Matt. 5:22).

Ra'cal (rā'cāl), in A.V. Ra'chal [trade, commerce]. A place in Judah to which David sent some of the recovered spoil of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:29).

Race. See GAMES.

Ra'chab (rā'kāb). See RAHAB, II.

Ra'chal (rā'kāl). See RACAL.

Ra'chel (rā'chēl), in A.V. once Ra'hel (Jer. 31:15) [few]. The younger daughter of Laban. She was possessed of much personal beauty, and Jacob fell in love with her at first sight, when he met her at the well near Haran, in Mesopotamia, where she was watering her flock. Since he possessed no property and it was customary to pay the parents a price for the bride, he served her father 7 years for her, and then, being cheated by the substitution of the elder sister Leah, who was much less highly favored, he served another 7 for the younger maiden, the only one who had gained his affections. He married her also (Gen. 29:1-30), and she became the mother of Joseph (ch. 30:22-25) and Benjamin, dying when the latter was born (chs. 35:16-20; 48:7). She was buried a little to the n. of Ephrath, better known as Bethlehem. The grave was situated at a place which a traveler from Beth-el would reach before he came to Bethlehem. Jacob erected a pillar to mark the spot. This pillar long remained. It was near Zelzah (I Sam. 10:2). The reputed site was alluded to by Jerome and the Bordeaux pilgrim in the 4th century, and is accepted as correct by Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans. The erection called Kubbat Rahil (Dome of Rachel) is a small building like a mosque, with a dome. It has an open apartment toward the e. and a small enclosure toward the w. The present structure is of no great antiquity; it is located about 4 miles s. of Jerusalem and 1 mile n. of Bethlehem.

It seems, however, that there is a double tradition of the burial place of Rachel. Beth-el is about 11 miles n. of Jerusalem (cf. Gen. 35:16; 48:7), and according to I Sam. 10:2 Rachel's tomb is in the border of Benjamin. About 5 miles n. of Jerusalem lies Ramah, and it seems that Jeremiah (Jer. 31:15) favors the location of the tomb in that region. Matthew (Matt. 2:18), however, makes application of the s. tradition, which places the tomb in the neighborhood of Bethlehem.

The Prophet Jeremiah represents Rachel as weeping for her children, the descendants of her son Joseph, the people of Ephraim and Manasseh who were in captivity (Jer. 31:15; cf. vs. 9, 18). At Ramah was her voice heard; not so much because the prophet foresaw that the captives of Judah and Benjamin would be brought to Ramah after the fall of Jerusalem before being led into exile (ch. 40:1), but either because a town called Ramah was perhaps near Rachel's grave (cf. I Sam. 10:2; see RAMAH 2), or more probably because Ramah was a height in the territory of Rachel's remaining children, the descendants of Benjamin, and near the border of depopulated Ephraim, whence the desolation of the land was visible. This picture which the prophet drew of weeping Rachel found fulfillment in the slaughter of the innocents at Bethlehem in the land of Judah (Matt. 2:18), although the descendants of Leah, not Rachel, wept. Rachel looking on the wasted land of Ephraim, and bewailing her slain and exiled children, was witness that the process had begun which terminated in the possession of the Promised Land by foreigners, the occupation of the throne by an Edomite, and the slaughter of Leah's children in the endeavor to slay the legitimate king and destined Saviour of all Israel, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Judah alike. The picture of Rachel found more than a counterpart in the sorrow of the women of Bethlehem. It found completion, and it found renewed realization. Rachel wept again, this time with Leah. Rachel's hope for the return of her children to the Lord their God and David their king (Jer. 30:9) was bound up in Leah's yearning for that son of David in whose days Judah should be saved and Israel dwell in safety (ch. 23:6). Rachel's cry was the first wail of that lamentation which continued through the centuries and was heard at Bethlehem when a foreign king, in hostility to the son of David, legitimate king of the Jews, was able to send armed men to the city of David and slay the children. The process begun when Rachel first wept was being completed. The prophetic picture was finding final fulfillment.

Ra'd'ai (răd'ă-i) [perhaps, Jehovah has subdued]. A son of Jesse, and brother of David (I Chron. 2:14).

Ra'gau (ră'gō). See REU.

Ra-gu'el (ră-gū'el). See REUEL.

Ra'hab, I (ră'hăb) [Heb. rahab, storm, insolence]. A poetical name for Egypt (Ps. 87:4; 89:10; Isa. 30:7, R.V.; 51:9). In Isa. 51:9 it is parallel with dragon; see DRAGON. In Job 9:13; 26:12, R.V., especially, some interpreters understand a sea monster, and some even discern an allusion to the Semitic myth of the sea monster Tiamat who attempted to reduce the ordered universe to chaos but was subdued by the sun-god Marduk. This interpretation is not necessary, but it is possible. The inspired poets and prophets might borrow the creations of fancy to illustrate truth; see LEVIATHAN.

Ra'hab, II (ră'hăb), in A.V. of N.T. once Ra'chab (Matt. 1:5) [Heb. rāhāb, broad]. A harlot whose house was on the wall of Jericho. She harbored the spies sent by Joshua to explore the city, hid them when they were searched for, and, finally, let them down by a cord on the outer side of the wall, so that they escaped to the Israelite camp (Josh. 2:1-24). When Jericho was taken, Rahab and her family were spared and incorporated with the chosen people (Josh. 6:22-25; Heb. 11:31; James 2:25). It was probably she who became the wife of Salmon and the mother of Boaz, and a link in the chain of ancestry both of King David and of our Lord (Matt. 1:5).

Ra'ham (ră'hăm) [(God) has been compassionate]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (I Chron. 2:44).

Ra'hel (ră'hēl). See RACHEL.

Rain. See YEAR.

Rain'bow. A bow appearing in the part of the heavens opposite to the sun, consisting of the prismatic colors, and formed by the refraction and reflection of the sun's rays from drops of rain. After the Flood God selected the rainbow, which had often before been seen in the sky, and appointed or consecrated it as the token of the promise that he would not again destroy the earth by a flood (Gen. 9:12-17). It became the symbol of God's faithfulness and of his beneficence toward man (Rev. 4:3).

Rai'sin. See VINE.

Ra'kem (ră'kēm) [variegated]. The Heb. pausal form of Rekem. A Manassite (I Chron. 7:16); J.V., Rekem.

Rak'kath (răk'ăth) [Aram., bank, shore]. A fenced city of Naphtali, on the w. shore of the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 19:35). The rabbis place it where Tiberias now stands, but it probably is to be located at Tell Eklātiyeh, s. of Magdala (el-Mejdel).

Rak'kon (răk'ōn) [perhaps, shore]. A village of Dan (Josh. 19:46). Conder suggests as its site Tell er-Rekkēt, 2½ miles n. of the mouth of the 'Aujah, and 6 n. of Joppa. The name does not occur in the LXX, and so many consider it a textual corruption of Me-jarkon which immediately precedes.

Ram, I. 1. The male of the sheep (Ezek. 34:17). It was used as food (Gen. 31:38), might be brought as a burnt offering or a peace offering (Gen. 22:13; Lev. 1:10; 8:18; and chs. 3:6; 9:4), and was appointed for a guilt or trespass offering (chs. 5:15; 6:6). Rams' skins dyed red were used, with other appliances, as coverings of the tabernacle (Ex. 26:14), and rams' horns as war and apparently jubilee trumpets in the time of Joshua (Josh. 6:4-6, 8, 13). The 2-horned ram seen by Daniel in prophetic vision was the Medo-Persian power, the 1st or smaller horn that came up being the empire of the Medes, the 2d or greater horn which rose at a later period that of the Persians (Dan. 8:3-7, 20).

2. The battering-ram was an instrument of war, used to beat down the gates and walls of a besieged city (Ezek. 4:2; 21:22; Jos. War v. 6, 4). It consisted of a log of wood, iron-pointed, swung by ropes from a support above and generally within a tower (Jos. War v. 11, 5). In attacking a fort or city, it was often necessary to throw up a mound of earth called Ramathaim-zophim (cf. ch. 1:1 with v. 19; etc.). The town cannot be located with certainty. 1. It has been identified with Ramah of Benjamin. On this theory the place is rightly described, so it is contended, as situated in the hill country of Ephraim (I Sam. 1:1), and it is different from the unnamed town in the land of Zuph where Saul first met Samuel (ch. 9:5 seq.). Robinson called this identification in question, and probably justly, although his opinion has not been followed by all authorities. 2. It lay s. of Benjamin, for (a) the passage I Sam. 1:1 does not clearly locate Ramathaim in the hill country of Ephraim, but rather states that a certain man of the family of Zuph dwelt in Ramathaim, a city of the Zophites, who were a branch of the Kohathite Levites, and were called Ephraim-to serve as an inclined plane and enable the besiegers to bring the battering-ram and other military engines against the walls (Ezek. 4:2).

Ram, II (rām), in A.V. of N.T. A'ram, in imitation of the Gr. form [high]. The name assumes various Gr. forms, as Aram, Arran, Arni. 1. A man of Judah, a son of Hezron, and brother of Jerahmeel (Ruth 4:19; I Chron. 2:9; Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33, R.V., text and marg.).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:25, 27).

3. A descendant of Buz, founder of a family of the Buzites, and an ancestor of Elihu (Job 32:2). He has sometimes been identified with Aram of Gen. 22:21; but Aram was not descended from Buz (nor vice versa), and Aram and Ram are different names in Heb.

Ra'mah (rāmā), in A.V. of N.T. Ra'ma (rāmā), in imitation of the Gr. [a height]. 1. A town in Benjamin (Josh. 18:25), not far from Gibeath, Geba, and Beth-el (Judg. 4:5; 19:13, 14; Isa. 10:29). It was fortified by Baasha, king of Israel, to keep the people of Judah from making military excursions n. (I Kings 15:17, 21, 22; II Chron. 16:1-6); hence apparently s. of Beth-el. It seems to have been the place where the captives of Judah were massed together before their deportation to Babylon (Jer. 40:1). The town was reoccupied after the Captivity (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 11:33). According to Josephus, Ramah was distant 40 stades from Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. viii. 12, 3). Robinson located it at er-Rām, on a height 5 miles n. of Jerusalem.

2. A town where the parents of Samuel lived (I Sam. 1:19; 2:11; cf. ch. 1:1), where he himself was born and had his residence (chs. 7:17; 8:4; 15:34; 16:13; 19:18, 19, 22, 23; 20:1), and where he was buried (chs. 25:1; 28:3). For the sake of distinction from other towns of similar name it was ites because their assigned home was in the hill country of Ephraim, whence they had migrated (cf. Josh. 21:5; I Chron. 6:22-26, 35, 66 seq.). (b) If this be the true interpretation, then the unnamed city where Saul met Samuel is doubtless Ramathaim-zophim, for it is in the land of Zuph. This district lay outside the borders of Benjamin (I Sam. 9:4-6), and s. of Benjamin, i.e., in such a situation that a person going from a city in or quite near it to Gibeath of Benjamin came to Rachel's sepulcher on the borders of Benjamin (I Sam. 10:2), between Beth-el and Bethlehem (Gen. 35:16, 19). (c) It is now plain why Saul did not know the Prophet Samuel by sight, which could scarcely have been the case had the prophet resided at Ramah of Benjamin, only 2½ miles from Saul's home (cf. also I Sam. 8:1, 2). 3. Another location for Ramathaim may be sought in the territory of Ephraim (Jos. Antiq. v. 10, 2) where the Zophites dwelt; but not in Benjamin and not the nameless town of I Sam. 9:5. Beit Rima, 13 miles n.e. of Lydda, has been suggested. Compare with caution RAMATHAIM.

3. A town on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. 19:29). If it is not the same town as Ramah of Naphtali (v. 36), its site may be at Rāmeh, about 13 miles s.e. by s. of Tyre.

4. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36). It is believed to have been situated at er-Rāmeh, about 5 miles s.w. of Safed and 17 e. of Acre.

5. Ramoth-gilead (cf. II Kings 8:28 with v. 29, and II Chron. 22:5 with v. 6).

6. A village in Simeon (Josh. 19:8; A.V., Ramath). It is doubtless the same as Ramoth of the South (I Sam. 30:27); and was also known as Baalath-beer (q.v.).

Ra'math (rāmāth) [height], the Heb. form of Ramah when joined to a following word. A village of Simeon (Josh. 19:8, in R.V. Ramah), known also as Ramoth of the South (I Sam. 30:27). See RAMAH 6.

Ra'ma'tha'im (rā'mā-thā'im), in A.V. Ram'a-them (rām'ā-thēm) [twin heights]. A town which gave name to 1 of 3 governmental districts which were detached from Samaria and added to Judea (I Macc. 11:34; cf. ch. 10:30, 38). Its location must be sought near the s. border of Ephraim.

Ra'ma'tha'im-zō'phim (rā'mā-thā'im-zō'fīm) [the twin heights (of the) Zophites]. The residence of Samuel's father (I Sam. 1:1); see RAMAH 2.

Ra'math-ite (rā'māth-īt). A native or inhabitant of any town called Ramah (I Chron. 27:27). Which of them is referred to in the passage is not known.

Ra'math-le'hī (rā'māth-lē'hī). See LEHI.

Ra'math-miz'peh (rā'māth-miz'pē). See MIZPAH 2.

Ram'es (rām'ē-sēz) [from Egypt. R'-mš-šw, (the sun-god) Re is the one who has begotten him]. A town of Egypt. It was in the most fertile district of the country (Gen. 47:11), the land of Goshen (v. 6), the region where Pharaoh bade Joseph locate his father and brothers. Ramesses II built a town on the e. frontier of Egypt and gave it his own name. Perhaps it was the same as the store city Raames, which the Israelites built for Pharaoh (Ex. 1:11); see EGYPT, III. 8. At the Exodus the Israelites marched from Ramesses to Succoth (ch. 12:37); Avaris, Ramesses, and Tanis were all successive phases of the same city and are to be located at Šan el-Hagar. See ZOAN.

Ra-mi'ah (rā-mi'ā) [exalted is Jehovah]. A son of Parosh, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:25).

Ra'moth (rā'mōth) [high places, height]. 1. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29). The R.V. reads Jeremoth in the text, and relegates Ra'moth to the marg.

2. A town of Issachar, assigned for residence to the Gershonite Levites (I Chron. 6:73); see JARMUTH 2.

3. A town in Gilead; see RAMOTH-GILEAD.

4. A town of the South (I Sam. 30:27); see RAMAH 6.

Ra'moth-gil'e-ad (rā'mōth-gil'ē-ād) [heights of Gilead]. See MIZPAH 2.

Ram'ses (rām'sēz). A method of Anglicizing the name of the Egypt. Pharaoh R'-mš-šw; now generally called Ramesses. See EGYPT II. 3 (4) and RAMESSES.

Ra'phah (rā'fā) and Ra'pha (rā'fā) [he (God) has healed]. 1. A son of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:2); but he is not enumerated with those who accompanied Jacob into Egypt (Gen. 46:21), and was probably born after the descent into Egypt. He did not found a tribal family; his descendants, if there were any, were included in other families of the Benjamites.

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:37). Called in ch. 9:43 Rephaiah, a synonymous name.

Ra'phon (rā'fōn). A town of Gilead, besieged by the Ammonites, but relieved by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 5:37). It was apparently not far from Carnaim (v. 43). It probably is Raphana, which was one of the original cities constituting the Decapolis, and was situated s. of the Sea of Galilee and e. of the Jordan.

Ra'phu (rā'fū) [healed, cured]. A Benjamite, father of Palti (Num. 13:9).

Ras Sham'ra (rās šām'rā) [Arab., Fennel Head]. Ras Shamra (ancient Ugarit) is on the Mediterranean about 10 miles n. of Latakia and about 25 s.w. of Antioch; it lies directly opposite the extreme e. point of Cyprus. Here were found between 1929 and 1939 several hundred clay tablets and fragments written in a cuneiform alphabet. The language, known as Ugaritic, is a Canaanite dialect and is closely related to proto-Hebrew. Among the literature are several Canaanite epics relating to Baal and Anath, Dan'el and Akhat, Keret, etc. Some of the tablets contain hymns, liturgies, rituals, and documents concerning temple administration. The date of these records of Canaanite religion and mythology is c. 1400 B.C., but the original compositions are much older and probably were handed down orally for a long time before they were reduced to writing. These tablets are of special importance for the light they shed on Canaanite religion and the many parallels they offer to the O.T. in vocabulary and poetic style.

Ra'ven. A bird, black in color (S. of Sol. 5:11), omnivorous, feeding even on carrion (Prov. 30:17), and hence ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:15). Noah sent 1 forth from the ark. It did not return to him, finding, doubtless, floating carcasses on which it was able to feed (Gen. 8:7). It frequents valleys (Prov. 30:17), and makes its nest in solitary places (Isa. 34:11). By divine providence ravens fed Elijah with bread and flesh morning and evening at the brook Cherith during the drought and famine (I Kings 17:2-7). The consonants of the words for ravens and Arabs are the same in Heb.; and when the text is written without vowels, as originally, it is impossible to determine, if the context does not decide, whether Arabs or ravens are meant. It is generally admitted now that the LXX and Vulgate are right, and that the Hebrew writer intends to state that Elijah was fed by ravens. The bird referred to in Scripture is undoubtedly the common raven (Corvus corax), which is found in every part of Palestine. It is black, with steel-blue and purple iridescence, and is about 26 inches long. The name is broad enough, however, to include other Corvidae. Another species (Corvus umbrinus) occurs in s. Palestine and in the valley of the Jordan.

Ra'zor. A sharp instrument for removing the beard or hair (Isa. 7:20; Ezek. 5:1). See KNIFE, BEARD, HAIR.

Rea'iah (rē-ā'yā), in A.V. once Re-a'ia (rē-ā'yā) (I Chron. 5:5) [Jehovah has seen, or provided for]. 1. A son of Shobal, and descended from Judah through Hezron (I Chron. 4:2), called in ch. 2:52 Haroeh, i.e., the seeing One.

2. A Reubenite (I Chron. 5:5).

3. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:50).

Re'ba (rē'bā) [perhaps, a 4th part or quarter]. One of the 5 Midianite kings, allies or vassals of Sihon, slain by the Israelites in the war waged by Moses against Midian, because they seduced Israel to licentious idolatry (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

Re-bek'ah (rē-bēk'ā), in N.T. Re-bee'ca (rē-bēk'ā) (Rom. 9:10) [cf. Arab. rabaka, to tie, bind; rabkah, ribkah, loop of a rope. Perhaps by metathesis of r; cf. Arab. bakarrah, cow; Heb. bākār, cattle]. A daughter of Bethuel. When she came with her pitcher to a well near the city of Nahor, in Mesopotamia, the servant of Abraham, who had been sent to obtain a wife for Isaac, presented himself and asked permission to drink from her pitcher. She not only granted his request but volunteered to draw water for his camels. He had asked God for this very sign; her conduct showed that she was of a generous disposition; he saw that she was beautiful; and he at once gave her expensive presents, as for a future bride. He did not at the time know her name, but asked what it was, and then added the inquiry whether he might lodge at her father's house. When her brother Laban's consent had been obtained, the delegate took up his temporary residence in their dwelling, and explained the object of his journey to Mesopotamia. He ended by petitioning that Rebekah should accompany him to Canaan and become the wife of Isaac. Laban gave his consent, and the maiden, adding hers, went with the servant, married Isaac, and became the mother of Esau and Jacob (Gen. 24:1-67). She preferred Jacob to Esau; and although she had the prophecy that Jacob should have the pre-eminence, she did not leave the matter in God's hands, but suggested a deceit by which the younger obtained the blessing belonging by birth to the elder (chs. 25:28; 27:1 to 28:5). She died apparently while Jacob was in Mesopotamia, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (ch. 49:31).

Re'ah (rē'kā), in A.V. Re'chah. An unknown place in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:12).

Re'chab (rē'kāb) [horseman, charioteer]. 1. A son of Rimmon, a Beerothite. He was a captain of a band under Ish-bosheth and one of Ish-bosheth's murderers (II Sam. 4:2, 6).

2. A Kenite (I Chron. 2:55), father of that Jehonadab who was invited by Jehu to mount his chariot and see his zeal for the Lord (II Kings 10:15, 16, 23), and who placed his tribe under a rule of life. See RECHABITES.

3. Father of Malchijah, the ruler of Beth-haccherem (Neh. 3:14).

Rech'ab-ites (rēk'ā-bīts). A Kenite tribe, which dwelt among the Israelites. Their chief Jonadab, son of Rechab, commanded them to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, not to live in houses, or plant or possess vineyards, but to dwell in tents. The object of these regulations was the preservation of primitive simplicity of manners. When Jeremiah tested their obedience years later, he found them faithful. A promise was therefore given them that they should never want a man to represent them in all succeeding time (Jer. 35:1-19). Professed descendants of the sect still exist in Mesopotamia and Yemen.

Re'chah (rē'kā). See RECAH.

Re'cord'er. An official of high rank in the Hebrew government from the time of David onward. He was called mazkir, one who brings to mind, or remembrancer, and probably derived his title from his official duty of recording important events and advising the king respecting them. At any rate he held one of the highest offices of state. He was numbered among the chief officials of David and Solomon (II Sam. 8:16; I Kings 4:3). The prefect of the palace, the scribe, and the recorder represented Hezekiah in public business (II Kings 18:18, 37); and in the reign of Josiah the scribe, the governor of the city and the recorder were placed in charge of the repairs of the Temple (II Chron. 34:8).

Red Sea. The sea called by the Hebrews yam sūph, or sea of reeds. The Gr. term, of which Red Sea is the literal translation, is erythra thalassa, used by Herodotus (ii. 8), the LXX (Ex. 15:4, 22), Josephus (Antiq. ii. 11, 1; 15, 1), but the origin of the term is uncertain. The Greeks derived the name from Erythras, a fabulous king who reigned in the adjacent country (Strabo xvi. 3, 5; 4, 20; Pliny Hist. Nat. vi. 23). He possibly corresponds to Edom, or represents the red- or copper-skinned people, including Edomites, Himyarites, and original Phoenicians. Some would derive the name from reddish corals which cover the floor or line the shores of this sea. "The Eocene and Cretaceous limestones assume by weathering a rich reddish-brown hue, and under the evening sun the eastern range glows with a ruddy radiance, which in the morning is equally seen on the western cliffs, while these colors contrast with the clear greenish-blue of the sea itself. Such an appearance would naturally suggest to early voyagers the name Red Sea" (Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 59). In I Kings 9:26, by reading Heb. sūph (sedge, reeds) as sōph (end), the LXX renders the name as the Uttermost Sea.

By the Erythraean Sea, the ancients understood not merely the Red Sea as limited by modern geographers, but also the Indian Ocean and ultimately the Persian Gulf. In the restricted sense in which the term is used in modern geography, the Red Sea is about 1,490 miles long, with an average breadth of about 150 miles. At its n. part it terminates in 2 gulfs, Suez and 'Akabah, which enclose between them the Sinaitic Peninsula. The Gulf of 'Akabah lies on the e., and is about 100 miles long by 15 broad. At its n. end stood the towns of Elath and Ezion-geber. The Gulf of Suez, on the w. of the peninsula, is about 180 miles long by 20 broad; but it formerly extended farther n. and included, in prehistoric times at least, Lake Timsah and the Bitter Lakes. The shores of both lakes abound in reeds, and this feature sufficiently accounts for the Heb. designation, "sea of sedge." The Heb. term yam sūph denotes the Red Sea of modern geography, or at least so much of it as embraces the peninsula of Sinai; for it lay to the e. of Egypt (Ex. 10:19), on it was an encampment of the Israelites not far from Sinai (Num. 33:10, 11), by taking the way of the yam sūph the Israelites compassed the land of Edom (ch. 21:4), and Ezion-geber in the land of Edom was on this sea (I Kings 9:26). The yam sūph was crossed by the Israelites, and the pursuing Egyptian hosts sank into its depths (Ex. 15:4, 22). The general opinion, based on constant Scripture representation, is that the sea crossed by the Israelites was the Gulf of Suez, probably at a point immediately n. or just s. of the Bitter Lakes.

The navigation of the sea is at all times somewhat perilous, from the sudden changes of the wind and the strength with which it often blows. The voyage from end to end was rendered slow by the prevalent wind in the n. part of the sea blowing toward the s. during 9 months of the year, and in the s. part blowing n. during the same period. Besides this, the mariner has to be on his guard against coral reefs and small islands, which in many places rise above the surface of the sea.

Reed. 1. Any tall, broad-leaved grass growing in a wet place. It is called kāneh in Heb., kalamos in Gr. (cf. Isa. 42:3 with Matt. 12:20). It grows or grew in the Nile and elsewhere in the water (I Kings 14:15; Isa. 19:6; 35:7), and is so tall and in such abundance that it helps to furnish shelter and concealment even for the bulky hippopotamus (Job 40:21). It is easily shaken by the wind (I Kings 14:15), and so fragile that if one leans upon it, it will break with a ragged fracture, the projecting points entering and piercing the hand (II Kings 18:21; Isa. 36:6; Ezek. 29:6, 7). In this last respect it affords a lively picture of the treatment Egypt had given to the Israelites when they leaned upon that power in seasons of emergency. It was a reed which the persecutors of our Lord thrust into his hand for a scepter, and with which they afterward struck him on the head; and it was to this or another stem of the same plant that the sponge was affixed which they dipped in vinegar and put to his lips (Matt. 27:29, 30, 48). The plant referred to is probably Arundo donax, which grows in the Nile and is common throughout Palestine, is at least 10 feet high, and has leaves as long and as broad as those of a sword. It is cultivated in France, where its long, straight, and light stems are made into fishing rods, arrows, fences, poles for vines.

A reed stalk was used as a measuring rod, and came to denote a fixed length of 6 long cubits (Ezek. 40:5; 41:8). Likewise in Babylonia 6 cubits made a reed or kanu.

Reed (Arundo donax)

2. The rendering, by metonymy, in Jer. 51:32 of Heb. 'āgam, a marsh. R.V. marg. renders it marshes; J.V., castles.

Re'el-ā'iah (rē'el-ā'yā) [perhaps, Jehovah has shaken]. One of the leading men who accompanied Zerubbabel and Jeshua from Babylon (Ezra 2:2). Called Raamiah in Neh. 7:7.

Re'fin'er. One who refines the precious metals, as silver or gold, by causing them to pass repeatedly through the furnace till their dross is taken away (Zech. 13:9; cf. Ps. 12:6). It is said that the refiner knows when the process is complete by seeing his image reflected in the precious metal purified. God is compared to a refiner of silver, by which is meant that he casts his people into the furnace of affliction till they are refined and purified (Mal. 3:2, 3). Then they clearly reflect his image in their souls.

Ref'uge. See CITY OF REFUGE.

Re'gem (rē'gēm) [ety. uncertain; cf. Arab. ragm, friend]. A man of Judah, a son of Jahdai (I Chron. 2:47).

Re'gem-me'lech (rē'gēm-mē'lēk) [perhaps, friend of king]. A man sent from Beth-el with companions to put a question to the priests regarding fasting (Zech. 7:2); the Peshitta reads Rab-māg (cf. Jer. 39:3, 13).

Re'ha-bi'ah (rē'hā-bī'ā) [Jehovah is comprehensive, or has extended]. Son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses (I Chron. 23:17; 24:21; 26:25).

Re'hob (rē'hōb) [open space, broad street]. 1. A place situated toward Hamath; see BETH-REHOB.

2. A town on the boundary line of the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:28), probably to be identified with Khirbet el-'Amri. The Rehob which belonged to Asher (Josh. 19:30) is probably to be identified with Tell Berweh. From Rehob the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg. 1:31). Rehob was assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:31; I Chron. 6:75).

3. Father of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (II Sam. 8:3, 12).

4. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:11).

Re'ho-bo'am (rē'hō-bō'ām), in A.V. of N.T. Ro-bo'am [the people is enlarged; or perhaps, the (divine) uncle or kinsman has enlarged]. Son of King Solomon by Naamah, an Ammonitess, one of his wives (I Kings 14:31). Although son of a wise father, he was himself a man of small mind. On the death of Solomon about 931 B.C., representatives of all the 12 tribes promptly assembled at the central city of Shechem to make Rehoboam, who was his lawful successor, king. Various causes more or less remote had led to jealousy and a growing coldness between Judah and the tribes to the n. and e.; see HISTORY, III. 3. Recently the people had suffered under heavy taxation levied to support Solomon's splendor, and opportunity was taken to lay this grievance of the people before the future ruler. The spokesman was Jeroboam, an able man who had been an official under Solomon and had been told by the Prophet Ahijah that he should become king of 10 tribes. The popular demand was that taxation might be lightened. Rehoboam asked 3 days for deliberation. He consulted the old men who had till lately been counselors of his father; they advised him to accede to the request and speak good words to the petitioners, and assured him that the people would then be his servants forever. He next consulted the young men who had grown up with him, and they urged him to say to the people: "My little finger is thicker than my father's loins. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke; my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." It indicated the mental caliber of Rehoboam that he rejected the counsel of the sages and uttered the words of folly which his young companions had put into his mouth.

At once 10 out of the 12 tribes renounced their allegiance to Rehoboam, departed to their homes, and were forever lost to the house of David. The king sent after them Adoram, who was over the tribute, but they stoned him to death, and the king, fearing that the next missiles would be directed against himself, hastily mounted his chariot and drove to Jerusalem (I Kings 12:1-20; II Chron. 10:1-19). Judah and a large part of Benjamin, together with the Simeonites, were left him. He mustered the entire militia of his kingdom to attempt the subjugation of the revolted tribes, but the Prophet Shemaiah forbade the enterprise (I Kings 12:21-24; II Chron. 11:1-4). He therefore contented himself with fortifying a number of cities in Judah and Benjamin and provisioning the garrisons (II Chron. 11:5-12). The erection of the golden calves by his rival at Beth-el and Dan drove s. almost the whole body of the priests and Levites, which greatly increased the strength of the kingdom of Rehoboam; but after 3 years he himself lapsed into idolatry (I Kings 14:21-24; II Chron. 11:13-17; 12:1). In the 5th year of his reign, Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded his kingdom, capturing some of the fenced cities, ultimately taking Jerusalem itself and plundering the Temple and the palace (I Kings 14:25-28; II Chron. 12:2-12); see PHARAOH 1. Rehoboam had 18 wives and 60 concubines, 28 sons and 60 daughters (II Chron. 11:21). Abijah his son claimed that at the time of his great mistake he was young and tenderhearted (ch. 13:1-12); in reality, he was at that time 41 years old. He reigned 17 years, and died about 915 B.C., leaving his son, Abijah, to ascend the throne (I Kings 14:21, 31; II Chron. 12:13, 16).

Re-ho'both (rê-hô'bôth) [broad places, streets]. 1. A well dug by Isaac in the valley of Gerar. Since the Philistine herdsmen did not claim it, as they had its 2 predecessors, he named it Rehoboth, meaning room (Gen. 26:22). Robinson identified the valley as Wadi Ruhaibeh, about 19 miles s.w. of Beer-sheba.

2. A suburb of Nineveh (Gen. 10:11); see REHOBOTH-IR.

3. A town "by the River" (Gen. 36:37; I Chron. 1:48). "The River" commonly denotes the Euphrates, but since the reference is to Edom, the river here must be used in a different sense. The river probably is the Sail el-Kerâhi, which flows into the Dead Sea near its s.e. extremity. There is a place of slight importance Khirbet Rihâb, but on Jebel Rihâb about 3 miles to the w. is Khirbet Musrab, which probably corresponds to Rehoboth; the military post may be placed farther w.n.w. in the direction of the extremity of the Dead Sea, at Khirbet Bir Melih.

Re-ho'both-ir (rê-hô'bôth-ir) [broad places of the city]. A city which formed part of the great city of Nineveh or, as we would say, Greater Nineveh (Gen. 10:11; in A.V. the city Rehoboth).

Re'hûm (rê'hûm) [beloved]. 1. A chancellor of Persia in the country beyond the River, who in the time of Artaxerxes complained against the Jews for rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 4:8, 9).

2. One of the principal men who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:2); called Nehem in Neh. 7:7, probably through a copyist's error.

3. A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:1-7). In the next generation a father's house, occupying the corresponding position in the enumeration, bears the name Harim (v. 15). One of these names has probably been miswritten by transposing the Heb. letters.

4. One of those who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:25).

5. A Levite, son of Bani. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17).

Re'i (rê'i) [friendly, sociable]. One who did not join in Adonijah's attempt to usurp the throne (I Kings 1:8).

Reins. The kidneys. They were supposed by the ancient Hebrews and others to be the seat of the innermost emotions (A.V. and R.V. marg. of Ps. 7:9; 26:2; 73:21; Prov. 23:16; Jer. 12:2).

Re'kem (rê'kêm) [variegation]. 1. One of the 5 kings of Midian, allies or vassals of Sihon, slain in the war waged by Moses against the Midianites because they had seduced Israelites to licentious idolatry (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

2. A son of Hebron, a descendant of Caleb (I Chron. 2:43).

3. A city of the Benjamites (Josh. 18:27); probably to be located at Qalandiyeh.

Rem'a-li'ah (rêm'-a-li'â) [S. Arab., sooth-sayer of Jehovah]. Father of King Pekah (II Kings 15:25).

Re'meth (rê'mêth) [probably, a high place]. A frontier town of Issachar (Josh. 19:21). See JARMUTH 2.

Rem'mon (rêm'ôn) and Rem'mon-meth-o-ar (rêm'ôn-mêth'-ô-âr). See RIMMON, I. 2 and 3.

Rem'nant. The portion of the people that survives the judgment sent to remove the dross from the Kingdom of God (Ezra 9:8; Zech. 14:2). Because of Jehovah's love for his people, this godly remnant shall be gathered from the nations among which Israel has been scattered and form the nucleus of a new Israel, holy, living in accordance with Jehovah's Law, loyal to him, and defended and blessed by him (Isa. 1:26; 4:2-6; 6:13; 10:20-23; 11:11 to 12:6; Jer. 23:3; 32:36-44; Amos 9:8-15; Micah 4:6-8; 5:7, 8; Zeph. 3:13; Zech. 8:12; 13:9).

Rem'phan (rêm'fân). See REPHAN.

Re'pha-el (rê'fâ-êl) [God has healed]. A Levite, son of Shemaiah, of the family of Obed-edom, and a doorkeeper of the sanctuary (I Chron. 26:7).

Re'phah (rê'fâ) [riches, wealth]. An ancestor of Joshua and probably son of Beriah (I Chron. 7:25).

Re'pha'iah (rê-fâ'yâ) [Jehovah has healed]. 1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola (I Chron. 7:2).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 9:43). Called in ch. 8:37 Raphah, a synonymous name, "he has healed."

3. One of 4 Simeonite captains who led an expedition into Edom, destroyed a community of Amalekites who were dwelling there, and took possession of their land (I Chron. 4:42, 43).

4. A son of Hur and ruler of half the district about Jerusalem, who aided in repairing the wall (Neh. 3:9).

5. The founder of a family that is loosely registered with the royal descendants of David and is presumably a collateral line sprung from David (I Chron. 3:21).

Reph'a'im (rê'fâ-îm), in A.V. twice Reph'a-ims (rê'fâ-imz) (Gen. 14:5; 15:20) [shades of the dead, spirits of the departed, extinct aborigines, giants]. 1. A people of large stature who in ancient times, even before the arrival of Abraham, dwelt in Palestine, e. and w. of the Jordan (Gen. 14:5; 15:20; Deut. 2:11, 20; 3:11; Josh. 17:15). A remnant of them appears to have taken refuge among the Philistines, when the Hebrews entered Canaan (II Sam. 21:16, 18, 20, 21, R.V. marg.).

2. A valley near Jerusalem and Bethlehem (Jos. Antiq. vii. 4, 1; II Sam. 23:13, 14), s.w. of Jerusalem and the valley of Hinnom (Josh. 15:8; 18:16); quite fertile (Isa. 17:5); presumably once inhabited by the Rephaim. The Philistines were twice defeated there by David (II Sam. 5:18-22; 23:13; I Chron. 11:15; 14:9). It is probably the broad valley called Bakâ', about 3 miles long, lying s.w. of Jerusalem, beginning beyond the ravine that bounds the city on the s. and w., and extending halfway to Bethlehem. It declines rapidly toward the w. and is stony but fertile.

Re'phan (rê'fân), in A.V. Rem'phan. A god who has a star associated with him, and who was worshiped by the Israelites in the wilderness (Acts 7:43). The passage is quoted from the O.T. The name represents Raiphân, a corrupt transliteration in the LXX of Kaivân (Kêvân), which is the same as Kaimân, Akkad. name of Saturn and was understood to be the god Chiun (Amos 5:26, A.V. and J.V.). See CHIUIN, SICCUTH.

Reph'i-dim (rê'fî-dîm) [expanses, stretches]. A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness between the wilderness of Sin and Sinai (Ex. 17:1; 19:2; Num. 33:12-15). There was no water obtainable, and the people murmured till Moses, accompanied by elders, went forward to Horeb by divine command and smote a rock, from which water at once issued (Ex. 17:5, 6). The water flowed down the wadi to the camp of the Israelites and supplied them during their sojourn at Mount Sinai also. Rephidim was the scene of the battle with Amalek, when Moses with uplifted hand pointed to Jehovah as the ensign under which Israel fought (Ex. 17:8-16). The site is not properly determined. The place probably is to be located on Wadi Refāyied, n.w. of Jebel Mūsa. Wadi Redwa, a stream of cold water, joins Wadi Refāyied, which has an oasis at the foot of Jebel Refāyied.

Re'sen (rē'sēn). A city of Assyria, a suburb of Nineveh, a part of the complex of towns known as the great city. It was situated between Nineveh and Calah (Gen. 10:11, 12).

Resh (rēsh). The 20th letter of the Heb. alphabet. English r comes by way of Gr. rho from the same source, and represents it in Anglicized Heb. names. It heads the 20th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Copyists sometimes had difficulty in distinguishing resh from daleth (q.v.).

Re'sheph (rē'shēf) [a flame]. A descendant of Ephraim and probably son of Beriah (I Chron. 7:25).

Re'turn'. See HISTORY, III. 4, and CHRONOLOGY, V, beginning with the year 539 B.C.

Re'u (rē'ū), in A.V. once Ra'gau (Luke 3:35) [one exercising oversight, shepherd, friend]. A descendant of Eber and an ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 11:18-26).

Reu'ben (rōō'bēn) [behold a son; but cf. S. Arab. Ra'bān, chief]. 1. Jacob's eldest son, the 1st by his wife Leah (Gen. 29:31, 32; 35:23; 46:8; I Chron. 2:1; 5:1). Reuben was guilty of gross misconduct (Gen. 35:22); but when his brothers plotted to kill Joseph, Reuben came forward with the proposal to cast him into a pit, designing to restore him eventually to his father. He was not with them when Joseph was sold to the Midianite Ishmaelites, and was greatly moved when, visiting the pit, he found it empty (Gen. 37:21-29). When the brothers found themselves in trouble in Egypt 20 years later, Reuben was quick to remind his brothers that he had not concurred in their plot to take Joseph's life (ch. 42:22-24). When Jacob was reluctant to send Benjamin to Egypt, Reuben offered 2 of his sons as pledge that he would bring Benjamin home again in safety (ch. 42:37). Reuben had 4 sons in all: Hanoch, Phallu, Hezron, and Carmi (Gen. 46:8, 9; Ex. 6:14; I Chron. 5:3). Jacob, when about to die, pronounced Reuben to be unstable as water and declared that he should not have pre-eminence. By his heinous deed he had forfeited the birthright (Gen. 49:3, 4).

2. The tribe formed by descendants of Reuben, and the territory in which they dwelt. The tribe was divided into 4 great tribal families, the posterity of Reuben's 4 sons (Num. 26:5-11). Its prince at the beginning of the sojourn in the wilderness was Elizur (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30-35; 10:18). At that time the tribe numbered 46,500 fighting men (ch. 1:20, 21); at the 2d census 38 years later, they had decreased to 43,730 (ch. 26:7). The Reubenite chief was head of the camp made up of the 3 tribes, Reuben, Simeon, and Gad, the aggregate military strength of which was 151,450 (Num. 2:10, 16). The spy from the tribe was Shammua, son of Zaccur (ch. 13:4). Dathan, Abiram, and On, who joined the Levite Korah in revolt against Moses and Aaron, were Reubenites (Num. 16:1-50; 26:9; Deut. 11:6); see KORAH 4. After the battles with Sihon and Og, the Gadites and Reubenites, with whom half the tribe of Manasseh joined, being rich in cattle, petitioned Moses to be allowed to settle e. of the Jordan, that region being well adapted for flocks and herds. Their request was granted on condition that they would send the greater number of their warriors across the Jordan to help their brethren in the war with the Canaanites (Num. 32:1-42; Josh. 18:7). They did so, and took part in all of Joshua's wars in Canaan (Josh. 4:12). Afterward they returned with honor to their own territory. But the erection of a memorial altar by them and their Israelite brethren e. of Jordan led to a temporary misunderstanding which nearly involved them in civil war (Josh. 22:1-34). The Reubenites took no part in the contest with Sisera and were referred to reproachfully in Deborah's song (Judg. 5:15, 16). They made war against the Hagarites, in which they prevailed; the victors made a great slaughter of the enemy and lived in their territory to the time of the Captivity (I Chron. 5:18-22). Ezekiel allotted them a place in the reoccupied Canaan (Ezek. 48:6, 7), and named a gate after them in the restored Jerusalem (v. 31). When the book of Revelation records the sealing of the 144,000, it assigns Reuben a quota of 12,000 (Rev. 7:5). The boundary of the territory of Reuben was on the e. the country of the Ammonites, on the s. the river Arnon (Num. 21:24), on the w. the Dead Sea and the river Jordan (Josh. 13:23), while on the n. the boundary line ran from the Jordan s. of Beth-nimrah to Heshbon (Josh. 13:17, 26; 21:37; and Num. 32:36; Josh. 13:27). Included in these limits were Aroer, on the edge of the valley of Arnon, and the city in the middle of the valley, all the plain by Medeba, Heshbon and its subordinate towns, Dibon, Bamoth-baal, Beth-baal-meon, Jahaz, Kedemoth, Mephaath, Kiriathaim, Sibmah, Zereth-shahar, Beth-peor, the slopes of Pisgah, Beth-jeshimoth; in short, the s. part of the Ammonite kingdom which had been ruled over by Sihon (Josh. 13:15-23). The 4 cities of Bezer, Jahaz, Kedemoth, and Mephaath, with their suburbs, were assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:7, 36, 37; I Chron. 6:63, 78, 79); the 1st of these, Bezer, was a city of refuge (Josh. 20:8; I Chron. 6:78). The Reubenites had an exposed position, the Moabites being in their immediate vicinity, while desert marauders could invade their territory both from the e. and the s. If the list of Reubenite cities given in this section is compared with those in Moabite possession incidentally mentioned in Isa., chs. 15; 16; Jer., ch. 48, and on the Moabite stone, it will be seen that in the times of Mesha and these prophets Reuben had its limits greatly curtailed by Moabite conquest. The whole territory is a tableland quite capable of cultivation.

Ren'el (rōō'ēl), in A.V. once Ra-gu'el (Num. 10:29) in imitation of the Gr. form [God is a friend, or friend of God]. 1. A descendant of Esau and also of Ishmael (Gen. 36:2-4).

2. Moses' father-in-law (Ex. 2:18). See JETHRO.

3. A Benjamite, a son of Ibnijah (I Chron. 9:8).

4. A Gadite, father of Eliasaph (Num. 2:14); see DEUEL.

Reu'mah (rōō'mā) [exalted]. A concubine of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:24).

Rev'e-la'tion [Lat. revelatio, unveiling; hence to reveal, to expose to sight, and, metaphorically, to disclose to the mind truth otherwise unknown; Gr. Apokalypsis, whence Eng. Apocalypse]. In the O.T. the noun revelation does not occur; but the verb reveal is used in the sense of making known secrets (e.g., Prov. 11:13) and then of God's disclosure of his will to man (e.g., Deut. 29:29; Isa. 22:14; Dan. 2:19, 22, 28; Amos 3:7). In the N.T. revelation is used for the disclosure by God or Christ or the Spirit of truth concerning divine things previously unknown (e.g., Rom. 16:25; I Cor. 14:6, 26; II

(Cor. 12:1; Gal. 1:12; Rev. 1:1) or of duty specially required (Gal. 2:2), and then for the manifestation or appearance of persons or events previously concealed from sight (e.g., Rom. 2:5; I Peter 1:13). In theology revelation means the communication of truth by God to man, and is usually applied to such communications as have been conveyed through supernatural agencies.

The Revelation of John is the last book of the N.T., also called, from the Gr., the Apocalypse. The name is given to it because, as its opening words state, it is a disclosure of the future, and, therefore, pre-eminently a revelation. Its author describes it as a communication concerning "things which must shortly come to pass," which God gave to Jesus Christ, and which Christ gave by his angel to his servant John, to be communicated in turn to the Church (Rev. 1:1-3). The work is addressed to 7 churches of the Roman province of Asia: Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea (vs. 4, 11), the number 7 being selected probably because, as the sacred number, it signified completeness, and thus indicated that the book was really addressed to the whole Church. The author calls himself, after the manner of the Hebrew prophets (cf. Isa. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Amos 1:1, etc.), simply John (Rev. 1:1, 4, 9; 22:8), and relates that the visions of the book were seen by him when he was in the island of Patmos "for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (ch. 1:9). Patmos lies off the s.w. coast of Asia Minor, and John had been banished to it because he was a Christian. This points to a period of persecution by the Roman government. The opening vision was of the exalted Christ, who is represented in a symbolic portraiture as standing in the midst of 7 golden candlesticks which represent the 7 churches (ch. 1:10-20). Christ gives to the seer messages to the 7 churches, and after that follows a succession of other visions. The revelation is said to have been given on the Lord's Day (ch. 1:10), by which we are doubtless to understand the 1st day of the week. See LORD'S DAY. The visions described are of a highly symbolical character. Many of the figures and much of the language are taken from the O.T. prophets, especially from Daniel and Ezekiel, and the meaning cannot be understood without constant reference to them.

Examining the book more closely, we find that after the introduction (ch. 1:1-3) and salutation (vs. 4-8), it consists of 7 chief divisions, extending to ch. 22:7, after which the book closes with an epilogue (vs. 8-21). These divisions constitute in fact 7 visions, or series of visions, and are themselves subdivided usually into 7 parts. Each series opens with a vision, which presents as a whole the idea of the series, and this is then followed in most instances by a sevenfold representation of its elements. These visions are probably not to be understood as representing events which were to follow one another in history in the order of time, but as symbolical portraitures of certain religious truths or principles which were to be realized in the experience of the Church. The whole is intended for the Church's comfort and warning amid the conflicts of time and in preparation for the Second Coming of her Lord (chs. 1:7, 8; 22:7, 10, 17, 20). The 7 series of visions, which show the analysis of the book, are the following:

1. The vision of the glorified Christ amid his Church, followed by 7 messages to the 7 churches of Asia (Rev. 1:9 to 3:22). Here the main thought is of instruction, warning, and encouragement for the Church in her present condition.

2. The vision of God, presiding over the destinies of the universe and adored by all creation, and of the exalted, but redeeming, Lamb of God, who holds in his hand the sealed book of the divine decrees (chs. 4; 5), followed by the breaking of the seals in 7 visions, whereby is portrayed the sevenfold purpose of God from the going forth of Christ to conquer unto the Last Judgment (chs. 6:1 to 8:1). Between the 6th and 7th seals an episode is introduced which shows the safety of the people of God amid the judgment which befalls the world (ch. 7).

3. The vision of the trumpets (chs. 8:2 to 11:19). It opens with the vision of an angel offering the prayers of the saints to God (ch. 8:2-6). Then each trumpet is followed by a vision of destruction upon the sinful world, ending again with the Last Judgment. Between the 6th and 7th trumpets an episode again is introduced, descriptive of the preservation of the witnessing Church (chs. 10:1 to 11:14). The main thought here appears to be that in reply to the prayers of the saints for God to vindicate his truth they are shown the desolations which befall the sinful world amid which they are to bear their testimony.

4. The vision of the Church, under the figure of a woman, bringing forth the Christ, against whom the dragon, or Satan, wages war (ch. 12), followed by visions of the beasts, which Satan will use as his agents (ch. 13), of the militant Church (ch. 14:1-5), and of the advancing stages of Christ's conquest (vs. 6-20). This may be called the vision of conflict.

5. The vision of the vials, or bowls, containing the last plagues, or judgments of God (chs. 15; 16). The opening vision (ch. 15) depicts the triumph of the saints, while the 7 bowls represent the sevenfold judgment of God on a wicked world (ch. 16).

6. The vision of the harlot city, Babylon (ch. 17), followed by the victory of Christ over her, and over his enemies in league with her, ending again in the Last Judgment (chs. 18:1 to 20:15). Between the 6th and 7th scenes of this triumph an episode is introduced (ch. 20:1-10), which is probably descriptive of the complete safety and spiritual deliverance of Christ's people throughout the whole period of the age-long battle. Some scholars, however, place the division between the 6th and 7th series of visions at ch. 19:11.

7. The vision of the ideal Church, the bride of Christ, or New Jerusalem (ch. 21:1-8), followed by a description of her glory (chs. 21:9 to 22:7).

General agreement prevails among both critical and devotional students of The Revelation that the book as it stands has unity. Structural unity is apparent in its having a framework consisting of 7 groups of usually 7 episodes and in a general grammatical and linguistic similarity. The strongly Semitic coloring of the Gr. of this book can be explained either by supposing that the author was accustomed to think in Aramaic or by postulating a written Aramaic (or possibly Hebrew) document from which the present Greek text was translated.

The author of The Revelation was a Jewish Christian with a noble universalistic outlook, thoroughly conversant with the contents of the O.T. and with its literary forms, and able to mold characteristic prophecies of Daniel and Ezekiel into his own picture of the Church's conflict and final glory (see DANIEL, EZEKIEL). His name was John (Rev. 1:1, 4, 9; 22:8). That he was John the apostle has been the tradition of the Church from the earliest time, being specifically so stated by Justin Martyr in the middle of the 2d century. But some scholars feel that the writer can scarcely be the author of the Fourth Gospel and the Johannine epistles. As Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria (A.D. 247-265) pointed out (Eusebius H.E. vii. 25), the Apocalypse differs markedly from the other Johannine writings in style, language, and recurring ideas. Proponents of the traditional common authorship of all 5 documents maintain that the divergencies can be explained on the basis of diversity of subject matter and the different dates of writing, and they push The Revelation back to the end of Nero's reign, c. A.D. 68. Thus it is supposed that the terrors of the fall of Jerusalem combined with those of the Neronian persecution provide many of the lurid figures used by the seer. The number 666 (Rev. 13:18) has been explained as being the total of the numerical values of the Heb. or Aram. letters in the name Nero Caesar (nṛwn ksr); yet even if this is the true solution of the cryptogram, it does not necessarily prove that John wrote in Nero's time. N.T. scholarship of various schools quite generally favors the traditional date of the Apocalypse, voiced by Irenaeus as early as c. A.D. 180, which assigns it to the close of Domitian's reign, c. A.D. 96. The condition of the churches is later than Paul's time, as is seen in the references to the deterioration of the churches in Ephesus and Laodicea; furthermore the Nicolaitans are denounced, who favored a compromise between the claims of Christianity and that of the state religion (Rev. 2:1-6, 15; 3:14-19). Nero's persecution was confined to Rome; that of Domitian extended to Asia. The background seems to be the time when the emperor's demands for divine honors, his widespread use of informers, and his fiendish fury against the Christians established a reign of terror in his later years. Whoever was the author of the Gospel and the epistles of John, the testimony is strong that the Apostle John wrote the Apocalypse.

The Church was slow in recognizing the canonicity of this book. During the first 5 centuries, the Peshitta, the common Bible of the Syrian church, did not include the Apocalypse, nor do the mediaeval lectionaries of the Orthodox Catholic Church contain lessons from it.

The interpretations of The Revelation have been innumerable. Four general classes of interpretation may, however, be distinguished. 1. The praeterist interpretation, which regards the work as a description of what was taking place when the book was written. This view destroys its prophetic character, and is certainly to be rejected. 2. The futurist interpretation, which sees in the book predictions of events yet to be fulfilled. This view is met by the difficulty that all prophecy, and this one in particular, closely connects itself with the situation of the Church and prophet to whom it was given. 3. The historico-prophetic interpretation, which sees in the visions a successive portrayal of the events of Christian history. The difficulty with this view is that few expositors can agree on the details of the fulfillment, and that it disregards the contemporaneous character of the 7 series of visions. 4. The spiritual, symbolic interpretation, which regards the visions as figurative portrayments of certain truths or principles, destined to find their place in the history of the Church, and the contemplation of which in pictorial representation is intended to encourage and comfort Christ's people until he comes again in glory and to judgment. While no expositor can feel sure that he has understood the meaning of all the contents of The Revelation, the last method of interpretation has the advantage of directing the attention of readers to certain large and important truths, under the form of pictures, thus making this most mysterious book of Scripture practically helpful. G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Reven'ger. See AVENGER OF BLOOD.

Re'zeph (rē'zēf) [glowing stone or coal]. A place which the rabshakeh boasted that the Assyrians had destroyed (II Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12), doubtless the town Rasappa, long residence of an Assyrian governor. Probably it is the modern Rusāfah, some miles w. of the Euphrates on the route to Palmyra.

Re-z'i'a (rē-zī'ā). See RIZIA.

Re'zin (rē'zīn) [cf. Syriac rāsīnā, brooklet]. 1. A king of Damascus. About 738 B.C. he paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. Four years later, in the time of Ahaz, he joined with Pekah, king of Israel, in an effort to capture Jerusalem and place a creature of their own upon the throne of David. They failed, after eliciting from Isaiah a celebrated prophecy (Isa. 7:1 to 9:12). On this campaign, before attempting to unite his troops with those of Pekah, Rezin marched to Elath on the Gulf of 'Akabah and took the town from Judah (II Kings 16:6). The aid of Tiglath-pileser had been purchased by Ahaz; and the Assyrian king, after chastising the Philistines for their participation in the hostilities against Judah, marched against Damascus, besieged it during the years 733 and 732 B.C., ravaged the surrounding district, finally captured the city, and slew Rezin (II Kings 16:7-9; and Assyrian inscriptions).

2. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50).

Re'zon (rē'zōn) [prince, potentate]. A son of Eliada, and a subject of Hadadezer, king of Zobah. When David captured Zobah, Rezon gathered a band of men, seized Damascus, and founded the Syrian kingdom, with which, while it lasted, the Israelites had continual relations, hostile or friendly (I Kings 11:23-25).

Rhe'gium (rē'jī-ŭm). A city of Greek origin on the coast of Italy, opposite to Messina in Sicily. Paul's vessel touched at Rhegium after having made a circuit from Syracuse (Acts 28:12). Rhegium is now called Reggio.

Rhe'sa (rē'sā). A descendant of Zerubabel, and an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:27).

Rho'da (rō'dā) [Gr. Rhodē, a rose bush]. A servant girl of Mary, the mother of Mark. When Peter, after having been miraculously released from prison, knocked at the door of the gate of Mary's house, Rhoda was sent to see who was there. On hearing Peter's voice she was filled with joy and, forgetting in her excitement to let him in, ran back to tell that it was Peter. The apostle had to continue the knocking for some time before he could gain admittance (Acts 12:13-16).

Rhodes (rōdz), in A.V. of I Macc. 15:23 Rho'dus (rō'dūs). An island off the coast of Caria, in the s.w. of Asia Minor. It is about 45 miles long by 20 broad, and is remarkable for its orange and citron groves. The island was at the junction of great commercial routes for coasting vessels, and became a commercial center which ranked with Alexandria and Carthage. Its capital, also called Rhodes, was famed for its Colossus, a great lighthouse, said to have been 70 cubits, or about 105 feet, high. It was erected between 300 and 288 B.C. The Rhodians were semi-independent under the Romans (I Macc. 15:23), except during 9 years in the reign of Claudius, beginning A.D. 44, and again in the time of Vespasian. The vessel in which Paul sailed to Palestine from Assos touched at Rhodes (Acts 21:1), which was then a splendid city. As the Rhodians long remained unsubdued by the Romans, so, led by the Knights of St. John, who in A.D. 1310 had possessed themselves of the island, they defied the power of the Turks till 1522, when they had to surrender on terms, the knights being allowed to transfer themselves to the isle of Malta.

Rī'bal (rī'bi) [Jehovah strives]. A Benjamite of Gibeah, and the father of Ittai, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:29; I Chron. 11:31).

Rib'lah (rīb'lā) [cf. Arab. rabala, to multiply]. A town in the land of Hamath (II Kings 23:33; 25:21). The Egyptians were encamped there when Jehoahaz was brought in as a prisoner (II Kings 23:33). When Zedekiah was captured after his escape from Jerusalem, he was brought to Nebuchadnezzar, then encamped at Riblah, who put out his eyes and had him bound to be carried to Babylon. His sons and the princes of Judah were also slain at Riblah (II Kings 25:6, 7, 21; Jer. 39:5-7; 52:9-11, 27). Buckingham, in 1816, met with ruins at a place called by him Rubia, but now more generally spelled Ribleh, on the right bank of the Orontes, about 36 miles n. by e. of Ba'al-bek, in the midst of the great plain of Coelesyria, very suitable for the encampment of a great army, and with easy access s. or n. If commotion arose. The ruins consist of low mounds surrounded by the remains of old buildings. It is hardly identical with Riblah on the n. boundary of Palestine, e. of Ain (Num. 34:11) for which no satisfactory identification has been found.

Riddle. In Biblical usage, any dark saying, of which the meaning is not at once clear and must be discovered by shrewd thought (Num. 12:8, dark speeches; Prov. 1:6, R.V. marg.). It may be a parable (Ps. 49:4; 78:2, dark sayings) and be proposed merely in order to arouse attention and start inquiry and to make the truth more vivid and impressive, the propounder intending to give an explanation immediately (Ezek. 17:2-24); or the riddle may be set forth for men to guess, as the riddle of Samson and those of Solomon and Hiram to which Josephus refers (Judg. 14:12-19; Jos. Antiq. viii. 5, 3). The riddle of Samson was proposed in verse. It was not properly a riddle at all, since the discovery of its meaning was not within the realm of possibility for the Philistines. It could not be guessed, for they were not acquainted with the facts on which it was based.

The Greeks and Romans were fond of the riddle or enigma. One of the most celebrated was put into the mouth of the monster named the sphinx, which had been sent to ravage the territory of Thebes. She asked: "What animal goes on four feet in the morning, two at noon, and on three in the evening?" After many had failed, Oedipus answered that it was man, who in infancy creeps on all fours, at maturity walks on 2 feet, and in old age uses a staff. Thereupon the sphinx flung herself to the ground and perished.

Rie, obsolete spelling of rye. See SPELT.

Rim'mon, I (rīm'ōn), in A.V. twice Rem'mon (Josh. 19:7, 13); in R.V. once Rim'mo-no (I Chron. 6:77) [a pomegranate]. 1. A Benjamite, whose 2 sons were captains under Ish-bosheth, and became his murderers (II Sam. 4:2).

2. A town in the s. of Judah near Ain (Josh. 15:32; I Chron. 4:32; Zech. 14:10), so near indeed as to form, apparently, one community with it (Neh. 11:29). It was soon transferred with Ain and other towns to Simeon (Josh. 19:7). It is identified with the ruin Umm er-Rumānīn, about 9 miles n. of Beer-sheba.

3. A border town of Zebulun, but assigned to the Levites (Josh. 19:13; I Chron. 6:77; and Josh. 21:35, where Dimnah is doubtless a misreading, resh being mistaken for daleth, q.v.). Methoar in A.V. of Josh. 19:13 is improperly regarded as part of the name; whereas it describes the boundary as "stretching" to Neah. The name of the town is preserved in Rummāneh, a village 6 miles n., slightly e., of Nazareth.

4. A rock near Gibeah, where 600 vanquished Benjamites took refuge and remained 4 months (Judg. 20:45-47; 21:13). It is probably the detached limestone eminence 3½ miles e., slightly n., of Beth-el. It is separated from all approach on the s., the n., and the w. by ravines, and has caverns in which the refugees may have lived. The name still lingers in Rammūn, a village on the summit.

Rim'mon, II (rīm'ōn) [Akkad., thunderer]. A Syrian god, who had a temple at Damascus, in which Naaman and his royal master were accustomed to bow themselves for worship (II Kings 5:18). In Assyria Rimmon, or Rammān as his name was pronounced there, was numbered among the 12 great deities. He was the god of rain and storm, lightning and thunder. Sometimes he was dreaded as the destroyer of crops and the scatterer of the harvest, and at others was adored as the lord of fecundity. He was identical with Hadad, the supreme god of the Syrians. The 2 names are combined in Hadad-Rimmon.

Rim'mo-no (rīm'ō-nō). See RIMMON, I.

Rim'mon-pe'rez (rīm'ōn-pē'rēz), in A.V. Rim'mon-pa'rez (rīm'ōn-pā'rēz) [pomegranate of the breach or cleft]. A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:19, 20); probably at Naḵb el-Biyār.

Ring. See ORNAMENTS and SEAL 2.

Rin'nah (rīn'ā) [a ringing cry]. A man of Judah, a son of Shimon (I Chron. 4:20).

Ri'phath (rī'fāth). A people descended from Gomer (Gen. 10:3; in I Chron. 1:6 Diphath; see DALETH). Josephus identifies them with the Paphlagonians (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 1). The name is perhaps preserved in the Riphæan Mountains, which were supposed by the ancients to skirt the n. shore of the world.

Ris'sah (rīs'ā) [a ruin; dew or rain]. A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:21, 22), probably at Kuntilet el-Jerāfi between Kossaima and 'Akabah n.w. of the mountain Rueisset el-Nejin.

Rith'mah (rīth'mā) [broom plant]. A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:18, 19).

Riv'er. Of several words translated river, only 3 require mention here: 1. Nāhār, a stream, in Gr. potamos, applied to the largest rivers known to the Hebrews, as the Tigris and Euphrates (Gen. 2:14; Rev. 9:14), the Abana and Parpar (II Kings 5:12), the Jordan (Mark 1:5), and the affluents of the Upper Nile (Zeph. 3:10). The river or the great river usually denotes the Euphrates (Gen. 15:18; 31:21). 2. Nahāl, sometimes a perennial stream like the Jabbok (Deut. 2:37), but usually a winter torrent, the bed of which is dry in summer; a wadi. See BROOK. 3. Yē'ōr, a stream, used almost exclusively of the Nile and its mouths, and sounding much like the native Egyptian name of that river (Gen. 41:1; II Kings 19:24; Ezek. 29:3). It once denotes the Tigris (Dan. 12:5-7; cf. 10:4, R.V. marg.).

Riv'er of E'gypt (ē'jipt). 1. The Nile, and specifically its most e. channel, the Pelusiac branch (Gen. 15:18); see SHIHOR. In this passage the 2 great rivers, the Nile and the Euphrates, are named broadly as the boundaries of the Promised Land. The brook of Egypt or Wadi el-'Arish was commonly regarded as the s.w. limit of Palestine; but the country between this wadi and the e. branch of the Nile was mainly desert, and the Nile was virtually on the boundary of Egypt. The passage means that the descendants of Abraham should possess the land as far as Egypt. The distinction between the Nile and Wadi el-'Arish is well established; for the former is a nāhār and the latter a nahal.

2. A great wadi or nahal, uniformly called in the R.V. the brook of Egypt. It was the s.w. border of Canaan (Num. 34:5; I Kings 8:65; II Kings 24:7), and the limit in the same direction of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:4, 47). It was known to the Assyrians by the same name as to the Hebrews, and likewise as a boundary. It is Wadi el-'Arish, a watercourse nominally dry, but which after heavy rains runs n. from the desert, being fed by tributaries, one of which passes Kadesh-barnea. It falls into the Mediterranean about 50 miles s. of Gaza.

Ri-zi'a (rī-zi'ā), in A.V. Re-zi'a [pleasant]. An Asherite, a son of Ulla (I Chron. 7:39).

Riz'pah (rīz'pā) [a hot stone, hot coal]. A daughter of Aiah and concubine of Saul. On her account the quarrel arose between Ishbosheth and Abner which resulted in Abner's going over to David (II Sam. 3:6-8). Her children, Armoni and Mephibosheth, were put to death during the famine which arose in David's reign on account of Saul's treatment of the Gibeonites (II Sam. 21:8-11).

Road. An inroad, a raid, an incursion into an enemy's country (I Sam. 27:10, in R.V. raid). This sense is now obsolete in ordinary language. When a road in the modern sense is intended, the A.V. and R.V. generally use the term "way," or sometimes "path."

Rob'ber. See THIEF.

Ro-bo'am (rō-bō'am). See REHOBAM.

Rock. Rocks were found nearly everywhere in the hilly and mountainous districts of Palestine. Some had definite names, as the rock of Oreb (Judg. 7:25), the rock of Etam (ch. 15:8). See OREB 2, ETAM 2.

Rock Badg'er. The rendering of Heb. shā-phān, in the marg. of the R.V. (Lev. 11:5), where "coney" appears in the text. The animal intended by the Heb. word is small and wary, dwells among the rocks (Ps. 104:18; Prov. 30:24, 26), and chews the cud, but does not part the hoof (Deut. 14:7). The corresponding name in the dialect of S. Arabia denotes the Hyrax syriacus, the so-called rock badger. The hyrax looks like a rabbit or badger, but has more affinity to the rhinoceros and the tapir; indeed, its structure is so anomalous that it has been given a whole order, Hyracoidea, to itself. It moves its jaws as if it were chewing the cud, but it does not really ruminate. The species syriacus is found in the peninsula of Sinai, n. Palestine, and the region round the Dead Sea. Its fur is tawny, with a yellow spot on the back. It lives in clefts of rocks, but does not scoop out a hole. Small parties meet together, with a sentinel on some eminence to give warning of danger. It is rarely seen except in the morning and evening, when it comes forth to feed.

Rod'a-nim (rōd'ā-nim). A people descended from Javan (Heb. text of I Chron. 1:7; and LXX and Samaritan text of Gen. 10:4). If Rodanim is the correct reading, the people of Rhodes and of the neighboring islands of the Aegean Sea are probably intended. See DODANIM.

Roe. A deer (Capreolus capraea, the Cervus capreolus of Linnaeus) which is described under ROEBUCK 2 (II Sam. 2:18; I Chron. 12:8, in Heb. ṣēbī; and Prov. 5:19, A.V., in Heb. yā'ālāh); see GAZELLE and DOE.

Roe'back'. 1. The rendering in A.V. of Heb. ṣēbī in Deut. 12:15, 22; 14:5; 15:22; I Kings 4:23. R.V. substitutes gazelle (q.v.).

2. The rendering in R.V. of Hebrew yahmūr. The animal was ceremonially clean and used for food (Deut. 14:5; I Kings 4:23, in A.V. fallow deer). Etymology indicates that its color was reddish. According to Arabian authorities, it casts its horns every year, which is characteristic of deer. In n. Galilee the name yahmūr is still given to the roebuck (Capreolus capraea, or Cervus capreolus). In Europe it is a small deer about 2 feet high at the shoulder, but in Asia it attains to a larger size. In summer it is dark reddish-brown, in winter yellowish-gray. It has a large patch of white on the rump. The antlers are about a foot long, with 3 points. It is wild over a great part of Europe and Asia. In Palestine it is found on Mount Carmel and Mount Lebanon.

By many, however, the yahmūr is identified with the bubale, one of the bovine antelopes. It is about the size of a large stag, has a long head, a narrow forehead, and reddish or pale brown hair. Its flesh is most savory.

Ro'ge-lim (rō'gē-lim) [fullers; or spies]. A town in Gilead where Barzillai lived (II Sam. 17:27; 19:31); probably on Wadi er-Rujelleh, near Irbid.

Roh'gah (rō'gā) [cf. Arab. rahg, dust, tumult]. An Asherite, family of Beriah, house of Heber (I Chron. 7:34).

Roll. The sheet of papyrus or the parchment on which documents were frequently written in ancient times was rolled up or wound around a stick, like a modern map, and thus constituted a roll (Jer. 36:2), or a volume in the original sense of the term (Ps. 40:7, A.V.); see BOOK. The word gillayōn rendered "roll" in Isa. 8:1, A.V., should be translated "tablet."

Ro-man'ti-e-zer (rō-mām'tī-ē-zēr) [I have exalted help]. A singer, a son of Heman (I Chron. 25:4). He obtained the 24th lot among the courses of the singers (v. 31). See GIDDALTI.

Ro'mans (rō'mānz). 1. Inhabitants of Rome (I Macc. 8:1; Acts 2:10, "sojourners from Rome," R.V.).

2. Those who represent the Roman government (John 11:48; Acts 25:16; 28:17).

3. Those, wherever born or of whatever race, who possessed the rights of citizenship in the Roman Empire (Acts 16:21, 37, 38; 22:25, 26, 27, 29). By the Valerian and Porcian Laws it was declared that no magistrate had the right to bind, scourge, or kill a Roman citizen. The life of one so privileged could not be taken away except by a decision of the whole people met in the comitia centuriata, a general assembly of the people, voting in divisions called centuries. If a magistrate or ruler of any kind gave orders to scourge one entitled to the protection of these laws, the latter had only to utter the words, "I am a Roman citizen," and all procedure was stayed till the people had decided on his case. When the power formerly possessed by the people was transferred to the emperor, it was to him that the right of appeal lay. The privileges of Roman citizenship were first limited to residents in Rome itself; then they were extended to various Italian tribes and cities; then to the greater part of Italy; then to places beyond the Italian peninsula; and so on and on till, it is said, Caracalla (A.D. 211-217) conferred them on every inhabitant of the Roman Empire. During the transition period individuals who had rendered service to Rome might be declared citizens, or the privilege might be purchased for money, even in towns or districts that were not as yet enfranchised. Sometimes also manumitted slaves were granted citizenship. These explanations make it easy to understand how Paul, though of Jewish descent (Phil. 3:5), could still be a Roman citizen; and how Claudius Lysias thought it worth his while to purchase the privilege for a great sum of money (Acts 22:28); and how, when he had given orders that Paul should be scourged, and was informed by the centurion that the apostle was a Roman citizen, procedure was immediately stopped (Acts 22:25-29). One can also understand the alarm of the authorities at Philippi when they had taken the responsibility of having Paul and Silas openly beaten, and, to make matters worse, uncondemned, without first taking means to ascertain whether or not they were Roman citizens (ch. 16:36-38). It will appear also that Paul simply exercised his legal right when he took his appeal to Caesar; that is, to the Roman emperor (ch. 25:11).

Rō'mans (rō'mānz), The Epis'tle of Paul to the. The first of Paul's epistles according to the order in which they are placed in our N.T. In order of composition, however, it was the 6th, since it was written from Corinth, as appears from the salutations (cf. Rom. 16:23 with I Cor. 1:14 and II Tim. 4:20), and from the fact that it was probably carried to Rome by Phoebe, a servant or deaconess of the church at Cenchreae (Rom. 16:1), which was near Corinth (Acts 18:18); and, if so, it must have been written during the visit to Greece mentioned in Acts 20:2, 3. That was in the winter of A.D. 57-58. The apostle had long wished to visit Rome (Rom. 1:10-12; 15:23), and it was his purpose, his work in the e. having been finished (ch. 15:23), to visit the capital on his way to Spain (v. 28). Before doing so, however, he was determined to return to Jerusalem to present the gifts of the Gentile churches (v. 25, 26). Not knowing, however, what might be his fate on this dangerous journey (Rom. 15:30-32; Acts 20:22), he sent this letter to the Christians at Rome, where he had many friends (cf. Rom., ch. 16), for, as the apostle of the Gentiles, he considered the church at Rome to be under his care (ch. 15:15, 16), although he had never visited it. The theme of the epistle, which is one of the most elaborate ever written by him, was naturally determined by the controversies through which he had passed and by the need of stating, formally and completely, the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles. It is a full presentation, therefore, of the way of salvation; hence its supreme importance. That he addressed it to the Christians at Rome indicates, no doubt, his appreciation of the influence which the church of the world's metropolis would exert, and the consequent necessity of establishing it in the faith that it might resist the assaults of error.

Whereas The Epistle of Paul to the Galatians is the Magna Charta of universal Christianity, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans is its constitution. The epistle may be analyzed as follows: After the salutation (ch. 1:1-7) and statement of his interest in the people addressed (vs. 8-15), he epitomizes the character of his gospel and, in doing so, gives the theme of the epistle: "The gospel . . . is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. . . . For therein is revealed a righteousness of God from faith unto faith" (vs. 16, 17).

He then proves the universal need of righteousness (chs. 1:18 to 3:20). He first shows that the Gentile world is in a state of sin and just condemnation (ch. 1:18-32), and then that the Jewish world is no exception, but is likewise guilty before God (ch. 2). To the objection that this destroys the privileges of the Jew, he replies by showing that their privilege consisted in being the trustees of revelation, but that their own Scriptures declared them to be sinful (ch. 3:1-19), so that there is no exception to the universal guilt. In fact, the Law only increases the consciousness of sin (v. 20).

He then states the righteousness which God has provided for every believer through the redemptive and sacrificial work of Christ (ch. 3:21-30), and proves that this way of salvation is that taught in the O.T. (chs. 3:31 to 4:25), that it is the basis of Christian experience (ch. 5:1-11), and that it proceeds upon the same principle of moral government on which God acted when he dealt with mankind in the person of its first head and representative, Adam (ch. 5:12-21).

The apostle then refutes 3 objections which would be brought against his doctrine of salvation by the work of Christ for us received through faith alone. The 1st objection is that on this doctrine men may continue in sin and yet be saved, to which he replies no, because faith in Christ involves vital union with him, whereby the believer rises with Christ into a new moral life (ch. 6:1-14). The 2d objection is that Paul's doctrine of deliverance from the Law released men from moral obligation, to which he replies no, because the believer accepts a new and higher obligation, whereby he devotes himself to the will of God (chs. 6:15 to 7:6). The 3d objection is that Paul's doctrine makes the Law of God an evil thing, to which he replies no, for the reason that the Law cannot save is not that the Law is evil, but that man is sinful and cannot keep it (ch. 7:7-25).

Having refuted objections, he shows (ch. 8) that on the basis of Christ's redemptive work provision is made for the spiritual renewal, complete sanctification, and final glorification of those who are in Christ, and who, being chosen and called by God, will certainly enjoy the perfect fruition of God's love. Having thus stated the gospel way of salvation, the apostle proceeds to adjust it to the fact that Israel, the chosen people, had as a nation rejected it. He does this by teaching that the saving promise of God had never been made to the Jews as a nation, but only to the "election," the true seed of Abraham, whom God had chosen (ch. 9:1-13), and he justifies from Scripture this doctrine of sovereign election (vs. 14-29); then, further, that the rejection of the Jews was due to their refusal of the very way of salvation taught by their own Scriptures (chs. 9:30 to 10:21), yet that the rejection of Israel was not complete, for the promised remnant, the election, did believe (ch. 11:1-10), and, finally, that in the end the Jews will be converted and with the Gentiles trust in the promised Redeemer (vs. 11-36).

The rest of the epistle consists of an exhortation to Christian living (ch. 12), to the performance of civil and social duties (ch. 13), and to Christian charity and unity (chs. 14:1 to 15:13), ending with personal messages and salutations (chs. 15:14 to 16:27).

The question has been raised whether or not the Epistle to the Romans in early days ever existed in a shorter form than at present. In view of certain phenomena 2 theories especially have attracted attention. They have literary interest but no doctrinal importance. According to one theory, an abridgment of the epistle was prepared for general circulation, being shortened by the omission of local references, such as "in Rome" (Rom. 1:7) and chs. 15 and 16, but retaining the entire doctrinal instruction and the essence of the practical appeal. Evidence for the existence of the epistle in this shorter form is sought in the presence of the doxology (ch. 16:25-27) in some MSS. at the end of ch. 14, or both there and at the end of ch. 16; in the lack of quotations from chs. 15 and 16 in the writings of Tertullian, Irenaeus, and Cyprian; and in the apparent omission of these chapters by Marcion. The lack of citation from these chapters is without significance, however, in view of their character. They have never been much quoted. The salutations especially do not lend themselves to quotation. The theory of an abridged edition of the epistle must rest mainly on the occurrence of the doxology at the end of ch. 14 in some MSS. This is a frail support; and it is especially weak in view of the fact that no extant MS. is an abridgment, but all MSS. of the epistle without exception contain chs. 15 and 16.

The other theory, and one widely held, is that ch. 16 did not form a part of the epistle originally, but constituted a brief note commending Phoebe to the church at Ephesus. For ch. 15 is not easily separated from ch. 14, but follows it naturally, and simply develops the appeal that is made in ch. 14 to the spirit of Christian self-sacrifice on the part of those who are strong in conscience. Moreover, ch. 15 closes, in v. 33, with a benediction such as occurs at the end of other letters written by Paul (II Cor. 13:11; I Thess. 5:23; II Thess. 3:16; Phil. 4:9), and forms the natural conclusion to the Epistle to the Romans. Moreover the Chester Beatty papyrus of the Pauline epistles (copied during the 1st part of the 3d century) puts the doxology (Rom. 16:25-27) after ch. 15:33. Chapter 16 would, therefore, seem to be appended. That the latter chapter was originally a letter commending Phoebe to the church at Ephesus, not to the Christians in Rome, may be gathered, it is argued, from the following considerations: 1. It is intended to accredit Phoebe (ch. 16:1). 2. Aquila and Priscilla, to whom salutations are sent (ch. 16:3), were certainly living in Ephesus about 3 years before the Epistle to the Romans was written, and they were not in Rome when Paul wrote the 2d letter to Timothy (II Tim. 4:19). 3. The reference to Epaphroditus, "the firstfruits of Asia" (Rom. 16:5, R.V.), would be more natural in a letter to Ephesus than to Rome. 4. It is unlikely that Paul would have as many acquaintances in a church he had not visited as he salutes in ch. 16.

The objections to this theory that ch. 16 is a brief note to the church at Ephesus are: 1. Salutations were occasionally added, as here, after a doxology or a benediction, even when followed by Amen (Phil. 4:20; II Thess. 3:16; cf. II Tim. 4:18). 2. The fact that ch. 16 forms part of the epistle in all extant MSS. 3. Aquila and Priscilla migrated from place to place a great deal. They were residing in Rome when all Jews were notified to leave the city; they lived at Corinth for about 1½ years and accompanied Paul to Ephesus. In this place they actively worked for Christianity and remained at least until he returned from a trip to Jerusalem. It would not be strange if they went back to Rome, especially in connection with the apostle's plan to visit the city and introduce the Christian religion (Acts 19:21). 4. That Epaphroditus, a convert of the province of Asia, found his way to Rome occasions no surprise; for Christians, Jews, and Gentiles were constantly going to the imperial capital for various reasons from all parts of the world, for example, Epaphroditus of Colossae and Aquila of Pontus and Herod the tetrarch. 5. The persons saluted in ch. 16 bear names that are proved to have been current in Rome, and some of them were common among the early Christians of the city. 6. It is not necessary to assume that the people to whom he sends greetings were in every case personal acquaintances of the apostle; it is enough that they were known to him as earnest, active Christians through references to them in letters from Aquila, Priscilla, and others concerning affairs in Rome.

Rome (rōm). The date 753 B.C. is accepted by the best authorities for the traditional founding of Rome by Romulus, who became its first king. The little kingdom grew in size and importance, absorbing its immediate neighbors through the reigns of 7 kings, until the tyranny of Tarquinius Superbus drove the people to take the government into their own hands and establish a republic. In the beginning the power was entirely in the hands of a few patrician families, the plebeians merely acquiescing in measures taken. The plebs, however, demanded and obtained privilege after privilege until every Roman citizen had a voice in the government. During the period of the republic Rome extended its boundaries at first over all Italy, and finally over the whole Mediterranean world.

Rome's first contact with Asia occurred 190 B.C., when the Roman army defeated Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, at the battle of Magnesia, and Rome assumed a protectorate over certain cities in Asia Minor (cf. I Macc. 1:10). Most of Rome's conquests after this were of a peaceful nature, other nations willingly acknowledging its superiority.

In 63 B.C. Judea became formally subject to Rome, being taken by Pompey after he had reduced the Seleucid kingdom to the level of a province. It was required to pay tribute, but was left for a time under native rulers.

Meantime, several parties jealous of each other had been growing up in the state. As the result of an internal political struggle, the triumvirate of Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus was formed to rule, but by the death of Crassus, and the defeat of Pompey in a civil struggle, the power fell into the hands of Caesar alone. This did not last long. Caesar was murdered by his enemies in 44 B.C., civil war again broke out, a 2d triumvirate was formed by Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus, and, like the 1st, was soon reduced to 1 man, Octavian (31 B.C.). Full of ambition, Octavian had himself proclaimed emperor with the title of Augustus, and the Roman Empire began.

It was during the reign of Augustus that Christ was born; during that of his successor Tiberius, that the crucifixion took place. The martyrdom of James the brother of John took place in the reign of the emperor Claudius (Acts 11:28; 12:1, 2). It was to the emperor Nero that Paul appealed (ch. 25:11). The destruction of Jerusalem prophesied by our Lord (Matt., ch. 24; Mark., ch. 13; Luke 19:41-44; 21:5-36) was accomplished in the year A.D. 70 by Titus, who afterward became emperor. See CAESAR.

In the days of Augustus the empire was bounded by the Rhine and the Danube, the Euphrates, the African desert, the Atlantic, and the North Sea. The conquest of a part of Britain took place under Claudius, and Trajan expanded beyond the Euphrates. The Roman Empire covered practically the whole civilized world.

Weakened by excesses and corruption within, and attacked by enemies without, the empire in course of time began to fail. The last emperor of the whole Roman Empire was Theodosius (A.D. 379-395); at his death it was divided between his 2 sons and was never again united. The w. part disintegrated and finally Rome fell (476), when Odoacer, a German leader, became ruler of Italy.

During the decline of Rome's civil power the Christians there were growing in power and influence. Although it had been the policy of Rome to tolerate the religions of its conquered peoples, the Christians were persecuted almost from the first. This was due mainly to 2 causes: their uncompromising attitude toward all heathen rites and religions, and their unceasing efforts to make converts. The persecutions were especially severe under Nero, who attempted to throw on the Christians the blame for some of his own nefarious deeds. Persecutions were also very severe under Domitian, but notwithstanding constant imprisonment and death the Christians continued to grow in numbers and influence until the church in Rome and the bishop of Rome became no inconsiderable factor in the general growth of Christianity. The Christian religion was officially adopted and declared the religion of the state by the emperor Constantine early in the 4th century.

Roof. See HOUSE.

Room. 1. A chamber or other apartment in a house (Acts 1:13). See HOUSE.

2. In A.V. room is also used in the sense of place or position in society, a meaning which is now obsolete (Matt. 23:6; Luke 14:7, 8; 20:46). "Uppermost [or chief] room" is the translation of Gr. protoklitia, the chief (most honorable) reclining place; see MEALS. The scribes and Pharisees were censured for seeking the place of honor at feasts, desiring to recline on the most important couch. R.V. substitutes "place [or seat]" for "room," when used in this obsolete sense.

Rose. The rendering of Heb. hăbasseleth (S. of Sol. 2:1; Isa. 35:1), in the Eng. versions and by several Jewish scholars of the Middle Ages. Modern interpreters are divided in opinion. The most important suggestions are the following: 1. Some expositors, including Tristram, following the Targum of S. of Sol. 2:1, and sometimes appealing to a doubtful ety., understand the beautiful, white sweet-scented narcissus (Narcissus tazetta), common in spring in the plain of Sharon and in the hill country. 2. Syriac hamsaldyât, cognate to the Heb. name, denotes colchicum and the crocus, which are strikingly alike and which, when the rainy season sets in, carpet the fields with bright flowers. The prevalent opinion, perhaps represented by R.V. marg., is that meadow saffron (Colchicum autumnale) is meant, with its pale lilac flowers. 3. Akkad. habasillatu refers to marsh plants, so that the Heb. has been understood by some interpreters of late to denote Cyperus syriacus, known also as Cyperus papyrus, which grows on the Nahr el-Aujah in the plain of Sharon and in other marshy districts of Palestine. It flowers toward the end of autumn.

The true rose is a native of Media and Persia. It was early transplanted to the countries on the Mediterranean, and grows on the mountains of Palestine. The maid who recognized the voice of Peter at the gate was named Rhoda, a rose (Acts 12:13); and the true rose is probably intended in Wisd. of Sol. 2:8; Eccclus. 24:14; 39:13; 50:8, where the Gr. word is used. Tristram, however, judges from its growing at Jericho and by the waters that the oleander is meant in these passages.

Rosh (rōsh) [head, chief, prince]. 1. A son of Benjamin, who went down to Egypt with Jacob and his sons (Gen. 46:21). He did not give rise to a tribal family (Num. 26:38), because probably, like Er and Onan of Judah, he died without issue.

2. A n. people mentioned with Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. 38:2; 39:1, both R.V. text). The text of the A.V. and J.V., and the marg. of the R.V. render Rosh "chief prince," in which case Rosh as a proper name disappears.

Ru'by. 1. The pl., rubies, is the rendering of Heb. peninim, which occurs only in the pl. The marg. of the R.V. has coral, red coral, or pearls. The name may signify branches and thus aptly describe coral; but this signification is not established. It was ruddy in hue (Lam. 4:7), and was precious (Job 28:18; Prov. 3:15). The color is a good reason for not regarding it as a pearl. The true or Oriental ruby is, like the sapphire, a variety of corundum. It is a clear, bright gem, rich red in color. The spinel ruby is a deep red, and the balas ruby a rose-red, variety of spinel.

2. The marginal rendering of Heb. ōdem, red gem (Ex. 28:17; Ezek. 28:13). In the text it is translated sardius, which is the better rendering.

Rue. A plant, in Gr. pēganon, of which the Pharisees, careful about minute points, were scrupulously accurate in paying tithes (Luke 11:42). It is Ruta graveolens, a half shrubby plant, 2 or 3 feet high, with pinnate bluish-green leaves, all dotted over with odoriferous glands and yellowish corymbose flowers, mostly with 8 stamens. Its odor is very powerful. It is a native of the Mediterranean region. It was cultivated in Palestine as a medicine, and perhaps as a condiment for food. Had it been wild it would not have been a tithable plant.

Rufus (rōō'fūs) [Lat., red]. A son of that Simon of Cyrene who was compelled to bear the cross of Christ (Mark 15:21). He may have been the same as the Rufus at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. 16:13), but there is nothing to prove that such a conjecture is correct.

Ru-ha'mah (rōō-hā'mā) [she has obtained mercy]. One of the symbolical names with which the children of Judah and Israel shall eventually greet each other (Hos. 2:1).

Rul'er. In a general sense, anyone who exercises authority. More particularly: 1. Officer of a synagogue (Luke 8:41). See SYNAGOGUE.

2. Member of the sanhedrin, whether priest or layman (John 3:1; 7:26; cf. Acts 4:5 with vs. 8 and 15; cf. ch. 23:5).

3. Archon or civil magistrate of a city (Acts 16:19). In Macedonia and regions under Macedonian influence such officials were technically called politarchs or rulers of the city (ch. 17:6, 8).

4. The governor of a feast, who prepared it and had the direction of it, but was not the host (Ecclus. 32:1; II Macc. 2:27; and John 2:8, but marg. "steward").

Ru'mah (rōō'mā) [height, high place]. The home of a grandfather of Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:36); perhaps Arumah near Shechem (cf. Jos. Antiq. x. 5, 2), or Rumah in Galilee (Jos. War iii. 7, 21), represented by Khirbet Rumeih, 6 miles n. of Nazareth.

Run'ners. A class of soldiers who served as a bodyguard to the king (I Sam. 22:17, in A.V. footmen, R.V. guard), were posted at the door of the royal palace at Jerusalem (I Kings 14:27; II Kings 11:19), had their own guard room (I Kings 14:28), escorted the king to the Temple (v. 28), and executed the king's commands (I Sam. 22:17; II Kings 10:25). In each instance, see R.V. marg. Perhaps they ran before the royal chariot (see FORERUNNER).

Rush. See PAPYRUS.

Rust. A corrosive or disfiguring accretion, in Gr. īos, which denotes the rust of iron, the verdigris of brass, the tarnish on gold and silver (James 5:3). The Gr. word brōsis, eating, corrosion, is used in Matt. 6:19, 20.

Ruth (rōōth) [ety. uncertain; perhaps, slightly, comely]. A Moabitess married first to Mahlon of Bethlehem, who was sojourning in Moab with his parents and brother because of a famine in Judah. The 3 men died. Ruth left her native land and accompanied her mother-in-law Naomi to Bethlehem. While gleaning in the field of Boaz, a kinsman of Naomi's deceased husband, she found favor in his eyes. Custom required a kinsman of Mahlon to marry Ruth; and Boaz took her to wife, after one nearer of kin than he had refused. By this marriage Ruth became an ancestress of David. The transaction between Boaz and Ruth was not a levirate marriage (Deut. 25:7-10; cf. Ruth 1:11-13), for Boaz was not a brother of Ruth's deceased husband. Custom required that, when the widow of a childless man desired to sell his estate, if there was no brother, then the nearest of kin and heir to the deceased should buy or redeem it of the widow (Ruth 4:3, 4, 9). The property was thereby retained in the family. Custom was also urgent that the kinsman voluntarily assume levirate duties or take the woman to wife, if he would not thereby endanger his own inheritance (chs. 3:9; 4:5, 6). It was considered magnanimous to do so, and a mark of loyalty to the family. A son born of such union was legally the son of the deceased (ch. 4:5, 10, 14, 17); and doubtless ultimately received the first-born's right in the estate.

In the Hebrew collection The Book of Ruth is placed among the Megilloth (scrolls), which are publicly read on specified anniversaries; since its scenery is the harvest field, it is read at Pentecost, the harvest festival. In the LXX and in Josephus' enumeration of the canonical books it stands immediately after Judges, as in the English version. The events recorded occurred in the days of the Judges (Ruth 1:1), 60 years or more before David's birth (ch. 4:21, 22). The marriage of a pious Israelite with a Moabitess is recounted, and the issue of the marriage is an ancestor of David. After the Exile such a marriage would have been regarded as discreditable, and would not have been invented. The narrative is, accordingly, historical. Its historical character receives confirmation from the appropriateness of the event to the period, for about that time friendly intercourse prevailed between Israel and Moab (I Sam. 22:3, 4). The event is related without disapprobation and without explanation or apology, an indication that it was committed to writing before the Exile. The language is also as pure as admittedly early writings, such as Judges, ch. 5. The book did not receive its final literary form until a considerable time after the event; for it explains the drawing off of the shoe in matters of attestation as a custom of former times (Ruth 4:7), and it brings down the genealogy to David.

S

Sab'a'oth (sāb'ā-ōth) [hosts, armies]. The Lord of Sabaoth is the same as Lord of hosts, the 2d part of the title being left untranslated (cf. Rom. 9:29 with Isa. 1:9; James 5:4). See HOST.

Sa'bat (sā'bāt). See SHEBAT.

Sab'bath (sāb'āth) [rest]. The divinely instituted day of rest, ordained for all men. God having completed the work of creation in 6 days ceased from creative work on the 7th day. "And God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it; because that in it he rested from all his work" which he had made in a creative manner (Gen. 2:1-3); see CREATION. The next reference to a division of time into periods of 7 days occurs in the account of the Flood, when Noah was forewarned of the imminence of the storm a week before it broke in its fury, and again when he sent forth the birds at intervals of 7 days to discover through them the stage of water (Gen. 7:4; 8:10, 12). But it is not only in this express mention of the week, but also in the entire chronology of the Flood, when interpreted according to its own principles, that the hebdomadal division of time is found to have existed at that early date. The events are measured by intervals of the week both in the Hebrew narrative and in the Babylonian account. And what is more, there is repeated evidence that the 7th day was regarded as a season of divine benevolence toward man. According to both accounts, and reckoning from the day when the Flood began, the divine power which caused the storm was restrained at the close of a 6th day, and the 1st day that dawned fair and beautiful was a 7th day; and the day when the inmates of the ark were permitted to disembark, and when they offered sacrifices of thanksgiving, was likewise a 7th day. A glance at the chronology will show that not improbably Noah dispatched the birds in connection with the conventional 7th day because it was a day of divine favor.

From the days of Noah until the Exodus there is no express mention in the Hebrew records of a sanctification of the 7th day by rest from labor and by religious worship. There is no reason why there should be. There was no event specially to emphasize the day. And probably in that age the Sabbath was somewhat less sharply marked off from the other days of the week, even among the people of God, than it was later; for the nomad shepherds had certain labors which must be performed, and the Israelites in Egypt were not their own masters and could not rest on the 7th day. But when the nation was organized at Sinai a different mode of life was adopted, the people were able to frame their own laws, they formed an independent community, they led camp life in the wilderness and exchanged it for the settled life of agriculturists and traders, and as a natural result rest on the Sabbath made a greater outward difference than it had done before. Still, in both the Hebrew and Babylonian literature relating to the period before the Exodus there are incidental references to a period of 7 days (Gen. 29:27, 28). These are doubtless to be understood in the sense in which we use the term week, reckoning 7 days from any date we please. At any rate time was frequently measured by periods of 7 days. Several causes doubtless contributed to make this custom general, among others the phasing of the moon. But over and beyond the appropriateness of a lunar subdivision of the lunar month, there was the conception, traceable in the narrative of the Flood, that the 7th day was one of divine rest and favor toward men.

The Sabbath is Jehovah's day par excellence and does not have a Babylonian origin. A Babylonian tablet rendered freely, goes as follows: "The seventh day is the feast of Marduk and Zarpanit. The shepherd of the great people shall not eat flesh cooked on the coals. The garment of his body he shall not change; clean clothing he shall not put on. A sacrifice he shall not offer. The king in a chariot shall not ride. Commanding, he shall not speak. In a secret place a seer shall not give an oracle. A physician shall not lay his hand on the sick. The day is not fitting for carrying out an intention. At night (i.e., at the end of this day) the king shall bring his gift to the great gods; his offering he shall offer. Then his prayer is acceptable with god." These prohibitions apply to the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th days of the month, which apparently were dies nefasti, on which certain things were to be avoided; the king was especially restricted. There is an Akkad. word shabattu, the 15th day of the month or full moon, etymologically related to Heb. Shabbāth (Sabbath), but it is not applied to the series of days listed above. A comparison of the Heb. Sabbath with the Babylonian dies nefasti sets its peculiarity into a clear light. Now there may originally have been some connection with the phases of the moon, but it is entirely independent of the courses of that heavenly body, since the 7-day week, which is bounded by the Sabbath, regularly pursues its course through the year without any consideration of the lunar month. Thus it is entirely independent of the astrology of the heathen of antiquity; we cannot trace any connection with the heathen dies fasti and dies nefasti. The Sabbath is praised as the will of the sovereign God of creation at the foundation of the world (Gen. 2:2 seq.; Ex. 20:11; 31:15-17). Among the Hebrews it was not the 7th day only which was sacred, but the day which began and which consecrated the 7th month, and the entire 7th year, and the completion of the 7th year. And these seasons were all associated with the idea of rest, of worship, of liberty, of good will to man, and of divine favor.

The first occurrence of the name Sabbath in the Hebrew records is in Ex. 16:23. The Israelites had not reached Mount Sinai, nor had the Ten Commandments been spoken from its summit, but in the wilderness of Sin, when manna began to be given a double amount fell on the 6th day; and Moses said: "This is that which the Lord hath spoken, To-morrow is a solemn rest, a holy sabbath unto the Lord; bake that which ye will bake, . . . and all that remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning." None fell on the morrow, and Moses said in regard to what had been kept over: "Eat that to-day; for to-day is a sabbath unto the Lord: to-day ye shall not find it in the field. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day is the sabbath, in it there shall be none" (vs. 23-26; cf. v. 5).

Shortly afterward the commandment requiring the Sabbath to be kept was promulgated with 9 other laws by Jehovah at Sinai, and afterward written by the finger of God on tables of stone (Ex. 31:18; Deut. 9:10). Like its companion laws, it was of perpetual obligation. It commences, "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy," the word remember being appropriately used, since the people did not now for the first time learn that the Sabbath existed. In repeating the laws 40 years later at Shittim, Moses recalls the fact that the Lord their God had commanded them to observe the day; and then instead of stating the reason for the ordination of the Sabbath, he assigns Jehovah's deliverance of his people from bondage or labor in Egypt as the reason why Israel specially is under obligation to keep the day of rest instituted by God (Deut. 5:15). The Sabbath was to be kept by a holy convocation for the worship of the Lord (Lev. 23:3; cf. Ezek. 46:3), and should be a sign showing that God was their sanctifier (Ex. 31:13). The doctrine clearly was that the day was ordained by God; that it was established as a day of physical rest and refreshment for man; that the obligation to keep it arises from God's own example, his connecting a blessing with it, and his explicit command, and that his redemption of his people lays them under special obligation to set the day apart; that it is to be observed by God's people as a Sabbath unto him, and is to include a holy assemblage for worship. It was a reminder of God's complacency in the contemplation of his finished work, and of Jehovah's redemption of his people from Egyptian service.

In the tabernacle and Temple worship the pre-eminence of the Sabbath over the other days of the week was shown by the offering upon it of 2 lambs, while 1 was sacrificed on an ordinary week day (Num. 28:9, 19). The 12 cakes of showbread were also to be presented on that day (Lev. 24:5-8; I Chron. 9:32). In enforcing the law, no fire was allowed to be lit by an Israelite in his habitation on the Sabbath day; anyone doing work on it was to be put to death; and one who gathered sticks on the Sabbath in the wilderness was in fact stoned to death (Ex. 35:3; Num. 15:32-36); see PUNISHMENT. Isaiah (chs. 56:2-6; 58:13) and Jeremiah (ch. 27:21-27) strongly counseled the keeping of the day. A psalm or song was composed for the Sabbath, in which delight is expressed in the worship of Jehovah and thought is directed to God's works of creation (Psalm 92). Ezekiel complains that the Sabbaths had to a large extent been profaned or polluted (Ezek. 20:12, 24; 22:8, 26; 23:38). In Nehemiah's time traders, especially those of Tyre, continually brought merchandise to Jerusalem for sale on the sacred day, till Nehemiah peremptorily forbade the practice to be continued and took strong measures against those who attempted to disregard his directions (Neh. 10:31; 13:15-22).

At the commencement of the war of independence under the Maccabee family, the Jews were of opinion that they had no right to defend themselves on the Sabbath if they were attacked by an enemy. The campaign therefore began with the slaughter of 1,000 unresisting Jews, consisting of patriots and their families. The survivors resolved in future to defend themselves if they were directly attacked on the sacred day, but not to engage in offensive operations (I Macc. 2:31-41). Even then they were at a disadvantage with the Gentiles, who labored under no such restriction. The latter pushed on siege and other operations on the Sabbath unmolested, provided they abstained from directly attacking the Jews. Pompey raised his banks and mounted his battering-rams against Jerusalem on the Sabbath without any interference from the inhabitants, but delayed the effort to breach the walls till the sacred day was over (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 2 and 3). In the time of our Lord the Pharisees applied the law to the most trivial acts, and forbade many works of necessity and mercy. They denounced Jesus because he healed sick people on the Sabbath, though if ox, or ass, or sheep fell into a pit on that day, they did not consider it at all unlawful to take it out without delay. They also led forth the animals to be watered just as on ordinary week days (Matt. 12:9-13; Luke 13:10-17). It was not merely to healing on the Sabbath that they objected. When the disciples of Jesus, passing on the Sabbath through the grain fields, plucked some of the ears, and, rubbing them in their hands, ate them, being hungry, the Pharisees denounced this as if it were in essence the same as reaping, threshing, and grinding. Our Lord made a notable reply, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath: so that the Son of man is lord even of the sabbath" (Mark 2:23-28). The Sabbath was instituted for the benefit of mankind; its obligation lasts as long as man has the same needs as at creation; the Son of Man is not the slave of the Sabbath, but its Lord.

The day for synagogue worship was the 7th day of the week, Saturday (Matt. 12:9, 10; Acts 13:14). The Apostolic Christian Church from the beginning held assemblages for worship on the 1st day of the week, which was the day on which Christ rose from the dead for our justification (Acts 2:1, probably; 20:7). On that day the Apostle Paul directed the Christians of Galatia and Corinth to make their weekly contribution to the charities of the Church (I Cor. 16:1, 2). It was designated the Lord's Day (Rev. 1:10); see LORD'S DAY. This day, like the former appointment of the 7th day, sets apart 1 day in 7 to be a Sabbath unto the Lord. It is equally a reminder of the Lord's redemption of his people. It is accompanied by the same evidence of divine favor in the form of physical and spiritual blessings.

The Sabbath of the land was a year in which the land of Canaan had a solemn rest. It came round once every 7 years. In it the ground was not sown or reaped, nor the vineyard pruned, nor its fruits gathered in. The spontaneous growth of field and orchard was free to all. In the Sabbatic year also the creditor released the Hebrew debtor from his obligation and freed the Hebrew slave (Ex. 23:10, 11; Lev. 25:3-7; Deut. 15:1-18; Neh. 10:31). On the completion of 7 such Sabbatic years, that is, at the end of 49 years, the trumpet was blown to proclaim liberty throughout the land, and the year of jubilee was ushered in (Lev. 25:8-10); see JUBILEE. Reliable historical notices of the observance of the Sabbatic year are the covenant of Nehemiah's time (Neh. 10:31), the 150th year of the Seleucid era or 164-163 B.C. (I Macc. 6:49, 53; cf. Jos. Antiq. xii. 9, 5), the 178th Seleucid year or 136-135 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 1; War i. 2, 4), the decree issued by Caesar exempting the Jews from tribute during the Sabbatic year (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 10, 6; cf. Tacitus Hist. v. 4), the year 38-37 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 16, 2; xv. 1, 2), and the year before the fall of Jerusalem, A.D. 68-69 (Talmud). See also Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 5, for time of Alexander the Great. If the Israelites disobeyed God's laws, they were to be carried into captivity, the land lying desolate, having rest and being left to enjoy its Sabbaths, or the rest which the Israelites had not allowed it on their weekly and septennial Sabbaths (Lev. 26:34-43). Jeremiah prophesied that the people should be punished for their idolatry by the desolation of their land and their bondage to the Babylonians for 70 years (Jer. 25:7-11). The Chronicler also connects the Captivity with the disobedience of the people and the pollution of the Temple; and he adds that they were servants unto the Babylonians for 70 years, as Jeremiah had foretold they should be, until the land had enjoyed its Sabbaths; for as long as it lay desolate it kept Sabbath, to fulfill threescore and ten years (II Chron. 36:14, 16, 20, 21). It must not be inferred from these words that the people had ignored the Sabbatic year exactly 70 times, or that the neglected Sabbatic years were continuous; and it is not stated that the Sabbatic year was neglected. Doubtless it had been neglected sometimes, for an idolatrous and disobedient people would scarcely obey an injunction when obedience would apparently involve pecuniary loss.

Evidently any period of time which was kept as a Sabbath could be called a Sabbath. Not only were the 7th day and the 7th year Sabbaths, but also the Day of Atonement on the 10th day of the 7th month (Lev. 23:32).

Sabbath Day's Journey. A Sabbath-day's journey was a journey of limited extent proper, in the estimation of the scribes, on a Sabbath day. The expression occurs in Acts 1:12, where this is stated to be the distance between Mount Olivet and Jerusalem, or from Jerusalem to a place on the mountain from which Bethany was visible (Luke 24:50). If the measurement be made from the e. gate of Jerusalem (the Jewish method of reckoning) to the site of the Church of the Ascension, crowning the Mount of Olives, the distance, as the crow flies, will be about 2,250 English feet; but in actual travel it will be considerably more. According to Josephus, the mount was distant 5 or 6 stades from the city (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 6; War v. 2, 3). The regulation of the Sabbath-day's journey had its origin in the injunction not to leave the camp on the Sabbath (Ex. 16:29). It was reckoned at 2,000 cubits, partly on an interpretation of Num. 35:5, according to which the district pertaining to a Levitical city extended 2,000 cubits from the wall on every side, and partly on the belief, derived from Josh. 3:4, that the camp of the Israelites was 2,000 cubits from the tabernacle, to which of course they might go on the Sabbath. A man might travel on the Sabbath within the city where he resided as far as its limits allowed, be the city never so large. Rabbinic casuistry, however, found means of evading this strict regulation. A man could, previous to the Sabbath, establish a residence by depositing food for 2 meals at or within the 2,000-cubit limit; he could then go 2,000 cubits beyond that point on the Sabbath without transgressing the law.

Sabbatical Year. See JUBILEE, SABBATH.

Sabe'ans (sá-bé'ānz). The people of Sheba (Isa. 45:14), a nation far off (Joel 3:8); also the people of Seba (Isa. 45:14; cf. Ezek. 23:42, A.V., which follows the kere). See SEBA, SHEBA, I.

Sab'tah (säb'tä) and Sab'ta (säb'tä). A Cushite people (Gen. 10:7; I Chron. 1:9), probably of s. Arabia; generally identified with Shabwat, the ancient metropolis of Hadramaut.

Sab'te'ca (säb'të-kä), in A.V. Sab'te'cha (säb'të-kä) and Sab'te'chah (säb'të-kä). A Cushite people (Gen. 10:7; I Chron. 1:9), probably of s. Arabia.

Sa'car (sä'kär) [hire, wages]. 1. A Hararite, father of one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:35). In II Sam. 23:33 Sharar. 2. A son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:4).

Sack'but. A medieval wind instrument, having a long bent tube of brass with a movable slide for changing the pitch of the tone, as in the trombone. The instrument referred to by this name in the English version of Dan. 3:5 belonged to an entirely different class. It was a stringed instrument, and the English translation is erroneously a sound equivalent of the original. It is called in Aram. sabbekä, which is evidently identical with Gr. sambyké, which was an instrument of music somewhat like the harp or lyre, but with only 4 strings. Strabo affirms that the Gr. word is of barbarian origin; and Athenaeus states that the instrument was invented by the Syrians.

Sack'cloth. A coarse cloth, of a dark color, usually made of goat's hair (Rev. 6:12). It was called in Heb. šak, from which the Eng. word is derived. It was worn customarily by mourners (II Sam. 3:31; II Kings 19:1, 2), often, if not habitually, by prophets (Isa. 20:2; Rev. 11:3), and by captives (I Kings 20:31; cf. Isa. 3:24). The garment of sackcloth probably resembled a sack, with openings made for the neck and arms, and slit down the front. It was cast about the loins (Gen. 37:34; I Kings 20:31) and girded on (II Sam. 3:31; Ezek. 7:18; Joel 1:8); and was usually worn over other raiment (Jonah 3:6; cf. II Sam. 21:10), but sometimes next to the skin (I Kings 21:27; II Kings 6:30; Job 16:15; Isa. 32:11).

The cloth was also used for making sacks, which were known by the same name as the material (Gen. 42:25; Josh. 9:4).

Sac'ri-fice. See OFFERINGS.

Sad'ducees (sä'q'ū-sēz) [Lat. Sadducaei, Gr. Saddoukaioi]. A Jewish party, the opponents of the Pharisees (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 10, 6). They were comparatively few in number, but they were educated men, and mostly wealthy and of good position (ibid.; xviii. 1, 4). The name, judged by the orthography, is derived from Zadok, which was often written Saddouk in Greek. The rabbis say that the party took its name from its founder Zadok, who lived c. 300 B.C.; but since it appears that the members and adherents of the highest priestly aristocracy constituted the party, it is now generally believed that the name refers to the high priest Zadok, who officiated in David's reign and in whose family the high priesthood remained until the political confusion of the Maccabean times, his descendants and partisans being Zadokites or Sadducees.

In opposition to the Pharisees, who laid great stress on the tradition of the elders, the Sadducees limited their creed to the doctrines which they found in the sacred text itself. They held that the word of the written Law was alone binding (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 10, 6). They maintained the right of private interpretation (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 4). They held to the letter of Scripture, even when it led to severity in the administration of justice (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1). In distinction from the Pharisees, they denied: 1. The resurrection and future retribution in Sheol, asserting that the soul dies with the body (Matt. 22:23-33; Acts 23:8; Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 4; War ii. 8, 14). 2. The existence of angels and spirits (Acts 23:8). 3. Fatalism: contending for the freedom of the will, teaching that all our actions are in our own power, so that we are ourselves the causes of what is good and receive what is evil from our own folly, and affirming that God is not concerned in our doing good or not doing what is evil (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 5, 9; War ii. 8, 14). In denying immortality and the resurrection, they were relying on the absence of an explicit statement of these doctrines in the Mosaic Law, and they failed to hold the faith of the Patriarchs regarding Sheol, which, though it was undeveloped, yet contained the germs of the later Biblical doctrine of the resurrection of the body and a future retribution. The Patriarchs unquestionably believed in the continued existence of the soul after death. In affirming that there is neither angel nor spirit, the Sadducees were setting themselves against the elaborate angelology of the Judaism of their time; but they went to the other extreme, and again fell short of the teaching of the Law (Ex. 3:2; 14:19). They probably at first emphasized the truth that God directs affairs with respect to man's conduct, punishing or rewarding in this life according as man's deeds are good or evil. If they actually taught, as Josephus affirms they did, that God is not concerned in our doing good or refraining from evil, they rejected the clear teaching of the Mosaic Law which they professed to believe (Gen. 3:17; 4:7; 6:5-7). It is probable that they began by denying what is not expressly taught in the letter of Scripture; but as they yielded more fully to Greek influence, they adopted the principles of the Aristotelian philosophy, and refused to accept any doctrine which they could not prove by pure reason.

As to the origin and growth of the Sadducees, Schürer suggests that the priestly house of Zadok, which was at the head of affairs in the 4th and 3d centuries B.C. under the Persian and Grecian kings, began, unconsciously perhaps, to place political above religious considerations. In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah the family of the high priest was worldly and inclined to resist the strict separation of Jew from Gentile. See ELIASHIB 5. In the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-163 B.C.) a large number of priests were friendly to Greek culture (II Macc. 4:14-16), and the high priests Jason, Menelaus, and Alcimus were pronounced Hellenizers. The people took a determined stand under the Maccabees for purity of Israel's religion; and when this party triumphed and the Maccabees secured the high priesthood, the Zadokites were forced into retirement and driven to politics, and they continued to be ready to neglect the customs and traditions of the elders and favor Greek culture and influence. John Hyrcanus, Aristobulus, and Alexander Jannaeus (135-78 B.C.) favored the Sadducees, and the conduct of political affairs was largely in their hands under the Romans and the Herods, for the high priests of this period were Sadducees (Acts 5:17; Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 1). The Sadducees, as well as the Pharisees, who visited John the Baptist in the wilderness, were addressed by him as a generation of vipers (Matt. 3:7). They joined with the Pharisees in demanding from our Lord a sign from heaven (Matt. 16:1-4), and Jesus warned his disciples against both (vs. 6-12). The Sadducees attempted to embarrass him by putting to him an ensnaring question regarding the resurrection, but he refuted their arguments, and reduced them to silence (Matt. 22:23-33). They joined with the priests and the captain of the Temple in persecuting Peter and John (Acts 4:1-22). Both Pharisees and Sadducees were in the sanhedrin which tried Paul, and the apostle, taking note of the fact, cleverly set them at variance with each other (Acts 23:6-10).

Sa'doc (sā'dōk) [šādōk, just, righteous]. An ancestor of Christ, who lived after the Exile (Matt. 1:14).

Saffron. A fragrant plant (S. of Sol. 4:14), called in Heb. karkôm, in Arab. kurkum. It is the saffron crocus (Crocus sativus), a native, apparently, of n. Italy and of w. Asia. From a remote period of antiquity it has been largely cultivated in s. Europe and Asia. The flowers are light violet in color, veined with red. The dried stigmas, pulverized or pressed, yield a yellow dye. Clothing and rooms were sprinkled with water scented with saffron; olive oil perfumed with it was used as an ointment; food was spiced with it; and it was employed in medicine.

Sa'la (sā'lā) and Sa'lah (sā'lā). See SHELAH, I.

Sa'l'a-mis (sāl'a-mis). A city on the e. or s.e. coast of Cyprus, traditionally reported to have been built by Teucer, from the island of Salamis, off the coast of Greece. It contained synagogues of the Jews, in which Paul on his First Missionary Journey preached (Acts 13:4, 5). The place is now called Famagusta.

Sa-la'thi-el (sā-lā'thī-ēl). See SHEALTIEL.

Sa'l'e-cah (sāl'ē-kā) in A.V. Sa'cah (sāl'kā) and Sa'l'chah (sāl'chā) [cf. Arab. sakala, to go along a road]. A city of Bashan, near Edrei (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 12:5; 13:11). It was on the boundary of Og's kingdom, and afterward constituted the n. limit of the Gadites (I Chron. 5:11). It is now known as Salkhad, 25 miles e. of Edrei, and 66 e., very slightly n. of the Jordan, opposite to Beth-shean, in Samaria.

Sa'lem (sāl'ēm) [complete, peaceful, peace]. A natural abbreviation of the name Jerusalem, the city or foundation of peace (Ps. 76:2; and probably Gen. 14:18). See MELCHIZEDEK, SHALEM.

Sa'lim (sāl'im) [perhaps, Aram. sh'elim, completed]. A place near which were the waters of Aenon (John 3:23); see AENON.

Sa'l'a-i (sāl'ā-i) [cf. Arab. sala'a, to pay promptly; but in S. Arab., to consecrate, offer]. 1. A chief of a family of Benjamites who resided at Jerusalem (Neh. 11:8).

2. A father's house among the priests after the Captivity (Neh. 12:20); see SALLU 2.

Sa'lu (sāl'ū) [cf. Sallai]. 1. A Benjamite, a son of Meshullam and a chief of a family resident at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:7; Neh. 11:7).

2. A chief of the priests who came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:7). In the next generation a father's house, which occupies the same position in the corresponding catalogue, bore the name Sallai (v. 20). One of the 2 names has probably been misread, the difference being merely that between a yodh (jod) and a vaw (vav), q.v.

Sa'l'ma (sāl'mā). See SALMON.

Sa'l'mai (sāl'mī), in A.V. Shal'mai, in R.V. of Ezra 2:46 Sham'lai (shām'lī); the forms being confused in the Heb. text itself. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:48).

Sa'l'mon (sāl'mōn) or Sa'l'mah (sāl'mā) or Sa'l'ma. Father of Boaz. He was a man of Judah, descended through Perez, Hezron, and Ram (Ruth 4:18-21; Matt. 1:4; Luke 3:32).

In the Hebrew text of Ruth 4:20, not 21, the form Salmah is used, of which Salma is the later orthography (I Chron. 2:11). He has sometimes been thought to have been the ancestor of the inhabitants of Bethlehem, mentioned in I Chron. 2:51, 54. But the genealogy of Salma, ancestor of the Bethlehemites, is traced back by the line of Caleb, not of Ram. The different lineage probably indicates a different person; though, of course, genealogies may intertwine. For Salmon of Ps. 68:14, see ZALMON.

Sa'l'mo'ne (sāl-mō'nē). A promontory, constituting the e. extremity of Crete (Acts 27:7). It is now known as Cape Sidero.

Sa'lom (sāl'ōm). See SALU.

Sa'l'o'me (sā-lō'mē) [fem. of Solomon]. 1. The wife of Zebedee, and the mother of James and John (cf. Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40; 16:1). She was one of the women who from a distance saw the crucifixion (Matt. 27:56), and who went to the sepulcher of our Lord on the resurrection morning with sweet spices to anoint his body (Mark 16:1).

2. The daughter of Herodias, who danced before Herod the tetrarch and received the head of John the Baptist (Matt. 14:3-11; Mark 6:17-28). For her name, see Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5, 4.

Salt. Salt of poor quality could be scraped up on the shore of the Dead Sea, when the salty water had evaporated, or be cut from the neighboring cliffs. It was used in Canaan and the adjacent regions as a condiment and preservative for animal food (Job 6:6; Eccles. 39:26). Under the Law, it was presented with offerings of all kinds (Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:24; Jos. Antiq. iii. 9, 1). Salt land is unfruitful (Job 39:6), and when a captured city was doomed to utter destruction the final step sometimes was to sow it with salt. Abimelech thus treated Shechem (Judg. 9:45). Salt preserves from corruption and renders food palatable, and is therefore used figuratively for the true disciples of Jesus, who by their precepts and example raise the moral tone of society (Matt. 5:13; Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34). Salt is also used for wholesome character and speech (Mark 9:50; Col. 4:6). The impure salt of Syria, when exposed to the rain and sun or stored in damp houses, is apt to lose its taste and become useless. It cannot be used like much other refuse as a fertilizer, for it is good for nothing (Matt. 5:13; Luke 14:35). During the convulsion in which the guilty cities of the Plain were destroyed, Lot's wife, lingering in the doomed region, perished, and was transformed into a pillar of salt (Gen. 19:26; Wisd. of Sol. 10:7; Jos. Antiq. i. 11, 4).

A covenant of salt was a covenant of permanent continuance and perpetual obligation (Lev. 2:13; Num. 18:19; II Chron. 13:5).

Salt, Cit'y of. A city in the wilderness of Judah. It is mentioned along with Eng-edai on the shore of the Dead Sea, from which, presumably, it was not far distant (Josh. 15:62).

Salt, Valley of. A valley in which the army of David slew 18,000 men of Aram (II Sam. 8:13) or rather Edom (II Sam. 8:14; I Chron. 18:12; cf. I Kings 11:15-17; Psalm 60, title); see DALETH. Amaziah, king of Judah, slew 10,000 Edomites in the Valley of Salt, and then took their capital, Sela (II Kings 14:7; II Chron. 25:11). The site of the Valley of Salt was formerly placed at the s. end of the Dead Sea, where there is a range of hills 5 miles in length, consisting of layers of salt, and between this chain and the sea is a valley 6 or 8 miles long. East of Beer-sheba, however, there is Wadi el-Mih (salt), which flows by the foot of Tell el-Milh, and this seems to be the scene of the defeat of the Edomites.

Salt Sea. The name given in the O.T. to what is now generally called the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:3; Num. 34:3, 12; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 15:2, 5). See DEAD SEA.

Salt'wort'. The rendering of Heb. mallūah, saline plant (Job 30:4; in A.V. mallows). It was used as food by the very poor. Two genera of plants are commonly so designated, Salicornia and Salsola, but neither is suitable for food. The plant intended is probably some other chenopod, as spinach or, better, sea purslane (Atriplex halimus). This latter is a bush. It grows abundantly in salt marshes along the Mediterranean and on the shores of the Dead Sea. Its small, thick, sour leaves would, in extreme need, furnish a miserable food.

Sal'u (sālū) [passive participle of root sala'a; see SALLAI]. A Simeonite, father of Zimri whom Phinehas slew (Num. 25:14; in A.V. of I Macc. 2:26 Salom).

Sal'u-ta'tion. Among the Hebrews salutation on meeting consisted in the expression of good wishes or a solemn blessing. The forms most prevalent were: 1. "Blessed be thou of the Lord," or "God be gracious unto thee," or the equivalent (Gen. 43:29; Ruth 3:10; I Sam. 15:13). 2. "The Lord be with thee," to which the rejoinder was, "The Lord bless thee" (Ruth 2:4). 3. "Peace be unto thee," or "Peace be upon thee," peace meaning welfare (Luke 24:36). This was the most common salutation, and is still in use among the Jews. The reply is, "Upon thee be peace." If the occasion made the words appropriate, the form was: "Peace be unto thee, and peace be to thy house" (cf. I Sam. 25:6; Luke 10:5). 4. "Hail" a common salutation in the Greek period (Matt. 26:49; 27:29; 28:9; Luke 1:28). 5. "Let the king live for ever" was the salutation addressed by a subject to the Hebrew monarch (cf. I Kings 1:31), and was employed in the Babylonian and Persian courts (Neh. 2:3; Dan. 2:4; 5:10; 6:6, 21).

At parting a blessing was invoked (Gen. 24:60; 28:1; 47:10; Josh. 22:6), which eventually assumed the conventional form, "Go in peace," or "Farewell" (I Sam. 1:17; 20:42; II Sam. 15:9; Mark 5:34; Acts 16:36); and the rejoinder to a superior might be, "Let thy handmaid find favor in thy sight" (I Sam. 1:18).

Abraham and Lot rose up to meet passing strangers, bowed before them to the earth, and pressed hospitality upon them (Gen. 18:2; 19:1); Boaz exchanged greeting with his reapers (Ruth 2:4); travelers on the road saluted workmen in the field (Ps. 129:8). The salutation was often withheld from men of a different religion (Matt. 5:47); and rightly so, when it was apt to lead to fellowship and to imply a wish for the success of a bad cause (II John 11). Messengers might be charged to salute no man by the way (II Kings 4:29; Luke 10:4), for the formality incident to offering a greeting and receiving a response involved delay. The bow was not a mere nod, but profound obeisance or prostration; and in deferential greetings, a rider dismounted from his beast or left his chariot (I Sam. 25:23; II Kings 5:21).

Letters in Palestine, before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews, and in Egypt, always began with salutations. The greetings are all framed on the same model. A son begins a letter to his father thus: "To Dūdu, my lord, my father, thus speaketh Aziri thy son, thy servant. At the feet of my father I prostrate myself. Upon my father be peace [welfare]." A subject addresses his liege, the king of Egypt, after this manner: "To the king my lord, my gods, my sun, thus speaketh Yapaḥi thy servant, the dust of thy two feet. At the feet of the king my lord, my gods, my sun, seven times and seven times I prostrate myself." The governor of a district writes to his equals: "To the kings of Canaan, servants, my brothers, thus the king." And Pharaoh begins a letter to a Kassite monarch with the words: "To Kadashman-Enlil, king of Karduniash [Babylonian], my brother, thus saith Nibmuraia [Amenhotep III] the great king, king of Egypt, thy brother. To me is peace [welfare]. May peace [welfare] be to thee! To thy house, thy wives, thy children, thy chief men, thy horses, thy chariots, in the midst of thy lands, may it be very well!"

The usual epistolary salutation in the Greco-Roman period in Palestine was briefer, more direct, more businesslike, and in it the name of the writer commonly stands first. "King Alexander to his brother Jonathan, greeting" (I Macc. 10:18). "King Demetrius unto the nation of the Jews, greeting" (I Macc. 10:25; and so Acts 15:23; 23:26; James 1:1). The letter was frequently concluded with a salutation, derived from Latin usage, "Fare ye well" (Acts 15:29). To the brief salutation after the Latin manner, the Hebrews, following their own customs, often added a prayer for peace (II Macc. 1:1). Their salutation also was often elaborate (vs. 1-5), and the old order was frequently observed (ch. 9:19, 20). The salutations with which Paul begins his letters are equally manifold (Rom. 1:1-7). In the epistles to Timothy he wishes his true child in the faith, grace, mercy, and peace; but his usual greeting is, "Grace to you and peace," and he was apt to close his letters with salutations from himself and others (I Thess. 1:1; 5:26-28, his first letter).

Sa'mar'ia (sā-mār'ī-ā) [Lat. Samaria from Gr. Samar(e)ia, from Aram. Shāmrayin; for Heb. see below]. 1. The capital of the 10 tribes during the longest period of their history; the site had been occupied in the early Bronze period. The city was built or commenced by Omri, king of Israel, on a hill purchased for 2 talents of silver, which may be the equivalent of about $3,900. The former owner's name was Shemer; and since it expressed the idea of watching, guarding, keeping, it suggested an appropriate designation for a city on a hill. Accordingly Omri called the city Shōmērōn, place of watch (I Kings 16:24); it was actually protected by a strong watchtower on the s.w. The eminence which the city crowned was sometimes denominated the mountain of Samaria (Amos 4:1; 6:1). It stood in the midst of a fertile valley (Isa. 28:1). The site was so well chosen that the city continued to be the capital of the Northern Kingdom to the captivity of the 10 tribes, the successive sovereigns reigning, and at their death being buried, there (I Kings 16:28, 29; 20:43; 22:10, 37, 51; etc.). Scarcely was Samaria built before hostilities arose between Ben-hadad I, king of Syria, and Omri. The former, if his son spoke the truth, had the advantage, and, to please the victor, Omri had to make streets in Samaria for Syrian merchants (I Kings 20:34). During the reign of Ahab, Omri's son and successor, the city, which was surrounded by a wall, was unsuccessfully besieged by Ben-hadad II (vs. 1-21). On the n. was a pool or reservoir which was cut in the rock and cemented; at the side of it the royal attendants washed the blood-stained chariot in which Ahab's body was brought home from Ramoth-gilead (I Kings 22:38). The excavation of Ahab's palace has revealed furnishings with ivory inlay (cf. v.

Sebastiyeh, the Site of Ancient Samaria

39); in an adjacent building were found a number of ostraca inscribed in Hebrew. It was probably in the days of Joram when the capital was unsuccessfully besieged by Benhadad II (II Kings 6:8 to 7:20). The elders of Samaria, afraid of displeasing Jehu, obeyed his order to murder Ahab's 70 sons (ch. 10:1-10).

From the very beginning Samaria had been a city notorious for its idolatry. Ahab had led the way in this heathen worship by rearing a temple and an altar to Baal (I Kings 16:32); and since in his reign reference is made to 400 prophets of the Asherah who ate at Jezebel's table (ch. 18:19), it is probable that the idol so named remained till Jehu's reign (II Kings 13:6). Attendant on this idolatry was great corruption of morals (Hos. 7:1-8; Amos 4:1; 8:14). Against these idolatrous practices Elijah worked (I Kings, ch. 18). Elisha made the city his headquarters (II Kings 5:3-9; 6:32); and doubtless Hosea labored there. Samaria and the kingdom were threatened with judgment by many prophets (Isa. 7:9; 8:4; Jer. 31:5; Ezek. 16:46, 51, 53, 55, 23:23; Hos. 8:2, 9:1, 11:11; Amos 3:12; Micah 1:5-9).

At length the disaster came upon the city. The siege was begun by the Assyrians under Shalmaneser, 724 B.C., and in 722, or early in 721, the city was captured by the king of Assyria (II Kings 17:3-6). The glory of the capture is claimed by Sargon, Shalmaneser's successor, who in that year ascended the throne; see SARGON. The conquerors reseeded the town with foreigners (v. 24); see SAMARITAN. In 332 or 331 B.C. Alexander the Great took Samaria and transferred its inhabitants to Shechem, placing Syro-Macedonians in their place. About the year 108 B.C. Samaria was besieged by John Hyrcanus, who drew around it a wall of circumvallation 80 stades, or about 9 miles, in extent. The city held out for a year but was ultimately forced by famine to surrender. The victor demolished it, attempting to efface all proofs that a fortified city had ever stood on the hill (cf. Micah 1:6; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 10, 2 and 3; War i. 2, 7 and 8). It was again inhabited in the time of Alexander Jannaeus. Pompey annexed it to the province of Syria. Gabinius fortified it anew (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 4; 5, 3). It was rebuilt and refortified by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, a Gr. fem. of Sebastos, the Gr. for Lat. Augustus, the title of his patron, the first Roman emperor (Jos. Antiq. xv. 8, 5). The evangelist Philip labored there with success; among others Simon Magus believed and was baptized (Acts 8:5-13). To carry on this work Peter and John were sent from Jerusalem (vs. 14-25). The site of Samaria is the hill, 5½ miles n.w. of Shechem, on which the village of Sebastiyeh stands. The sides are steep, the summit a tableland about a mile from e. to w.

2. The territory occupied by the 10 tribes, or the Kingdom of Israel personified (I Kings 21:1; II Kings 17:24; Isa. 7:9; Jer. 31:5; Ezek. 16:46). See ISRAEL.

3. The district of Samaria, occupying central Palestine, between Galilee on the n. and Judea on the s. (I Macc. 10:30). Josephus' description of its limits (Jos. War iii. 3, 4, and 5) is not very intelligible, but he makes it plain that the n. limit passed through "a village that is in the great plain called Ginea." This is apparently Eng-gannim (Josh. 19:21; 21:29), at the s. angle of the Plain of Esdraelon. The s. limit was the toparchy Acrabattene, some 6 or 7 miles s. of Shechem. Samaria extended to the Jordan on the e., but did not reach the Mediterranean on the w. Acco belonged to Judea. The Talmud makes Antipatris the w. limit. It comprehended the old territories of Manasseh w. of the Jordan, and of Ephraim, with a portion of Issachar and Benjamin. Pompey, in 63 B.C., attached it to the province of Syria (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 4). In A.D. 6 the emperor Augustus erected Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea into a division of the prefecture of Syria, called the province of Judea, and placed it under procurators (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 13, 5; cf. 11, 4), and this arrangement obtained in the time of our Lord.

Sa-mar'i-tan (sā-mār'i-tān). In the only passage in which the word is found in the O.T. (II Kings 17:29) it means an individual belonging to the old kingdom of Northern Israel. In later Hebrew literature it signifies an inhabitant of the district of Samaria in central Palestine (Luke 17:11). When Sargon captured Samaria (722/1 B.C.), he carried into captivity, by his own account, 27,280 people. That he left many Israelites in the land is evident. Finding that the remaining Israelites were rebellious, he began a systematic course for their denationalization. He introduced colonists from Babylonia and Hamath (II Kings 17:24) and Arabia, who continued to practice idolatry in their new home. The population of the country had been thinned, and the cultivation of the soil interrupted, by these wars, so that opportunity was afforded for wild beasts to multiply, which God used as a scourge. Lions killed some of the idolaters. The newcomers concluded that they did not understand how to worship the particular god of the country, and they informed the king of Assyria. He sent them a priest from among the captive Israelites, who took up his residence at Beth-el and began to instruct the people regarding Jehovah. He was unable to persuade them to abandon their ancestral idolatry. They erected images of their gods on the high places of the Israelites, and combined their idolatries with the worship of Jehovah (II Kings 17:25-33). This dual worship they kept up until after the fall of Jerusalem (vs. 34-41). Esarhaddon continued the policy of his grandfather, Sargon (Ezra 4:2), and finally Asnapper (Osnapper), probably Ashurbanipal, completed the work by adding to the population people from Elam and elsewhere (vs. 9, 10).

The new province of the Assyrian empire was weak, and Josiah or his agents traversed its whole extent, everywhere destroying the high places with which it abounded (II Chron. 34:6, 7). The idols were still on these high places, but it is probable that idolatry was decreasing under the influence of the Israelites who remained in the land and through the teaching of the priests. And this act of Josiah's was another blow to it. Several decades later some among the Samaritans were in the habit of visiting the Temple at Jerusalem for worship (Jer. 41:5). When Zerubbabel led back his band of exiles from Babylonia to Jerusalem, the Samaritans asked permission to participate in the erection of the Temple on the ground that they had worshiped the God of Israel ever since the time of Esarhaddon (Ezra 4:2).

There was early a repugnance on the part of most of the Jews to social and religious association with the Samaritans, and this feeling developed into intense antipathy as years rolled on (Ezra 4:3; Eccles. 50:25, 26; Luke 9:52, 53; John 4:9). The Samaritans were neither of pure Hebrew blood nor of uncontaminated worship. Josephus (Antiq. ix. 14, 3) says that when the Jews were in prosperity, the Samaritans claimed that they were allied to them in blood; but when they saw them in adversity, they declared that they had no relationship to them, but were descended from the Assyrian immigrants. When the offer of the Samaritans to assist in rebuilding the Temple was rejected by Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and their associates, the Samaritans made no further efforts at conciliation but did their best with other adversaries to prevent the completion of the work (Ezra 4:1-10); they also opposed the rebuilding later on of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. 4:1-23). Their leader on the latter occasion was Sanballat, the Horonite. It was he whose son-in-law was put out of the priesthood by Nehemiah; and the father-in-law probably founded the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim; see SANBALLAT. Henceforward fugitives from discipline at Jerusalem were accustomed to go to the rival edifice on Mount Gerizim where they were sure of obtaining a warm welcome (Jos. Antiq. xi. 3, 7). During the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes they declared that they were not of the same race as the Jews, and gratified the tyrant by expressing a desire that their temple on Mount Gerizim might in future be dedicated to Jupiter, the defender of strangers (II Macc. 6:2). About 128 B.C. John Hyrcanus took Shechem and Gerizim, destroying the Samaritan temple (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1); but the worshipers continued to offer their adorations on the summit of the hill where the sacred edifice had stood. They did so when our Lord was on earth (John 4:20, 21).

In the time of Christ their theological tenets did not essentially differ from those of the Jews, and especially of the Sadducean sect. They shared with them the expectation of a coming Messiah (John 4:25). They, however, accepted no more of the O.T. than the Pentateuch. The main cause for the Samaritans' receiving the gospel so gladly when Philip preached to them was the miracles which he wrought (Acts 8:5, 6); but another undoubtedly was that, unlike Judaism, Christianity followed the example and teaching of its founder and admitted Samaritans within its pale and to the same privileges as those possessed by the Jewish converts (Luke 10:29-37; 17:16-18; John 4:1-42). A small community of Samaritans still exists at and around Nablus, the ancient Shechem.

Sa'mar'i-tan Pen'ta-teuch (sá-mär'i-tán pën'tá-tük). The Samaritans possessed the Pentateuch in Hebrew. It was quoted by Jerome, Eusebius, and other Christian fathers. In A.D. 1616 Pietro della Valle purchased a copy from the Samaritans of Damascus, which was placed in 1623 in the library of the Oratory in Paris. By the end of the 18th century 15 other copies, more or less complete, had reached Europe, and the number has since been increased. Morinus, who published the Samaritan Pentateuch in 1632, considered the Samaritan text vastly superior to that of the Masoretes. Controversy on the subject went on, with occasional intervals, for nearly 2 centuries, till, in 1815, the great Hebrew scholar Gesenius, who had made a very careful examination of the Samaritan text, considered it to be far inferior to that of the Hebrew Masoretes, and of small critical value. Most of the Samaritan rolls, containing the whole or a part of the Pentateuch, are supposed not to be older than the 10th century of the Christian era, though there is 1 whose oldest portions claim A.D. 656 as the date. The Samaritan community at Nablus possesses a MS. said to have been copied in the 13th year after the Conquest of Canaan, but scholars consider the hand of a 13th century type. The several rolls are in the Samaritan character, that on the Maccabaeans coins, which was also that of the Hebrews before they introduced the present square letters.

The Samaritan text in about 6,000 places differs from the Hebrew text of the Masoretes. In Deut. 27:4, 8, we read that Moses directed the people when they passed the Jordan to set up certain stones in Mount Ebal, plaster them, and write on them the Law. Here the Samaritans have substituted Gerizim for Ebal, to increase the veneration for their sacred mountain. There are various other less important variations; see CHRONOLOGY. Most of them are manifestly due to the haste of the scribes or to alterations which they deliberately made. In about 1,900 places the text agrees with that of the LXX against the Hebrew readings, which indicates that the Greek translators used a Hebrew text much like that possessed by the Samaritans; but the great majority of these are of trifling consequence. Yet where it agrees with the LXX, we have one tradition of the Hebrew text preserved. Probably the Samaritan Pentateuch goes back to the time when Manasseh, the grandson of Eliashib the high priest and son-in-law of Sanballat, was expelled from Jerusalem (Neh. 13:23-30; Jos. Antiq. xi. 7-8). He took refuge with the Samaritans, and a rival temple was built upon Mount Gerizim. If the Pentateuch was canonized c. 400 B.C., the Samaritan Pentateuch was no longer influenced by that of the Jews after that date. Apparently the rift between the Jews and Samaritans occurred before the canonization of the Prophets.

The Samaritan Pentateuch must not be confounded with the Samaritan version of the Pentateuch made into the dialect of the Samaritans early in the Christian era. They possess an Arabic translation also, made in the 11th or 12th century, a book of Joshua, founded on the canonical book of the same name and written about the 13th century A.D., and some other literature.

Sa'mekh (säm'mëk), in A.V. Sa'mech (sä'mëk). The 15th letter of the Heb. alphabet. It is represented by s in Anglicizing Hebrew names which contain it, as Joseph. It heads the 15th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Sam'gar-ne'bo (säm'gär-në'bō) [perhaps Akkad. Shumgir-Nabū, be gracious, Nebo]. One of Nebuchadnezzar's princes who entered Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3).

Sam'lah (säm'lá) [a garment]. A king of the Edomites, a native of Masrekah (Gen. 36:36, 37).

Sa'mos (säm'mōs) [Gr., a height by the sea-shore]. An island about 80 miles in circumference off the coast of Asia Minor, s. by w. of Ephesus, and nearly opposite to the promontory of Trogyllum. After the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans at Magnesia, in 190 B.C., it was independent (I Macc. 15:23); but it was under the influence of Pergamos, and along with Pergamos it passed into the hands of the Romans in 133 B.C. At the time Paul reached it (Acts 20:15), it still enjoyed the autonomy conferred upon it by the Romans in 17 B.C. Its inhabitants were noted for commercial enterprise.

Sam'o-thrace (säm'ō-thrās), in A.V. Sam'o-thra'cia (säm'ō-thrā'shī-á) [Gr., Samos of Thrace]. An island in the archipelago off the coast of Thrace and opposite the mouth of the Hebrus. It has an area of about 30 square miles, and has in it a mountain 5,000 feet high. Paul's vessel made a straight course to the island from Troas, in Asia Minor (Acts 16:11).

Sam'p-sames (sämp'sá-mëz). A country, rather than a king, which was friendly to Rome (I Macc. 15:23). Not identified.

Sam'son (säm's'n) [little sun, solar]. One of the most eminent of the Hebrew Judges. He was the son of a Danite called Manoah, was born at Zorah, within the limits of the s. territory of Dan, and had his birth and his subsequent career announced beforehand to his parents by the angel of the Lord. He was a Nazirite from his birth, no razor coming upon his head, and no wine or strong drink entering into his mouth. As long as he submitted to these restrictions he was capable of heroic achievements against the Philistines (Judg. 13:1-24). Circumstances conspired at this time to separate Judah and Dan from the rest of the Hebrews and to compel these 2 tribes to act alone. They were at the mercy of the Philistines, who had promptly embraced the opportunity to oppress them. Isolated, Judah was able to do little more than harass the oppressors by bold deeds and stratagems. The Spirit of the Lord early moved Samson to commence his lifework in the camp of Dan (Judg. 13:25); but almost from the outset he showed one conspicuous weakness in his character: he was the slave of passion. He was betrothed to a Philistine woman, a native of Timnath; but she married another man, and in revenge Samson, aided perhaps by his friends, caught 300 jackals or foxes, tied them together in pairs by the tails, with a burning torch between, and turned them loose amidst the ripened grain of the Philistines (chs. 14:1 to 15:5). The Philistines invaded Judah and demanded that Samson be delivered unto them. He permitted his craven countrymen to bind him in whom they failed to perceive their deliverer. But when he was about to be surrendered to the uncircumcised Philistines, the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him and he snapped the ropes asunder. The Philistines, amazed at his display of strength, feared him. He seized the jawbone of an ass and, as the Philistines turned to flee, pursued them and slew a thousand men (in round numbers). They fell in several heaps. Samson acknowledged that the work was of God and confessed his own need of help lest he die of thirst. God in his providence caused a spring to give forth its water. The men of Judah now recognized Samson as their deliverer (ch. 15:6-20).

Afterward Samson fearlessly went to Gaza, and there he fell into sin. The Gazites thought that their opportunity had come to seize him, but at midnight he came to the gate and, finding it closed, laid hold of its doors and the two posts, and plucked them up, bar and all, and carried them to the top of a hill in the direction of Hebron. An entanglement with the woman Delilah, from the valley of Sorek, caused his ruin. By direction of her countrymen, she importuned him to tell her in what his great strength lay. At first he gave her deceitful answers, but at last he revealed the secret. If his head were shaved, he would become weak as another man. The Philistines at once shaved his head and found that his strength had departed. They therefore put out his eyes and made him grind in the prison house at Gaza. They brought him out to exhibit him to the people on occasion of a great festival and public sacrifice to their god Dagon. His hair had by this time begun again to grow, and he was again fulfilling his Nazirite vow. The great temple was full of people, and some 3,000 more were on the roof. Samson knew the structure of the building, for he had been in Gaza before when he possessed his sight. He asked the lad who attended him to let him rest himself against the 2 middle pillars on which the roof was supported, and grasping them he prayed to God for one more manifestation of favor and the gift of strength that he might be avenged on the Philistines. He then tore the pillars from their position, brought down the roof, and perished with a multitude of his foes (ch. 16:1-31). Notwithstanding the defects in his character, the N.T. names him with those Hebrew heroes whose animating principle was faith (Heb. 11:32).

Samson had the strength of a man in a preternatural degree. When the Spirit of the Lord impelled him from time to time, he accomplished his great deeds. His strength did not reside in his long hair. His unshorn locks were the external evidence of his relation to God, a public profession that he was acting as the servant of the Lord. When he informed Delilah that he was a Nazirite and allowed her to take advantage of him and to have his hair cut, he broke his vow, and it is significantly said that the Lord abandoned him. His marvelous strength failed when God left him, and it returned when God granted his prayer. His preternatural strength was a sign, testifying to the men of Judah that this Nazirite was indeed called of God to deliver them from their enemies, and bearing witness among the Philistines to the superiority of the servant of Jehovah.

Various attempts have been made to group the deeds of Samson. Ewald, led by a favorite theory of his, thought he could discover a drama in 5 acts. In fact the narrative itself describes 5 groups of related deeds: 1. Those that resulted from his wooing of the woman of Timnath; namely, his rending the lion, slaughter of 30 Philistines at Ashkelon, release of the jackals bearing burning torches among the ripened grain of the Philistines, and a defeat of the Philistines who had burned the woman. 2. The events at the rock of Etam, when his fellow countrymen asked permission to deliver him into the hands of the Philistines, and he broke his bonds of rope in the presence of the uncircumcised, slew a thousand of their number with the jawbone of an ass, and by prayer obtained water to quench his thirst. 3. The visit to Gaza, when he carried off the doors of the city gate. 4. His passion for the Philistine woman Delilah, when he broke the 7 green withes wherewith she had bound him and then the 9 cords with which she next bound him, and tore away the web with which she had woven his locks. 5. A blind slave at Gaza, when he pulled down the pillars on which the roof of Dagon's temple rested. The particular achievements in the 5 groups are 12 as enumerated.

Samson's name may be interpreted as meaning solar or little sun, and a strenuous effort has been made by Roskoff, Steinthal, and others like-minded, to connect his achievements with the 12 labors of Hercules or with the Babylonian Gilgamesh or otherwise with the sun-god Shamash. Hercules wandered in search of adventures, slew a lion, slept, was sold as a slave, immolated himself voluntarily. Gilgamesh overcame the bull, rejected the advances of Ishtar, the goddess of love. Hercules is a sun myth. The story of Gilgamesh is the history of an ancient king of Erech embellished with legend and wrought out into an epic in 12 parts; see NIMROD. But with neither the sun-god nor the king of Erech is Samson to be identified; for: 1. The ancient Hebrews themselves assigned Samson to a time well within their historical period, in the generation before Samuel and Saul. 2. The Hebrew account of Samson states definitely the place of his birth and his deeds, and gives the location of his grave. 3. The enumeration of 12 labors is a matter of some importance to those who would identify Samson with Hercules or Gilgamesh, but in itself the number is not of consequence. And the number 12 is not so readily made out. The cry of Samson to God for drink can scarcely be called a labor of Samson's. The narrative speaks of other deeds of Samson which it does not specify (Judg. 13:25), showing that the narrator did not think of 12 achievements only. 4. While the strength which Samson exercised was the gift of God and was not inherent in him as a man, while it failed when he was left to himself, yet it was preternatural in the sense that what he accomplished by it might have been a work of nature but was not. There are parallels in the O.T. David without a weapon slew a lion and a bear; Jonathan and his armor-bearer, and Eleazar and Shammah and Abishai each singlehanded performed prodigies of valor equal to Samson's (I Sam. 14:1-17; II Sam. 23:9-12, 18).

Sam'u-el (sām'û-ēl), in A.V. once She'mu-el (shēm'û-ēl) (I Chron. 6:33) [name of God, or his name is El (God)]. The earliest of the great Hebrew prophets after Moses and the last of the Judges. His father, Elkanah, was a Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (see ELKANAH 4); he was a Zophite, because descended through Zophai or Zuph (I Sam. 1:1; I Chron. 6:26, 35); and he was a man of the hill country of Ephraim or an Ephraimite, because the family had been assigned residence in that tribe (Josh. 21:5; I Chron. 6:66). Elkanah lived in Ramah or, as it was called to distinguish it from other towns of the name, Ramathaim of the Zophites (I Sam. 1:1, 19; 2:11). He had 2 wives, Peninnah and Hannah. Hannah had no child and prayed earnestly to God that she might give birth to a boy, vowing that if her prayer were answered the infant should be devoted for life to Jehovah, apparently as a Nazirite, for she added, "There shall no razor come upon his head" (cf. Num. 6:1-5). Her petition was granted. She named the boy Samuel; and when he was weaned she brought him to the tabernacle at Shiloh, and put him in charge of the high priest, Eli, to train him for his sacred duties (I Sam. 1; 2:1-11).

While yet a child Samuel ministered before God, clad in the simple linen ephod which was worn by ordinary priests when engaged in the sanctuary and even by laymen (I Sam. 2:18). He lived at the tabernacle, sleeping in some chamber connected with it, opened the doors of the sanctuary in the morning, and otherwise assisted Eli in his ministrations (ch. 3:1, 3, 15). He had not advanced beyond early boyhood when Jehovah revealed to him the approaching doom of Eli's house for the foolish indulgence which the father had shown to his unworthy sons (ch. 3:1-18). Josephus says that Samuel was 12 years old at this time (Jos. Antiq. v. 10, 4). His statement is about right; but his authority for it is unknown. By the time that the child had reached manhood all Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, knew that he was established to be a prophet of the Lord, for the Lord revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh (I Sam. 3:20, 21). Soon afterward the judgment threatened against Eli and his house began by the death of Eli's 2 sons in battle, the capture of the Ark by the Philistines, and the death of Eli on hearing the fatal news (ch. 4:1-22). The Ark was soon restored to the Israelites; but it was kept in seclusion and placed for safe keeping with a proper guardian at Kiriath-jearim until the people should be spiritually prepared to receive it.

Samuel was an accredited prophet and, after the death of Eli, the chief religious authority in the land. He addressed himself to the work of reforming the people. Twenty years after the restoration of the Ark he found the moral condition of the nation improved, and he convoked an assembly at Mizpah, near the place where the Ark had been lost, to make confession of sin, to fast before the Lord, and to beseech a return of his favor. The Philistines gathered their forces to battle when they heard of this assembly; but Samuel exhorted the people to pray for deliverance, and he himself besought the Lord for Israel. A thunderstorm discomfited the Philistines, the Israelites discerned the hand of God, embraced the opportunity, pursued the enemy, and gained such a victory over the Philistines as deterred those pertinacious foes from again invading the land while Samuel was at the head of affairs (I Sam. 7:3-14); see PHILISTINES and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. This signal deliverance indicated that God had raised up Samuel to be judge, in the usual sense of defender and director. Like Deborah, and more fully like Moses, Samuel was accredited prophet and judge. In the discharge of his duties he went annually in circuit to Beth-el, Gilgal, and Mizpah; but his residence was at Ramah, where a company of prophets gathered about him to be at his service in the work of reform (chs. 7:15-17; 19:18-20). Here he built an altar to the Lord; for God had forsaken Shiloh, the Ark was in necessary seclusion, the covenant was in abeyance because the Israelites had broken it by their idolatries and sacrilege, and Samuel was Jehovah's representative; see ALTAR. During the years of Samuel's vigorous administration the land enjoyed freedom from foreign domination. When he was old he made his 2 sons judges at Beer-sheba. They proved themselves unworthy of their high trust, taking bribes and perverting justice. Their misconduct and the threatening attitude of the surrounding heathen nations produced the request on the part of the Israelite elders and people for the institution of kingly government; and Samuel was divinely commissioned to anoint first Saul, and, when he was rejected, David; see the detailed account in SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. Samuel died while David was a fugitive from Saul in the wilderness of En-gedi. He was buried in his house at Ramah, all Israel lamenting his loss (ch. 25:1). On the night before the battle of Gilboa, Saul desired the woman with the familiar spirit at En-dor to call up Samuel from Sheol (ch. 28:3-25); see SAUL 2. Heman, one of David's singers, was a grandson of Samuel (I Chron. 6:33, R.V.; cf. v. 28). Samuel is in the list of O.T. heroes whose animating principle was faith (Heb. 11:32).

Sam'u-el (sām'û-ēl), Books of. Two books of the O.T. They were originally one, as appears from the Masoretic note to I Sam. 28:24, which states that this verse is the middle of the book. They are treated as one by Josephus in his enumeration of the books of the O.T., and in Heb. MSS. The division was introduced into the Rabbinic Hebrew Bible printed by Bomberg at Venice, 1516-1517, and was derived from the LXX and Vulgate. Since Samuel is the leading person during the first half of the period covered, and since he was one of the greatest of the prophets that Israel ever had, the organizer of the kingdom, the agent in the selection of both Saul and David for the throne, and the coadjutor of Saul as long as the king remained faithful to his theocratic obligations, the book appropriately bears his name. Since it contains the history of the first 2 kings, it is divided in the LXX into 2 books, and called First and Second of Kingdoms; and the 2 books which continue the history, and are known in the Eng. version as First and Second Books of the Kings, are called Third and Fourth of Kingdoms in the LXX. Jerome substituted Book of Kings for Book of Kingdoms in his Lat. version.

The work is divisible into 3 sections: 1. Samuel, the prophet and judge (I Sam., chs. 1 to 7), including his birth and early life, the causes which led to his call to the prophetic office (ch. 3:20), and which left him as prophet in possession of the sole authority and opened the way for his judicial administration (ch. 4), his reformatory work, and the attestation of his right to the judgeship, which was afforded by the deliverance of Israel from Philistine oppression by his hand (ch. 7:1-12). Summary of his administration (vs. 13-17). 2. Saul the king (chs. 8 to 31), including (a) the popular demand for a king in Samuel's old age and Samuel's promise to accede to it (ch. 8), the interview between Samuel and Saul and the anointing of Saul in private (chs. 9:1 to 10:16), the public assembly called by Samuel at Mizpah, and the selection of Saul by lot (vs. 17-26), the dissatisfaction of a portion of the people (v. 27), the occasion which won the people for their divinely appointed king and his induction into office (ch. 11), Samuel's farewell address (ch. 12). (b) Revolt against the Philistines, and Saul's failure to observe his theocratic obligations (ch. 13), the feat of Jonathan, leading to the rout of the Philistines (ch. 14:1-46), summary of Saul's wars (vs. 47, 48), his family (vs. 49-51), the particulars of one of these wars, that with Amalek, in which Saul again and in aggravated manner shows his contempt for his theocratic obligations (ch. 15). Then follows (c) an account of the latter years of Saul's reign, with special reference to the relations between the king and David (chs. 16 to 31): Saul having been rejected by God, Samuel by divine direction anoints David (ch. 16:1-13), Saul troubled by an evil spirit summons David as harpist to his court (vs. 14-23), David slays Goliath and becomes a permanent attaché of Saul's court (chs. 17:1 to 18:5), jealousy of Saul and his attempts on David's life (chs. 18:6 to 19:17), flight of David from court and his wandering life (chs. 19:18 to 27:12), invasion of the Philistines and Saul's inquiry of the woman with the familiar spirit (ch. 28), David, expelled from the Philistine camp, pursues a marauding band of Amalekites (chs. 29; 30), battle of Gilboa and death of Saul (ch. 31). 3. David the king (II Sam., chs. 1 to 24). Announcement of Saul's death to David (ch. 1), contest for the throne between David, supported by the men of Judah, and Ish-bosheth as head of the other tribes (chs. 2 to 4), David made king by all Israel (ch. 5:1-3), his reign (chs. 5:4 to 24:25). See DAVID.

The double book of Samuel is placed among the Former Prophets in the Hebrew canon. The work owes its title to the fact that Samuel is the prominent figure both at its opening and for some time subsequently. Samuel wrote a book and laid it up before the Lord (I Sam. 10:25), and part of the double book may be derived from the History of Samuel the Seer (I Chron. 29:29); but scarcely half of the book could have come from his pen, for he died before the end of Saul's reign (I Sam. 25:1). It was written after David's death (cf. II Sam. 5:5). An allusion to the kings of Judah probably indicates that the book was not completed until after the division of the Israelites into the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (I Sam. 27:6), but the distinction between Israel and Judah existed in the time of David (I Sam. 11:8; 17:52; II Sam. 3:10; 24:1).

There were several documents relating to the period treated in the books, such as the History of Samuel the Seer, the History of Nathan the Prophet, and the History of Gad the Seer (I Chron. 29:29), but the author or redactor does not mention the sources whence he derived his information, as do the authors of Kings and Chronicles.

Critics generally have come to the conclusion that the books of Samuel comprise at least 2 principal sources, an early one and a late one. It appears that, speaking relatively, the latest passages are I Sam. 2:1-10, 12-36; 7:2 to 8:22; 10:17-27a; 11:14; chs. 12 and 15; II Sam., ch. 7. Most of these passages in their present form have some affinities in thought and expression with Deuteronomy, but less so than is the case in the books of Kings. They probably are pre-Deuteronomistic and are hardly later than c. 700 B.C. Driver supposes that I Sam., chs. 7; 8; and 12, may have been in parts expanded by a Deuteronomistic hand. The rest of the material in the books of Samuel is probably earlier than the passages quoted (i.e., it is from the early source), but apparently it is not throughout the work of one writer; the following passages especially seem to come from a different hand: I Sam., chs. 1 to 4:1a; 17:1 to 18:5; 19:18-24; 24; 26; II Sam. 5:17-25. One section of the early source (I Sam. 4:1b to 7:1) begins by continuing the history of the conflict with the Philistines as narrated in Judges, chs. 13 to 16. One section (II Sam., chs. 9 to 20) is nearly contemporary with the events recorded and clearly appears to be the work of one writer. Many parts of the preceding history of David (I Sam., ch. 15 to II Sam., ch. 5) form a continuous narrative and probably come from one writer, though it cannot be determined whether he is the same as the one who wrote II Sam., chs. 9 to 20.

Who the author of the early source is remains unknown, but some have conjectured Ahimaaz. Robert H. Pfeiffer, in writing of this early historian, says he "is the 'father of history' in a much truer sense than Herodotus half a millennium later. As far as we know, he created history as an art, as a recital of past events dominated by a great idea. . . . Without any previous models as guide, he wrote a masterpiece, unsurpassed in historicity, psychological insight, literary style, and dramatic power."

It has been suggested that the addition of the 2d or late document to the earlier work made it unnecessary for the Deuteronomists, who according to the critics edited the books from Genesis to Kings c. 550 B.C., to subject the books of Samuel to a thorough revision.

San-bal'lat (sän-bäl'ät) [Akkad., Sin (the moon-god) has given life]. An influential Samaritan (Neh. 2:10). He was a Horonite. This designation scarcely means a native of Horonaim in Moab, but rather describes him as a man of Beth-horon (cf. chs. 4:2; 6:2). He was opposed to the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah and tried, unsuccessfully, to stop it (ch. 4:7, 8). Next he plotted with others to invite Nehemiah to a conference and assassinate him (ch. 6:1-4). This new device failing, he tried intimidation, but in vain (vs. 5-14).

Sanballat the Horonite was a contemporary of the high priest Eliashib, great-grandfather of Jaddua; was associated with Tobiah the Ammonite; and opposed the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah in the 20th year of Artaxerxes (Neh. 3:1; 4:7). He was governor of Samaria shortly before 407 B.C., the 17th year of Darius Nothus (Elephantine papyri). A son of Joiada, who was the son of Eliashib the high priest, took Sanballat's daughter to wife, and for this offense was expelled by Nehemiah (ch. 13:4, 28). Josephus mentions one Sanballat, a Cuthean by birth, whom Darius, the last king (of Persia, 336/5-331 B.C.) sent to Samaria as governor, but who, on the defeat of Darius, went over to Alexander the Great, 331 B.C. His daughter Nicaso was taken to wife by Manasseh, brother of the high priest Jaddua. This foreign marriage offended the Jewish authorities, and they drove Manasseh from the altar at Jerusalem; but Sanballat, with the approbation of Alexander, built a temple on Mount Gerizim and made his son-in-law its priest (Jos. Antiq. xi. 7, 2; 8, 2 and 4). These statements of the Jewish historian do not accord with the facts of Sanballat's history already recited. The older commentators thought that Josephus speaks of a later Sanballat. Josephus, however, doubtless has in mind Sanballat the Horonite and the marriage referred to in Neh. 13:28; but he has probably lowered the date of Sanballat 100 years to conform the facts to his belief that the son-in-law of Sanballat not only founded or greatly promoted the Samaritan religion, but also built the temple on Gerizim, and that this temple was erected after Alexander's conquest of the country (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1), 200 years before 128 B.C. or thereabout, and that Alexander and the high priest Jaddua were contemporaries (Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 5). Josephus assigns a false date here; as he also does when he dates Nehemiah's commission in the 25th year of Xerxes, who reigned but 21 years (Jos. Antiq. xi. 5, 7), instead of in the 20th year of his successor, Artaxerxes (Neh. 2:1), and when he dates the arrival of Ezra in Jerusalem in the 7th year of Xerxes (Jos. Antiq. xi. 5, 2), instead of 21 years later, in the 7th year of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:1, 8), and when he confounds Onias I with Onias

III, who lived a century later (I Macc. 12:7, 20; Jos. Antiq. xii. 4, 10).

San'dal. See CLOTHING, SHOE.

San'he'drin (săn'hê-drîn) and San'he'drim (săn'hê-drîm) [Talmudic Heb., from Gr. synedrion, a council]. The name generally given by writers on Jewish antiquities and history to the highest Jewish assembly for government in the time of our Lord. The English version uses the more familiar word council; see COUNCIL 1.

San-san'nah (săn-săn'ă) [a palm branch]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:31); identified with Khirbet esh-Shamsāniyāt, between Khirbet er-Rās and Tātreit, about 10 miles n.n.e. of Beer-sheba.

Saph (săf) [a basin, threshold]. A Philistine giant, slain by Sibbeai in a battle at Gob (II Sam. 21:18). Called in I Chron. 20:4 Sippai.

Sa'phir (să'fēr). See SHAPHIR.

Sap-phi'ra (să-fî'ră) [Aram., beautiful]. The wife of that Ananias who was struck dead for having lied unto God. She shared her husband's sin and its penalty (Acts 5:1-10).

Sapphire. A precious stone, called in Heb. sappîr, in Gr. sappheiros. It was the middle gem in the 2d row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:18), and adorned the 2d foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19). The sapphire is 1 of the 3 varieties of corundum, the others being corundum proper and emery. It is of a bluish color, and transparent or translucent (cf. Ex. 24:10). It is inferior in hardness only to the diamond, and is still greatly prized. The ancients obtained it from India and Ethiopia. Fine specimens are brought from Ceylon.

Sar'ah (sâr'ă), in A.V. of N.T. twice Sar'a (sâr'ă) (Heb. 11:11; I Peter 3:6) [a princess]. 1. The wife of Abraham, 10 years his junior, married to him in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 11:29-31; 17:17). She was also his half sister, being the daughter of his father, but not of his mother (Gen. 20:12). Her name was originally Sarai. When Abraham departed from Haran to go to Canaan, Sarai was about 65 years old (ch. 12:4). Evidently she was a well-preserved woman, for she lived to be 127 years old; and shortly after leaving Haran, when about to enter Egypt, Abraham feared lest her beauty should attract the Egyptians and lead to his murder, and he represented that she was his sister, keeping back the fact that she was his wife (ch. 12:10-20). Years later he did so again at the court of Abimelech, king of Gerar (ch. 20:1-18). Why he did so is not stated, nor is it said that Abimelech was influenced by her beauty. The king of Gerar may have thought of the desirability of an alliance with the powerful Hebrew chieftain and, with this end in view, determined to take a woman of the immediate family of Abraham into his harem, as was frequently done by princes of that period when they concluded alliances. Sarai was childless; and when about 75 years old concluded that she was an obstacle to the promise made to Abraham of numerous posterity, and persuaded her husband to take Hagar, her handmaid, as secondary wife. He did so, and became the father of Ishmael (ch. 16:1-16). Afterward Sarai, when about 89, received a promise from God that she should herself bear a son, and in the course of a year gave birth to Isaac, the child of promise. It was when this promise was made to her that God changed her name to Sarah, meaning princess (chs. 17:15-22; 18:9-15; 21:1-5). When Isaac was weaned, his parents made a great feast, at which Sarah saw Ishmael, Hagar's son, mocking. She insisted that both mother and son should be sent away (ch. 21:9-21). Sarah died at Kiriath-arba (Hebron) at the age of 127 (ch. 23:1, 2), and was buried in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham purchased at that time for a family sepulcher.

2. For Sarah of Num. 26:46, A.V., a different word in Heb., see SERAH.

Sa'rai (să'ri). See SARAH 1.

Sar'a-mel (săr'ă-mêl). See ASARAMEL.

Sa'raph (săr'ăf) [burning; or, serpent]. A descendant of Shelah, the son of Judah. At one time he exercised dominion in Moab (I Chron. 4:22).

Sar'dine. See SARDIUS.

Sar'dis (săr'dîs). A city, first of the Maeonians and then of the Lydians, situated at the foot of Mount Tmolus, on the e. bank of the river Pactolus, in the midst of a fertile region, about 50 miles e. of Smyrna. The acropolis crowned a hill, 950 feet high, a spur of the mountain. The Lydian town lay at its foot on the w., between the acropolis and the river; but the Romans eventually built to the n. of the acropolis. In 546 B.C. Cyrus the Great took the city, which was the capital of Croesus, the rich Lydian king, and it became the seat of a Persian satrap. The Athenians burned it in 499 B.C., and thereby brought on the Persian invasions of Greece in the reigns of Darius and Xerxes. In 334 B.C. it surrendered to Alexander the Great, after his victory at the Granicus. In 214 B.C. it was taken by Antiochus the Great, but he lost it on being defeated by the Romans at Magnesia in 190 B.C. The Romans annexed it to the kingdom of Pergamos; but when in 129 B.C. they erected the province of Asia, Sardis fell within its bounds. In A.D. 17, when it was destroyed by an earthquake, the emperor Tiberius remitted the taxes of the citizens and rebuilt the city. Jews dwelt in the city (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 10, 24), and a Christian community early grew up there (Rev. 1:11; 3:1, 4). Sardis is a small village; but on the site of the Lydian town are the remains of a magnificent temple of Artemis, built in the 4th century B.C. to replace an older structure, and a temple of Zeus, said to stand above the foundations of Croesus' palace. Immediately outside the temple of Artemis, at the e. end, the walls of a Christian church are still standing, which were erected before the 4th century A.D.

Sar'dius, in A.V. of Rev. 4:3 Sar'dine. A variety of chalcedony, which the Greeks called sardios and sardion. It was a precious stone (Rev. 4:3), and constituted the 6th foundation of the wall about the New Jerusalem (ch. 21:20). Two sorts, distinguished by their color, were known by the name of sardius: the transparent red being our carnelian and the brownish red being the variety of carnelian to which we restrict the name sardius. According to Pliny, it was found near Sardis, whence it derived its name, but the finest qualities were brought from Babylon. The best carnelians now come from India; some also occur in Arabia, whence the ancient Hebrews may have obtained them.

In the O.T. sardius is the rendering of Heb. 'ôdem, reddish gem. It was the 1st stone in the 1st row on the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:17), and was 1 of the stones with which Tyre adorned itself (Ezek. 28:13). The marginal reading is ruby, but the LXX renders 'ôdem by sardion.

Sar'donyx. A variety of chalcedony, called by the Greeks sardonys. It forms the 5th foundation of the wall surrounding the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20). It is like the onyx in structure, but includes layers of carnelian along with others of white, whitish-brown, or sometimes of black. It was obtained chiefly in India and Arabia.

Sarep'ta (sà-rép'tá). See ZAREPHATH.

Sarg'on (sär'gōn) [Heb. for Akkad., the constituted king]. A king of Assyria, mentioned by name in Scripture in Isa. 20:1 only; he succeeded Shalmaneser V. He was perhaps of royal blood, as he claims; but it is believed that he usurped the throne, assuming the name of Sargon, an ancient and celebrated Akkadian king. He either secured the throne and then completed the siege of Samaria, which Shalmaneser had begun in 724 B.C., or else he ascended the throne immediately after the fall of Israel's capital and, perhaps as the general who had brought these military operations to a successful termination, claimed the capture as an act of his accession year. The Biblical record is not clear (II Kings 17:1-6). The Hebrew writer relates that Shalmaneser came against Hoshea, and proceeds by saying that "the king of Assyria found conspiracy in Hoshea" and cast him into prison, and that the king of Assyria besieged Samaria 3 years, and in the 9th year of Hoshea took the city. Until the claim of Sargon to have captured Samaria came to light, readers of the Hebrew narrative inferred that Shalmaneser was the conqueror of Samaria. But the inference was not warranted, for the writer continues to speak of the king of Assyria, where it is probable that he does not mean the conqueror of Samaria (II Kings 17:24, 26, 27). He does not specify the particular king, but uses the general title; and when he recurs to the siege, he names Shalmaneser as the besieger, but continues by saying, "They took it" (ch. 18: 9, 10). At any rate, Samaria fell in 722 or the early months of 721 B.C., and Sargon ascended the throne on the 12th of Tebet, the 10th month, of that year. Immediately after his accession the Babylonians, assisted by the Elamites, revolted and Sargon was for a time unable to reduce them to subjection. In 720 the remaining Israelites of Samaria in alliance with the men of Hamath rebelled, but Sargon subdued them, and placed captive Hamathites as colonists in Samaria. In the same year he defeated the allied forces of Hanunu, king of Gaza and Sib'e, better known to readers of the Bible as So, the tartan of Egypt, in a battle fought at Raphia. Sargon took Carchemish, the capital of the Hittites, in 717, and with the capture of their capital the empire of the Hittites fell. In 716 his armies waged war in Armenia, in 715 they were still engaged in war in Armenia, and were carrying on operations in Media. In this year also Arab tribes were planted as colonists in Samaria by Sargon's orders, and he received tribute from Pharaoh of Egypt. He boasted of having subjugated Judah. The tablet on which this boast appears was inscribed before the close of 714, to judge from its contents. The combined Assyrian and Hebrew data point to the end of 715 or the beginning of 714 as the date when Hezekiah acknowledged the suzerainty of Assyria by beginning to pay tribute. Merodach-baladan incited the nations from Elam to the Mediterranean Sea to revolt from Assyria. In 712, therefore, Sargon dispatched troops against Ashdod, and in 710 he captured Babylon and assumed the title of king of Babylon. He began to erect a new palace and town 10 miles n.e. of Nineveh in 712 and named it Dur-sharrukin (Sargonsburg). The ruins are known as Khorsabad; see NINEVEH. He was murdered in 705 and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib.

Sa'rid (sā'rid) [survivor]. A village on the s. frontier of Zebulun (Josh. 19:10, 12); Tell Shadūd in the n. part of the Plain of Esdraelon, 5 miles s.w. of Nazareth.

Sa'ron (sā'rōn). See SHARON.

Sar'se-chim (sär'sê-kim). One of Nebuchadnezzar's princes who entered Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3).

Sa'ruch (sā'rūk). See SERUG.

Sa'tan (sāt'ăn) [sātān, adversary]. The Devil (cf. Matt. 4:1 with vs. 10, 11; Mark 1:13); pre-eminent "the Adversary" (Job 1:6 marg.; Zech. 3:1 marg.), because animated by a disposition hostile to all goodness and the chief opponent of God and man (Job 2:3; Luke 22:3; cf. I Chron. 21:1 and Ps. 109:6, but see R.V.), aiming to undo the work of God (Mark 4:15), seeking to persuade men to sin, desirous of leading them to renounce God (Job 2:5; Matt. 4:9, 10), and endeavoring to prevent their acceptance and salvation by God (Zech. 3:1, 2). He is sometimes influential in bringing about pecuniary loss, physical sickness, bereavement (Job 1:10-22; 2:4-7; Luke 13:16). He is, however, under the control of God. Only by God's permission can he pursue his malicious designs (Job 1:12; 2:5, 6; Luke 22:31, 32). When permission is granted him to carry out his evil plots, it is only that he may become an instrument in furthering the divine plan. In Job's case, the vain efforts of Satan to induce the patriarch to sin resulted in disciplining Job's character and maturing his faith in God. In the fully revealed doctrine of Satan, which is seen in the N.T., he is the demon of this world who has access to the hearts of men, deceives them, and receives their witting or unwitting obedience (Acts 5:3; 26:18; II Cor. 4:4; II Thess. 2:9; Rev. 12:9). He is the ruler of a kingdom, having principalities, powers, and demons under him (Matt. 12:24, 26; Luke 11:18; Rev. 12:7).

Satan was the seducer of Adam and Eve (II Cor. 11:3; Rev. 12:9). This fact may have become known to them. If not, it was discerned as soon as the existence of the Devil and his work became known, for the temptation of Eve came from without through the persuasions of the serpent. The malignant spirit behind the serpent, hostile to good, seeking to undo the work of God, and supernaturally lending speech to the reptile, or communicating with the mind of the woman so that she thought she heard articulate speech, was evidently Satan. This doctrine went hand in hand with the doctrine concerning the Devil, and received the highest sanction (Wisd. of Sol. 2:24; John 8:44; Rom. 16:20); see SERPENT 1. Satan produced demoniacal possession (Matt. 12:22-29; Luke 11:14-23). He approached Jesus with temptation (Matt. 4:1-11). He steals the word from the heart of the ignorant or inattentive hearer (Mark 4:15). He entered into the heart of Judas before the commission of the great crime (John 13:27). He had to do with Peter's fall (Luke 22:31). It was under temptation by Satan that Ananias and Sapphira lied to the Holy Spirit (Acts 5:3). He hindered Paul in his ministry (I Thess. 2:18), having previously sent a messenger to buffet him (II Cor. 12:7). Pergamos, where a faithful Christian, Antipas, suffered martyrdom, was a place where Satan dwelt (Rev. 2:13). Men with hearts unchanged are under Satan's power (Acts 26:18). An assembly of those who have grievously erred from the faith, and perhaps from morality, is the synagogue of Satan (Rev. 2:9; 3:9; cf. I Tim. 5:14, 15). Those who are expelled from the Church are said to be delivered to Satan; but this is designed to produce their reformation and not their destruction (I Cor. 5:5; I Tim. 1:20). There are depths in Satan which inexperienced Christians fail to fathom (Rev. 2:24). He is, moreover, so plausible that he seems to be an angel of light (II Cor. 11:14). He sometimes gains advantages over Christians (II Cor. 2:11), but he shall ultimately be bruised under their feet (Rom. 16:20). He is the real agent in the operations carried on by the man of sin (II Thess. 2:1-12), but the day will come when, after a temporary triumph, Satan shall be expelled from the earth and, being bound, shall be cast into the abyss (Rev. 12:9; 20:1, 2). See DEVIL 2.

Simon Peter was called Satan when he took it upon himself to contradict Christ's prophecy of his death and resurrection, for he was a stumbling-block to Christ, opposed him, and minded not the things of God (Matt. 16:23; Mark 8:33).

Sa'trap [Gr. from Old Pers. xshathra-pāvan, protector of the land]. The official title of the viceroy who, in behalf of the Persian monarch, exercised the civil and military authority in several small provinces combined in one government. Each of these provinces had its own governor (Ezra 8:36; Esth. 3:12, in A.V. lieutenant). The title is used in Aramaic historical documents written after the Persian conquest, in referring to high officials of the Babylonian empire and of the kingdom ruled by Darius the Mede (Dan. 3:2; 6:1, in A.V. prince).

Satyr. A sylvan god of the Greeks and Romans, a companion of Bacchus. At first he was represented with long-pointed ears, snub nose, and goat's tail. At a later period goat's legs were added. He was supposed to possess a half brutal and lustful nature. In A.V. satyr is the rendering of Heb. šā'ir, and is applied to wild animals or demons which should dance among the ruins of Babylon (Isa. 13:21) and of the Edomite cities (ch. 34:14). The word commonly signifies a he-goat. In 2 passages it denotes an object of idolatrous worship (Lev. 17:7; II Chron. 11:15, both R.V.). In the latter place it is mentioned with calf idols, suggesting that it refers to idols having the likeness of goats. In Isa. 13:21, 22 it is associated with wild animals; in ch. 34:14 with a creature of the night also, which may be either some nocturnal animal (in A.V. the screech owl) or a nocturnal demon; see NIGHT MONSTER. In the adaptation of Isaiah's words in The Revelation, the language is quoted from the LXX and the word demons is used (Rev. 18:2, R.V.). Accordingly, interpreters dispute whether the Hebrew prophet meant that wild goats, ostriches, wolves, jackals, and other beasts of the desert should wander among the forsaken ruins, or whether he introduced into the imagery of his poetic description a popular belief in demons which appeared in the form of goats and haunted desert places.

Saul (sōl) [asked (of God); or lent (to God)]. 1. A king of Edom, from Rehoboth, on the Euphrates (Gen. 36:37, 38, in R.V. Shaul).

2. The first king of Israel, son of Kish, a Benjamite; see KISH 2. The Prophet Samuel had grown old; his sons showed by their conduct that they did not possess his upright character and could not carry on his work; and the surrounding nations were evidently ready to harass and oppress Israel (I Sam. 8:1, 3, 20; 12:12). The elders of Israel accordingly came to Samuel and demanded that the form of government be changed and that a visible king be set over them, so that they might be like the well-organized nations about them and have one who could lead them to victory over their foes (ch. 8:4, 5, 19, 20). Although the ultimate organization of the Hebrews as a kingdom, with an earthly monarch as the representative of Jehovah, had long been contemplated (Gen. 17:6, 16; 35:11; Deut. 17:14-20), yet the spirit of the people in demanding a king at this crisis was irreligious. They lacked abiding faith in God, without which the rule of Jehovah as theocratic king was impossible. They were turning from faith in the invisible God to put confidence in a visible king. By divine direction Samuel informed the elders what the people would have to endure from a king, but on their persisting in their demand, he promised to do as they desired and dismissed them.

The elevation of Saul to the throne. About this time the asses of Kish, a Benjamite, went astray, and his son, Saul, was sent to seek them. Saul was at the time a young man, perhaps 35 years old; and he was head and shoulders taller than any of the people. Not finding the asses after 3 days' search, he was about to give up the quest and return home. His servant, however, suggested one further effort. Persons of whom the servant made inquiry concerning the asses probably told him that there was a man of God in the neighboring city who might give the desired information, and he persuaded Saul to go to him. The man of God was Samuel, who had been told by God to expect a Benjamite and to anoint him prince over Israel. Saul and his family in Gibeah knew Samuel well by report (I Sam. 10:14-16), but Saul seems not to have met the prophet before and not to have understood that Samuel was the man of God of whom the people spoke. He refers to him as "the man" (ch. 9:7), and on meeting him at the city gate does not know him (vs. 18, 19). Samuel informed Saul that the asses had been recovered, intimated to him that he would be chosen king, and put him in the place of honor at the sacrificial feast which he was about to celebrate. Next morning, as the guest was leaving the town, the prophet took a vial of oil, poured it upon his head, and having kissed him, said, "Is it not that Jehovah hath anointed thee to be prince over his inheritance?" and charged him not to disclose the secret, to go to Gilgal at the proper time and tarry there 7 days, until he himself should come and offer sacrifice and give instruction (chs. 9:20 to 10:16). Samuel soon summoned the people to Mizpah. The choice was left to God. The lot was cast, and Saul was chosen. But he had hidden himself. When he was brought from his hiding place and stood forth, towering above the multitude, he was received with enthusiasm. God had selected a man of fine appearance in order to win the admiration and confidence of all the Israelites, and a man of the tribe of Benjamin, which stood on the border between Ephraim and Judah, in order to satisfy both n. and s. Samuel had committed the choice to God in order to secure the allegiance of the godly men for the king. A large company of men, obedient to God, escorted Saul home; but certain men of Belial were nevertheless dissatisfied, and Saul retired to private life until private jealousies should be overcome. He devoted himself to the cultivation of his father's fields. A month later (ch. 10:27, LXX) the town of Jabesh in Gilead was straitly besieged by the Ammonites. At the request of the citizens, the besiegers scornfully granted a truce of 7 days in order that the townspeople might invoke the aid of their fellow countrymen. The messengers, or some of them, came to Gibeah with their mournful story. Saul heard it when he returned from the field. The Spirit of God stirred him. He sent summons to the tribes to follow him and Samuel to the rescue of their imperiled brethren. Jabesh was relieved. The people asked where were they who had refused to recognize Saul as king, and they carried Saul to Gilgal, the nearest place of customary sacrifice, where he was inducted into office and Samuel laid down his judgeship (chs. 11:1 to 12:25); see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

The reign of Saul. The age of Saul when he began to reign is unknown, since the Heb. text of I Sam. 13:1 is defective, the numeral being omitted. The number 30 is derived from some LXX MSS. He was at any rate old enough to have a son capable of holding a military command. Saul established a small standing army of 3,000 men; 2,000 of these were with him at Michmash and Beth-el, and 1,000 were stationed with Jonathan at Gibeah (ch. 13:2). Jonathan smote a Philistine garrison, or rather deputy, at Geba (ch. 13:3); see GARRISON. The Philistines heard thereof and held the Israelites in abomination. The Israelites, learning of their danger, responded to Saul's summons to assemble at Gilgal (ch. 13:3, 4), whither Samuel had promised to come in this emergency and entreat the favor of the Lord (chs. 13:8, 11, 12; 10:8). A Philistine army advanced into the land of Israel and pitched at Michmash. Great fear seized the Israelites, Samuel intentionally delayed to appear, the people began to scatter and leave the king, and a descent of the Philistines upon Saul and his decreasing forces seemed imminent (ch. 13:8, 11, 12); and therefore Saul presumed to conduct the sacrifice. But Samuel came, rebuked the king for transgressing God's command, and declared that Saul on account of his disobedience should not found a dynasty (ch. 13:13, 14). Samuel went to Gibeah (v. 15). Saul and Jonathan took post at Geba of Benjamin, while the Philistines lay encamped at Michmash (v. 16). By a feat of valor, Jonathan started a panic in the garrison of the Philistines, which spread to their camp and to their prowling bands. Saul took advantage of it, and secured a victory (chs. 13:15 to 14:46). Afterward Samuel directed Saul to wage a war of extermination against the Amalekites. Saul undertook the war, but he spared the best of the cattle to sacrifice to the Lord at Gilgal, and also saved their king. For this 2d act of disobedience, by which he showed that he could not be trusted to act as God's instrument, but desired to assert his own will in God's kingdom, he was rejected from being king (ch. 15:1-35); see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. Samuel, therefore, was sent to Bethlehem to anoint David king (ch. 16:1-13).

The Spirit of the Lord now departed from Saul, and he began to be troubled by an evil spirit. A harper was required to charm away his melancholy madness, and David was selected to discharge the duty (I Sam. 16:14-23). The plaudits with which the youthful son of Jesse was welcomed on returning from his great victory over Goliath so excited Saul's jealousy that before long the hero was a fugitive, pursued with relentless fury by the now vindictive monarch (chs. 17 to 30); see DAVID. At last the end came. The Philistines, invading the Israelite territory, pitched in Shunem, near the valley of Jezreel. Saul, following to give them battle, established his headquarters on the slope of Mount Gilboa. Sad forebodings of his fate troubling him, he made a night journey quite close to the Philistine camp, to En-dor, where lived a woman who was reputed to have the power of calling up even the dead, and he was there informed that he and his sons should perish on the morrow (ch. 28:1-25). The morrow came, and the battle began. The Philistine archers slew many in the Israelite ranks. They slew 3 of Saul's sons, including the eldest, the unselfish and heroic Jonathan. They seriously wounded Saul himself, on which he called to his armor-bearer to thrust him through. The young man declined the responsibility, whereupon the erring monarch fell upon his sword and died. The victorious Philistines, finding his corpse, severed the head from the body and affixed the latter, with the bodies of his sons, to the wall of Beth-shean, whilst they sent his armor as a trophy to be kept in the temple of Ashtaroth. The men of Jabesh-gilead, whom Saul had saved in the early part of his reign, feeling gratitude for their deliverance, crossed the Jordan by night to Beth-shean, took down the bodies, and gave them honorable interment, while David mourned the fate of the Lord's anointed and the beloved Jonathan in plaintive poetry (I Sam., ch. 31; II Sam., ch. 1). The length of Saul's reign is not stated in the O.T., but both Paul and Josephus are able to assign it 40 years (Acts 13:21; Jos. Antiq. vi. 14, 9).

Saul and the woman of En-dor. The old man covered with a robe, who figures in the interview between the woman of En-dor and Saul (I Sam. 28:3-19), has been explained in 3 different ways. He was the woman's accomplice, and when he appeared she uttered a loud cry, and she pronounced the man who had come to seek her aid to be Saul. The loud cry was her customary trick. She knew that the king was in the neighborhood, and she had at once detected that her visitor was he, in his tall stature, in his bearing, in his words, and in the manner of his attendants. Or else the appearance was a spirit, quite unexpected by her, at which she uttered a loud cry because she was really startled. If an unexpected appearance, it was either the Devil, as Luther and Calvin believed, and as those understand who think that certain phenomena of ancient sorcery and modern spiritualism are due to Satanic agency (see DEVIL and DEMONIAC), or else Samuel, reappearing as did Moses and Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration, as do most of the evangelical interpreters since the Reformation. The basis for the opinion that Samuel appeared is that the narrator refers to the person as though he is Samuel (I Sam. 28:14, 15, 16, 20), and that the words spoken by him were fulfilled. The Biblical recorder simply describes what occurred. It is to be noted that the woman was a lawbreaker, and was also condemned by the religion of Jehovah. Moreover, she alone saw the apparition, and she described the appearance in most vague terms—an old man rising from the earth and covered with a robe. This description would apply to any aged person, but Saul concluded that Samuel had really appeared. The words which were uttered by the robed figure boldly forecast the future as a fortune teller does or else predicted it with full knowledge. The words came true, but they were in part fulfilled by Saul's own deliberate act. If Samuel himself appeared, then this is the sole instance recorded in Scripture where the spirit of a departed saint has returned to earth and conversed with men, since the case of Moses and Elijah in converse with the transfigured Christ is not analogous. Moreover, it would be strange, indeed, if, after God had refused to answer Saul, either by dreams or by prophets, his servant Samuel should appear, and especially if he should appear at an interview strictly forbidden by God and at the behest of a woman who was condemned alike by the law of the land and by the Law of God (Ex. 22:18; Lev. 20:27; Deut. 18:10-14; I Sam. 28:3, 9; I Chron. 10:13; Eccles. 46:20).

3. The original name of the Apostle Paul (Acts 7:58; 13:9).

Sav'io'ur. One who saves from any evil or danger (II Kings 13:5; Neh. 9:27). In the O.T. it is specially used of God, Jehovah, viewed as the deliverer of his chosen people Israel (II Sam. 22:3; Ps. 106:21; Isa. 43:3, 11; 45:15, 21; 49:26; 63:8; Jer. 14:8; Hos. 13:4). The Gr. word sōtēr (preserver, deliverer) is used by the classical writers specially of their gods, though sometimes a king assumed the title, as did Ptolemy Soter and Demetrius I. In the N.T. it is used of God the Father (I Tim. 1:1; 4:10; Titus 1:3; 3:4; Jude 25), but especially of Jesus Christ the Son, who saves his people from their sins (Matt. 1:21), delivering them out of their sinful condition and misery, from guilt, the wrath of God, the power of sin and the dominion of Satan, and bringing them into a state of salvation in blessed communion with God (Luke 19:10; Acts 5:31; Rom. 5:8-11; Phil. 3:20, 21; I Tim. 1:15; II Tim. 1:10; Titus 2:13, 14; Heb. 7:25).

Saw. A toothed tool for cutting wood and for shaping stone (I Kings 7:9; Isa. 10:15). Victims of persecuting rage were sometimes sawn asunder (Heb. 11:37). If David cut the Ammonites of Rabbah, and other towns which fell into his hands, with saws, harrows, and axes (II Sam. 12:31; I Chron. 20:3), it was an act of exceptional severity on his part and foreign to all else that is known of his character. A change of resh (r) to mem (m) in the verb used in Chronicles, and of resh (r) to daleth (d) in the verb in Samuel, would make the record state that David exacted labor from the captives (II Sam. 12:31, R.V. marg.).

The saws used by the ancient Egyptians had, so far as known, but 1 handle. The blade was usually of bronze, let into the handle or bound to it by thongs. The teeth commonly inclined toward the handle. The wood was placed perpendicularly in a frame and was sawed downward. The Assyrians used a double-handled saw also, with a blade of iron.

Scape'goat'. See AZAZEL.

Scar'let. A bright, rich crimson, not the hue of recent origin known as scarlet. The coloring matter was obtained by the Israelites from an insect (Coccus ilicis), called kirmiz by the Arabs, whence the Eng. word crimson is derived. The insect abounds in Palestine on the holm oak (Quercus coccifera). The female alone yields the coloring matter. She attains the form and size of an ordinary pea, is violet-black in color, covered with a whitish powder, and wingless. Filled with eggs containing red matter, she adheres to the leaves and twigs of the oak, and feeds on its juices. From the resemblance of the insect to a berry, the Greeks called it kokkos, berry. It is related to the cochineal insect of Mexico (Coccus cacti), but it yields a much less valuable dye and has been supplanted commercially by its Mexican congener. The color was called in Heb. shānī, "brightness," "crimson," shēnī tōlā'ath, "brightness of the worm," "worm crimson," tōlā'ath shānī, "worm of brightness," "crimson worm," tōlā', "worm," and in Gr. kokkinos, "pertaining to the coccus."

The color and the method of obtaining it were early known. It was much used in the hangings of the tabernacle and in the high priest's vestments. It was employed in the ceremony attending the purification of the leper, and in the preparation of the water of separation (Lev. 14:4; Num. 19:6; Heb. 9:19).

Scep'ter. A rod held in the hands of kings as a token of authority (Ps. 45:6; Amos 1:5; Wisd. of Sol. 10:14; Heb. 1:8). It has been used from time immemorial. The staff was not, however, a symbol of royal sovereignty exclusively. It might be carried by any leader (Judg. 5:14, R.V.; Baruch 6:14); among the Greeks by kings, judges, heralds, and speakers given the floor by the herald (Homer Iliad i. 238; ii. 100; vii. 277; xxiii. 568). Nor is the Heb. name shebēṭ a specific term, but it denotes any rod, such as the walking stick, which was often carried as a mark of dignity (Gen. 38:18), the shepherd's staff (Lev. 27:32; Ps. 23:4; Micah 7:14), or the rod used in threshing cummin (Isa. 28:27). The royal scepter was doubtless often of wood. The scepter of Ahasuerus was made of gold (Esth. 4:11). A reed was placed in Christ's hand when he was mocked as king (Matt. 27:29).

See'va (sē'vā). A certain Jew, belonging to a high-priestly family; his 7 sons were exorcists (Acts 19:14).

School. There were no schools for children in ancient Israel, but instruction was not lacking. Parents gave their children religious instruction (Gen. 18:19; Deut. 6:7; Susanna 3; II Tim. 3:15). The older people had opportunity for obtaining further knowledge from the priests and Levites, who could be found at the sanctuary and in the towns assigned to them throughout the land, and who occasionally itinerated for the purpose of publicly teaching the statutes of the Law (Lev. 10:11; II Chron. 17:7-9; Hag. 2:11). Every 7 years, at the feast of tabernacles, the Law was read publicly in the audience of assembled Israel (Deut. 31:10-13). The great festivals themselves, and songs written for the purpose (Deut. 31:19, 30; 32:1-43), kept alive the knowledge of those events at the birth of the nation which obligated the Israelites as a people to serve Jehovah, their redeemer and bountiful benefactor. The prophets by their public preaching spread religious knowledge and quickened religious life. Business negotiations and legal processes were conducted in the open street, affording constant instruction to the public through eye and ear. Reading and writing were perhaps not uncommon among the young (Judg. 8:14 marg.; Isa. 10:19).

In the Greco-Roman period the education of the young was carefully attended to (Jos. Apion i. 12; ii. 19). Elementary schools were established in connection with the synagogues, where the children were taught to read from the Scriptures, to write, and to cipher. About 75 B.C. attendance upon this primary instruction was made compulsory, and under Gamaliel the age for attendance was fixed at 6 years. Slaves and others were employed as tutors by the wealthy (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 8, 3). The scribes also imparted advanced instruction. The subject which they discussed was the Law. Chambers connected with the outer court of the Temple, and outside of Jerusalem a room in the synagogue, were used as lecture rooms (Luke 2:46). The instruction was nominally free, but it is said that in the time of Herod the Great the porter collected entrance money. Not only was instruction imparted directly to the pupils in these schools, but learned men held public disputations with each other there in the presence of the scholars.

School'mas'ter. The rendering in Gal. 3:24, 25, A.V., of Gr. paidagōgos (one who leads a boy, a pedagogue). It is translated "tutor" in the R.V. of this passage and I Cor. 4:15. The paidagōgos, or pedagogue, in a Greek household was a trusted slave, to whose care the children were committed (Jos. Life 76; Herod. viii. 75). He always accompanied them when they were out of doors. He was responsible for their personal safety, guarded them from physical evil and bad company, and led them to and from school. The Law as a pedagogue led us to Christ. It prepared us to receive him as our Redeemer. It displayed the justice of God and convinced us that we were unrighteous; its threatenings pressed us to seek refuge from the wrath and curse of God; it made apparent the inability of man to obtain salvation by the works of the Law; it exhibited the plan of salvation in types and ceremonies and excited to faith in the coming Redeemer (Gal. 3:24; Rom. 3:19-21; 4:15; 7:7-25).

Sci'ence. The rendering of Heb. maddā' and Gr. gnōsis in Dan. 1:4 and A.V. of I Tim. 6:20. The word is not used in its modern sense. It does not denote knowledge gained by observation of phenomena and systematized. The Heb. and Gr. words mean simply knowledge. The false knowledge spoken of by Paul is the teaching of Judaizing and mystic sects in the Apostolic Age, which they boastfully claimed to be certain (cf. Col. 2:8), against which Paul urgently warns men (I Cor. 8:1, 7), and which counterfeits the true knowledge which he praised and in which he desired Christians to grow (I Cor. 12:8; 13:2; Phil. 1:9).

Scor'pion. A small animal with a tail armed with a sting which inflicts great pain (Rev. 9:5, 10). It was called 'akrāb by the Hebrews, and skorpion by the Greeks. It abounds in Palestine, and is common in the wilderness s. of Judah (Deut. 8:15); see AKRABBIM. Rehoboam threatened to chastise his subjects, not with whips, but with scorpions (I Kings 12:11; II Chron. 10:14), which probably are whips armed with sharp points to make the lash more severe. The scorpion is a small invertebrate animal of the order Arachnida. It is closely akin to the higher spiders, having, like them, 8 legs; but it differs in shape, and in having the poison bag not in proximity to the jaws, but at the extremity of the tail. It has a pair of nippers like the lobster. The tail is long and jointed and capable of being curled up over the back. The last joint is swollen, contains the venom gland, and is armed with a perforated sting by means of which the poison is discharged. The scorpion feeds principally on beetles and locusts, which it seizes with its nippers and stings to death. Some 8 or more species exist in Palestine. The largest is about 8 inches long, and black.

Scourge and Scourg'ing. Scourging is severe punishment or torture by lashing. The Law authorized beating, when the culprit lay down and was smitten on the back (Deut. 25:2, 3). Scourging is perhaps alluded to by Rehoboam as a known punishment (I Kings 12:11, 14), and it was employed by Antiochus Epiphanes to drive the Jews by its tortures to eat swine's flesh (II Macc. 6:30; 7:1). As a legal penalty it was recognized by the later Jewish law, which prescribed beating or scourging for ecclesiastical offenses, such as transgression of ceremonial ordinances for which the Mosaic Law did not specify the punishment, disobedience of the orders of the sanhedrin, and heresy. Rods were used for beating (II Cor. 11:25); and for scourging a whip was employed, which consisted of 3 thongs, 1 of ox hide and 2 of ass's hide. The number of stripes ranged from a few blows up to 39, this limit being set in order to avoid all danger of exceeding the 40 blows allowed by the Mosaic Law in corporal punishment (Deut. 25:2, 3). When the punishment was inflicted in the synagogue (Matt. 10:17; 23:34), it was administered by the hazzan (overseer, officer); but culprits were also beaten before the sanhedrin (Acts 5:40).

The Romans used a scourge of cords or thongs, made more painful by various expedients which cruelty suggested. Pieces of lead or brass, or small, sharp-pointed bones, were attached to the lashes. The Romans employed scourging as a punishment or as torture to extract confession or testimony. After the Porcian law and the Valerian law, Roman citizens were exempted from scourging (Livy x. 9); but free persons not Roman citizens might be beaten and slaves scourged. Lawless governors, however, did not scruple to scourge free provincials and even Roman citizens (Jos. War ii. 14, 9). Criminals condemned to crucifixion were ordinarily scourged before being executed (Livy xxxiii. 36); this took place in the case of Jesus and of many of the Jews before the revolt and after the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans (Matt. 27:26; Jos. War v. 11, 1). The victim was stripped to the waist, and bound in a stooping position, with the hands behind the back, to a post or pillar. The suffering under the lash was intense. The body was frightfully lacerated. The Christian martyrs at Smyrna about A.D. 155 were so torn with the scourges that their veins were laid bare, and the inner muscles and sinews, and even the entrails, were exposed (Eusebius H.E. iv. 15).

Screech Owl. The rendering of Heb. lilith, a nocturnal being (Isa. 34:14; in R.V. night monster). It frequents the ruins of cities. Tristram believes it to be the tawny owl (Syrnium aluco) which is found in Gilead, Bashan, Lebanon, and the valley of the Jordan, breaking in on the stillness of night with its hooting. See NIGHT MONSTER, SATYR.

Scribe. 1. A public writer who was employed as an amanuensis to write at dictation (Jer. 36:4, 18, 32) and to draw up legal documents (ch. 32:12, probably). For a description of the ancient scribe, see Ezek. 9:2. In the Hymn to Gilgamesh is a reference to "the mighty one who has the writing tablet in the girdle of his loins." Representations of the god Nabū, the writer of the book of fate, with a stylus in his hand are specially frequent in the Neo-Babylonian period. In Egyptian religion Thot exercises the same functions as the Babylonian Nabû. Public scribes still frequent the streets of cities in the Near East.

2. A secretary; a government or other clerk (II Kings 12:10; Ezra 4:8). Levites were employed as scribes for the business of repairing the Temple (II Chron. 34:13).

3. A copier of the Law and other parts of the Scriptures (Jer. 8:8). The most noted of these earlier scribes was the priest Ezra, who was a ready scribe in the Law of Moses and had set his heart to seek the Law of the Lord and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments (Ezra 7:6, 10). In this latter respect he is the prototype of the scribes of later times, who were professional interpreters of the Law. In the N.T. they are called grammateis, or more exactly nomikoi, rendered "lawyers," and nomodidaskaloi, "teachers of the Law." They devoted themselves: (1) To the study and interpretation of the Law, which it will be remembered was both civil and religious; and to determining its application to the details of daily life. The decisions of the great scribes became the oral law or tradition. (2) To the study of the Scriptures generally in regard to historical and doctrinal matters. (3) To teaching, each noted scribe having a company of disciples about him; see SCHOOL. The profession of scribe received a great impulse after the Return of the Jews from the Exile, when prophecy had ceased and it only remained to study the completed Scriptures and make them the basis of the national life. The scribes were becoming numerous in the Maccabean period (I Macc. 7:12) and at the time of Christ had attained paramount influence among the people. The sanhedrin counted many of them among its members (Matt. 16:21; 26:3). Though there were among them some who believed in Christ's teaching (Matt. 8:19), the majority of them were hopelessly prejudiced against him. They murmured at or found fault with much that he and his disciples said or did (Matt. 21:15), and they had a large share in the responsibility for his death. They were also associated with the rulers and elders in the persecution of Peter and John (Acts 4:5; etc.), and in that which led to the martyrdom of Stephen (ch. 6:12); but the scribes of the Pharisees took Paul's part with respect to the resurrection (ch. 23:9).

Scrip. A bag or wallet for carrying provisions or articles required on a journey (Matt. 10:10, in R.V. wallet). The scrip of modern Palestine is made of the skin of a kid stripped off whole from the carcass and tanned, and slung from the shoulder by straps. Every shepherd and farmer has such an article. David when a shepherd carried one (I Sam. 17:40).

Scrip'ture. A writing, a narrative or other matter committed to writing (Dan. 10:21, in R.V. writing); especially the sacred writings of the Hebrews, viewed either collectively or individually, or even a single passage or quotation from them, as in Mark 12:10; Luke 4:21; John 19:37. When this collection of sacred documents is thought of as forming 1 book, the word is sing., the Scripture (John 7:42; 10:35; 17:12; 19:28; Gal. 3:22). More frequently the many documents from different authors which constitute the O.T. are in mind and the pl. is used, the Scriptures (Matt. 21:42; Luke 24:27; John 5:39; Rom. 1:2; II Tim. 3:15-17). The epistles of Paul at once took their place with the other Scriptures as authoritative (II Peter 3:16). See BIBLE, CANON, INSPIRATION.

Scyth'i-an (sīth'ī-ān). A native of Scythia. This name was applied originally to the region immediately n. of the Black Sea and e. of the Carpathian Mountains. When the conquests of Alexander the Great revealed the existence of men in Asia like the European Scythians in race, an Asiatic Scythia began to be recognized; and finally, all n.e. Europe and central and n. Asia were supposed to be traversed by the nomad Scythian race. They were far behind in civilization; so that at last the name Scythian was used as we now use Tartar, or the Greeks and Romans used the term Barbarian (II Macc. 4:47; Col. 3:11); see BETH-SHEAN.

Sea. 1. The ocean or general gathering of the waters, as distinguished from the dry land of the globe (Gen. 1:10; Ps. 8:8; Rev. 7:1-3; 21:1).

2. A more or less detached portion of that ocean (Gen. 49:13; Acts 10:6), or a large inland lake of fresh or salt water (Num. 34:11, 12; Matt. 4:18). The chief seas with which the Israelites had to do were the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, the Dead Sea, and the Sea of Galilee. The Mediterranean was referred to as the sea, or was called the great sea, the sea of the Philistines, the hinder or w. sea, the utmost and uttermost sea; see MEDITERRANEAN SEA. The Dead Sea was variously known as the Salt Sea, the Eastern Sea, Sea of the Arabah or the Plain, and according to A.V. of Zech. 14:8, the former sea; see DEAD SEA. The Sea of Galilee was also named the Sea of Chinnereth, Lake of Genesaret, and Sea of Tiberias; see GALILEE, SEA OF.

3. A large river with its network of branches, channels, and irrigating canals, as the Euphrates (Jer. 51:36, 42) and the Nile (Nahum 3:8).

4. The large basin in Solomon's Temple where the priests washed their hands and feet preparatory to ministering in the sanctuary or at the altar (I Kings 7:39); see MOLTEN SEA.

Sea Mew. The rendering in R.V. of Lev. 11:16 and Deut. 14:15 of the Heb. noun shahaph (perhaps suggesting leanness), a bird ceremonially unclean. The A.V. makes it the cuckoo (cuckoo). The LXX and Vulgate regard it as a sea mew or gull. Sea mew is an indefinite term, broad enough to include gulls, terns, and petrels, all of which abound on the shore and lakes of Palestine. If any single species is meant, perhaps it is the Sterna fluviatilis, the common tern, or sea swallow. This bird, which looks lean, might be included under the designation sea mew, for the Sterninae, or terns, are a sub-family of the Laridae, or gulls. It is plentiful along the shores of Palestine.

Sea Mon'ster. Any great fish of the sea (Gen. 1:21; Job 7:12; in A.V. whale), called in Heb. tannin. See DRAGON. In Lam. 4:3, Heb. tannin, although it is sing., number stands in Heb. before a pl. verb. It is doubtless a copyist's error for tannim (jackals). This reading is adopted by the R.V.

Seal. 1. The rendering of Heb. tahash in R.V., with porpoise in the marg. (Ex. 26:14; Ezek. 16:10); in A.V. badger. Its skin was used for the outer covering of the tabernacle and for sandals. Tahash corresponds to Arab. tubas, which embraces seals and specially denotes the dugong (Halicore humpichii). The latter belongs to the order Sirenia, of which the nearest allies are mammals of the whale order. It is generally 10 to 12 feet long, with a round head, breasts for suckling its young, and a fish-like tail. The color is slaty above and white below. It is believed to be 1 of the animals, if not indeed the animal, which gave rise to the fabled mermaid, half woman, half fish. It is common among the coral banks of the Red Sea, whence it extends as far as the coasts of Australia.

2. A signet ring or cylinder, engraved with the owner's name or some design or both (Ex. 28:11; Esth. 8:8). In Babylonia the cylinder seal and writing go back to the Uruk or Warkan period; the cylinder seals of the 3d quarter of the 4th millennium B.C. show a remarkable development in art. The seal was worn on the finger, if a ring, or was strung on a cord and hung around the neck (Gen. 38:18, R.V.; Jer. 22:24). Men affixed their seal as signature to letters or other documents (I Kings 21:8; Neh. 9:38; Esth. 8:8; Jer. 32:10, 44; John 3:33). These were usually written on clay, and the seal was pressed on the soft material and left its mark (Job 38:14). A large number of seals and seal impressions have been found in Palestine, dating between the 8th and 5th centuries B.C., which bear the personal names of their owners. Chests, boxes, tombs, or anything which required to be guarded from being opened, were sealed with the signet of the person who had authority to prohibit intrusion (Job 14:17; 41:15; Dan. 6:17; Matt. 27:66; Rev. 5:1).

Se'ba (sē'bā). A people in the Cushite genealogy (Gen. 10:7), who dwelt in s. Arabia. Seba is a dialectic variation of Sheba, giving the Arab. pronunciation. According to the Assyrian inscriptions this people was in n.w. Arabia in the 8th century B.C. Seba is associated with Sheba as a remote s. country (Ps. 72:10); and with Egypt and Ethiopia as if in Africa, whither many Cushites migrated (Isa. 43:3; 45:14). Josephus identifies Seba with the isle of Meroë (Jos. Antiq. ii. 10, 2). The region so named is situated between the Nile and its affluent, the Atbara. It is about 400 miles long by 200 broad. But this district was known to the Hebrews as Cush. According to Strabo (xvi. 4, 8-10) there were on the w. coast of the Red Sea the harbor Saba and the town Sabai.

Se'bam (sē'bām), in A.V. She'bam. See SIBMAM.

Se'bat (sē'bāt). See SHEBAT.

Se'ca'cah (sē-kā'kā) [thicket, cover]. A village in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. 15:61). Conder places it doubtfully at Khirbet Sikkeh or Dikkeh, about 2 miles e. of Bethany.

Se'cu (sē'kū), in A.V. Se'chu (sē'kū) [probably, lookout place]. A village near Samuel's town of Ramah (I Sam. 19:22), probably in the direction of Gibeah (v. 9). Conder doubtfully suggests as its site Shuweikeh, about 3 miles n.w. by n. of er-Rām; see RAMAH 1.

Se'cun'dus (sē-kūn'dūs) [Lat., second]. A man of Thessalonica who accompanied Paul from Macedonia into Asia Minor (Acts 20:4).

Se'er. See PROPHET.

Se'gub (sē'gūb) [exalted]. 1. The youngest or younger son of Hiel. He died when his father set up the gates of Jericho, which he was then fortifying (I Kings 16:34), completing the fulfillment of the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. 6:26).

2. Son of Hezron, by a daughter of Machir (I Chron. 2:21, 22).

Se'ir (sē'ir) [hairy, shaggy; i.e., covered with brushwood]. 1. A land and its inhabitants. Seir was the mountain range of Edom (Gen. 36:21; Num. 24:18; Ezek. 35:15). The original inhabitants of these mountains were Horites (Gen. 14:6). Seir is elsewhere used collectively for the people (Ezek. 25:8). Esau took up his abode in Mount Seir (Gen. 32:3), and his descendants dispossessed the Horites (Deut. 2:12; Josh. 24:4). A remnant of the Amalekites took refuge in these mountain fastnesses, but were finally destroyed by the Simeonites (I Chron. 4:42, 43).

2. A ridge on the border line of the territory of Judah w. of Kiriath-jearim (Josh. 15:10); generally identified with the rocky point on which the village of Saris stands, s.w. of Kiriath-jearim.

Se'i'rah (sē-irā), in A.V. Se'i'rath (sē-irāth) [see SEIR]. A locality in Mount Ephraim, probably in the s.e. part, to which Ehud escaped after murdering Eglon (Judg. 3:26).

Se'la (sē'lā), in A.V. once Se'lah (sē'lā) (II Kings 14:7) [rock]. A place in Edom taken by Amaziah, king of Judah, and named by him Joktheel (II Kings 14:7). It is hardly referred to in Judg. 1:36; but probably in II Chron. 25:12; Isa. 42:11; Obad. 3; and perhaps in Isa. 16:1 (R.V., Selah). The inhabitants dwelt high, among clefts (Obad. 3). These indications point to the ravine called by the Greeks Petra, which is simply a translation of the Heb. Sela. About 300 B.C. Petra passed from the Edomites to the Nabataean Arabs. The dynasty which now began to rule in Petra contained several kings of the name of Aretas, 1 of whom is mentioned in II Cor. 11:32. The kingdom of the Nabataeans came to an end in A.D. 105 and Arabia Petraea was made a province of the Roman Empire. See NABATAEANS. The place was rediscovered by Burckhardt in 1812 and has since been visited by various travelers. It lies in the nook of a deep chasm excavated by water on the n.e. flank of Mount Hor. The valley, with branching side valleys, is about 4,500 feet long by 740 to 1,500 broad, and is surrounded on all sides by precipitous sandstone cliffs. The main gorge is called Wadi Mūsa, the valley of Moses, though probably he was never there. A rivulet traverses it through its whole length. The variegated colors of the rock—red, brown, purple, yellow—add to the beauty of the spot. There are tombs, remains of temples, an amphitheater, a triumphal arch, etc., most of them apparently of Roman times. Besides these, there are tombs and dwelling houses in the adjacent cliffs, some of which may be of older date. On the height above, overlooking the ancient city, is the great high place; and yet other altars stand on neighboring lofty sites.

The Treasury at Petra

Se'lah (sē'lā) [Heb. sālāl, to lift up; cf. Akkad. sullū, prayer]. A word occurring 71 times in The Psalms, as well as in Hab. 3: 3, 9, 13. It is universally agreed that this word is a musical or liturgical sign of some kind, but the exact meaning has not been determined: 1. The LXX renders it by diapsalma, which may imply the intervention at the particular place by a musical symphony. In this case, the meaning may be "Lift up! Loud!" a direction to the orchestra. The singers' voices would cease, and then the instruments would be heard with full effect (cf. forte, fortissimo). 2. The Targum, Aquila, and Jerome render it "for ever," but this interpretation has no known ety. and is unsuitable in the majority of passages. 3. Jacob of Edessa (640-708) compares it with the Christian Amen sung by the people after the Gloria. It may therefore mean "Lift up your benedictions" and may refer to a doxology sung after every psalm or section of a psalm which for any liturgical reason was separated from a following section. It probably was introduced in the late Persian period in connection with the liturgical use of the psalms and indicated the place of benedictions.

Se'la-ham-mah'le-koth (sē'lā-hā-mā'lē-kōth) [rock of divisions or escapes]. A cliff in the wilderness of Maon. It was so called because David on 1 side of the eminence eluded Saul on the other (I Sam. 23:28). Conder points out that about 8 miles e.n.e. of Maon there is a cliff at Wadi el-Malāki, a narrow but deep chasm, impassable except by making a circuit of many miles. Saul might here have come near enough to see David and yet not have been able to reach the place where David was except by making a long detour.

Se'led (sē'lēd) [exultation]. A man of Judah, family of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:30).

Seleu'e'ia (sē-lū'shī-ā). A city on the seacoast of Syria (I Macc. 11:8), 5 miles n. of the mouth of the Orontes. It was built on the site of an earlier town by Seleucus Nicator, founder of the kingdom of Syria, and was the seaport of Antioch, which lay about 16 miles farther up the river. Pompey made the city free. Paul and Barnabas sailed thence for Cyprus (Acts 13:4).

Seleu'e'us (sē-lū'kūs). A king of Syria (I Macc. 7:1; II Macc. 3:3), called Philopator. He was son and successor of Antiochus the Great, and reigned from 187-175 B.C., when he was murdered by Heliodorus, one of his courtiers. He was followed on the throne by Antiochus Epiphanes; see ANTIOCHUS 1 and 2. During his father's reign he fought in the disastrous battle of Magnesia. During his own administration he sought to strengthen his kingdom, and was conciliatory toward the Jews; although it is said that he attempted to plunder the Temple (II Macc. 3: 4-40), possibly to help to raise the enormous tribute which he was compelled to pay the Romans.

Sem (sēm). See SHEM.

Sem'achī'ah (sēm'āchī-ā) [Jehovah has sustained]. A Levite, descendant of the doorkeeper Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:7).

Sem'e'in (sēm'ē-in), in A.V. Sem'e'i (sēm'ē-i) [Gr. for Heb. Shim'i, Shimei]. An ancestor of Christ, who lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:26).

Semitic (sē-mīt'ik) [Lat. Semiticus from Sem, Gr. Sēm, from Heb. Shēm, Shem]. The languages which, speaking broadly, were or are vernacular to the descendants of Shem are called Semitic. They are inflectional, and together with Egyptian, which is a Semitico-Hamitic tongue, the Semitic languages have the longest recorded history. They constitute one of the leading families of languages. Many scholars accept a common parentage for the Hamitic and Semitic tongues, but the connection with the Indo-European through the Indo-Hittite is very remote. According to this theory the Hamites were in n. Africa, where the Hamitic languages grew up; the Semites were in Arabia, where their language developed its special characteristics and diverged from that of the Hamites. Thus it is supposed that there was at first 1 primitive Semitic language, but the separation of the tribes speaking it led ultimately to its divergence into several languages. No doubt dialects occurred in Arabia before the Semitic migrations into the Fertile Crescent. In each the roots of the words are nearly always trilateral, the 3 radical letters being 3 consonants. Many trilaterals appear to be based on pre-existing bilaterals; and it is even supposed by some that originally there were but 2 radical consonants. The various modifications of meaning were produced from these roots by the use of vowels, of which 3 only, a, i, and u, were originally employed; thus the 3 consonants k, s, r suggest the idea of cutting off, and kāšār means he reaped, kāšōr reaper, kāšēr reaper, kāšir harvest, kāšūr reaped. The meaning was also modified by laying stress on certain of the consonants and by means of affixes; thus gādāl he became large, giddāl he magnified, gaddāl magnify, miggdāl a tower.

The Semitic languages are arranged under 4 groups: 1. The eastern consists of Akkadian, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Neo-Babylonian. The name Akkadian is generally applied in a comprehensive sense to the whole group. 2. The northern embraces the Amorite and Aramaic. Western Aramaic includes Old Aramaic, Biblical and Palestinian Aramaic, the language of the Elephantine papyri, that of the Targums, Palmyrene, and Nabataean. In eastern Aramaic are the Aramaic of the Babylonian Talmud, Mandaic, Syriac, and Modern Aramaic. 3. The western includes Ugaritic, Canaanite, Moabite, Phoenician and Punic, and Hebrew (Biblical, Mishnaic, Rabbinic, and Modern). 4. The southern is divided into Arabic and Ethiopic. Under Arabic we have N. Arabic, which includes Classical Arabic, Modern Arabic, and Maltese; under S. Arabic are listed Minaean, Sabaean, Himyarite, and modern dialects (Mahri-Sokotri). The Ethiopic group consists of Ethiopic or Ge'ez, Amharic, Tigré, and Tigriña.

Semitic writing is in most of the languages from right to left: that is, in the other direction from English. Hence the title-page in the Hebrew Bible is at what looks like the end of the volume. From this it reads backward, till it ends at what, if it were English, would be called the beginning of the book.

The intellectual ability of the Semitic race is shown by the place which the Jews have taken in Christian countries and by the role played by the Arabs in the Middle Ages.

Senna'ah (sé-nā'á). See HASSENAAH.

Se'neh (sē'nē) [thorn bush, bramble]. A sharp rock, 1 of 2 which flanked a pass running e. and w. between Michmah and Gibeah. It was the more s. of the cliffs, and nearer Gibeah than Michmah. It was between these 2 rocks that Jonathan and his armor-bearer passed when they were going to surprise the Philistine garrison (I Sam. 14:4, 5). It overlooked Wadi Suweinit, about 3½ miles s.e. by s. of Michmah.

Se'nir (sē'nir), in A.V. twice She'nir (Deut. 3:9; S. of Sol. 4:8) [perhaps, mount of light, but cf. SIRON]. The Amorite name of Hermon (Deut. 3:9). In S. of Sol. 4:8 Senir and Hermon are distinguished, each probably being a distinct peak of the giant mountain. Fir timber was obtained on Senir (Ezek. 27:5).

Sennach'erib (sē-nāk'ēr-ib) [Akkad., Sin (the moon-god) has increased the brothers]. A son of Sargon, who succeeded to the Assyrian throne on the murder of his father, in the year 705 B.C. Though a warrior, he was inferior to Sargon in ability. He was boastful, cruel, and not wise enough to perpetuate his conquests by conciliating those whom he had vanquished. On his accession Merodach-baladan of Babylon attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Sennacherib defeated him and his ally, the king of Elam, placed Bel-ibni on the Babylonian throne, and returned in triumph to Nineveh, laden with captives and spoil. Discontent and rebellion manifested themselves in the w. also, among the peoples who had submitted to Sargon. To quell this revolt, Sennacherib in 701 appeared in Phoenicia, capturing Great and Little Zidon, Zarephath, Achzib, and Acco, but Tyre appears to have held out. Neighboring states hastened to announce their submission. Proceeding to the Philistine country, he took Ashkelon, Beth-dagon, and Joppa. Next he invested and captured Lachish, sent a detachment of his troops to Jerusalem, secured the release of the dethroned king of Ekron from Jerusalem, defeated the combined armies of Egypt and Ethiopia at the battle of Eltekeh, and added Ekron to his conquests. On this campaign he not only took Lachish and Eltekeh, cities of Judah, but by his own account took 46 fortified towns of Judah, carried away 200,150 people captive, and seized multitudes of horses, mules, asses, camels, and sheep. His career of conquest was cut short by the plague, which devastated his army and compelled him to return to Nineveh. No express mention is, of course, to be expected in the Assyrian inscriptions of his failure to possess himself of Jerusalem; but it is clearly implied, for he is unable to tell of the capture of the city, and he apparently covers up the inglorious conclusion of the campaign by placing at the close of his narrative the account of the tribute which he received from Hezekiah. Here is his own account of the matter: "Hezekiah himself I shut up like a caged bird in Jerusalem, his royal city. I erected beleaguering works against him and turned back by command every one who came out of his city gate. I severed his towns, which I plundered, from his dominions and gave them to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, Padi, king of Ekron, and Šillibaal, king of Gaza. Thus I diminished his land. In addition to the former tribute, their yearly tax, I added a tax as the impost of my overlordship and laid it upon them. As for Hezekiah, the fear of the glory of my sovereignty overwhelmed him, and the Urbi and his favorite soldiers, whom he had brought in to strengthen Jerusalem, his capital city, deserted. With thirty talents of gold, 800 talents of silver, precious stones, rouge, dakkasi, lapis lazuli, great angumi-stones, beds of ivory, stationary ivory thrones, elephants' hide, ivory, ushu-wood, ukarinnu-wood, all sorts of objects, a heavy treasure; also his daughters, the women of his palace, male and female musicians he sent after me to Nineveh, my capital city, and sent his messenger to present the gift and to do homage." A story was told the Greek historian Herodotus by the Egyptian priests that Sennacherib advanced against Egypt and had reached Pelusium, when immense numbers of field mice destroyed the bowstrings of the Assyrians, who next morning commenced their flight from the country. For the series of historic events in which Sennacherib and Hezekiah figure as antagonists, see HEZEKIAH. Sennacherib's failure against Jerusalem was in 701 B.C.

In the meantime new troubles for Sennacherib arose in Babylonia; and in the 3d year of Bel-ibni, in 700 B.C. the Assyrian king marched to the s., removed Bel-ibni, and placed his own son Ashur-nadin-shum on the throne 699. Freed from concern for the s. Sennacherib next turned his attention to the n.w. and brought Cilicia under the Assyrian yoke. In 694 he made a novel expedition by ship and attempted to root out the followers of Merodach-baladan from their last refuge at the mouth of the Ulai. The campaign was in a measure successful; but the Elamites invaded Babylonia, seized Ashur-nadin-shum, and placed a Babylonian king on the throne, who held the country for 1½ years. But though Sennacherib took Erech, captured the Babylonian king, and devastated Elam, yet another Babylonian king ascended the throne, and the Assyrians did not succeed in finally chastising Babylonia until 689. Then Sennacherib advanced against Babylon, captured and plundered the city, massacred the inhabitants, fired the buildings, razed the walls and temples, and flooded the ruins with water from the Euphrates and its canals.

The last 8 years of his reign were mostly peaceful. He had some time before surrounded Nineveh with a wall 8 miles in circumference. About 695 B.C. he finished a great palace which he had built for himself in the n.w. part of Nineveh. It was 1,500 feet long and 700 broad, with great courts, halls, and chambers. He restored another palace and constructed a system of canals by which he brought good drinking water to the city. After a reign of 24 years and 5 months, he was assassinated in the year 681. The deed was done by 2 of his sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, who were excited against him because his favorite in the family was another brother, Esarhaddon (II Kings 19:37; II Chron. 32:21).

Se-nu'ah (sê-nū'ā). See HASSENUAH.

Se-o'rim (sê-ō'rim) [barley]. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and constituted the 4th course when David distributed the priests into divisions (I Chron. 24:1-8).

Se'phar (sê'fār) [numbering]. A place which formed the limit in 1 direction of the territory settled by the descendants of Joktan (Gen. 10:30). It was probably in s. Arabia.

Se'pha'rad (sê-fā'rād). This place of captivity of people of Jerusalem (Obad. 20) may be Sardis in Asia Minor. Sparda, a district frequently mentioned in Persian inscriptions along with Ionia, Armenia, and Cappadocia, may be Sardis and so stand for Lydia. The name occurs in Assyrian inscriptions as early as the time of Esarhaddon, 681-669 B.C. Perhaps happier is the identification with Shaparda, which Sargon, who transported Israelites to the cities of the Medes (II Kings 17:6), and boasts of having subjugated Judah, mentions as a district of s.w. Media.

Seph'ar-va'im (sêf'ār-vā'im). A place from which the Assyrians brought colonists to inhabit Samaria (II Kings 17:24, 31). Not improbably the same town is referred to in chs. 18:34; 19:13. Formerly it was identified with Sippar on the e. bank of the Euphrates, above Babylon. It may, however, be Sabarim, a Syrian city (cf. Sibraim, Ezek. 47:16), which was destroyed by Shalmaneser V in 727 B.C.

Se'phar-vites (sêf'ār-vīts). Natives or inhabitants of Sepharvaim (II Kings 17:31).

Se'phe'la (sê-fē'lā). See SHEPHELAH.

Sep'tu-a'gint (sêp'tū-d-jīnt). See VER-SIONS, I. 1.

Sep'ul-cher. The Hebrews, as a rule, buried their dead in caverns, natural or artificial (Gen. 23:9; Isa. 22:16; Matt. 27:60; John 11:38), natural caves being often extended by excavation (Gen. 50:5). The cliffs near Jerusalem are full of such sepulchers. The entrance to the cavern or its chambers was closed by a stone (Matt. 27:60) to exclude jackals and other beasts that prey upon dead bodies. It was desirable that the sepulchers should be at a distance from human habitations. They might be in gardens attached to dwellings (II Kings 21:18, 26), or within the city walls (I Kings 2:10); but they were generally outside the town. Even then trees or gardens might surround them (John 19:41). Often, however, they were excavated high up in the face of a precipitous cliff, with their entrance far above the ground. Frequently the tomb was whitewashed (Matt. 23:27), not only for cleanliness and beauty, but also that it might be clearly seen and not touched, for the touch brought defilement. Inside the sepulcher the individual grave was sunk in the floor and covered by a slab of stone, or was cut as a niche in the wall, or driven as a shaft into the side of the cavern and closed by a flat stone or door, or a shelf for bodies was hewn around the chamber. Sometimes there were double tiers of niches or shafts. Coffins were not necessary; but occasionally among the wealthy the body was inclosed in a stone sarcophagus and placed in the tomb. The entrance was sometimes richly ornamented. Sometimes a monument was erected. It might consist of a simple pillar (II Kings 23:17, R.V.), or it might assume the form of a mausoleum (I Macc. 13:27). The Hebrews and their neighbors were fond of family burial places, and the sepulcher with its chambers and niches was adapted to this purpose (Gen. 49:29-31; II Sam. 2:32; I Kings 13:22; I Macc. 9:

Sealed Stone at Entrance of a Tomb

19; 13:25). Public burial places were used by the poor and were provided for strangers (II Kings 23:6; Jer. 26:23; Matt. 27:7). See GRAVE.

Sep'ul-cher, Ho'ly. See CALVARY.

Sep'ul-chers of the Kings, or of Da'vid (dā'vid). The royal burial place in the city of David, not far from the king's garden and the pool of Shelah (I Kings 2:10; II Chron. 21:20; Neh. 3:15, 16), and doubtless in the field of burial which belonged to the kings (II Kings 15:7; II Chron. 26:23). Theodoret quotes Josephus as saying that the tomb is near Siloam, is in fashion like a cave, and reveals the royal lavishness. It consisted of several chambers (Jos. Antiq. vii. 15, 3). It was robbed of large treasure by John Hyrcanus; and the report of the sum which that prince had obtained led Herod the Great to search it in the hope of securing additional plunder; but he became frightened, abandoned the search, and erected a propitiatory monument of white stone at its mouth (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 4; xvi. 7, 1; War i. 2, 5). It was extant in the time of Christ (Acts 2:29). All the kings from David to Hezekiah inclusive were buried in the city of David. The common royal sepulcher was by implication ordinarily used; but Asa and probably Hezekiah had tombs of their own (II Chron. 16:14; 32:33, R.V.), and Jehoram, Joash, Uzziah, and Ahaz were not admitted to the royal sepulcher (chs. 21:20; 24:25; 26:23; 28:27). Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah were buried at Jerusalem in their own tombs (cf. II Kings 21:18, 26; 23:30 with II Chron. 35:24). Jehoahaz died in Egypt, and Jehoiahin and Zedekiah doubtless in Babylonia. Jehoiahim was probably left unburied.

The caverns of the kings, which are referred to by Josephus (Jos. War v. 4, 2), may be what is now known as the Grotto of Jeremiah.

Se'rah (sē'rā'), in A.V. once Sar'ah (Num. 26:46) [cf. S. Arab. Shārīh, the one who opens or explains]. A daughter of Asher (Gen. 46:17; I Chron. 7:30).

Se-ra'iah (sē-rā'yā') [Jehovah has striven, or ruled]. 1. A son of Kenaz (I Chron. 4:13).

2. A scribe who had held office under David (II Sam. 8:17); see SHAVSHA.

3. A Simeonite, son of Asiel (I Chron. 4:35).

4. One of those sent to arrest Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 36:26).

5. The chief priest when Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem. He was put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (II Kings 25:18-21; Jer. 52:24-27). He was the father of Jehozadak, who was carried into captivity; and the grandfather of Jeshua, who was high priest immediately after the Exile; and he was also an ancestor of Ezra, the scribe (I Chron. 6:14, 15; Ezra 3:2; 7:1).

6. The son of Neriah; he was "quarter-master" (R.V. marg.; J.V.); "chief chamberlain" (R.V.); "a quiet prince" (A.V.). The 1st translation is preferable. He was carried captive to Babylon (Jer. 51:59-64).

7. The son of Tanhumeth, a Netophathite (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

8. One of those who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:2). Called in Neh. 7:7 Azariah.

9. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (v. 12). Possibly the same as number 8.

10. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house and probably of the father's house just mentioned, who with Nehemiah signed the covenant to keep separate from the heathen and observe the Law of God (Neh. 10:2). Probably also he is identical with the following.

11. A priest, son of Hilkiah and ruler of the house of God after the Exile (Neh. 11:11; cf. the preceding). The name Azariah occurs in the corresponding place in I Chron. 9:11. Different persons are probably intended, of whom Azariah lived before and Seraiah after the Exile. Possibly, however, different persons are intended, each of whom lived after the Exile, Azariah being a predecessor of Seraiah. Or the text may be corrupt; in 1 of the passages the name may have been misread by a copyist; or as both names belong to the high-priestly genealogy and succeed each other there (I Chron. 6:12-15), something may have slipped from the text, as, for example: "Seraiah, son of" may have been lost before Azariah in Chronicles, or "son of Azariah" after Seraiah in Nehemiah.

Ser'a-phim (sēr'ā-fīm), in A.V. Ser'a-phims (sēr'ā-fīmz). Celestial beings who stood before the enthroned Lord when he appeared in vision to Isaiah. "Each . . . had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. And one cried unto another, and said, Holy, holy, holy, is Jehovah of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa. 6:2, 3). The prophet having confessed his sinfulness, one of the seraphim flew unto him, "having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar"; and he touched the prophet's mouth with it, and said: "Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin forgiven."

Scripture affords no further information regarding the seraphim. They are mentioned in this 1 passage only. Various suggestions have been proposed: 1. Gesenius derives their name from Arab. sharafa, "to surpass in glory or rank." The Arab. root would regularly be šārāph in Heb. 2. Cheyne conjectures that the seraphim are the serpent-like lightning, referring to the fact that šārāph and šērāphim denote the fiery serpents in the wilderness (Num. 21:6, 8; Isa. 14:29; 30:6). But even if the words seraphim and fiery serpent have the same form in the sing. number, and if they are from the same Semitic root, which is probable, they yet need not signify the same beings or similarly shaped beings. Shape is not denoted by the name. The common characteristic, which finds expression in the word, is burning, in the transitive sense; this would accord with the idea of making the seraphim agents of purification by fire (Isa. 6:6, 7). But the seraphim do not resemble serpents outwardly, for they have hands, feet, and wings. So if the root šārāph (to burn) is taken, the idea of serpent must be excluded. Cheyne admits that Isaiah did not regard them as animals in form. 3. The seraphim are identical with the Egyptian griffins, seref, and were borrowed by the Israelites. If so, they were personifications of natural objects or phenomena; and in the vision of Isaiah they symbolically represent the powers of nature attendant upon nature's Lord (cf. Zech. 6:1-8, R.V.). There is little support for these theories. 4. They are an order of angels. So the Jews understood. The Targum inserts the word in Ezek. 1:8; Zech. 3:7. They are consuming beings, who cry, "Holy, holy, holy," who are most impressed with the attribute of holiness in God, worship him most fondly in that character, and execute his purposes of holiness in the world. The conclusive argument in favor of this theory against the 3d is that their adoration of holiness in God and their employment in the ministry of atonement indicate moral beings and not physical powers personified.

Plan of the So-called Tombs of the Kings

Se' red (sē'rēd) [cf. Syr. serād, to be terrified]. A son of Zebulun, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

Ser'gius Paul'us (sūr'ji-ūs pō'lūs). The proconsul of Cyprus, which constituted a senatorial province in Paul's time (Acts 13:5-12); see CYPRIUS. The inscription on a coin found at ancient Soli, on the n. coast of the island, mentions "Paulus proconsul."

Se'ron (sē'rōn). Commander of the army of Syria (I Macc. 3:13) in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. He attempted to suppress the revolt of the Jews, but was defeated by Judas Maccabaeus near Beth-horon in 166 B.C. (vs. 14-24). Josephus states that Seron lost his life in the battle (Jos. Antiq. xii. 7, 1).

Serp'ent. 1. An animal which creeps on its belly (Gen. 3:1, 14); having head, tail, and body (Gen. 3:15; Ex. 4:4), but no limbs. It is generically called nāḥāsh in Heb., ophis in Gr. (cf. Gen. 3:13 with II Cor. 11:3; Num. 21:9 with John 3:14). As it wriggles along, its mouth is apt to come in contact with the dust, which it licks (Micah 7:17; cf. Gen. 3:14). The bite of some species infuses fatal poison into the wound (Num. 21:6; Ps. 58:4; Prov. 23:32). Some can be charmed (Eccl. 10:11). The serpent is found in the wilderness and in inhabited districts, by the road, in hedges, on rocks, in walls (Gen. 49:17; Num. 21:6; Prov. 30:19; Eccl. 10:8; Amos 5:19).

The fiery serpents which bit the children of Israel in the wilderness and caused death were a kind of snake found in Arabia and elsewhere whose bite produces the fiery burning of inflammation and thirst. See BRAZEN SERPENT.

The serpent of the temptation was an ordinary snake, one of the beasts of the field, comparable with them in subtlety and skill in securing prey, and, after it was involved in the temptation of man, cursed among them (Gen. 3:1, 14). Perhaps Eve saw nothing more than a snake; but the Devil was in this serpent, as afterward the demons were in men and in the swine, controlling it, lending it supernatural subtlety, and using it as a means by which to approach Eve (Wisd. of Sol. 2:24; Rom. 16:20; II Cor. 11:3; Rev. 12:9); see SATAN. It suffered in the punishment, as did other innocent animals when made the instruments of sin (Lev. 20:15, 16). Its mode of locomotion was not new: it had beyond doubt always crept, but now its groveling on the earth is made the memorial of its degradation. It does not suffer thereby, save as it is loathed and killed by man. But the more distinctly man recognizes that the evil spirit was the serpent's master, the more does man transfer his enmity to the Archfiend.

2. A species of serpent, in Heb. pethen (Ps. 91:13, adder). See ASP.

Ser'ug (sē'rūg), in A.V. of N.T. Sa'ruch [perhaps, shoot, branch]. Son of Reu, father of Nahor, and ancestor of Abraham (Gen. 11:20-23; I Chron. 1:26; Luke 3:35). There was a city by this name near Haran.

Serv'ant. One who serves, in Heb. usually 'ebed. It is a general term, including voluntary and involuntary service, and embracing all who are under obligation of any kind to render service to another, from the slave captured in war or purchased at a price, to the envied official of a king and the willing worshiper of God (cf. Gen. 39:1 with chs. 41:12; 40:20; Ex. 32:13; Acts 16:17). It is systematically employed by Orientals when addressing a superior, whether man or God (Gen. 32:4, 20; 50:18; Deut. 3:24; II Sam. 9:2; Luke 2:29; Acts 4:29); and is applied to conquered nations compelled to pay tribute to their conqueror (II Sam. 8:2). God also designates his worshipers servants (Gen. 26:24; Num. 12:7; II Sam. 7:5). See MINISTER, SLAVE.

Serv'ant of Je-ho'vah (jē-hō'vā). 1. One who acknowledges Jehovah as his God and, by implication of the term, faithfully performs his will; as Abraham (Ps. 105:6), Moses (v. 26), David (Ps. 132:10), Isaiah (Isa. 20:3).

2. The prominent figure in Isa., chs. 40 to 66 (cf. especially chs. 42:1-7; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13 to 53:12). The view most widely entertained by modern commentators is that the servant of the Lord in these chapters is Israel, the eye of the prophet being fixed sometimes on the nation as a whole, sometimes on the godly portion, sometimes on a perfect representative of Israel: that individual is Christ. Against other views there may be urged: 1. The servant of chapter 53 is interpreted by the Targum as Messiah. 2. The Prophet Zechariah apparently identifies the branch, a familiar designation of Messiah, with the servant whereby the iniquity of the land is taken away (Zech. 3:8-10; cf. Jer. 23:5-8). 3. The description of the suffering servant of Isa., ch. 53 actually finds its counterpart in Christ.

The interpreter of Isa., ch. 53 must be ever mindful of certain controlling facts: 1. When this chapter was penned, the Hebrews were fully acquainted with the sense of guilt (Gen. 39:9; II Sam. 12:5-13; Isa. 6:5-7; cf. Psalms 32; 51). 2. The godly among the Israelites recognized themselves as sinful and as involved in the guilt of the nation, in its disobedience to God's Law and in its failure to fulfill the purpose of its selection to be God's servant among men. Israel's best men felt this truth keenly (Neh. 1:6, 7; Dan. 9:5-11, 20). Israel was a unit, a solidarity: the sin of a part of the people involved all in guilt (Deut. 21:1, 7, 8; Josh. 7:1, 11, 13, 15, 25; Judg. 20:6, 10, 13). 3. When this chapter, Isa., ch. 53, was written, the Israelites were familiar with the symbolism of atonement. The prophecy was uttered when the truths were well known that God might pardon after sufficient punishment had been inflicted (Isa. 40:2), yet the mere punishment of sin or compensation for an injury does not cleanse the sinner. Punishment and restitution and cleansing are required (Isa. 4:3, 4; 6:6, 7; 53:10; Lev. 5:14-16; Num. 5:5-8; Ps. 51:2, 7). 4. The doctrine of substitution was also known. It pervades the chapter (Isa. 53:5, 6, 11, 12). It was publicly illustrated on the annual Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:20-22). 5. To fulfill these conditions and satisfy the creed of Israel, the servant of Jehovah must be of sufficient worth to be substituted for Israel, must be identical with Israel in order that he may really represent Israel before God and that it may be said that Israel has actually met its obligations in him; and yet the servant must be distinct from Israel so as not to be involved in Israel's guilt and to have no obligation of service to discharge for himself. These doctrinal requirements point not obscurely to the need of divinity in him who fills the office assigned to the Lord's servant in Isa., ch. 53.

Seth (sēth), in A.V. once Sheth (I Chron. 1:1) [appointed, substituted]. A son of Adam. He was born after the murder of Abel, for whom to a certain extent he became a substitute (Gen. 4:25; 5:3). He became the father of Enos, and died at the age of 912 (Gen. 5:6-8; Luke 3:38).

Se'thur (sē'thēr) [hidden]. The representative spy from the tribe of Asher (Num. 13:13).

Se'ven. Seven is an ordinary numeral, and it was commonly used without religious significance; but it was also a sacred number among the Hebrews and other Semites, and also among the Aryans of Persia and even of Greece. Its sacredness is traceable to remote antiquity. It is seen in the 7 pillars of wisdom's house (Prov. 9:1), the 7 locks into which Samson, who was consecrated to God, braided his hair (Judg. 16:13, 19), the 7 victims to atone for the broken covenant (II Sam. 21:6, 9), the 7 stones of the ancient Arabs smeared with the blood of the covenanting parties (Herod. iii. 8), the 7 lambs to attest the conclusion of a treaty (Gen. 21:28-30), the Hebrew words for oath and taking an oath, which incorporate the number 7, and the sacredness of the 7th portion of time. The idea that 7 derived its sacred character from the fact that 3 plus 4 make 7 is pure fancy. It was held sacred because men believed that God recognized the number. He placed 7 luminaries in the sky: sun, moon, and 5 planets. The moon has its phases every 7 days. These phenomena, however, were but confirmatory and served as reminders of a greater recognition. God had blessed the 7th day and hallowed it. Far more was needed than the signs of the sky to originate the sacredness of 7. Twelve did not become a sacred number, although there are 12 months in the year and 12 signs in the zodiac. Man noted these phenomena in the earliest times, adopted them into his daily life and language, and celebrated certain of them with religious festivals. In Babylonia 12 was made the basis of an arithmetical system (the duodecimal), and in Assyria the pantheon contained 12 great gods. Notwithstanding all this, 12 did not become a sacred number; but 7 did become a sacred number, and the 7th portion of time a sacred season; and not merely was the recurring 7th portion of time sacred, but it involved a benediction. It was cherished in hoary antiquity as a season of divine favor toward man, when the manifestation of God's good will was to be expected. See SABBATH.

Se-ve'neh (sē-vē'nē), in A.V. Sy'e'ne. A town constituting the extreme limit of Egypt in 1 direction. Which direction depends on the translation of Ezek. 29:10; 30:6. The preferable rendering is that of the marg., "from Migdol to Syene," and so it is in J.V. The town of Seveneh is in the s. of Egypt, on the borders of Ethiopia, and is the Roman Syene, the modern Aswān, on the Egyptian side of the First Cataract, where a few remains of the ancient city exist. Here, or on the island hard by, the border garrison was stationed (Herod. ii. 30). On the island, as early as the time of the Persian conquest of Egypt, a Jewish colony maintained a temple to Jehovah (Elephantine papyri); see ALTAR.

Se'ven Words, The. These words were spoken by Jesus from the cross. The progressive stages by which they are characterized may be interpreted as showing a gradual unfolding of the will and purpose of God for the redemption of mankind. They are as follows: (1) "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Luke 23:34); (2) "Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Luke 23:43); (3) "Woman, behold, thy son! . . . Behold, thy mother!" (John 19:26, 27); (4) "Eli [Eloi], Eli [Eloi], lama sabachthani? . . . My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34); (5) "I thirst" (John 19:28); (6) "It is finished" (John 19:30); (7) "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Luke 23:46).

Sha'al'bim (shā'āl'bīm), once Sha'a-lab'bin (shā'ā-lāb'bin) (Josh. 19:42) [cf. Arab. tha'lab, fox]. An Amorite city within the territory of Dan (Josh. 19:42), which the Amorites did not yield (Judg. 1:35) until some time after the settlement of the Hebrews in the land (I Kings 4:9). It may be Selbit, 3 miles n.w. of Aijalon and 8 miles n. of Beth-shemesh.

Sha'al-bo'nite (shā'āl-bō'nīt). A native or inhabitant either of an unknown town called Shaalbon, or more probably of Shaalbim (II Sam. 23:32; I Chron. 11:33).

Sha'al'im (shā'ā-līm), in A.V. Sha'lim [perhaps, foxes]. A district apparently in Ephraim, through which Saul, on leaving the land of Shalishah, passed in quest of his father's asses (I Sam. 9:4).

Sha'aph (shā'āf) [Aram., balsam]. 1. A son of Jahdai, included in the registry of Caleb (I Chron. 2:47).

2. A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah. He was ancestor of the inhabitants of Madmannah (I Chron. 2:49).

Sha'a-ra'im (shā'ā-rā'im), in A.V. once Sha-ra'im [two gates]. 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:36), apparently w. of Socoh and Azekah (cf. I Sam. 17:52 with v. 1). Sa'ireh among the hills, 5 miles n.e. by n. of Socoh, has not the proper location; it may be near Tell es-Sāf.

2. A town of Simeon (I Chron. 4:31); see SHARUHEN.

Sha'ash'gaz (shā-āsh'gāz). A chamberlain of King Ahasuerus (Esth. 2:14).

Shab'be-thai (shāb'ē-thi) [born on the Sabbath]. A chief Levite, prominent in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:15; Neh. 8:7; 11:16).

Sha-chi'a (shā-kī'ā) [Jehovah has hedged about]. A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim (I Chron. 8:10).

Sha'drach (shā'drāk) [perhaps, Akkad. Shudur (command of)+Sumerian Aku (the moon-god); but it may be merely a perversion of Marduk]. The name given by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon to Hananiah, 1 of the 3 faithful Hebrews afterward miraculously saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:7; 3:12-30).

Sha'gee (shā'gē), in A.V. Sha'ge (shā'gē) [wandering]. A Hararite, the father of one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:34). Some expositors would read Agee instead of Shage, on the ground of II Sam. 23:11. The more appropriate comparison with II Sam. 23:32, 33, and the reading of Lucian's recension of the LXX render more probable the conjecture that the name is really Shammah; see SHAMMAH 3.

Sha'ha-ra'im (shā'hā-rā'im) [the double dawning]. A Benjamite, who had numerous descendants (I Chron. 8:8).

Sha'ha-zu'mah (shā'hā-zō'mā), in A.V. Sha'ha-zil'mah (shā'hā-zil'mā), as in Heb. marg. [perhaps, lofty places]. A town on the border of Issachar between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. 19:22); identified with Tell el-Mekarkash (Mukarkash), at the junction of Wadi Sherrār and Wadi Tuffāh.

Sha'lem (shālēm) [entire, safe]. A town near Shechem (Gen. 33:18), according to the Gr., Lat., and Syriac versions, followed by A.V. It is scarcely Salem (Gen. 14:18), for that town is probably Jerusalem; nor Salim, 4 miles e. of Shechem, which is not mentioned in the O.T. The word is probably a common noun, to be rendered, with R.V., "in peace or safety."

Sha'lim (shāl'im). See SHAALIM.

Shal-l'shah (shā-lī'shā), in A.V. Shal-l'sha (shā-lī'shā) [a third part]. A district apparently in the hill country of Ephraim, traversed by Saul in quest of his father's asses (I Sam. 9:4); probably n.e. of Lydda on the w. slope of the range. It does not seem to be the same as Baal-shalishah.

Shal'te-cheth (shāl'tē-kēth) [casting out]. A gate of Solomon's Temple on the w. (I Chron. 26:16).

Shal'tum (shāl'ūm) [recompense]. 1. A son of Naphtali (I Chron. 7:13); see SHILLEM.

2. A descendant of Simeon through Shaul (I Chron. 4:24, 25).

3. A descendant of Judah through Sisamai (I Chron. 2:40, 41).

4. The chief porter at the sanctuary (I Chron. 9:17, 18). If before the Exile, as is probable, he is mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. 35:4). He was a son of Kore, a Korahite, and he and his family were keepers of the gates of the sanctuary (I Chron. 9:19). The name Shallum may be equivalent to Meshelemiah or Shelemiah (ch. 26:1, 14), according to whether the registry of ch. 9 is referred to the time before or after the Exile. A comparison of ch. 9:21 with ch. 26:2 raises a strong presumption against the identification. If notwithstanding this the registry be regarded as postexilic and Shallum be identified with Shelemiah, then Shallum is not the name of a person, but of the family, in the registry.

5. A son of Jabesh, who murdered King Zechariah and reigned in his stead over the 10 tribes, but in a month was himself assassinated by Menahem (II Kings 15:8-15).

6. Father of a certain Jehizkiah (II Chron. 28:12).

7. A member of the high-priestly family of Zadok, and an ancestor of Ezra. He lived several generations before the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (I Chron. 6:12-15; Ezra 7:2). Called Meshullam in I Chron. 9:11; see MESHULLAM 4.

8. A son of Tikvah, and the husband of Huldah, the prophetess, and in the reign of Josiah the officer who had charge either of the priests' garments which were kept in the Temple or of the king's wardrobe (II Kings 22:14; II Chron. 34:22).

9. Uncle of Jeremiah, and the father of Hanameel (Jer. 32:7, 8). He was not a member of the high-priestly family, as some have thought; for his son lived at Anathoth, a town where priests of Ithamar's line represented by Abiathar dwelt (I Kings 2:26), and the high priests of this time belonged to the line of Eleazar.

10. Another name for Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, king of Judah (II Kings 23:30; Jer. 22:11); see JEHOAHAZ 3.

11 and 12. A porter of the Temple, and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24, 42).

13. A son of Hallohesh, ruler of half the district of Jerusalem. With his daughters, he repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:12).

Shal'un (shāl'ūn) [perhaps, same as Shal-lum]. A ruler of part of Mizpah, who repaired the gate of the fountains at Jerusalem (Neh. 3:15).

Shal'mai (shāl'mī). See SALMAI.

Shal'man (shāl'mān). Tiglath-pileser mentions Salamanu of Moab among the various princes who were tributary to him, and Schrader believes that this person is Shalman, the destroyer of Beth-arbel, to whom Hosea refers (Hos. 10:14), and that Beth-arbel is the town of that name e. of the Jordan, near Pella. These identifications may be correct, but they are unsupported. It is not known that Salamanu of Moab invaded the land of Israel, but it is known that Shalmaneser of Assyria did. In the light of present knowledge, it is more natural to regard Shalman as an abbreviation of Shulmanu-asharidu (shortened in II Kings to Shalmaneser), and to think of Beth-arbel as being the town of Galilee, from which Shalmaneser's army was certainly not far distant. See SHALMANESER 3.

Shal'mane'ser (shāl'mān-ē'zēr) [Assyrian Shulmanu-asharidu, god Shulman is chief]. The name of several Assyrian kings: 1. Shalmaneser I, the builder, or rather rebuild, and fortifier of the town of Calah (q.v.). He reigned 1280-1260 B.C.

2. Shalmaneser III, the son of Ashur-nasir-pal. He reigned from c. 860 to 825 B.C., and was the 1st Assyrian king who came into conflict with the Israelites. He was energetic and persistent in purpose. He crossed the Euphrates with hostile intent as early as his 1st year and wasted the Hittite country as far as the Mediterranean; and he repeatedly crossed the river later, besides waging war in the countries n., e., and s., of Nineveh. To resist him in the w., the Syrian league was formed, which included Damascus, Hamath, and the 12 kings of the coast, and was at times re-enforced by the soldiers of the neighboring nations. Thus, for instance, the army of Ahab of Israel was found fighting side by side with the men of Damascus against the common Assyrian foe at Karkar, (854) 853 B.C.; see AHAB 1, BEN-HADAD 2. Shalmaneser claims to have won the battle of Karkar; but he gained nothing if he did, and at once led his army back to Nineveh. After 3 years he returned, but his onward course was again stopped by the allies. The following year, the 11th of his reign, he crossed the Euphrates and plundered many towns of the kingdom of Hamath, but he was again checked. In his 14th year he returned and conquered. The power of the league was broken. In his 18th year, 842 B.C., he defeated Hazael of Damascus at Mount Hermon. The kings of Tyre and Sidon, and Jehu of Israel, in dismay hastened to make submission by sending tribute.

3. Successor of Tiglath-pileser. He reigned from 728/7 B.C. to 722 B.C. In 725 he undertook an expedition to foreign parts. According to the Syrian annals cited by Josephus, Shalmaneser overran Phoenicia. On the approach of the Assyrians, Sidon, Acre, and Tyre on the mainland revolted from the dominion of island Tyre and acknowledged the suzerainty of the invader. The Assyrian king thereupon withdrew. He returned, however, to war against the island. His ships, manned by his Phoenician subjects, were scattered by the Tyrians in a naval engagement. After this defeat Shalmaneser marched away, leaving troops enough to maintain a siege of the city, which was sustained for 5 years (Jos. Antiq. ix. 14, 2), when Tyre submitted to Sargon. When Shalmaneser arrived in the w., Hoshea paid him tribute, as he had done to his predecessor, but he soon stopped his payments, relying upon So of Egypt to aid him in fighting the Assyrians and perhaps encouraged by the stern resistance of Tyre. Shalmaneser promptly had him seized and imprisoned. After seizing the king, whether at Arbela in Galilee or elsewhere, Shalmaneser laid siege to the capital. Samaria stood this siege for 3 years and then fell into the hands of the Assyrians (II Kings 17:1-6; 18:9, 10). See SARGON.

Sha'ma (shā'má) [he (God) has heard]. A son of Hotham, the Aroerite. He was one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:44).

Sham'a-ri'ah (shām'á-rí'á). See SHEMARIAH.

Sha'med (shā'mēd). See SHEMAED.

Sha'mer (shā'mēr). See SHEMAER.

Sham'gar (shām'gār) [probably Hurrian, Shimig-ar(i), (the god) Shimike gavel]. A son of Anath (Judg. 3:31). Shortly before the time of Deborah, for fear of the Philistines, travelers avoided the highways and crept along by-paths (ch. 5:6). But Shamgar fought single-handed with the oppressors. Their dead, slain from time to time by his oxgoad, at length amounted to 600. He thus saved Israel (ch. 3:31); but he is not called a judge, and no years are assigned him in the chronology.

Sham'huth (shām'hūth) [desolation, appallment]. An Izrahite, David's captain for the 5th month (I Chron. 27:8). Perhaps identical with Shammah, one of David's mighty men. See SHAMMAH 4.

Sha'mir (shā'mēr) [thorn, flint]. 1. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:48); the name is represented by the ruin Sömerah, about 13 miles w.s.w. of Hebron, but the old site was probably at el-Bireh.

2. A town in Mount Ephraim, which the judge Tola, though a man of Issachar, made his residence, and where he was buried (Judg. 10:1, 2). Sanūr between Samaria and Engannim has been suggested, but Codex Alexandrinus has Samaria.

3. A Levite, a son of Micah (I Chron. 24:24).

Sham'ma (shām'á) [desolation, appallment]. An Asherite, a son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:37).

Sham'mah (shām'á) [desolation, appallment]. 1. A descendant of Esau and also of Ishmael (Gen. 36:3, 4, 13, 17). He became a chief of Edom (v. 17).

2. Third son of Jesse, and brother of David (I Sam. 16:9; 17:13). See SHIMEA 3.

3. One of David's first 3 mighty men, a son of Agee, a Hararite (II Sam. 23:11). Shammah the Hararite is named in v. 33; and, in view of I Chron. 11:34 and textual considerations, is reasonably believed to be this person mentioned again as father of Jonathan. The words in Samuel and Chronicles are to be read: "Jonathan, son of Shammah the Hararite." See SHAGEE.

4. A Harodite, also one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:25). In I Chron. 11:27 the pl. form Shammoth is used. Shamhuth of I Chron. 27:8 is perhaps another external and unessential variation of this man's name.

Sham'ma-i (shām'á-i) [perhaps, (Jehovah) has heard]. 1. A son of Onam, house of Jerahmeel, tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:28).

2. A son of Rekem, house of Caleb, tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:44).

3. A son of a certain Ezrah, registered with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:17).

Sham'moth (shām'óth) [desolations]. See SHAMMAH 4.

Sham-mu'a (shā-mū'á), in A.V. once Sham-mu'ah (shā-mū'á) (II Sam. 5:14) [heard (by God)]. 1. The representative from the tribe of Reuben sent to spy out the Land of Canaan (Num. 13:4).

2. A son of David by Bath-sheba, born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:14; I Chron. 3:5); see BATH-SHUA 2. He bore an uncle's name (R.V., I Chron. 2:13). In I Chron. 3:5 he is called Shimea, an unessential variant, having the same meaning as Shammua.

3. A Levite descended from Jeduthun (Neh. 11:17).

4. A priest in the days of the high priest Joiakim. He was head of the father's house of Bilgah (Neh. 12:18).

Sham'she-rai (shām'shē-rī). A Benjamite, a son of Jeroham (I Chron. 8:26).

Sha'pham (shā'fām). A Gadite dwelling in Bashan (I Chron. 5:12).

Sha'phan (shā'fān) [hyrax, rock badger]. A scribe in the reign of Josiah. When Hilkiah found the Book of the Law, he gave it to Shaphan, who read it at first privately, and then to the king. Afterward he was one of those who went to Huldah, the prophetess, to consult her regarding the threatenings contained in the book (II Kings 22:8-14). He was the father of Ahikam (Jer. 26:24; 39:14), Elasah (Jer. 29:3), Gemariah (Jer. 36:10), and Jaazaniah (Ezek. 8:11), and the grandfather of Gedaliah (II Kings 25:22).

Sha'phat (shā'fāt) [he has judged]. 1. The representative from the tribe of Simeon who was sent to spy out the Land of Canaan (Num. 13:5).

2. A Gadite in Bashan (I Chron. 5:12).

3. Son of Adlai, and David's overseer of the herds that were in the valleys (I Chron. 27:29).

4. Father of the Prophet Elisha (I Kings 19:16).

5. A son of Shemaiah, registered with the descendants of David (I Chron. 3:22).

Sha'pher (shā'fēr). See SHEPHER.

Sha'phir (shā'fēr), in A.V. Shā'phir [beautiful]. A town in Judah (Micah 1:11); not identified. Robinson and others locate it at es-Suwāfir, 3½ miles s.e. of Ashdod.

Sha-ra'ī (shā-rā'ī) [perhaps, (Jehovah has set) free]. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

Sha-ra'im (shā-rā'im). See SHAARATIM.

Sha'rar (shā'rēr) [Aram., firm]. A Hara-rite, father of one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:33). Called in I Chron. 11:35 Sacar.

Sha-re'zer (shā-rē'zēr), in A.V. Shere'zer in Zech. 7:2 [Akkad., protect the king]. 1. A son of Sennacherib. With one of his brothers he murdered his father (II Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38).

2. A man sent from Beth-el to the priests at Jerusalem to inquire whether the fasts should be kept now that the cause for them no longer existed (Zech. 7:2).

Shar'on (shār'ūn), in A.V. of N.T. Sa'ron (Acts 9:35) [a plain]. 1. The seacoast between Joppa and Carmel, and extending back to the hills of Samaria. It was a fertile region (Isa. 35:2), a pasture land for flocks (I Chron. 27:29; Isa. 65:10); but like a desert when devastated (Isa. 33:9). Among its flowers, lilies and anemones are prominent; see LILY, ROSE. Lydda was at its s. limit (cf. Acts 9:35). Its length is about 50 miles, its breadth 9 or 10. It is not flat, but agreeably undulated, with here and there groves of oak, and with excellent pasturage, except that in places thorns and thistles too much abound.

2. A pasture region e. of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:16). One suggestion is that Sharon is a corruption of Sirion (Hermon), and accordingly it would be the pasture lands of Hermon. Another view is that the mishōr or tableland of Gilead between the Arnon and Heshbon is meant (cf. Deut. 3:10).

Sha'ru'hen (shā-rōō'hēn). A village in the territory of Simeon (Josh. 19:6), apparently the place called Shaaraim (I Chron. 4:31) and Shilhim (Josh. 15:32); identified with Tell el-Fār'ah, about 15½ miles s.s.e. of Gaza.

Sha'shai (shā'shī) [perhaps, whitish, pale]. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:40).

Sha'shak (shā'shāk). A Benjamite, a son of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:14, 25).

Sha'ul (shā'ūl) [asked (of God)]. 1. A king of Edom, from Rehoboth on the Euphrates (Gen. 36:37, in A.V. Saul; I Chron. 1:48).

2. A son of Simeon by a Canaanitish woman (Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15; I Chron. 1:48). He founded a tribal family (Num. 26:13).

3. A Kohathite Levite, descended through Korah, Abiasaph, and Tahath (I Chron. 6:24).

Sha'veh (shā'vē) [a plain]. A valley, afterward called the king's dale, near Salem, in which the king of Sodom met Abraham after the defeat of Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:17, 18). Absalom reared a memorial pillar for himself there (II Sam. 18:18), which according to Josephus stood about a quarter of a mile from Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. vii. 10, 3).

Sha'veh-kir'ia-tha'im (shā'vē-kir'yā-thā'im), in A.V. Sha'veh Kir'ia-tha'im (shā'vē kir'yā-thā'im) [plain of Kiriathaim]. A plain near the city of Kiriathaim, in the territory afterward assigned to Reuben. It was at first inhabited by Emim (Gen. 14:5). Exact situation unknown.

Shav'sha (shāv'shā) and Shi'sha. A scribe of David and afterward of Solomon (I Chron. 18:16; I Kings 4:3). Probably identical with the scribe Seraiah (II Sam. 8:17) and doubtless with the scribe Sheva (II Sam. 20:25).

She'al (shē'āl) [asking]. A son of Bani induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:29).

Sheul'tiel (shē-āl'tī-ēl), in A.V. of I Chron. 3:17 and of N.T. Sa-la'thiel, the Gr. form [I have asked God]. A son of King Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:17; Matt. 1:12) and also of Nerl (Luke 3:27). He was the father of Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2; etc.), and yet apparently his uncle, or possibly, though not probably, his grandfather (I Chron. 3:17-19). The explanation probably is that, while neither the son of Jeconiah nor the father of Zerubbabel after the flesh, he was the legitimate successor of Jeconiah to the royal title, and on his own death the right to the throne passed to Zerubbabel. He is the link in the royal succession connecting Jeconiah with Zerubbabel. See ASSIR 3, ZERUBBABEL, and GENEALOGY, II.

She'ar'iah (shē'ā-rī'ā) [Jehovah has esteemed]. A descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:38).

Shear'ing House. The place where Jehu slew the 42 brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah, who were going to Ahaziah at Samaria while he was on a visit to the wounded king of Israel (II Kings 10:12-14). It took its name either from the fact that shepherds there bound the sheep which they were about to shear, or because they were in the habit of meeting there (Targum; R.V. marg.). The Heb. name is Bēth 'ēked hārō'im, and is probably to be identified with Beit Kād, about 3 miles e. by n. of En-gannim, and about 16 n.e. by n. of Samaria.

She'ar-ja'shub (shē'ār-jā'shūb) [a remnant shall return]. A son of Isaiah. His name was designed to embody a prophecy (Isa. 7:3; cf. ch. 10:21).

She'ba, I (shē'bā) [Heb. Shēbā']. A people of Cushite genealogy descended through Raamah and closely related to Dedan (Gen. 10:7), but also classed as a Semitic people descended through Joktan (v. 28) and, like Dedan, from Abraham through Jokshan (ch. 25:3). So far as connected with Abraham, they migrated e. (Gen. 25:6; cf. Job 1:15; 6:19). See ARABIA. They dwelt in the s. (Matt. 12:42), and traded in gold, incense, and precious stones (I Kings 10:1 seq.; Ps. 72:10; Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22; 38:13). Sheba was a country and people of s.w. Arabia, well known from its own records and classical geographers. Its capital was Marib, where was the famous great dam, which after various earlier breaks and repairs finally broke sometime between A.D. 542 and 570. The Sabaeans were a great commercial people. They traded not only in the products of their own land, but also in those of India and Ethiopia. Their language was s. Arabic. They spread widely and were in n.w. Arabia in Assyrian times (8th century B.C.), and in the n. desert along with the Nabataeans. It is readily conceivable that in their dispersion they became mingled with other tribes by intermarriage or attached to them by political relations, and hence they might trace their descent by different lines and be classed variously in a genealogy.

She'ba, II (shē'bā) [Heb. sheba', seven, an oath]. 1. A Simeonite town, mentioned after Beer-sheba (Josh. 19:2). Three views are entertained regarding it: (1) Its site may be Tell es-Seb'a, 3 miles e. of Beer-sheba. (2) It is a corruption of Shema (cf. LXX and Josh. 15:26). (3) Since it is lacking in I Chron. 4:28, and this agrees with the summation in Josh. 19:6, it is an abbreviated form of Beer-sheba (see R.V.) or accidentally introduced into the text by dittography.

2. A Benjaminite, a son of Bichri. After the collapse of Absalom's rebellion and the concurrence of the 10 tribes with Judah in restoring David to his throne, Sheba blew a trumpet, and summoned the 10 tribes to renounce their allegiance. He was besieged in Abel of Beth-maacah and lost his life there, for the inhabitants cut off his head and threw it over the wall to Joab (II Sam. 20:1-22).

3. A Gadite dwelling in Gilead in Bashan (I Chron. 5:13, 16).

She'bah (shē'bā). See SHIBAH.

She'bam (shē'bām). See SIEMAH.

Sheb'a-ni'ah (shēb'ā-ni'ā) [perhaps, Jehovah has brought me back]. 1. A Levite who was a trumpeter in David's time (I Chron. 15:24).

2. A father's house among the priests in the generation after the Exile (Neh. 12:14); see SHECANIAH 3. Its representative set his seal to the covenant (Neh. 10:4).

3. A Levite who assisted at the feast of tabernacles in Ezra's time (Neh. 9:4, 5), and in behalf of his house sealed the covenant (ch. 10:10).

4. Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:12).

Sheb'a-rim (shēb'ā-rim) [breakings; perhaps, quarries]. A locality near Ai (Josh. 7:5). Site unknown.

She'bat' (shē-bāt'), in A.V. Se'bat, and I Macc. 16:14, A.V. Sa'bat, R.V. Se'bat [Heb. shēbāt from Akkad. shabātu]. The 11th month of the year (Zech. 1:7); see YEAR.

She'ber (shē'bēr) [cf. Arab. sabr, lion; Aram. shabrā, childish, simple]. A son of Caleb, by his concubine Maacah (I Chron. 2:48).

Sheb'na (shēb'nā), twice Sheb'nah (shēb'nā) (II Kings 18:18, 26) [perhaps, short form of Shebaniah]. The steward of the king's house under Hezekiah (Isa. 22:15), a man of great influence, apparently a foreigner, and fond of display (vs. 16, 18). As was customary among the wealthy, he built himself a sepulcher in his lifetime (v. 16). Isaiah rebuked him, calling him the shame of his lord's house, and predicted his fall and his retirement from Judah, and the elevation of Eliakim to his place (vs. 17-25). Probably later, in 701 B.C., Eliakim held the position of house steward, while Shebna was only Hezekiah's scribe or secretary (II Kings 18:18, 26, 37; 19:2).

She-bu'el (shē-bū'el), in LXX and Lucian everywhere Shu'ba-el [return, O God]. 1. A son of Gershon, and a grandson of Moses (I Chron. 23:16; 26:24; in ch. 24:20 Shubael).

2. A son of Heman, in David's time (I Chron. 25:4; in v. 20 Shubael).

Shec'a-ni'ah (shēk'ā-ni'ā), in A.V. Shech'a-ni'ah (shēk'ā-ni'ā) except I Chron. 24:11; II Chron. 31:15 [Jehovah has dwelt]. 1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and became the 10th of the 24 courses into which David divided the priests (I Chron. 24:1, 6, 11).

2. A Levite in King Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:15).

3. A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. 12:3, 7). In the next generation a father's house probably bore his name, although it is written Shebaniah (v. 14); for the possibility of misreading kaph (k) as beth (b) cf. these letters in the table under ALPHABET. See SHEBANIAH 2.

4. Founder of a family, presumably a descendant of David, but not in the line of succession to the throne (I Chron. 3:21, 22), for he is loosely registered, his kinship with Zerubbabel not being given. Perhaps his was the family of which the representative returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:3). The name of this representative has probably fallen out of the Hebrew text between Shecaniah and the words "of the sons of Parosh." The parallel passage, I Esdras 8:29, R.V., has: "Of the sons of David, Attus the son of Sechenias." This agrees indeed with the fact that Hattush was a grandson of Shecaniah (I Chron. 3:22), but it is not supported by either the LXX or Hebrew of Ezra 8:3.

5. A son of Jahaziel and descendant of Zattu, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:5, LXX; I Esdras 8:32).

6. A son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam. He confessed the guilt of himself and his brethren who had married foreign wives, and proposed to Ezra that they should put them away (Ezra 10:2, 3).

7. Father of Shemaiah, the keeper of the gate in Nehemiah's time, and probably a Levite (Neh. 3:29), and not the man of Judah (I Chron. 3:22).

8. Father-in-law of Tobiah, the Ammonite. He was the son of Arah (Neh. 6:18).

She'chem (shē'kēm), in A.V. once Si'chem (Gen. 12:6), twice Sy'chem (Acts 7:16), Gr. forms [shoulder]. 1. A walled town (Gen. 33:18; cf. ch. 34:20), by Mount Gerizim (Judg. 9:7), in the hill-country of Ephraim (Josh. 20:7). Abraham camped near it (Gen. 12:6). He found Canaanites in the land, but Jehovah told him that this was the land promised him for his descendants. Jacob, coming back to the Promised Land, found a tribe of Hivites inhabiting Shechem (Gen. 34:2). He bought a parcel of ground from them (Gen. 33:18, 19), where Joseph's body was eventually buried (Josh. 24:32; in Acts 7:16 confused by Stephen with Abraham's purchase of Machpelah). On account of the mistreatment of their sister, Simeon and Levi broke treaty and massacred the male inhabitants, and the sons of Jacob pillaged the town (Gen. 34:25-29; 48:22). Jacob condemned the deed (chs. 34:30; 49:5-7). Joseph's brothers for a time fed their flocks near Shechem (ch. 37:12, 13). The town fell into the hands of the Habirū in the 15th century B.C. (Tell el-Amarna letters). In the vale of Shechem the tribes assembled solemnly to assume obligation to the Law of Jehovah (Josh. 8:30). The boundary between the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh passed near it (Josh. 17:7), and it was one of the cities of refuge and a Levitical city (chs. 20:7; 21:21). Joshua summoned the tribes thither to hear his farewell address (ch. 24:1). In the time of the Judges, a temple of Baal-berith was maintained in the town (Judg. 8:33; 9:4). Gideon's concubine lived there; and her son, Abimelech, was for a time assisted in his political designs by its citizens cupies the bottom of the valley, at its narrowest point, where the 2 mountains are only 100 yards apart, and climbs the slope of Gerizim to the foot of the cliffs. There is still a small community of Samaritans at and around Nablus.

2. The son of Hamor, the Hivite, who was prince of Shechem (Gen., ch. 34).

3. A son of Gilead, and the founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:31; Josh. 17:2).

4. A Manassite, a son of Shemidah (I Chron. 7:19).

Shed'e'ur (shēd'ē-ēr) [Shaddai (the One of the mountains) shines (shows favor to me)]. Father of Elizur, the Reubenite chief in the wilderness (Num. 1:5; 2:10).

Sheep. Sheep were early domesticated (Gen. 4:2). They were herded by the Hebrew Patriarchs (Gen. 12:16), and by their descendants when sojourning in Egypt and when settled

The Village of Nablus, the Ancient Shechem

(Judg. 9:1, 3, 6), but they turned against him and he destroyed the town (vs. 23, 45). At Shechem the 10 tribes rejected Rehoboam and made Jeroboam king (I Kings 12:1-19); Jeroboam fortified the town, and occupied it for a time as his capital (v. 25). It continued in existence after the fall of the Northern Kingdom (Jer. 41:5); and became the chief city of the Samaritans (Ecclus. 50:26; Jos. Antiq. xi. 8, 6). It was captured by John Hyrcanus (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 9, 1). Shechem, or Nablus, is about 31½ miles n. of Jerusalem and 5½ s.e. of Samaria. It lies in the upland valley bounded by Mount Ebal on the n., and Mount Gerizim on the s. The valley was known as Mabatha, the defile, being a pass from the seacoast to the Jordan; and Vespasian, leading his army from Emmaus to Jericho, camped at Shechem for a night (Jos. War iv. 8, 1). After the war Shechem was rebuilt, and the new town was named Flavia Neapolis in honor of Flavius Vespasian, then Roman emperor. This name still persists in the form Nablus. The original settlement was probably at the e. end of the valley, at Tell Balāṭa, which hides walls of great strength and thickness. The town today stands at the w. end of the pass, at the watershed, 1,870 feet above sea level. It occupies the bottom of the valley, at its narrowest point, where the 2 mountains are only 100 yards apart, and climbs the slope of Gerizim to the foot of the cliffs. There is still a small community of Samaritans at and around Nablus.

2. The son of Hamor, the Hivite, who was prince of Shechem (Gen., ch. 34).

3. A son of Gilead, and the founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:31; Josh. 17:2).

4. A Manassite, a son of Shemidah (I Chron. 7:19).

Shed'e'ur (shēd'ē-ēr) [Shaddai (the One of the mountains) shines (shows favor to me)]. Father of Elizur, the Reubenite chief in the wilderness (Num. 1:5; 2:10).

Sheep. Sheep were early domesticated (Gen. 4:2). They were herded by the Hebrew Patriarchs (Gen. 12:16), and by their descendants when sojourning in Egypt and when settled in Canaan (Ex. 10:9; 12:32, 38; I Chron. 27:31), even down to the latest times (Luke 2:3). The wilderness of Judea and the s. country, and the plateau of Moab, were pasture lands (Num. 32:1; Judg. 5:16; I Sam. 16:11; 25:2); and so was the country around Haran (Gen. 29:2), and the land of Midian (Ex. 2:16), and of Uz and the Hagarenes (Job 1:3; I Chron. 5:20, 21), and of the tribes of Kedar and Nebaioth (Isa. 60:7; Ezek. 27:21; cf. I Sam. 15:7, 9). In these regions the sheep, owing to the heat and dryness of the climate, require water daily (Gen. 29:7-10; Ex. 2:16-19). The sheep was a clean animal and used for food; its flesh was eaten (I Sam. 14:32; 25:18; II Sam. 17:29; I Kings 4:23), and the rich milk of the ewes was drunk (Deut. 32:14; Isa. 7:21, 22; I Cor. 9:7). The skin served as rude clothing (Heb. 11:37; cf. Zech. 13:4; Matt. 7:15), and it was sometimes used in covering tents (Ex. 26:14). From the wool, cloth was woven (Lev. 13:47, 48; Job 31:20; Prov. 27:26; Ezek. 34:3); hence wool was a valuable commodity, and was rendered as tribute (II Kings 3:4; Isa. 16:1). Sheepshearing was made a time of feasting and frolic (Gen. 38:12; I Sam. 25:4, 11, 36; II Sam. 13:23). The horns of rams served as flasks and trumpets (Josh. 6:4; I Sam. 16:1). As the sheep was a clean animal, it was used in sacrifice by the Hebrews and other peoples (Ex. 20:24; Num. 22:40; John 2:14). An animal of the flock might be taken for a burnt offering (Lev. 1:10), a sin offering of the common people (ch. 4:32), a guilt and a trespass offering (chs. 5:15; 6:6), and a peace offering (ch. 22:21); see LAMB, RAM, I. 1. The sheep was known for its affection (II Sam. 12:3), docility (John 10:3, 4), meekness and submissiveness (Isa. 53:7; Jer. 11:19), helplessness when left to itself (Micah 5:8; Matt. 10:16), and its need of guidance (Num. 27:17; Ezek. 34:5; Matt. 9:36; 26:31).

The sheep of Palestine and the adjacent regions are usually white (Ps. 147:16; Isa. 1:18; Ezek. 27:18), but occasionally they are black or brown, or piebald, either white and tawny or white and black (Gen. 30:32). Two breeds of sheep are found in Palestine. In the n. districts a short-wooled variety is raised, of which both the rams and ewes are horned. But the broad-tailed sheep (Ovis laticaudata) is more general. It has been bred since early ages in Arabia and Palestine (Herod. iii. 113; cf. Ex. 29:22; Lev. 3:9; 7:3; 8:25). The tails which are offered for sale in the markets ordinarily weigh 10 or 15 pounds; but when the sheep is well fattened, the tail grows to an enormous size. The Arabs regard it as a delicacy, frying it in slices.

Sheep'fold' and Sheep'cote'. An enclosure for sheep (Jer. 23:3; Ezek. 34:14), whither the flock was ordinarily driven for the night. Many were permanent pens, surrounded by a stone wall (cf. Num. 32:16) and entered by a gate (John 10:1). The wall was often surmounted with branches of thorny shrubs. The sheep lay in the yard under the open sky; but doubtless there were in former days, as there are now, low, flat buildings on the sheltered side of the area, in which the flocks were shut up on cold nights. It was common for several flocks to pass the night in one fold under the care of an undershepherd, who guarded the door. The shepherds came in the morning, and were admitted by the undershepherd. Each shepherd knew the sheep of his own flock and was known by them (John 10:2-5). Less substantial inclosures were hastily formed of tangled thorn branches for temporary use on pastures remote from home, and caves and other natural shelters were also taken advantage of for protecting the sheep at night, the shepherds camping with their flocks. On ranges exposed to the raids of robbers or hostile tribes, towers were erected, about which the flocks and herds were pastured and at night folded (II Chron. 26:10; Micah 4:8).

Sheep Gate. See JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Sheep Mar'ket, in R.V. Sheep Gate. See JERUSALEM, II. 3.

She'e'rah (shê'ê-râ), in A.V. She'rah [consanguinity, a female relative]. A daughter of Ephraim, or perhaps of Beriah. She or rather her descendants built upper and nether Beth-horon and Uzzan-sheerah (I Chron. 7:24). She may have married Becher and given rise to the tribal family of the Becherites.

She'har'i'ah (shê'hâ-rî'â) [Jehovah is the dawn]. A Benjamite, son of Jeroham (I Chron. 8:26).

Shek'el [weight]. A weight used for metals (Gen. 24:22; I Sam. 17:5, 7); see WEIGHTS. At an early period this quantity of silver, uncoined, was a recognized standard in financial transactions (Gen. 23:15, 16). Half a shekel was to be given by each man as a ransom for his life when a census was taken (Ex. 30:14, 15). The standard shekel weighed 11.46 grams (metric system), or 176.85 grains.

There are 437½ grains in one ounce avoirdupois, and thus 2½ shekels would be slightly heavier than one ounce avoirdupois. Discoveries at Kiriath-sepher now prove what scholars had concluded inductively concerning the weight of the shekel. It is important that we do not identify this weight with the coin bearing the same name. See MONEY, WEIGHTS.

She-ki'nah (shê-kî'nâ) [the earthly presence (dwelling) of God]. See THEOPHANY.

She'tah, I (shê'lâ), in A.V. of Genesis Sa'tah, of N.T. Sa'la, in imitation of Gr. form [a shoot, a sprout], 1. The son of Arphaxad (Gen. 10:24; 11:12-15; I Chron. 1:18).

2. A pool at Jerusalem, near the king's garden, erroneously translated in A.V. Siloah (Neh. 3:15). See SHILOAH, SILLOAM.

She'tah, II (shê'lâ). The 3d son of Judah by a Canaanite woman. He was the founder of a tribal family (Gen. 38:2, 5, 11, 14, 26; Num. 26:20).

She'e-mi'ah (shê'lê-mî'â) [Jehovah has recompensed]. 1. A doorkeeper of the sanctuary in David's time (I Chron. 26:13, 14). See MESHELEMI'AH.

2. Son of Cush (Jer. 36:14).

3. Son of Abdeel (Jer. 36:26).

4. Son of Hananiah (Jer. 37:13).

5. Father of Jucal (Jer. 38:1).

6, 7. Two men, descendants of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:39, 41).

8. Father of that Hananiah who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:30).

9. A priest whom Nehemiah appointed as one of 3 treasurers who were commissioned to distribute the tithes among the Levites (Neh. 13:13).

She'leph (shê'lêf) [cf. Arab. salafa, to till]. A Semitic people descended through Joktan (Gen. 10:26; I Chron. 1:20), and doubtless dwelling in s. Arabia. The name is a common one in Yemen.

She'lesh (shê'lêsh) [triad; but cf. Arab. salis, obedient, meek]. An Asherite, son of Helem (I Chron. 7:35).

She-lo'mi (shê-lô'mî) [at peace, complete, perfect]. Father of Ahihud, who was prince of Asher in the latter part of the wilderness wanderings (Num. 34:27).

She-lo'mith (shê-lô'mîth) [fem. of Shelomi].

1. A Danite, a daughter of Dibri, and mother of the Israelite who was put to death in the wilderness for blasphemy (Lev. 24:11).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (I Chron. 23:18). Called Shelomoth in ch. 24:22.

3. A descendant of Moses through Eliezer. He and his brethren were appointed by David over the dedicated treasures (I Chron. 26:25, 26, in R.V., following the Heb. text, Shelomoth; cf. ch. 23:15-17).

4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (I Chron. 23:9, in R.V. Shelomoth).

5. A son or daughter of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:20).

6. Son of Josiphiah (Ezra 8:10). The Heb. text is faulty. The LXX shows that he was a member of the family of Bani: "Of the sons of Baani, Salimouth, son of Iôsephia."

7. A daughter of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:19).

She-lo'moth (shê-lô'môth). See SHELOMITH 2.

She-lu'mi-el (shê-lû'mî-êl) [El (God) is welfare, peace]. The prince of the tribe of Simeon early in the wilderness wanderings (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19).

Shem (shêm), in A.V. of N.T. Sem [name, renown]. One of the 2 elder sons of Noah (Gen. 10:1, 21; cf. ch. 9:24), and probably the first-born (ch. 5:32). For explanation of ch. 11:10, see CHRONOLOGY, I, 3, section relating to the period from the Creation to Abraham. With his descendants, he is mentioned last in the catalogue of Gen., ch. 10 in accordance with the author's custom of disposing of subordinate genealogies before presenting the main line of the people of God. He was born about the 500th year of Noah's life (see NOAH, I). At the time of the Deluge he was married, but had no children (Gen. 7:7; I Peter 3:20). After that catastrophe, he acted with filial respect to his father when the latter committed his great sin. Shem in consequence received a blessing, the wording of which implied that God would bless Shem and that the worship of the true God should continue in his family (Gen. 9:23, 27). He was progenitor of the people who inhabited or perhaps in some cases held in subjection Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram (ch. 10:21, 22).

Shē'ma (shēmā) [report, fame; or he (God) has heard]. 1. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:26); see SHEBA, II, 1.

2. A son of Hebron, belonging to the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:43, 44); see MARESHAH 2.

3. A Reubenite, a son of Joel (I Chron. 5:8; cf. v. 4).

4. A Benjamite, head of a father's house in Aijalon (I Chron. 8:13). Called in v. 21 Shimei, in A.V. Shimhi.

5. One of the men, probably priests, who assisted Ezra at the public reading of the Law (Neh. 8:4).

Shē'mā'ah (shē-mā'ā) [report, fame]. A Benjamite of Gibeah, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

Shē'mā'iah (shē-mā'yā) [Jehovah has heard]. 1. A Simeonite (I Chron. 4:37).

2. A Reubenite, a son of Joel (I Chron. 5:4).

3. A Levite, chief of the sons of Elizaphan, who to the number of 200 took part in the ceremonies attendant on the removal of the Ark from the house of Obed-edom to Mount Zion (I Chron. 15:8-11).

4. A Levite, a son of Nathanel. He was a scribe in the time of David, and noted down the 24 divisions then made of the priests (I Chron. 24:6).

5. Eldest son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:4). He was the father of various valiant sons who, with him, were doorkeepers of the tabernacle (vs. 6-8).

6. A prophet in the reign of Rehoboam, who forbade the king to attempt the conquest of the revolted 10 tribes (I Kings 12:22-24; II Chron. 11:2-4). Five years later, when Shishak invaded the land, he declared that the invasion was permitted as a punishment for sin. Thereupon the princes humbled themselves, and the affliction was made lighter (II Chron. 12:5-8). Shemaiah wrote a history of Rehoboam's reign (v. 15).

7. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (II Chron. 17:8).

8. A Levite, descendant of Jeduthun. He helped to cleanse the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:14, 15). He is, perhaps, the Levite mentioned in I Chron. 9:16, and he may be the person called Shammua in Neh. 11:17.

9. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign who, with others, had to distribute the firstlings, tithes, and gifts to the Levites in the cities (II Chron. 31:15).

10. A chief Levite in Josiah's reign who, with others, was liberal in his donations of animals for the passover services (II Chron. 35:9).

11. Father of Urijah, of Kiriath-jearim, who was put to death by King Jehoiakim for the true prophecies he had uttered (Jer. 26:20-23).

12. Father of Delaiah, the latter being a prince in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:12).

13. A Nehelamite, a false prophet among the exiles in Babylonia, who prophesied a speedy return from captivity. He wrote to the people of Jerusalem and the priest who had oversight of the Temple, and complained that Jeremiah, who declared that the Exile would be long, remained unpunished. When Jeremiah heard the complaint, he foretold that Shemaiah should leave no posterity and not live to see the Return (Jer. 29:24-32).

14. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6, 7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (v. 18).

15. A son of Adonikam, and one of the chief men who accompanied Ezra from the land of the Captivity to Canaan (Ezra 8:13).

16. A chief man whom Ezra sent with others to Iddo to obtain Levites who were lacking in the party leaving the land of the Captivity for Canaan (Ezra 8:16).

17 and 18. Two men, 1 descended from the priest Harim, and the other from the layman Harim, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:21, 31).

19. A son of Shecaniah (I Chron. 3:22); see SHECANIAH 4.

20. Keeper of the e. gate, and probably a Levite. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3:29); see SHECANIAH 7.

21. A Levite, descended from Bunni. He was an overseer of the business of the house of God in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 11:15; cf. I Chron. 9:14).

22. A false prophet, son of Delaiah, son of Mehetabel. He was hired by Tobiah and Sanballat to frighten Nehemiah into going with him into the Temple and shutting the doors to avoid assassination (Neh. 6:10-13). In carrying out his plan, he shut himself in his house and pretended to fear for his life.

23. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:8).

24. A prince of Judah who took part in the ceremonies at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:34).

25. A Levite of the lineage of Asaph (Neh. 12:35).

26. One of the company of Levite musicians at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

27. A priest who blew a trumpet on the same occasion (Neh. 12:42).

Shem'a-rī'ah (shēm'ā-rī'ā), in A.V. once Sham'a-rī'ah (II Chron. 11:19) [Jehovah has kept, preserved]. 1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

2. A son of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:19). 3 and 4. A son of Harim and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:32, 41).

Sheme'e'ber (shēm-ē'bēr). The king of Zebaim, defeated, with the other kings ruling over the cities of the Plain, by Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. 14:2, 8, 10).

Shē'med (shēm'mēd), in A.V. Sha'med, the pausal form [destruction]. A Benjamite, descended from Shaharaim through Elpaal. He was a rebuilder of Ono and Lod, with their dependent villages (I Chron. 8:12).

Shē'mer (shēm'mēr), in A.V. of Chronicles Sha'mer, the pausal form [guard, watcher]. 1. The man from whom Omri purchased the hill on which to build Samaria (I Kings 16:24).

2. A Merarite Levite, the son of Mahli (I Chron. 6:46).

3. An Asherite (I Chron. 7:34). The same as the Shomer of v. 32.

She-mi'da (shê-mi'dd), in A.V. once She-mi'dah (I Chron. 7:19) [the name (posterity) has known]. A son of Gilead, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:32; Josh. 17:2).

Shem'i-nith (shêm'i-nith) [eighth]. A musical term (I Chron. 15:21; and Psalms 6 and 12, titles). Perhaps, in contrast with alamoth, it means an octave lower, or, on the lower octave: tenor or bass (cf. I Chron. 15:19-21).

She-mir'a-moth (shê-mir'a-môth) [perhaps, name of heights]. 1. A Levite and singer in the reign of David (I Chron. 15:18, 20).

2. A Levite, one of those employed by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (II Chron. 17:8).

Shem-it'ic (shêm-it'ik). See SEMITIC.

She-mu'el (shê-mu'ël). The same Hebrew name as that commonly rendered Samuel (q.v.). 1. A son of Ammiud. He was appointed as the representative for the tribe of Simeon on the commission to divide Canaan (Num. 34:20).

2. A man of Issachar, family of Tola, and head of a father's house (I Chron. 7:2).

3. The Prophet Samuel (I Chron. 6:33, A.V.).

Shen (shên) [a tooth, a jagged rock]. A spot a little on one side of the place where Samuel set up the stone which he called Ebenezer (I Sam. 7:12). The text is suspicious. The Greek and Syriac versions indicate Jeshanah. See JESHANAH.

She-naz'zar (shê-nâz'är), in A.V. She-na'zar (shê-nâ'zär) [Akkad., O Sin (moon-god), protect]. A son or descendant of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:18).

She'nir (shê'nēr). See SENIR.

She'ol (shê'öl). See HELL 1.

She'pham (shê'fäm). A place on the n.e. border of Canaan, near Riblah (Num. 34:10, 11).

Sheph'a-ti'ah (shêf'a-ti'ä), in A.V. once erroneously Sheph'a-thi'ah (shêf'a-thi'ä) (I Chron. 9:8) [Jehovah has judged]. 1. A Haruphite, one of the Benjamites who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

2. A son born to David at Hebron by one of his wives, Abital (II Sam. 3:4; I Chron. 3:3).

3. Son of Maacah and head of the Simeonite tribe in David's reign (I Chron. 27:16).

4. The father of a Benjamite who dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:8).

5. A son of King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 21:2).

6. A prince, son of Mattan. He was one of those who advised Zedekiah to put the Prophet Jeremiah to death, as his unfavorable prophecies were discouraging the defenders of Jerusalem during its siege by Nebuchadnezzar's army (Jer. 38:1).

7. Founder of a family, 372 members of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:4; Neh. 7:9), and 81 more with Ezra (Ezra 8:8).

8. A man of Judah, family of Perez. He evidently lived before the Exile (Neh. 11:4).

9. A man whose descendants, classified with Solomon's servants, came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59).

She-phe'lah (shê-fê'lä) [low land]. A well-known name in the geography of Palestine, used, however, in the English versions only in I Macc. 12:38, A.V., and then in the form Sephela. See LOWLAND.

She'pher (shê'fēr), in A.V. Sha'pher [beauty, elegance]. A mountain constituting an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:23, 24).

Shep'herd. One whose occupation it is to take charge of a flock of sheep. Abel was a keeper of sheep (Gen. 4:2). The occupation of the Patriarchs from Abraham to Jacob and his sons was pastoral (ch. 13:1-6). There were nomad shepherds who owned flocks and herds, dwelt in tents, and moved from place to place to find pasture for their cattle and afford them protection, like Jabal, Abraham, and the Rechabites (Gen. 4:20; cf. ch. 13:2, 3, 18 with ch. 20:1; Jer. 35:6-10). There were also wealthy sheep owners who dwelt in towns while their flocks were driven from pasture to pasture by their servants (I Sam. 25:2, 3, 7, 15, 16; cf. Gen. 37:12-17). Then there was the settled shepherd, who led the flock from the permanent fold to the pasture in the morning, and in the evening brought it home again (John 10:1-4); see SHEEPFOLD. The care of the flock was often committed to a son (Gen. 37:2; I Sam. 16:11, 19), or a daughter (Gen. 29:9; Ex. 2:16, 17), or a hired servant (Gen. 30:31, 32; Zech. 11:12; John 10:12). The shepherd was ordinarily responsible to the owner for any loss of sheep (Gen. 31:39). The Mosaic Law relieved him of responsibility if he could prove that the loss was not due to his neglect (Ex. 22:10-13).

In the morning the shepherd went to the fold, where several flocks were lying, and called. His own sheep knew his voice and followed him. The sheep which belonged to other owners or were under the care of other keepers paid no attention to the strange voice (John 10:2-5). The shepherd led his own sheep to pasture, spent the day with them there, and sometimes the night also (Gen. 31:40; S. of Sol. 1:7; Luke 2:8); defended them from wild beasts and robbers (I Sam. 17:34, 35; Isa. 31:4); kept the restless sheep from trespassing on cultivated ground, searched for the strayed sheep, and brought them back (Ezek. 34:12; Luke 15:4); and tenderly cared for the delicate and the weak (Isa. 40:11; Ezek. 34:3, 4, 16; Zech. 11:9). The sheep which kept near the shepherd had each a name and answered to it, and were the recipients of many little kindnesses. Such is still the case in the Orient.

The shepherd carried a garment in which to wrap himself in inclement weather, a pouch for food, and some defensive weapon (I Sam. 17:40; Jer. 43:12). A long rod, doubtless generally in ancient times as now with a crook at the upper end, was used to manage the flock, keep it together, guide it, defend it, and chastise the disobedient (Ps. 23:4; Micah 7:14; Zech. 11:7). The shepherd was aided by dogs (Job 30:1); not intelligent, faithful dogs, but lazy, mean brutes, which loitered behind the flock, but were of service; they gave warning of danger by their bark.

Jehovah was the Shepherd of Israel, and especially of the faithful section of the people (Gen. 49:24).

Christ is the Good Shepherd, entering into the sheepfold by the door, calling out his own sheep by name, and so possessing their confidence and affection that they follow him while they refuse to follow any other. He satisfactorily met the test of supreme devotion to his flock and to his duty by laying down his life for the sheep (John 10:1-18).

All who had responsible positions in the theocracy, prophets, priests, and kings, were looked on as pastors of the Israelitish people. They were undershepherds, aiding Jehovah, and their unfaithfulness was frequently pointed out (Isa. 56:11). And in the Christian Church, the elders or bishops are pastors or shepherds, under Christ, the chief Shepherd, appointed to tend the flock of God (I Peter 5:1-4).

She'phi (shē'fī) and She'pho (shē'fō) [bareness]. A son or tribe of Shobal, descended from Seir, the Horite (Gen. 36:23); for the 2 forms, see VAV.

She-phu'pham (shē-fū'fām) and She-phu'phan (shē-fū'fān). A son or remoter descendant of Benjamin and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:39; in A.V. Shupham). In the same verse his name appears as Shupham (in Shuphamites). He is also called Muppim (Gen. 46:21) and Shuppim (I Chron. 7:12, 15). The letters m and s or sh were very much alike in the old Heb. alphabet. He was perhaps known also as Shephuphan (I Chron. 8:5). In this passage Shephuphan is probably listed as a descendant of Bela, although it is not impossible that the enumeration of Bela's sons closes with Gera and that Shephuphan is registered as a son of Benjamin. In ch. 7:12 Shuppim is catalogued among the sons of Benjamin, but it is not clear whether he is enrolled as a son in the strict sense or as descended from Benjamin's son Bela through Ir or Iri (v. 7). In the latter case he was born after the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt, but is enumerated with those who went down into Egypt because he founded a tribal family.

She'rah (shē'rā). See SHEERAH.

She'r'e-bi'ah (shēr'ē-bī'ā) [Jehovah has sent burning heat]. 1. A Levite, head of a family, who came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8). The representative of the family sealed the covenant (ch. 10:12). It was a family of singers (ch. 12:24).

2. Head of a family of Levites who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:18). He was perhaps the representative of a part of the aforementioned family which had remained behind when the exiles returned with Zerubbabel, and as representative he officially bore the family name. He is probably intended in v. 24, although the present text describes him as a priest, and was one of the men to whose custody during the journey Ezra committed the gifts for the Temple.

3. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra, reading the Law to the people, and giving the sense, so that the listeners might understand what they heard (Neh. 8:7). He took part in the public confession of sin after the feast of tabernacles (ch. 9:4).

She'resh (shē'rēsh) [perhaps, root or sprout]. A man of Manasseh, family of Machir (I Chron. 7:16).

She're'zer (shē-rē'zēr). See SHAREZER.

She'shach (shē'shāk). According to ancient tradition, a cypher for Babel (Jer. 25:26; 51:41), constructed on the system known as Athbash. The letters of the alphabet were numbered both in their regular order of sequence and in the reverse order; and when the cypher of a name was desired, its consonants were replaced by those which have the same numbers in the reverse enumeration. B is the 2d letter of the Heb. alphabet and s or sh is the 2d from the end, l is the 12th letter from the beginning and k is the 12th from the end; hence the cypher for Babel was Sheshak. There may be a wordplay here; shēshak may have suggested the Heb. root shākak (to sink, bow) and thus implied the humiliation or punishment of Babylon.

She'shai (shē'shi) [probably, whitish]. A son or family of Anak, resident at Hebron, and driven thence by Caleb (Num. 13:32, cf. v. 33; Josh. 15:14).

She'shan (shē'shān) [perhaps, whitish]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:31). He had no sons, but only daughters, one of whom he gave in marriage to an Egyptian slave (vs. 34, 35). See AHLAI.

Shesh-baz'zar (shēsh-bāz'ēr) [Akkad., perhaps, O sun-god, protect the lord (or the son)]. A prince of Judah whom Cyrus made governor, to whom he restored the sacred vessels which had been carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, and who returned to Jerusalem and laid the foundation of the Temple (Ezra 1:8, 11; 5:14, 16). Sheshbazzar may have been the Babylonian name of Zerubbabel, as Belteshazzar was that of Daniel.

Sheth, I (shēth) [compensation]. A son of Adam (I Chron. 1:1). See SETH.

Sheth, II (shēth) [tumult]. A designation of the Moabites as makers of war and tumult (Num. 24:17, A.V.).

She'thar-boz'e-nai (shē'thār-bōz'ē-nī), in A.V. She'thar-boz'nai (shē'thār-bōz'nī). A Persian official who with others attempted to prevent the returned Jewish exiles from rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 5:3, 6; 6:6).

She'va (shē'vā) [vanity; but cf. Arab. sawā', equal, similar]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. He was the ancestor of the inhabitants of Machbena and Gibeon (I Chron. 2:49).

2. A scribe in David's reign (II Sam. 20:25). See SHAVSHA.

Shew'bread. See SHOWBREAD.

Shi'bah (shī'bā), in A.V. She'bah [seven, an oath]. Fem. form of Sheba. A well at Beersheba which Isaac's servants dug, and which Isaac named Shibah on account of the covenant he had just made with Abimelech (Gen. 26:33).

Shib'bo'leth (shīb'bō-lēth) [an ear of grain, or a stream]. The local dialect of the Ephraimites was characterized by the absence of sh at the beginning of a word and the use of s in its stead. When Jephthah, at the head of the Gileadites, had vanquished the Ephraimites and seized the fords of the Jordan, many of the defeated tribe came to the river desiring to pass. On being asked if they were Ephraimites, and denying the fact, they were required to pronounce the word Shibboleth, and if they called it Sibboleth, were slain without further ceremony (Judg. 12:5, 6). The word has entered the English language, and is used to mean a test word or the watchword or pet phrase of a party or sect.

Shib'mah (shīb'mā). See SIBMAH.

Shic'ron (shīk'rōn). See SHIKKERON.

Shield. See ARMOR.

Shig'ga'ion (shī-gā'yōn) and pl. Shig'i-o'-noth (shīg'i-ō'nōth) [wandering, irregular]. A musical term (Psalm 7, title; Hab. 3:1). Probably a dithyrambic ode, erratic, wild, enthusiastic.

Shi'hon (shī'hōn). See SHION.

Shi'hor (shī'hōr), in A.V. Si'hor (sī'hōr), except I Chron. 13:5 [Egypt. Shi-hro, lake or pool of Horus; this suggests Heb. shāhōr, black]. The river Nile (Isa. 23:3; Jer. 2:18, see R.V. marg.). Its e. or Pelusiac branch was on the boundary of Egypt toward Canaan (Josh. 13:3; I Chron. 13:5); see RIVER OF EGYPT 1. The R.V., however, and many commentators regard the Shi'hor in the last 2 passages as a title of the brook of Egypt, the wadi el-Arish (Josh. 13:3, R.V. marg.). According to Brugsch, the name belonged in the 1st instance to a canal on the e. boundary of Egypt, parallel to the course of the Pelusiac branch.

Shih'or-lib'nath (shī'hôr-lib'nāth) [turbid stream of Libnath]. A small river at the s.w. corner of Asher (Josh. 19:26) and apparently near Carmel. It is now commonly believed to be the Zerkā, 6 miles s. of Dor, a town of Asher.

Shik'eron (shīk'ê-rôn), in A.V. Shic'ron [drunkenness]. A town on the n. border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:11).

Shil'hi (shīl'hī) [perhaps, Jehovah has sent]. Father of Azubah, Jehoshaphat's mother (I Kings 22:42).

Shil'him (shīl'hīm) [missiles, sprouts]. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:32). The name may be in Khirbet Shalhā, 5 miles w. of Beit Jibrin; see SHARUHEN.

Shil'lem (shīl'ēm) [he (God) has made compensation]. A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49). Called Shallum, a synonymous and more common name, in I Chron. 7:13.

Shil'ling. See PENNY.

Shil'o'ah (shī-lō'ā) [a sending of waters, an aqueduct]; see SLOAM.

Shil'oh (shī'lō) [tranquillity, rest]. A town n. of Beth-el, s. of Lebanon, and on the e. side of the highway connecting Beth-el with Shechem (Judg. 21:19), and hence within the territory of Ephraim. It has been identified with Seilūn, about 10 miles n.e. of Beth-el. There the Israelites under Joshua set up the tabernacle (Josh. 18:1), and divided by lot the, as yet, unappropriated parts of Canaan (Josh. 18:3-10; 19:51; 22:9). When the w. tribes were convened to call the tribes e. of the Jordan to account for their building of an altar, it was at Shiloh that the gathering took place (Josh. 22:12). In the times of the Judges there was there an annual feast of Jehovah (Judg. 21:19; I Sam. 1:3), at which the Benjamites on 1 occasion obtained wives by capture (Judg. 21:16-23). The tabernacle, with the Ark, was still there in the time of Eli and during the early years of Samuel (Judg. 18:31; I Sam. 1:9, 24; 2:14, 22; 3:3, 21; 4:3, 4; 14:3). The capture of the Ark was understood to mean that God had forsaken Shiloh (Ps. 78:60; Jer. 7:12, 14; 26:6, 9). The covenant made at Sinai, of which the Ark and the ritual were the outward sign and privilege, was suspended. When the Ark was returned by the Philistines, it was not taken again to Shiloh (I Sam. 6:21; 7:1, 2; II Sam. 6:2, 11, 17), but the work of reviving true religion, preparatory to the restoration of covenant privileges, was begun by Samuel. Ahijah the prophet, who told Jeroboam of his approaching greatness, lived at Shiloh, and it was thither that the king's consort repaired to inquire about the issue of their sick child's malady (I Kings 14:2, 4). It continued to be inhabited at least as late as the time of Jeremiah (Jer. 41:5).

There are 3 main interpretations of Shiloh in the difficult passage Gen. 49:10, each of which receives recognition in R.V.: 1. Shiloh is a proper name, which designates the Messiah and refers to the peacefulness of his disposition and his reign. 2. Shiloh, place of tranquillity, is the town in central Palestine where the tabernacle was placed immediately after the conquest of Canaan by Joshua (Josh. 18:1). 3. Shiloh is not a proper name, nor is it a simple word. It is a compound, composed of the relative pronoun shē, the preposition lō, and the pronominal suffix of the 3d person masc. ōh. The same form of the suffix occurs twice in the following verse. This phrase has been interpreted as meaning "that which is his," "whose it is," or "his own one." The 2d of these 3 meanings would happily correspond to Ezek 21:27, but the omission of the subject is a serious syntactic difficulty; and the 1st regarded as objective, "he shall come to that which is his," is grammatically difficult, for a relative clause with indefinite antecedent used as an accusative is preceded by a preposition or the sign of the accusative. This conception of the word as a phrase is old, having been entertained by the ancient versions, namely, LXX, Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, Syriac, and Jerome.

On the 1st interpretation and commonly on the 3d the Messiah is expressly referred to. In the 2d the reference is to the covenant blessing, which the prophets of a later age discerned to belong in its fullness to Messianic times. Reuben had forfeited his birthright by misconduct (Gen. 49:4; 35:22), Simeon and Levi had incurred their father's just censure (chs. 49:5-7; 34:30), and Judah was consequently assigned the place of the first-born, and became the representative of the tribe and the peculiar possessor of the blessing covenanted to Abraham and his seed (ch. 49:8). The promise of victory to the woman's seed (ch. 3:15), the blessing of God's favor centered in Shem (ch. 9:26, 27), the further centralization of the covenant blessing in the family of Abraham (ch. 17), belonged thenceforth pre-eminently to Judah, the possessor of the birthright. By him, according to the 1st and 3d interpretations, the prerogative shall be held until one who is his, one of his tribe, the man of peace comes, to whom shall be the obedience of the peoples, and in whom the covenant blessing shall be still further centered. This interpretation, with many modifications of detail, according as the scepter is thought of restrictedly as the emblem of royalty or is regarded as the symbol of leadership in general, is represented in the text of the English versions. And it is argued that this essentially must be the true interpretation, because the town of Shiloh does not fulfil the historical conditions, for neither is there any reason why Jacob, apart from special revelation, should think of Shiloh as the future place of worship, nor did Judah occupy pre-eminence among the tribes before the tabernacle was pitched in Shiloh, save somewhat in numbers and in being permitted to lead the van, while the people were marching to Canaan, and to pitch their tents in front of the tabernacle. The leadership was at first in the hands of Moses, of the tribe of Levi, which excited the jealousy of the princes of Reuben, and after Moses' death, and until the tabernacle was pitched at Shiloh, the authority was exercised by Joshua, of the tribe of Ephraim.

But it is more natural to regard Shiloh in this passage as the name of the town, for it is such everywhere else, and on this interpretation the words of Jacob are at once intelligible. This view is commonly entertained by those who deny that Jacob uttered the words, and who affirm that the address is a prophecy after the event. But the address is not the utterance of a late prophet, commenting on the past history of the 12 tribes and putting his reflections in the mouth of their common ancestor Jacob, for the descriptions do not fit the actual state of things at any period of the national history; see, for example, Gen. 49:13 and ZEBULON. Believers in the genuineness of the address hold that the town of Shiloh is meant and they are able fairly to explain how Jacob came to use the name, and how Moses the Levite and Joshua the Ephraimite could lead the people while yet the scepter was acknowledged as belonging to Judah. The argument of Delitzsch may be amplified. Shiloh doubtless existed in the days of the Patriarchs; and Jacob, who looked for the ultimate return of his people to Canaan (Gen. 15:13-16; 46:3, 4; 48:21), employs this name, "place of tranquillity," as an omen of the future, playing upon it as Esau played upon the name Jacob and Micah upon the names of the towns of Judah. It made no difference that God raised up men from other tribes to meet special emergencies: the birthright and its accompanying privileges belonged to Judah. It was accorded to him by the position assigned him at the head of the marching host and in camp in front of the tabernacle. It was accredited to him by God's multiplication of his descendants, so that his tribe was much larger than any single tribe during the 40 years in the wilderness. It was confirmed by the lot's falling 1st to his tribe when the conquered land was distributed at Gilgal. The actual coming to the town of Shiloh was not contemplated as necessary by Jacob. The fulfillment of his words was more literal than his expectation. He had merely the peaceable possession of the Promised Land in view.

The erection of the tabernacle at Shiloh, a town which Joshua may have been led to choose by having knowledge of Jacob's words, marked the 1st stage in the realization of the promise. A new period had been reached in Israel's history. The conquest was completed, the inheritance was theirs, possession had begun, rest had been won. Judah, the possessor of the birthright, had come to a place of tranquillity in Canaan, having obtained the obedience of the peoples, and being now ready to occupy and enjoy his conquered possession (Gen. 49:10-12). The words do not mean that when he should come to Shiloh the scepter should depart. They are to be understood as the similar language in Isa. 42:4: "He will not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set justice in the earth." This does not mean that the servant will then fail and lose courage. So Jacob meant that the privilege conferred by the birthright, which centered in the Abrahamic covenant, should not be transferred until Judah had obtained the promised blessing, the possession of Canaan, when he would enter upon its enjoyment. A new period opens to him. He was still accorded by God the 1st position among the tribes, being called to go up 1st against the Canaanites still in the allotted land. He was called to go up 1st against the Benjamites in the war against that tribe to punish national sin. And the 1st and only deliverer of all Israel during the period of the Judges proper sprang from Judah (Judg. 3:7-11). Saul, a Benjamite, was raised up like the Judges to deliver Israel (I Sam. 9:16; 10:6), and might have retained the throne in his family (chs. 13:13, 14; 15:23, 26, 28), but he lost the opportunity through sin, as Reuben had lost the birthright, and the permanent royal line was taken from Judah. The obedience of the peoples was but the foretaste, and the possession of the land and enjoyment of its fertility were but a type, of the Messianic triumphs and peace involved in the covenanted mercies. As time went on, the fullness of meaning was revealed in the words of the prophets. (See Isa. 2:2-4; Micah 4:1-5; Joel 3:9-21.)

Shi-lō-ni (shī-lō'nī) [a Shilonite]. According to the A.V., a man of the tribe of Judah (Neh. 11:5, A.V.). But the word is preceded by the definite article in the Hebrew text, and hence is not a proper name. The R.V. correctly translates it "the Shilonite," and Shiloni, as a man, disappears. See SHILONITE 2.

Shi-lō-nite (shī-lō-nīt). 1. A native or inhabitant of Shiloh (I Kings 11:29).

2. A member of the tribal family of Shelah (Neh. 11:5, in A.V. Shiloni).

Shil'shah (shīl'shā) [triad]. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:37).

Shim'ea (shīm'ē-ā), once Shim'eah (shīm'ē-ā) (II Sam. 13:3) [he (God) has heard]. 1. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli (I Chron. 6:30).

2. A Levite, family of Gershon (I Chron. 6:39-43).

3. A brother of King David (II Sam. 13:3; I Chron. 20:7). In A.V. of I Chron. 2:13 he is incorrectly called Shimma, the Heb. having Shimeah. In I Sam. 16:9; 17:13 his name appears as Shammah.

4. A son of David; see SHAMMUA 2.

5. Another Shimeah, whose name in Heb. has aleph instead of ayin as the 3d radical; thus it is different from the foregoing (I Chron. 8:32); see SHIMEAM.

Shim'e-am (shīm'ē-ām). A Benjamite, a son of Mikloth, resident in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:33). In ch. 8:32 he is called Shim-eah, a synonymous name.

Shim'e-ath (shīm'ē-āth) [report]. An Ammonitess, mother of one of King Joash's assassins (II Kings 12:21).

Shim'e-ath-ites (shīm'ē-āth-its). A Kenite family of scribes, descended through a certain Shimeah from the founder of the house of Rechab and resident at Jabez (I Chron. 2:55).

Shim'ei (shīm'ē-i), in A.V. once Shim'i (Ex. 6:17), once Shim'hi (I Chron. 8:21) [(Jehovah) has heard]. 1. A son of Gershon, and a grandson of Levi. He founded a subdivision of the tribal family of Gershon (Ex. 6:17; Num. 3:18, 21; I Chron. 23:7, 10; Zech. 12:13).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli (I Chron. 6:29).

3. A Simeonite, probably of the family of Shaul. He had 16 sons and 6 daughters (I Chron. 4:24-27).

4. A Levite, son of Jahath, of the family of Gershon (I Chron. 6:42).

5. A Benjamite, head of a father's house in Aijalon (I Chron. 8:21, in A.V. Shimhi). Called Shema in v. 13.

6. A Levite, family of Gershon, and head of one of the subdivisions of Ladán, which latter was apparently a division of the house of Libni (I Chron. 23:9).

7. A Levite, head of the 10th course of singers in David's reign, and evidently a son of Jeduthun, for his name is needed to make out the 6 spoken of in I Chron. 25:3 (v. 17).

8. A Ramathite, who was over David's vineyards (I Chron. 27:27).

9. A Benjamite, the son of Gera. He was of Saul's family, which had lost the throne. When he saw David, with his attendants, descending the e. slope of the Mount of Olives, while Absalom was in possession of Jerusalem, he thought it safe to insult the fallen king, which he did in gross language. He was forgiven by David, but was afterward put to death by Solomon for disobeying a command of the latter (I Kings 2:44-46).

10. An adherent of David and Solomon during Adonijah's usurpation (I Kings 1:8). He was probably the son of Ela, who became Solomon's purveyor in the territory of Benjamin (ch. 4:18).

11. A Reubenite (I Chron. 5:4).

12. A Levite, a son of Heman, who helped to purify the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:14-16). He may be identical with the following.

13. A Levite, brother of Conaniah, in Hezekiah's reign. He was one of those who looked after the tithes (II Chron. 31:12).

14. A Benjamite, son of Kish and an ancestor of Mordecai (Esth. 2:5).

15. A man belonging to the royal family of Judah, and a brother of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:19).

16, 17, 18. Three men, 1 a Levite, 1 a son of Hashum, and 1 a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23, 33, 38).

Shim'eites (shim'è-its). See SHIMEI 1.

Shim'eon (shim'è-ün) [a hearkening, an answering (of prayer)]. A son of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:31).

Shim'hi (shim'hi). See SHIMEI 5.

Shim'i (shim'i). See SHIMEI 1.

Shim'ma (shim'd). See SHIMEA 3.

Shim'mon (shim'mön). A man who had his registry with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

Shim'rath (shim'räth) [watching, guarding]. A Benjamite, son of Shimei of Aijalon (I Chron. 8:21).

Shim'ri (shim'ri), in A.V. once Sim'ri (I Chron. 26:10) [(Jehovah) has watched, protected]. 1. A Simeonite, son of Shemaiah (I Chron. 4:37).

2. Father of one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:45).

3. A Merarite Levite, a son of Hosah (I Chron. 26:10).

4. A Levite, who lived in the reign of Hezekiah. He was a son of Elizaphan of the family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (II Chron. 29:13).

Shim'rith (shim'rith) [vigilant]. A Moabitess, mother of one of King Joash's assassins (II Chron. 24:26). Called in II Kings 12:21 Shomer.

Shim'ron (shim'rön), in A.V. once Shim'rom (shim'rön) (I Chron. 7:1) [watching, a guard]. 1. A son of Issachar, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:24).

2. A border town of Zebulun (Josh. 11:1; 19:15).

Shim'ron-me'ron (shim'rön-më'rön). A Canaanite town, whose king was vanquished and slain by Joshua (Josh. 12:20). Probably the full name of Shimron.

Shim'shai (shim'shi) [sunny, sun-child]. A scribe, one of those who complained to Artaxerxes Longimanus that the Jews were rebuilding the Temple (Ezra 4:8).

Shin (shên). The 21st letter of the Heb. alphabet. English s comes from the same source, and with sh represents it in Anglicized Hebrew names; as in Simeon, Shimea, Ishmael. It heads the 21st section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Shi'nab (shi'näb). The king of Admah, who was defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2, 8, 10).

Shi'nar (shi'när). A country in which the cities of Babel, Erech, Acad, and Calneh were situated (Gen. 10:10; 11:2; Dan. 1:2). Hence, in Hebrew usage, Shinar comprehended the alluvial plain of Babylonia; ancient Sumer was in the lower part of this region. In the days of Abraham, Amraphel was king of the whole or a large part of it (Gen. 14:1, 9). Some of the Jews were to be carried thither as captives (Isa. 11:11; Zech. 5:11).

Shi'on (shi'ön), in A.V. Shi'hon [destruction, ruin]. A town of Issachar (Josh. 19:19). The site is perhaps at 'Ayün esh-Sha'in, 3 miles w.n.w. of Mount Tabor.

Ship. As early as 3000 B.C. men had learned to navigate both the Nile and the Euphrates. Little boats were used for going from the upper Euphrates to Babylon (Herod. i. 194). They were circular in form. The ribs were made of willow, over which hides were stretched as a covering. They were steered by 2 men who stood upright, each with a spar which they thrust alternately. The largest vessels carried 5,000 talents. On the Nile boats built of acacia wood were used (Herod. ii. 96).

Boats were doubtless used on the Sea of Galilee in O.T. times, but they are not mentioned. In the Roman period the sea was alive with small fishing vessels (Luke 5:2; John 6:22, 23; Jos. War ii. 21, 8; iii. 10, 9; Life 33). They were propelled by oars; but some, at least, had both oars and sails (cf. Mark 4:38 with Luke 8:23); they carried an anchor and a pilot (Jos. Life 33).

The Israelites were not a seafaring people; although shipbuilding was far advanced among the Egyptians and doubtless among the Phoenicians before the Exodus, and the Hebrews had the spectacle of ships on the Mediterranean before their eyes during the whole period of their national history. Solomon conducted commercial enterprises, and Jehoshaphat attempted to imitate him; but these were transient efforts and were more or less dependent upon Phoenician sailors.

Phoenician Ship

The rafts of cedar and fir destined for Solomon's Temple were floated to Joppa by Tyrians (I Kings 5:9; II Chron. 2:16), and the timber for the 2d Temple was likewise brought by sea to Joppa by Phoenicians (Ezra 3:7). The crew of the vessel in which Jonah sailed from Joppa was also composed of foreigners (Jonah 1:5). In the Roman period, piratical expeditions by Jews are reported (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 3, 2; War iii. 9, 2 and 3).

Both merchant vessels and war ships were used on the Mediterranean (Num. 24:24; Dan 11:30; Jonah 1:3; I Macc. 11:1). In war, vessels were employed for transporting troops (I Macc. 15:3, 4; II Macc. 14:1) and for fighting at sea (I Macc. 8:23, 32; Jos. Antiq. ix. 14, 2; cf. War iii. 10, 1). Some ships were equipped with a sharp, pointed ram in front, which was employed in sinking another ship in battle. Some of these seagoing vessels were propelled by sails alone; others by both sails and oars. A gallant merchantman of Tyre was built of planks and calked (Ezek. 27:5, 9); had masts, linen sails, and tackling (Ezek. 27:7; Isa. 33:23), benches of boxwood, and oaken oars (Ezek. 27:6, R.V.). It was manned by sailors and guided by a pilot (vs. 8, 27). When luxuriously furnished, the sails were embroidered and a rich awning was spread (v. 7). Such vessels made the voyage to Tarshish (Jonah 1:3, 5, 6, 13), and even navigated the Atlantic Ocean from Spain to England; see TIR. The ship of Alexandria, in which Paul was conveyed from Myra to Malta, was large enough to accommodate a crew and passengers numbering 276 persons, besides a cargo of wheat (Acts 27:37, 38). The vessel in which Josephus was wrecked had 600 persons on board (Jos. Life 3). The Alexandrian wheat ship, described by Lucian as driven into the port of Athens by rough weather, was 120 cubits, or 180 feet, in length, doubtless including the projection at each end, and 45 feet in breadth. Its size attracted attention. Its capacity is supposed to have been about 1,200 or 1,300 tons. The exceptionally large war galley of Ptolemy Philopator measured, according to Athenaeus, 420 feet in length and 57 feet in breadth. Paul's ship was in charge of a master and the owner (Acts 27:11), and was managed by a crew (v. 30). It was built of planks (v. 44), carried a foresail, which could be raised and lowered (v. 40, R.V.), and by implication a foremast and a mainmast, and was steered by rudders, doubtless 2 (v. 40). Four anchors were stowed at the stern and several forward (vs. 29, 30), and a small boat was towed behind, which could be raised by ropes or davits to the deck (vs. 16, 17, 30, 32). Soundings were taken (v. 28). It was customary for ships to have an eye painted or carved on each side of the stem. Paul's vessel was unable to face the gale, literally to keep the eye to the wind (v. 15).

Roman Ship, from a Relief

A ship of Paul's time, depicted at Pompeii, shows a foremast inclined like a bowsprit, but intended to carry a square sail, and 1 large mast with 1 square sail fitted to a yard of great length. The yard was composed of 2 spars spliced together, and was placed with its center against the mast. The sail was strengthened by ropes sewed across it vertically and horizontally; and if torn, the rent was confined to the square in which it occurred. The sail was furled by being drawn up to the yard. The deck was protected by a rail. The stern post, and in many vessels the stem post also, rose in a curve. It was customary, as in this ship, for the stern post at least to terminate in the head of a water fowl. The sign of the ship (Acts 28:11) was painted or carved on each side of the prow. The vessel was steered by 2 broad oars or paddles, 1 on each quarter and acting through a porthole. The anchors were similar to those in modern use, except that they had no flukes. To prevent the starting of the planks in a storm, cables or chains, called helps or undergirders (Acts 27:17), were passed around the vessel at right angles to its length and made tight.

Shi'phi (shi'fi) [abounding, abundant]. A Simeonite, son of Allon (I Chron. 4:37).

Shiph'mite (shi'f'mit). A native or inhabitant probably of Siphmoth (I Chron. 27:27).

Shiph'rah (shi'f'rá) [splendor, beauty]. One of the Hebrew midwives in Egypt who declined to kill the male babes (Ex. 1:15).

Shiph'tan (shi'f'tán) [(God) exercises judgment]. An Ephraimite, father of Kemuel (Num. 34:24).

Shi'sha (shi'shá). See SHAVSHA.

Shi'shak (shi'shák). See PHARAOH 1.

Shit'ral (shit'ri). A Sharonite, who looked after David's herds on the plain of Sharon (I Chron. 27:29).

Shit'tah (shit'á) Tree and Shit'tim Wood. A tree (Isa. 41:19). The R.V. renders the word by acacia tree or wood. It grew in the Jordan Valley, from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea (see BETH-SHITTAH and SHITTIM). It was plentiful in the wilderness of Sinai, and its timber was largely used in the tabernacle, for the woodwork of the Ark, the altars and their staves, the table, the boards, bars, and pillars (Ex. 25:5, 10, 13, 23; 26:15, 26, 32; 27:1, 6; 30:1, 5). The wood was used in Egypt in boat building (Herod. ii. 96), and Josephus speaks of its strength and durability (Jos. Antiq. iii. 6, 5). Arabic sanat, sanf is the same word as the Heb. shittáh, and denotes the acacia. There are several species. Acacia seyal and tortilis are found in the valleys about the Dead Sea and s., and Acacia nilotica grows in the s. part of the peninsula of Sinai and in Egypt. Other species are found in various parts of Palestine. The genuine acacias are generally small trees, growing from 15 to 25 feet high, thorny, with bipinnate leaves, and pods with several seeds. The wood is hard and close-grained. Certain species yield the gum arabic of commerce.

Shit'im (shīt'īm) [acacias]. 1. An important encampment of the Israelites in the plains of Moab, e. of Jordan, opposite Jericho (cf. Num. 22:1 with ch. 25:1). The camp had been removed from Pisgah on the mountains of Abarim and pitched at Shittim after the conquest of Sihon and Og (chs. 21:20; 22:1; 33:47, 48). It was located on a tableland, the topmost of the 3 terraces which at this point form the valley of the Jordan, and among the long groves of acacia trees. It extended "from Beth-jeshimoth even unto Abel-shittim" (ch. 33:49; cf. ch. 23:28), a distance of 3 miles and more. It was arranged in an orderly manner, the Israelites dwelling according to their tribes (ch. 24:2, 5, 6); see CAMP. The sojourn at Shittim was eventful. While the Israelites were encamped there, Balaam attempted to curse them (chs. 22 to 24), the people committed sin with the daughters of Moab and Midian at Baal-peor, and were plagued in consequence (ch. 25), the 2d census was taken (ch. 26), occasion arose for enacting laws regarding the inheritance of daughters (ch. 27:1-11), Joshua was publicly proclaimed the successor to Moses (vs. 12-23), daily offerings and vows were further regulated (chs. 28 to 30), war was waged with the 5 Midianite tribes of the neighborhood on account of the deliberate attempt which they had recently made to seduce the Israelites into licentious idolatry at Baal-peor (ch. 31), Reuben and Gad, at their own request, received inheritance e. of the Jordan (ch. 32). Measures were also taken for the occupation of Canaan: in view of recent events, the expulsion of the Canaanites and the destruction of their altars and idols were urgently commanded anew; the boundaries of the land were defined, and a commission was appointed to superintend the allotment of territory to the tribes; and it was ordered that cities be assigned to the Levites, and that 6 cities of refuge be designated for the unintentional murderer (chs. 33:50 to 35:34). The matter of the inheritance of daughters was further regulated (ch. 36). Then Moses delivered his farewell address (see DEUTERONOMY), Joshua received a solemn charge, and Moses ascended Nebo and died. After the death of Moses, Joshua sent forth 2 spies from Shittim to examine and report on the defenses of Jericho (Josh., ch. 2). Then camp was broken at Shittim, and the people crossed the Jordan (ch. 3).

2. A valley, dry and comparatively unfruitful, where only the acacia or shittah tree grows (Joel 3:18). If a particular valley is in the prophet's mind, it may be the Kidron Wadi, which under the name of Wadi el-Jōz starts a little n.w. of Jerusalem, bends round so as to run e. of the city, separating it from the Mount of Olives, and then as a deep rocky gorge (Wadi en-Nār) runs s.e. toward the Dead Sea, which it joins at about 10 miles from its n. end. Or it may be simply the Arabah about the Dead Sea (cf. Ezek. 47:1-12). The prophet names it from the encampment of the Israelites at Shittim, and he selects it as a type because the waters of its sea were practically lifeless, and its s. portion consisted of barren rocks and cliffs of salt. After Jehovah has judged all nations, the Kingdom of God shall flourish and the kingdoms of the world become waste (Joel 3:9-21). The mountains of Judah shall drop down new wine, its hills flow with milk, its wadies be brooks of water, and from the house of the Lord shall go forth waters that shall make glad the valley of acacias. In other words, the desert shall blossom as the rose; spiritual life shall proceed from the Lord God and shall supply the needs of his Kingdom (cf. Rev. 22:1, 2).

Shi'za (shī'zā). A Reubenite, father of one of David's heroes (I Chron. 11:42).

Sho'a (shō'ā). A country and its inhabitants, mentioned in connection with the Babylonians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians (Ezek. 23:23); probably the Sutu, who were nomads in the Syrian desert at the time of the Amarna letters. In the 11th century they entered Babylonia and then were forced into the plains e. of the Tigris. In alliance with Aramaean tribes they were constantly at war with Assyria and never completely conquered.

Sho'bab (shō'bāb) [backsliding, apostate]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. His mother was Azubah (I Chron. 2:18).

2. A son of David, born to him at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:14).

Sho'bach (shō'bāk) [one who pours out]. Commander-in-chief under Hadarezer, king of Zobah (II Sam. 10:16). Called in I Chron. 19:16, 18, Shophach.

Sho'bal (shō'bāl) [perhaps, one who leads captive]. A Levite, founder of a family of doorkeepers, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:42).

Sho'bal (shō'bāl). 1. A tribe of Horites (Gen. 36:20), consisting of several families (v. 23), and ruled by a chieftain (v. 29).

2. A son of Hur, a man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. He was ancestor of the inhabitants of Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:50; 4:1, 2, 4).

Sho'bek (shō'bēk) [cf. Arab. sābiq, one who precedes, victor]. One of the Jewish chiefs who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:24).

Sho'bi (shō'bī) [perhaps, one who leads captive]. Son of a resident in Rabbah of the Ammonites named Nahash (II Sam. 17:27). Shobi brought food and other necessities to David at Mahanaim.

Sho'cho (shō'kō), Sho'choh (shō'kō), Sho'co (shō'kō). See Socco.

Shoe. Hebrew shoes were, as a rule, simply leather sandals affixed to the foot by straps known as latches; see CLOTHING. Shoes were not worn in the sitting room or at the table (cf. Luke 7:38); and in well-appointed houses a servant stood ready to unloose the latchet and remove the shoe of the guest (cf. Mark 1:7). Shoes were also removed when one was about to tread holy ground (Ex. 3:5; Josh. 5:15); and the absence of shoes in the description of the priests' garments is supposed to indicate that the priests performed their duties in the Temple barefoot. To be without shoes and stripped of superfluous raiment might betoken the captive's plight (Isa. 20:2), and was a customary sign of mourning (II Sam. 15:30); while to wear shoes in time of sorrow, and attire the head, was a concealment of grief (Ezek. 24:17, 23). In the olden time in Israel, in matters of redemption and exchange, a man drew off his shoe (sandal) and gave it to him with whom he had concluded the agreement, as confirmation of the transaction (Ruth 4:7, 8); and the shoe of the man who refused to take his deceased brother's wife was loosed, with other insult (Deut. 25:9, 10). To cast the shoe upon a place symbolized the act of taking possession or, possibly, of treating it as a slave upon whom as a task the master flings his shoes in order that they may be carried or cleaned (Ps. 60:8). The Assyrian soldier's boot (Isa. 9:5, R.V. marg.; J.V.) was not in use in Judah.

Sho'ham (shō'hām) [a beryl or onyx]. A Levite, son of Jaaziah (I Chron. 24:27).

Sho'mer (shō'mēr) [keeper, watchman]. 1. An Asherite, son of Heber (I Chron. 7:32). See SHEMER 3.

2. A Moabitess, mother of one of King Joash's assassins (II Kings 12:21). See SHIMRITH.

Sho'phach (shō'fāk). See SHOBACH.

Sho'phan (shō'fān). See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

Sho'shan'nim (shō-shān'īm) [lilies]. A word occurring in the titles of Psalms 45 and 69. Three opinions exist as to its meaning: symbolical of the contents of the psalm, a musical instrument resembling a lily, a familiar melody. It doubtless indicates a popular air. This appears from the combinations Shoshan-nim Eduth, "Lilies a testimony" (Psalm 80, title), and Shushan Eduth, "Lily a testimony" (Psalm 60, title).

Show'bread', in A.V. Shew'bread'. Literally "bread of the presence." It consisted of 12 loaves of bread, laid in 2 rows and displayed on a table in the Holy Place before the Lord continually. The bread was changed every Sabbath, and the old loaves were eaten by the priests in the Holy Place (Ex. 25:30; Lev. 24:5-9; I Sam. 21:6; Matt. 12:4). The bread was also known as "the continual bread" (Num. 4:7, where the name "show-bread" is also used); and "continual row," or arrangement (II Chron. 2:4, translated "show-bread") or "the bread of the row," or arrangement (I Chron. 9:32, translated "showbread"), because arranged in rows or columns (Lev.

showbread Table of Herod's Temple, Based on the Relief from the Arch of Titus

24:6). Josephus says the bread was unleavened (Jos. Antiq. iii. 6, 6). Each loaf contained  $\frac{2}{3}$  of an ephah of fine flour, such as was used for honored guests and for the king's table (Gen. 18:6; I Kings 4:22), and was employed in various offerings (Lev. 2:1; 5:11; etc.). The 12 loaves represented the 12 tribes of Israel (cf. Lev. 24:7 with Ex. 28:10-12; also Ex. 24:4; 28:21). These 12 loaves set in the presence of Jehovah probably signified the constant communion of his people with him in those things which his bounty provided and they enjoyed in his presence and used in his service. The Ko-nathites had charge of the showbread (I Chron. 9:32).

The table of showbread was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold. It was bordered by a golden crown, and had a ring at each corner for the rods by which it was carried. It measured 2 cubits long, 1 broad, and 1½ high (Ex. 25:23-29); for its transportation, cf. Num. 4:7, 8). It stood in the Holy Place, by the n. wall, that is, to the right of one entering the tabernacle (Ex. 40:22). In Solomon's Temple there were 10 tables for showbread, corresponding to the 10 candlesticks, although like the candlesticks apparently only 1 was in use at a time (I Chron. 28:16; II Chron. 4:8, 19; 13:11; Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 7); hence only 1 is mentioned in I Kings 7:48; II Chron. 29:18. The table which belonged to the 2d Temple was carried off by Antiochus Epiphanes, but a new one was provided by Judas Maccabaeus (I Macc. 1:22; 4:49). Titus carried it to Rome (Jos. War vii. 5, 5).

Shu'a (shōō'á), in A.V. twice Shu'ah (Gen. 38:2, 12) [wealth]. 1. A Canaanite, whose daughter became Judah's wife or concubine, and the mother of his sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah (Gen. 38:2, 12; I Chron. 2:3).

2. An Asherite, a daughter of Heber (I Chron. 7:32).

Shu'ah (shōō'á) [depression]. A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2), that is, an Arab tribe descended from them, doubtless the Shuhites who dwelt near the land of Uz (Job 2:11). Their land is plausibly identified with a district of the same name, in Assyrian Suhu, on the w. of the Euphrates, near the mouths of the Balikh and Khabor.

For others whose name is rendered Shuah in A.V., see SHUA and SHUAH.

Shu'al (shōō'ál) [a fox or jackal]. 1. An Asherite, son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:36).

2. A district near Ophrah, to the n. of Michmash (I Sam. 13:17).

Shu'ba-el (shōō'bā-él). See SHEBUEL.

Shu'hah (shōō'há), in A.V. Shu'ah [depression]. A man of Judah (I Chron. 4:11).

Shu'ham (shōō'hām). The son of Dan, and founder of the tribal family (Num. 26:42). Called in Gen. 46:23 Hushim.

Shu'hite (shōō'hít). See SHUAH.

Shu'lam-mite (shōō'lām-it), in A.V. Shu'lam-ite (shōō'lām-it). A young woman mentioned in the Song of Solomon (ch. 6:13). The name has been derived from that of the town of Shunem. The LXX translates it by Soumaneitis, i.e., Shunammite; the town of Shunem was known in the time of Eusebius as Shulem, and today bears the name Sölem or Sülam. The form Shulammite may have been preferred to Shunammite because of its assonance with Solomon, in Heb. Shelōmōh; in fact, it may be a fem. of Solomon, not as a proper name, but as a sort of title.

Shu'math-ites (shōō'māth-its). One of the leading families in Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:53).

Shu'nam-mite (shōō'nām-it). A native or inhabitant of Shunem; as Abishag (I Kings 1:3), and she whose son Elisha restored to life (II Kings 4:8, 12; 8:1).

Shu'nem (shōō'nēm). A town of Canaan, taken by Thothmes III, in the territory of Issachar (Josh. 19:18), opposite Mount Gilboa (I Sam. 28:4). The Philistines encamped there before the battle with Saul. The site is at Sölem or Sülam, on the w. slope of a hill 3½ miles n. by e. of Jezebel, 5 n. of the w. end of Mount Gilboa, and about 16 miles from Carmel, whither the Shunammite woman went to find Elisha (II Kings 4:25).

Shu'ni (shōō'ní). A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

Shu'pham (shōō'fām). See SHEPHUPHAM.

Shup'pim (shūp'im). 1. A Benjamite (I Chron. 7:12, 15); see SHEPHUPHAM.

2. A Levite, who served as a doorkeeper at the sanctuary (I Chron. 26:16). The Hebrew text is doubtless corrupt. Perhaps the name crept in from the preceding verse, which ends with a word very like Shup'pim.

Shur (shōōr) [wall, fortification]. 1. A locality in the wilderness, s. of Palestine, or more exactly s. of Beer-lahai-roi, and e. of Egypt (Gen. 16:7; 25:18). It has not been identified, but was doubtless connected with the frontier fortresses of Egypt. It gave name to the wilderness through which the Israelites marched for 3 days immediately after crossing the Red Sea (Ex. 15:22). This waste was also sometimes called the wilderness of Etham (Num. 33:8).

Shu'shan (shōō'shān). A city and royal residence in the Persian empire (Neh. 1:1; Esth. 1:2), in the province of Elam, on the river Ulai (Dan. 8:2). It was also a royal treasure city (Herod. v. 49). The place referred to in these passages is Susa. Ashurbanipal captured the city in a campaign c. 642-639 B.C., and later it became subject to the Chaldean kings. The royal family to which Cyrus, who conquered Babylon, belonged ruled over Anshan, which appears to have been a district of e. Elam. When Cyrus, by his military achievements, established the Persian empire, Susa was elevated to the rank of a capital of the empire, sharing this distinction with Ecbatana and Babylon. When Alexander the Great entered Susa, in 331 B.C., it had in it immense treasures, of which he took possession. In 317 B.C. it was occupied by Antigonus. After this it began to decline, but was still defensible when the Moslems conquered Persia. The site of the city is at Sus, in latitude 32° 10' n., longitude 48° 26' e., between the river Eulaeus (the Roman name for Daniel's Ulai) and the Shahpur, and about 100 miles from the Persian Gulf. The chief ruins are found within an area of about 6,000 feet long by 4,500 broad, the circumference being about 3 miles; but if scattered remains be taken in, the 3 miles may become 6 or 7. They consist of a series of mounds, in one of which the explorers laid bare the ruins of a palace, doubtless that begun by Darius, and in which Xerxes held his court. It seems to have been there that Esther's Ahasuerus held his feasts and his banquets (Esth. 1:2, 3, 9; 2:18; etc.).

Shu'shan'chites (shōō-shān'kīts), in A.V. Sus-shan'chites. Natives or inhabitants of the Persian Susa, the Shushan of the O.T. Shushanchites were brought, with others, to central Palestine to supply the place of the 10 tribes carried into captivity (Ezra 4:9).

Shu'shan E'duth (shōō'shān ē'dūth). See SHOSHANNIM.

Shu-the'lah (shōō-the'lā). 1. A son of Ephraim, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:35, 36; I Chron. 7:20).

2. Another descendant of Ephraim in the same line (I Chron. 7:21).

Si'a-ha (si'ā-hā) and Si'a (si'ā) [assembly]. A family of Nethinim, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the Captivity (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

Sib'be-cai (sib'ē-kī), in A.V. twice Sib'be-chai (sib'ē-kī) (II Sam. 21:18; I Chron. 20:4). A Hushathite, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:29). He won renown by slaying the Philistine Saph, one of the sons of the giant (II Sam. 21:18). He commanded the division of the army for the 8th month (I Chron. 27:11). He is called in II Sam. 23:27 Mebunnai (q.v.).

Sib'bo-leth (sib'ō-lēth). See SHIBBOLETH.

Sib'mah (sib'mā), in A.V. once Shib'mah (shib'mā) (Num. 32:38) [cf. Arab. shabima, to be cold]. A town assigned to Reuben (Num. 32:38; Josh. 13:19), which afterward reverted to Moab. It was celebrated for its vines (Isa. 16:8, 9; Jer. 48:32). The masc. form of the name is Sebam (Num. 32:3; in A.V. Shebam). According to Jerome, it was situated scarcely half a mile from Heshbon; it might be identified with Kurn el-Kibsh, between Heshbān and Nebo, about 3 miles e.n.e. of Siāgha, upon Wadi Salma.

Sib-ra'im (sib-rā'im) [perhaps, hope]. A place on Ezekiel's n. boundary of Canaan (Ezek. 47:16); perhaps to be identified with Shomeriyeh, e. of Lake Homs. See SEPHARVAIM.

Sic'euth (si'kōōth). A word occurring in Amos 5:26, E.R.V. and J.V.; but in A.V. and A.R.V. translated tabernacle (cf. the word Succoth). Regarded as a proper name, it corresponds to Sakkut, a designation given by the Babylonians to the planet Saturn. Another designation which they had for the planet was Kaimānu, in modified pronunciation Kaiwānu (see CHUN; Amos 5:26, A.V., E.R.V., and J.V.). It seems that the Masoretes gave Sakkut the vocalization of shikkūš (a detestable thing), whence Sicuth. See REPHAN.

Si'chem (si'kēm). See SHECHEM.

Si'cy-on (sish'i-ōn). A Dorian town in the Peloponnese (Herod. viii. 43), on the Gulf of Corinth, 10 miles n.w. of the city of Corinth. The old town at the harbor was abandoned in 303 B.C., and the populace removed to the new town, about 2 miles inland, which occupied a strong natural position. The city became a member of the Achaean league in 251 B.C. Half a century later it began to show friendliness to the Romans, and continued to do so during the 50 years that followed; and in 146 B.C., on the destruction of Corinth by the Roman general, Mummius, it was rewarded with a large portion of the conquered territory and with the management of the Isthmian Games. It held this distinction for a century, until Corinth was founded again and made a Roman colony. The Roman senate addressed the letter to Sicyon mentioned in I Macc. 15:23, about 139 B.C.

Si'd'im (si'd'im) [probably, salt flats, from Hittite siyanta, salt]. A valley, full of bitumen pits, in the region of the Salt or Dead Sea. There Chedorlaomer defeated the king of Sodom and his allies (Gen. 14:3, 8, 10).

Si'de (si'dē). A maritime town of e. Pamphylia in Asia Minor. It maintained close commercial relations with Aradus in Phoenicia, gave the title Sidetes to Antiochus VII, who was brought up in the town, and was one of the places to which the Roman senate sent letters in favor of the Jews (I Macc. 15:23).

Si'dōn (si'dōn) and Zi'dōn; in A.V. usually Zi'dōn in O.T.; in A.V. and R.V. always Si'dōn in N.T. [a fishery]. An ancient city of the Canaanites (Gen. 10:15, 19), on the seacoast, 22 miles n. of Tyre. It was subject to Egypt in the 15th century B.C. Its importance is attested by Homer, who often mentions Sidon, but never Tyre, and who uses Sidon and Sidonian as synonymous with Phoenicia and Phoenician. It was the n. limit of the Canaanites, in the narrow sense (Gen. 10:19). Its territory was near Zebulun (ch. 49:13) and the boundary of Asher reached it (Josh. 19:23, where and in ch. 11:8 it is called Great Sidon). The tribe of Asher, however, failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. 1:31). In the period of the Judges the Sidonians oppressed the Israelites (Judg. 10:12), and the latter people are accused of worshipping the gods of Sidon (v. 6). Of these gods, Baal was doubtless the chief (I Kings 16:31); the principal object of worship, however, was Ashtoreth, a goddess of fertility (I Kings 11:5, 33; II Kings 23:13). Ethbaal, a king of Sidon, was the father of Jezebel (I Kings 16:31). Isaiah predicted that it would be visited with judgment which would make its inhabitants pass to Kittim, that is, Cyprus (Isa. 23:12). It was for a time subject to the neighboring city of Tyre (Jos. Antiq. ix. 14, 2). In 701 B.C., it submitted to Sennacherib, king of Assyria. In 677 B.C. it was destroyed by Esarhaddon. Jeremiah predicted its subjugation by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (Jer. 27:3, 6). Ezekiel denounced judgment against it because it had been "a pricking brier unto the house of Israel" (Ezek. 28:21, 22). Joel charges the Sidonians and others with having helped to plunder Jerusalem, carrying off silver and gold, and selling its inhabitants for slaves (Joel 3:4-6). About 526 B.C. Sidon submitted to Cambyzes, son of Cyrus, king of Persia. The Sidonians sold cedar timber to the Jews for the Temple which Zerubbabel was building (Ezra 3:7). It revolted against Artaxerxes Ochus, king of Persia (c. 351 B.C.), but was retaken and destroyed (345 B.C.). To get rid of the Persians, in 333 B.C. it opened its gates to Alexander the Great. From his successors it passed, in 64 B.C., to the Romans. People from Sidon came to Galilee to attend on the preaching of Jesus and to witness his miracles (Mark 3:8; Luke 6:17; etc.). He once visited the region, and probably the city (Matt. 15:21; Mark 7:24, 31). Herod Agrippa II was highly displeased with the people of Tyre and Sidon, but they made peace with him "because their country was fed from the king's country" (Acts 12:20). Paul touched at the port (Acts 27:3). Since N.T. times Sidon has seen many vicissitudes. The modern city, called Saida, lies on the n.w. slope of a small promontory jutting out into the sea. The ancient harbor was formed by a ridge of rocks parallel to the shore. It was partly filled up with stones and earth by Fakhr ed-Din, the ruler of the Druses, in the 17th century. There is a wall protecting the land side of the city. The highest ground, which is crowned by the citadel, is on the s. side. Sidon has in and around it a few broken granite columns; and various sarcophagi, including the celebrated one of Eshmunazar, were brought from tombs in its vicinity.

Si-do'ni-ans (si-dō'nī-āns), in A.V. frequently Zi-dō'ni-ans (zī-dō'nī-ānz).

Siege. See WAR.

Sig'net. See SEAL 2.

Si'hon (si'hōn). A king of the Amorites, whose capital was Heshbon. He drove the Moabites from the country between Heshbon and the Arnon and took possession of it (Num. 21:26-30). Five Midianite tribes were his vassals (Josh. 13:21). When the Israelites arrived in the wilderness on the s.e. of the Arnon, Moses sent messengers to him to ask permission to cross his territory (Num. 21:21, 22; Deut. 2:26). Upon his refusal, the Israelites entered his domains under the necessity of fighting their way to the Jordan. Sihon gathered his army together at Jahaz and opposed the invaders, but he was defeated and his kingdom taken possession of by the Israelites (Num. 21:21-32; Ps. 135:11). The country thus seized was included between the Jordan, the Jabbok, and the Arnon (Num. 21:24, 32; Deut. 2:36; Judg. 11:22). The camp of Israel was pitched at Pisgah, a secure position on the mountains of Abarim, nearly in the center of the conquered district, preparatory to the campaign against Bashan (Num. 21:20; cf. chs. 22:1; 33:47). Sihon's kingdom was afterward assigned to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who desired it because it afforded good pasturage (Num. 32:1-4, 33-38).

Si'hor (si'hōr). See SHIHOR.

Si'las (si'lās) [Gr. for Aram. She'ild (= Saul)]. A distinguished member of the Apostolic Church at Jerusalem. He was sent with Paul to communicate the decision of the council held at that city to the Christians at Antioch (Acts 15:22, 27, 32). When Paul declined to take John Mark with him on the Second Missionary Journey, and parted with Barnabas, he chose Silas as his companion (v. 40), and the 2 were imprisoned together at Philippi (ch. 16:19, 25, 29). Silas was with Paul during the riot at Thessalonica (ch. 17:4), and was sent away with him to Berea, remaining there with Timothy after the apostle had been obliged to depart (v. 14). The 2 were, however, soon directed to follow Paul to Athens (v. 15). They started to join him, but do not seem to have come up with him till after his arrival at Corinth (ch. 18:5). In this city Silas was an esteemed co-worker of Paul's (II Cor. 1:19). The same individual who in the Acts is familiarly named Silas is unvaryingly called Silvanus in the Epistles. As the Apostle Paul was known by two names, so Silas had also a Latin appellation, Silvanus (sylvan), which resembles his Aramaic name. He was associated with Paul and Timothy in sending the 2 letters to the Thessalonians (I Thess. 1:1; II Thess. 1:1). He is probably the Silvanus who carried to its destination The First Epistle of Peter (I Peter 5:12).

Silk. A fine, soft thread produced by various species of caterpillars, and a fabric woven from the thread. Silk reached the markets of the West shortly after the conquest of Alexander the Great. It was known to the Greeks as serikon, pertaining to the Seres, who are generally identified with the Chinese. It was a choice article of merchandise (Rev. 18:12), fit for the clothing of Roman emperors (Jos. War vii. 5, 4). As late as the reign of the emperor Aurelian, A.D. 270-275, unmixed silk goods were sold for their weight in gold. The fine raiment referred to in Ezek. 16:10, 13 by the term meshi was probably silk, as the rabbinical interpreters understood and as it is rendered in English.

Si'la (si'lā). An unknown place near Mollo (II Kings 12:20).

Si-lo'ah (si-lō'āh), an erroneous transliteration of Shelah in A.V. of Neh. 3:15. See SILOAM.

Si-lo'am (si-lō'am) [sent, or conducted; a sending of water through an aqueduct]. A pool at Jerusalem (John 9:7); identical with Shiloah, the waters of which "go softly" (Isa. 8:6), and the pool of Shelah, which was by the king's garden (Neh. 3:15). Josephus says that it was situated at the extremity of the valley of cheesemongers, near a bend of the old wall beneath Ophlas, i.e., Ophel (Jos. War v. 4, 1 and 2). The name is preserved in the Birk'at Silwān, which occupies the general site of the ancient pool. It is a rectangular reservoir, 58 feet long, 18 broad, and 19 deep, built of masonry, the w. side of which has considerably broken down. The fountain is a small upper basin excavated in the rock. It is really the termination of the tunnel which was cut to conduct the water from the Fountain of the Virgin. From the lower reservoir, the water flows in a small rill across the road and irrigates gardens in the Kidron Valley.

In 1880 an inscription of 6 lines was discovered on the walls of this tunnel by a youth who had entered from the Siloam end. It proved to be written in pure Hebrew, and is supposed to date from the time of Ahaz or Hezekiah. A portion of the first 3 lines has been destroyed by the wearing away of the rock, and occasionally a letter cannot be made out with certainty. Still the sense is plain. It describes how the workmen, who had excavated toward each other from the 2 ends of the tunnel, met. It is as follows, as nearly as possible. "... the boring through! And this was the manner of the boring through. While yet [the miners were lifting up] the pick one toward another, and while there were yet three cubits to be [cut through, there was heard] the voice of each calling to the other; for there was a split in the rock on the right hand. . . . And on the day of the boring through, the miners struck the one so as to meet the other, pick against pick. And the water flowed from the source to the pool, 1200 cubits; and 100 cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the miners."

The tower in Siloam which fell (Luke 13: 4) was probably one on the Ophel ridge, near Siloam.

Sil'-va-nus (sīl-vā'nūs). See SILAS.

Sil'-ver. A precious metal. Its ore was mined from the earth (Job 28:1) and melted in a furnace, by which process the dross was separated from the richer metal (Ps. 12:6; Prov. 17:3; 25:4; Ezek. 22:22). It was obtained in Arabia (II Chron. 9:14; cf. I Kings 10:22, 27) and Tarshish (Jer. 10:9; Ezek. 27:12), Spain being a large producer (I Macc. 8:3). It was used as a medium of exchange from remotest antiquity (Gen. 23:16; 37:28). The amount required was weighed out (Job 28:15; Isa. 46:6), for silver was not coined until late, among the Jews not until long after the Exile (I Macc. 15:6); see MONEY. Personal ornaments (Gen. 24:53; Ex. 3:22; S. of Sol. 1:11), crowns (Zech. 6:11), musical instruments, as trumpets (Num. 10:2), and household utensils of the wealthy, like Joseph's drinking cup (Gen. 44:2) were made of silver. Large quantities of the metal were used in the tabernacle and Temple for sockets (Ex. 26:19), hooks, chapters and fillets of the pillars (Ex. 27:10; 38:19), platters and bowls (Num. 7:13; I Chron. 28:17; Ezra 1:9, 10), cups (II Kings 12:13), candlesticks, and tables (I Chron. 28:15, 16). Idols and models of idol shrines were constructed of silver (Ps. 115:4; Acts 19:24).

Sil'-ver-ling. The rendering of Heb. keseph, silver, in Isa. 7:23, which is elsewhere translated by shekel or piece of silver.

Sī'māl-cū'e (sī'māl-kū'ē). See IMALCUE.

Sīm'e-on (sīm'ē-ūn), in R.V. of N.T. Sym'e-on, in imitation of a Gr. form, when the persons are not mentioned in O.T. (Luke 3:30; Acts 13:1; 15:14) [hearing]. 1. The second-born son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. 29:33). In conjunction with his brother Levi, he massacred the Hivite inhabitants of Shechem on account of the injury done by one of their number to Dinah (ch. 34:24-31); see DINAH. When one of Jacob's sons was to be kept a prisoner in Egypt as security for return of the rest, Joseph took Simeon and bound him (ch. 42:24). The prediction of Simeon's future by the dying Jacob returns to the subject of the massacre, and threatens Simeon as well as Levi that they will be scattered in Israel (ch. 49:5-7).

2. The tribe of which Simeon, the son of Jacob, was the progenitor. He had 6 sons: Jemuel or Nemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin or Jarib, Zohar or Zerah, and Shaul. With the exception of Ohad, all these founded tribal families (Gen. 46:10; Num. 26:12-14; I Chron. 4:24). The prince of the tribe in the early times of the wilderness wanderings was Shelumiel, son of Zurishaddai (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19), and at a later period Shemuel, son of Ammihud (ch. 34:20). At the 1st census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 59,300 fighting men (chs. 1:23; 2:13), at the 2d, 22,200 (ch. 26:12-14). Shaphat, son of Hori, was the spy from the tribe (ch. 13:5). Moses, before his departure, blessed the tribes, but omitted to mention Simeon explicitly (Deut., ch. 33). This omission is probably due to the artificial construction of the poem. Moses wanted 12 for the number of the tribes. He formed 2 groups, departing from the order of birth, and placing the children of Jacob's 2 wives in the 1st group and those of the 2 maids in the 2d.

Leah 3	Leah's maid 1
Rachel 3	Rachel's maid 2
Leah 2	Leah's maid 1

The 1st group contains 8, Simeon being omitted, and the 2d group contains just half as many. The 1st group is subdivided into 3 minor groups, beginning with 3 of the elder children of Leah and closing with Leah's youngest 2, and having Rachel's 3 in the center; the number 3 for Rachel is obtained by counting Joseph as 2, i.e., Ephraim and Manasseh. The 2d group is made to correspond to this arrangement. It begins with Leah's first-born by her maid and closes with her 2d son by the same maid, and the 2 sons of Rachel by her maid are placed between. The blessings pronounced upon these tribes are framed within a benediction upon all Israel (Deut. 33:2-5, 26-29). The tribe of Simeon could best be omitted from the particular enumeration because it was to be scattered in Israel (Gen. 49:5-7). The same punishment also awaited Levi, but recent deeds had partly atoned for the past and given the tribe of Levi a position of honor among the people of God. After Moses' death the tribe of Simeon was not assigned a self-contained territory, but was granted possession in the midst of Judah. The Simeonites, however, although not explicitly mentioned, were not excluded from the blessings invoked on the tribes. They were included in the general benediction upon Israel as a whole, with which the poem opens and closes. The tribe of Simeon was one of those who stood at the foot of Mount Gerizim to pronounce blessings (Deut. 27:12).

When the Land of Canaan was distributed by lot, the 2d lot taken at Shiloh came forth for the tribe of Simeon, and land was assigned them in the extreme s. of Canaan, in the midst of the inheritance of the children of Judah (Josh. 19:1-9), and the 2 tribes made common cause against the Canaanites (Judg. 1:1, 3, 17). Among the Simeonite cities were Beer-sheba, Ziklag, and Hormah (Josh. 19:1-9), in the s. part of Judah. In the reign of Hezekiah the Simeonites smote the people of Ham and the Meunim who dwelt in the valley of Gedor; 500 of them also slaughtered the Amalekites of Mount Seir; in both cases occupying the territory of the vanquished tribes (I Chron. 4:24-43). It is believed that ultimately a great part of the tribe disappeared, but it was recognized by Ezekiel in his prophecies of the future Canaan (Ezek. 48:24, 25, 33), and in the apocalyptic vision there were sealed 12,000 Simeonites (Rev. 7:7).

3. An ancestor of Christ, who lived after David but before Zerubbabel (Luke 3:30).

4. A priest of the family of Joarib, and an ancestor of the Maccabees (I Macc. 2:1).

5. A righteous and devout man, to whom it had been revealed by the Holy Spirit that he should not see death till he had seen the Lord's Christ. Coming into the Temple when Joseph and Mary had just brought in the infant Jesus, Simeon recognized him as the promised Messiah, expressed his willingness now to depart in peace, and made a prophetic address to Mary with respect both to her and to her child (Luke 2:25-35).

6. Simon Peter (Acts 15:14); see PETER.

7. A Christian prophet or teacher at Antioch. He was surnamed Niger, black, and may perhaps have been of African race (Acts 13:1).

Símon (símŭn) [hearing]. Simon and Symeon represent Gr. for Heb. Shim'ôn, Simeon. 1. Second son of the priest Mattathias. He was called Thassi, which may perhaps mean director or guide (I Macc. 2:3, in Syriac Tharsi). With his brothers he sympathized with his father in the revolt against the religious intolerance of the Syrians (v. 14). Regarding him as the wisest of the sons, his father, when about to die, appointed him the adviser of the family, but gave the military authority to Judas, a younger brother (vs. 65, 66). Simon held a military command under Judas and led a detachment of troops to the aid of the Jews in Galilee (ch. 5:17, 20-23). After the death of Judas, Jonathan was chosen leader. He made Simon commandant of the entire coast (chs. 11:59; 12:33, 34). When Jonathan was seized and held prisoner by Tryphon, the conduct of the war devolved on Simon, as the last remaining brother of the Maccabee family (ch. 13:1-9). He at once completed the fortifications of Jerusalem and secured possession of Joppa (vs. 10, 11). When Tryphon invaded Judea, Simon dogged his army (v. 20), and when Tryphon withdrew from the country, Simon rebuilt and provisioned the strongholds of Judea (v. 33). He also allied himself with Tryphon's rival, Demetrius II, and obtained from him the recognition of the independence of Judea, 142 B.C. (vs. 34-42). Thereupon he besieged and captured Gezer (vs. 43-48, in A.V. Gaza). In the spring of 141 he reduced the Syrian citadel at Jerusalem (vs. 49-52). A season of peace followed, during which Simon devoted his energies to internal administration and the encouragement of commerce and agriculture (ch. 14:4-15). He embellished the family tomb at Modin, in which he had placed the remains of his brother Jonathan (ch. 13:25-30). The Spartans and Romans renewed the league with him (chs. 14:16-24; 15:15-24). He was acknowledged by the Jews as high priest and captain and leader (chs. 13:42; 14:41, 42, 47; 15:1, 2), and in 140 B.C. was authorized to wear the purple (ch. 14:43, 44). Antiochus Sidetes, when on the eve of coming to Syria to help to defend the cause of the absent Demetrius against Tryphon, made concessions to Simon and gave him authority to coin money (ch. 15:6), but afterward became estranged from him and demanded the surrender of Joppa, Gezer, and the citadel at Jerusalem (vs. 26-31). Simon refused, and war ensued, 138-7 B.C., but the Syrians were worsted. In the early spring of 135 B.C., while on a tour of visitation to the cities of his dominion, he was treacherously murdered in the castle of Dok, near Jericho, by his son-in-law (ch. 16:14-16).

2. Father of Judas Iscariot (John 6:71). He too bore the designation Iscariot (ibid. and ch. 13:26, R.V.).

3. Simon Peter (Matt. 10:2); see PETER.

4. Simon the Zealot, one of the 12 apostles (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13); see CANANAEAN.

5. One of the Lord's brethren (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3); see BROTHERN OF THE LORD.

6. A Pharisee, at whose house our Lord once ate, on which occasion a woman, who was a sinner, anointed his feet (Luke 7:36-50).

7. A householder in Bethany. He had been a leper and not improbably had been cured by Christ. When our Lord was at meat in his house, Mary, the sister of Lazarus, anointed his feet with precious ointment (Matt. 26:6-13; Mark 14:3-9). Martha served, and Lazarus was one of those who ate. The presence of the brother and 2 sisters, and the active part taken by the sisters, as well as the fact that Simon's house was in the town of Lazarus and his sisters, makes it evident that Simon was a relative or intimate friend of theirs. But there is no reason to believe that he was their father or the husband of Mary. He may have been the husband of Martha; see MARTHA.

8. The Cyrenian who was compelled to bear the cross of Christ. He was the father of Alexander and Rufus (Matt. 27:32).

9. A sorcerer (now popularly called Simon Magus, i.e., Simon the magician) who so amazed the people of Samaria with his arts that they said, "This man is that power of God which is called Great." He was apparently converted through the instrumentality of Philip the evangelist, by whom he was baptized. Having subsequently offered to buy with money the privilege of conferring the Holy Spirit on anyone he wished by the imposition of hands, he was sternly rebuked by Peter, who declared that his heart was not right with God, and that he was still in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. He took the reproof meekly and begged the apostle to pray for him that none of the evils threatened might be allowed to befall him (Acts 8:9-24). He was afraid, but there is no evidence that he was penitent. Ecclesiastical tradition makes Simon recommence his sorceries and become the persistent antagonist of the Apostle Peter, following him about from place to place and seeking encounters with him, but only to be signally defeated. He is said to have helped to originate Gnosticism.

10. A tanner at Joppa, in whose house Peter lodged (Acts 9:43; 10:6, 17, 32).

Sím'ri (sím'ri). See SHIMRI.

Sin, I. "Any want of conformity unto, or transgression of any law of God, given as a rule to the reasonable creature" (Rom. 3:23; I John 3:4; Gal. 3:10-12). A sin of omission is the neglect to do what the Law of God commands; a sin of commission is the doing of anything which it forbids. See EVIL.

Sin, II (sín) [Heb. Sin]. 1. A wilderness through which the Israelites passed on their way from Elím and the Red Sea to Rephidim and Mount Sinai (Ex. 16:1; 17:1; Num. 33:11, 12). It probably is Debbet er-Ramleh, a tract of sand, in the interior of the peninsula at the foot of Jebel et-Tih, but the desert plain el-Markhah on the coast has also been suggested. If the latter, the Israelites on leaving it probably continued to journey along the coast and turned inland through Wadi Feirân.

2. A city and stronghold of Egypt (Ezek. 30:15, 16). The LXX in v. 15 reads Sais, which, however, was never an important fortress. The Vulgate renders it Pelusium, which was "the key of Egypt," strongly fortified, and necessary to be captured before an army could enter Egypt from the n.e. In v. 16 the LXX reads Syênê, which is modern Assuan at the First Cataract; and the order of enumeration of Egyptian cities, from s. to n. (vs. 16-18) lends confirmation to this identification with Syene.

Sī'nai (sī'ni), in A.V. of N.T. twice Sī'na [sī'nā] (Acts 7:30, 38). A mountain, called also Horeb, at which the Israelites, traveling by way of Marah, Elim, and the Red Sea, arrived in the 3d month after their departure from Egypt (Ex. 19:1). It was distant from Kadesh-barnea 11 days' journey by way of Mount Seir (Deut. 1:2). A wilderness, sufficiently large for the camp of Israel, lay at its foot (Ex. 19:2); so close that the mountain could be touched (v. 12), and yet its upper part was visible from the camp (vs. 16, 18, 20). From this mountain the Law of the Ten Commandments was given, and at its base the covenant was ratified which made the Israelites a nation with Jehovah as king (Ex. 20:1 to 24:8). All the legislation contained in Ex., ch. 20 to Num., ch. 10 was enacted on or at the foot of Mount Sinai, according to repeated statement (Ex. 24:12; 31:18; 34:2; Lev. 1:1; 16:1; 25:1; 26:46; 27:34; Num. 1:1; 9:1). The only later visit to the mount recorded in Scripture is that of Elijah when he was threatened by Jezebel (1 Kings 19:8).

A theory has found favor that Mount Sinai stood within the borders of Mount Seir, but the opinion prevails that Sinai is to be sought among the mountains in the interior of the Sinaitic peninsula. Tradition in favor of Mount Serbāl, on Wadi Feirān, is traceable as far back as the time of Eusebius, for Jebel Mūsa only to that of Justinian. But neither tradition is regarded as weighty. Serbāl is the more imposing of the 2. It is a solitary, majestic mountain, 6,712 feet high, visible from a great distance. But at its foot is no wilderness which could be called the wilderness of Sinai. Jebel Mūsa is part of a short ridge of granite formation, extending about 2 miles from n.w. to s.e. The ridge has 2 peaks: Rās es-Şafāfeh, or peak of willows, at the n. end with an altitude of 6,540 feet; and Jebel Mūsa, the traditional Sinai, at the s. end rising to a height of about 7,363 feet. A plateau at the head of Wadi es-Sadad and almost due e. of Jebel Mūsa has been regarded by some scholars, including Tischendorf, as the site of the encampment of the Israelites, but its area is too limited to accommodate any considerable host. The base of Rās es-Şafāfeh toward the n.w. consists of a precipitous cliff. At the bottom of the cliff lies the plain of er-Rāhah, about 1 square mile in extent, and, with the adjacent wadies esh-Sheikh and ed-Deir, entirely suitable for a camping ground. The Biblical description makes it scarcely necessary, if not idle, to inquire whether the Law was given from Jebel Mūsa or Rās es-Şafāfeh, and whether one peak or the other was known as the mount of God in distinction from the rest of the clump. See HOREB.

The monastery of St. Catherine, a convent of Greek monks, is situated on the e. slope of the mountain, at the foot of Jebel Mūsa, in the wadi ed-Deir, 5,014 feet above sea level. Surrounded by massive granite walls, it is, as it were, a fortress. Its foundation is ascribed to the emperor Justinian in A.D. 527, who is said to have built it around a tower erected long before by Helena, mother of Constantine; but this ascription is probably due to confusion with the fact that Justinian built a castle in 530 for the protection of the monks who dwelt in the region. The monastery is named after St. Catherine, who was tortured on the wheel and beheaded in Alexandria in A.D. 307, and whose body is said by the monks to have been carried by angels from Alexandria to the lofty summit of Jebel Katherin, 2½ miles s.w. of Jebel Mūsa. Her head and 1 hand are said to be contained in a marble sarcophagus in the chapel of the monastery. The monastery has often been destroyed and rebuilt.

The Church of the Transfiguration is an early Christian basilica with mosaics of the 7th or 8th century. The oldest part of it is probably the Chapel of the Burning Bush, at the back of the apse and on the reputed site of the event it commemorates. In the garden are fig, orange, olive, almond, apple, and apricot trees, grape vines, and a few lofty cypresses. The library is exceedingly valuable. It contains many MSS., predominantly Greek and Arabic, but also many others, including some written in Syriac and Ethiopic. Here, in 1844 and 1859, Tischendorf found the Codex Sinaiticus, which dates from about A.D. 400; see NEW TESTAMENT. Here also, in 1892, Mrs. Lewis discovered a MS. which contains the text of the Old Syriac Gospels; see VERSIONS.

Sī'nīm (sī'nīm), Land of. A country cited to illustrate the promise that the scattered Israelites shall be gathered from the remotest regions of the earth. "Lo, these shall come from far; and, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim" (Isa. 49:12). Since the w. and n. have been mentioned, the land of Sinim is not to be sought there, but in the s. or e. Wherever the prophet was when he uttered these words, his words exclude the Sinites of Phoenicia (Gen. 10:17), for they were not a remote people. Besides this, they were an unimportant tribe. For the same reason, the people of Syene or Pelusium (cf. the name Sin in Ezek. 30:15, 16) are excluded. They were almost in the heart of the inhabited world, separated from the remote bounds of the earth by Ethiopia and Libya at least. The chief theories are: 1. The expression was chosen as a designation of the lands s. of Palestine, because in that direction lay the town of Sin (Pelusium or Syene), the wilderness of Sin (Ex. 16:1), and Mount Sinai. But this region was too near at hand to denote the remotest countries. Sheba and Cush, which are used to denote the utmost parts of the earth toward the s. lay far beyond. In favor of Syene, however, is the fact that there was a Jewish garrison colony at Elephantine and Syene, from the 6th century to c. 400 B.C., for defending the s. frontier of Egypt. 2. The Sinim were the Shinas, who have dwelt from ancient times at the foot of the Hindu Kush mountains. 3. It may refer to Elam, which in Old Akkadian was known as Si-nim (highland). 4. A widely held view is that the Chinese are meant. The prophet does not assert that Israelites were already living in China (if his words be restricted to a return of the exiles). They may have been; for the presence of Israelites in China is attested as early as the 3d century B.C., and it is not known how much earlier they migrated to that land. But the people were scattered far and wide, and yet wider dispersion was in prospect (Isa. 11:11). They should be recovered from the farthest bounds of earth where they are found. According to the Chinese records Chinese merchants visited foreign lands as early as the 12th century B.C., and foreign merchants entered China as early as the 10th century. It is probable that direct commercial relations existed between China and India, and hence indirectly at least with the countries farther w.

Sī'nite (sī'nīt). A Canaanite tribe, mentioned between the Arkite and the Arvadite (Gen. 10:17). A place named Sin not far from Arkā was known to Jerome, and Strabo mentions a fortress called Sinna on Mount Lebanon.

Sin Of'fer'ing. See OFFERINGS.

Sī'on (sī'win) [elevated, towering]. A name for Mount Hermon (Deut. 4:48). For Mount Sion at Jerusalem, a different word in Heb., see ZION.

Siph'moth (sif'mōth). A haunt of David during his wanderings, to which he sent part of the spoils of Ziklag (I Sam. 30:28; cf. I Chron. 27:27).

Sip'pai (sip'pī). See SAPH.

Sir'rah (sir'rā). A well or cistern 20 stades from Hebron (Jos. Antiq. vii. 1, 5) from which Abner was treacherously recalled to Hebron by Joab (II Sam. 3:26). It is probably 'Ain Sārah, 1½ miles n.w. of Hebron.

Sir'ron (sir'ī-ōn) [cuirass, coat of mail]. The name given by the Sidonians to Mount Hermon (Deut. 3:9; Ps. 29:6).

Sis'mal (sis'ā-mī). See SISMAL.

Sis'era (sis'ēr-ā). Commander of a Canaanite army which held northern Israel in subjection. Defeated on the Kishon and fleeing n., probably on his way to the overlord of the Canaanite king, he sought refuge with Heber the Kenite, who was at peace with the Canaanites. Heber's wife saw him coming, went forth, and invited him into her tent, but killed him while he slept (Judg., chs. 4; 5; I Sam. 12:9; Ps. 83:9); see JAEI. Probably those Nethinim who were known as the children of Sisera were descended from captives taken at this time (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55).

Sis'mai (sis'mī), in A.V. Sis'a'mal. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:40).

Sis'ter. A kinswoman; a full sister or a half-sister (Gen. 20:12; Deut. 27:22; or a wife (S. of Sol. 4:9; Tobit 5:20; 7:16; 8:4); or a woman of the same tribe (Num. 25:18) or a woman fellow believer in Christ (Rom. 16:1; James 2:15).

Sis'trum. A musical instrument (II Sam. 6:5, R.V. marg.), consisting of several metallic rods in an oval metallic frame. The rods were either loosely inserted or loose rings were hung on them, so that the instrument would jingle when shaken.

Sith'ri (sith'ri), in A.V. Zith'ri [a hiding place is (Jehovah)]. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (Ex. 6:22).

Sit'nah (sit'nā) [accusation, enmity (cf. Satan)]. A well dug by Isaac in the Philistine country, not far from Gerar; but the inhabitants of the district disputed his right to it (Gen. 26:21). Palmer and Drake in 1870 found a small valley called Wadi Shūtnet er-Ruheibeh. The first portion of the name corresponds to Sitnah, and Ruheibeh to Rehoboth, which was in the immediate vicinity of Sitnah (v. 22).

Si-van' (sē-vān') [Heb. siwān from Akkad. simānu]. The 3d month of the Babylonian and Jewish year (Esth. 8:9), extending from the new moon of May to that of June. See YEAR.

Slave. Slavery existed in remote antiquity. Slaves were acquired: 1. By capture, especially in war (Num. 31:9; II Kings 5:2; Jos. War iii. 4, 1; vi. 9, 2). 2. By purchase from slave owners (Gen. 17:27; 37:28, 36; Ezek. 27:13; Joel 3:6, 8). 3. By birth from slaves owned (Gen. 17:12). 4. In payment of debt; thieves unable to make restitution, and, though contrary to the spirit of the Mosaic Law, a debtor, or his children, being sold as slaves (Ex. 22:3; II Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5, 8; Amos 2:6; Matt. 18:25). 5. Among the Hebrews there was also the voluntary sale of one's self or one's daughter on account of poverty (Ex. 21:2, 7; Lev. 25:39, 47).

The price of a slave varied of course according to times and circumstances. It was reckoned in Hebrew judicial cases as averaging 30 shekels (Ex. 21:32). The Jewish slaves in Alexandria in the 3d century B.C.

brought about the same, 120 drachmas (Jos. Antiq. xii. 2, 3). Joseph at 17 years of age was purchased for 20 shekels (Gen. 37:28).

Among the Hebrews the legal status of a Hebrew slave was very different from that of the slave who was not an Israelite. The Hebrew slave had manumission after 6 years of service, if he chose; might not be harshly treated, nor sent away empty on his release; and, if owned by a foreign sojourner in Israel, had the privilege of redemption at a price legally regulated, the moment he could secure the necessary money (Ex. 21:2-6; Lev. 25:43, 47-55; Jer. 34:8-16). The rights of the Hebrew maid were the subject of further special legislation (Ex. 21:7-11). All Hebrew slaves, both those who had elected to remain with their masters when the 7th year had come and those who had not served 6 years, were released at the year of jubilee (Lev. 25:40). This provision was necessitated when the law regarding the restoration of every man's inheritance at the jubilee was enacted. The return of the slave to his inheritance was involved, whether he chose to go back to his master's family afterward or not. The slave also who was not an Israelite fared well among the Hebrews. The Mosaic Law recognized that he possessed rights. He might be whipped or beaten, but not maimed or killed (Ex. 21:20-27; Lev. 24:17, 22). In case a captive slave girl was taken to wife, she acquired new rights (Deut. 21:10-14). All these non-Hebrew slaves were regarded as members of the commonwealth of Israel (Gen. 17:10-14); and they were equal before God, participating in the religious festivals and sacrifices (Ex. 12:44; Lev. 22:11; Deut. 12:12, 18; 16:11, 14), and enjoying the rest of the Sabbath day (Ex. 20:10; 23:12). Another humane feature of the Mosaic Law gave an asylum to fugitive slaves. They were not to be surrendered, but were allowed to dwell in the land wherever they chose (Deut. 23:15, 16). It also forbade, on pain of death, the stealing of men and the selling or holding of them (Ex. 21:16; Deut. 24:7); and there is no evidence that slave markets ever existed in Israel. The Mosaic Law contrasts most favorably with the laws of contemporary heathen nations in its humanity toward slaves. The relationship between master and slave was often cordial (Gen., ch. 24). The slave was regarded as entitled to justice (Job 31:13-15); he sometimes inherited the property of his master (Gen. 15:2, 3), and was sometimes admitted into the family as son-in-law (I Chron. 2:34, 35).

Christianity avoided a sudden reversal of established usages (I Cor. 7:21), urged the slave to obey his master (Eph. 6:5-8; Col. 3:22-25; I Tim. 6:1, 2; I Peter 2:18-21), and sent the runaway slave voluntarily back to his Christian master (Philemon 10-16). But it also promulgated principles which improved the condition of slaves in the Roman Empire. It recognized the equality of slave and master in God's sight (I Cor. 7:21, 22; Gal. 3:28; Col. 3:11). It exhorted the master to treat his slaves considerably, reminding him that they had rights which God will maintain (Eph. 6:9; Col. 4:1).

Slime. See BITUMEN.

Sling. A simple weapon usually consisting of a piece of leather with 2 strings attached to its opposite sides and a stone inserted. It was whirled once or twice round the head and 1 string let go, whereby the stone was projected with great force. On the field of battle the stones were either carried in a bag by the slinger or piled at his feet (I Sam. 17:40).

It seems to have been used in warfare by practically all the peoples of antiquity; by the Egyptians, Syrians (I Macc. 6:51; 9:11), Assyrians, Persians (Xen. Anabasis iii. 3, 18), and in the far w. by Sicilians (Herod. vii. 158) and mercenaries in the Roman army. Among the Hebrews the Benjamites in the times of the Judges and in the reign of Saul were noted for their skill in its use,

Early Slingstones, Found in Palestine

being able to sling stones with the left hand (Judg. 20:16; I Chron. 12:2). David slew Goliath with a stone from a sling (I Sam. 17:48-50). Slingers served in the armies of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat, and Uzziah (II Kings 3:25; II Chron. 26:14), and were effective as late as the war with the Romans (Jos. War ii. 17, 5; iv. 1, 3).

Smith. An artificer who forges iron and brass into tools and weapons, a blacksmith (I Sam. 13:19; Isa. 44:12; 54:16), like Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22); or one who refines and shapes the precious metals, a goldsmith (Isa. 40:19). The blacksmith used a charcoal furnace, bellows, tongs, anvil, and hammer (Ecclus. 38:28). See BELLOWS.

Smyrna (smŭr'nā) [Gr., myrrh]. A city of great antiquity on the w. coast of Asia Minor. It was possessed by the Aeolian Greeks, and finally the Ionian Greeks admitted it into their confederacy. The Lydian king, Alyattes, destroyed it (c. 580 B.C.), and it lay waste for some 200 years, till the plan of rebuilding it was formed by Alexander the Great, and executed by his immediate successors, on a new site near by. It then became a large and flourishing commercial center, retaining its importance under the Romans. It became a part of the province of Asia, which was annexed in 133 B.C. and organized in 129-126 B.C. Its church was the 2d of the 7 addressed by John in the book of The Revelation. It escapes all censure, but it is exhorted to remain constant in the midst of persecution (Rev. 1:11; 2:8-11). Its bishop, Polycarp, suffered martyrdom by fire, near the stadion, probably in A.D. 169. In A.D. 178 Smyrna was destroyed by an earthquake, but was speedily rebuilt. Lying as it does at the extremity of a fine bay, in the track of trade, it is admirably adapted for commerce.

Snail. 1. The rendering of Heb. hōmet (Lev. 11:30; in R.V. sand lizard).

2. The rendering of Heb. shabbēlūl (Ps. 58:8), a genuine snail, especially of the shell-less family (Limacidae).

Snow. Snow occurs in the hilly country of Palestine, as at Sepphoris in Galilee, Nazareth, Jerusalem, Hebron (I Macc. 13:22; Jos. War i. 16, 2; iv. 8, 3). It may be expected in January or February, although the winter often passes without it. It sometimes falls to the depth of a foot, but seldom lies longer than a day. On Mount Lebanon it is found lingering on the heights and in the ravines late in the summer, and it crowns the summit of Hermon the year round. It is frequently referred to in Scripture as the standard of whiteness and the emblem of purity (Ps. 51:7; Isa. 1:18; Lam. 4:7; Matt. 28:3). It is poetically described as stored by God in his treasury (Job 38:22), commanded by him to fall (Job 37:6; Ps. 147:16), and descending like wool or birds or a swarm of locusts (ibid.; Ecclus. 43:17). Its value as a source of moisture to the ground was recognized (Isa. 55:10). Men took advantage of it in summer to cool their beverages (cf. Prov. 25:13). Clean snow would yield pure water for washing purposes (Job 9:30).

So (sō). King of Egypt, whose aid against Assyria Hoshea, king of Israel, endeavored to secure about 724 B.C. (II Kings 17:4). As the Heb. consonants may be pronounced Sewe', he is commonly identified, and doubtless correctly, with Sib'e, tartan of Egypt, who in 720 B.C. in alliance with Hanunu, king of Gaza, met Sargon, king of Assyria, in battle at Raphia on the Mediterranean, about 20 miles s. of Gaza. The allies were routed, Sib'e fled, Hanunu was captured, and presently Pharaoh paid tribute to Assyria. It is doubtful whether Sib'e was Shabako, king of Egypt. At this time at least he was tartan rather than Pharaoh.

Soap. Not the composition familiar in modern domestic use. The Heb. words bōr and bōrith, that which cleanses, denote an alkali. It was used for washing the person (Job 9:30, R.V. marg., lye; Jer. 2:22), for washing clothes (Mal. 3:2), and as a flux in smelting ores (Isa. 1:25, R.V. marg., lye). The Greek translators regarded it as a plant or obtained from a plant, for they represented it by the Gr. word pōa, grass, grass-like plant. The root of the soapwort (Saponaria officinalis) is largely used in Palestine for washing linens, because it does not cause them to shrink. The employment of the alkali for smelting purposes indicates that it was in the form of ashes. It was doubtless obtained from such plants as the glasswort (Salicornia fruticosa) and the saltwort (Salsola kali), which are to this day reduced to ashes for the soda which they yield.

So'eo (sō'kō) and So'eoh (sō'kō), according to the alternate Heb. orthography; in A.V. variously spelled So'coh, So'cho (sō'kō), So'choh (sō'kō), Sho'cho, Sho'choh, Sho'co [thorn, hedge of thorns]. 1. A town in the Shephelah or lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:35). It stood on the hilly border of the valley of Elah, in a strong position isolated from the rest of the ridge. The Philistines pitched between it and Azekah just before Goliath stood forth as their champion (I Sam. 17:1). It was rebuilt or refortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:7). It was captured, with the dependent villages, in the reign of Ahaz (ch. 28:18). Robinson successfully identified it with Khirbet Shuweikeh, 13 miles w. by s. of Bethlehem.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:48). Its site is found at another Khirbet Shuweikeh, 10 miles s.s.w. of Hebron.

It is doubtful which of the 2 towns is referred to in I Kings 4:10 and II Chron. 4:18.

So'di (sō'dī) [one in the secret or familiar council (of Jehovah)]. Father of the spy from the tribe of Zebulun (Num. 13:10).

Sod'om (sōd'ūm), in A.V. of N.T. once Sod'o-ma (sōd'ō-mā) (Rom. 9:29). One of the 5 cities in the Plain of the Jordan (Gen. 13:10). When Lot separated from Abraham, he chose it for his residence, though even then the place was notorious for its wickedness (vs. 11-13). It was plundered by Chedorlaomer (ch. 14:11), but the goods and captives were recovered by Abraham and restored (vs. 21-24). Subsequently it and at least 3 other cities of the Plain were destroyed by God on account of their wickedness. God probably effected his purpose by causing an eruption of burning asphalt and sulphur. Lot and his 2 daughters were spared (Gen. 19:1-29; Deut. 29:23; Isa. 1:9, 10; 3:9; 13:19; Jer. 49:18; 50:40; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:46-56; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9; Matt. 10:15; 11:24; Luke 10:12; 17:29; Rom. 9:29; II Peter 2:6; Jude 7). In the Apocalypse the great city of sin is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt (Rev. 11:8).

The exact site of Sodom is unknown. Two arguments may be advanced for the n. end of the Plain: 1. From a point near Beth-el, Abraham and Lot could see all the Plain of Jordan (cf. Gen. 13:3 with v. 10). Care must be exercised, however, in interpreting the word "all." 2. Chedorlaomer, coming from the s., had smitten the Amorites of Hazezon-tamar, i.e., En-gedi, before he was opposed by the king of Sodom and his allies (ch. 14:7, 8), a fact which seems to indicate that the meeting took place between En-gedi and the n. end of the sea. On the other hand, scholars favor the s. end, for which there are 3 weighty arguments: 1. Asphalt is found in large quantities only at the s. end of the Dead Sea (cf. Gen. 14:10). 2. Assuming that the sea covers the site (cf. ch. 14:3), the cities might have been situated at the s. end, where the water of the bay has a depth of from 2 to 20 feet, but could not have been in the n. part, where the sea is from 600 to 1,000 feet deep. The shallow s. basin of the Dead Sea has been encroaching on its shores steadily for the past century, during which its area has increased fully  $\frac{1}{2}$ . 3. Zoar, 1 of the cities (ch. 13:10), lay at the s. end of the sea (Jos. War iv, 8, 4).

For the vine of Sodom, see VINE OF SODOM.

Sod'om-ite (sōd'ūm-it). A person guilty of sodomy, the unnatural vice of Sodom (Gen. 19:5). The word renders Heb. kādēsh, one consecrated, a man dedicated to impure heathen worship. A woman thus dedicated practiced uncleanness as a priestess in the service of Ashtoreth or Asherah in Canaan, of Ishtar in Babylonia (Gen. 38:21, 22; Hos. 4:14). Sodomy was forbidden by the Mosaic Law (Deut. 23:17); but sodomites were found in Judah during the reign of Rehoboam (I Kings 14:24); Asa and Jehoshaphat cut them off (chs. 15:12; 22:46); but others arose in their place, and Josiah, to rid the land of them, broke down their houses (II Kings 23:7).

So'journ'er, in A.V. and sometimes in R.V. Stran'ger. See STRANGER.

Sol'o-mon (sōl'ō-mūn) [peaceable]. David's youngest son, at least by Bath-sheba (II Sam. 12:24; I Chron. 3:5; and cf. Jos. Antiq. vii. 14, 2). He was born at Jerusalem. David named him Solomon, "peaceable," in anticipation of the peace and quietness of his reign in contrast with his own stormy life (I Chron. 22:9); but through the Prophet Nathan he was divinely honored with the name Jedidiah, "beloved of Jehovah" (II Sam. 12:25). When David was old and feeble, Adonijah, one of his sons born at Hebron, and probably the eldest now that Amnon and Absalom were dead, planned to rule independently of his father's sanction; but the design was thwarted by the Prophet Nathan with the aid of Zadok the priest and Benaiah the military commander, supported by David's bodyguard. Solomon was proclaimed king (I Kings 1:5-40), and the party of Adonijah at once collapsed. David soon afterward died, and Solomon began his sole reign about the year 970 B.C., being at the time probably about 20 years old. Obedient to the dying charge of his father, he dealt out justice to Abiathar and Shimei; and when Adonijah began anew to plot against the king, he put him to death and ordered the execution of Joab likewise, who was implicated in the conspiracy (ch. 2:1-46). The young king soon brought to Jerusalem Pharaoh's daughter (ch. 3:1) as his queen. At that time the worship at the sanctuary, which had been broken up when the Lord forsook Shiloh, was still interrupted. The tabernacle was at Gibeon and the Ark at Jerusalem. The people worshiped at high places. Solomon went to Gibeon to sacrifice. There God appeared to him in a dream by night and bade him ask for anything he chose. He asked for an understanding heart, that he might be able justly to judge the people of God, for it was part of a king's duty in those days to administer justice. His request was granted, as he soon afterward showed by the skillful manner in which he disentangled truth from falsehood when he decided between the 2 women, each of whom claimed the living babe as her own (I Kings 3:2-28; II Chron. 1:3-12). Twenty or more years later the Lord appeared to him again, conditionally promised to continue the throne in Solomon's own line, and gave him solemn warning (I Kings 9:1-10; II Chron. 7:12-22).

His father had subdued the neighboring nations. Against Hamath only is it recorded that Solomon went to war. He was obliged to control that city in order to secure the n.e. portion of his dominions. Hadad the Edomite and Rezon of Damascus were hostile to Solomon, but the Hebrew monarch probably gave himself but little concern about them. He fortified Hazor at the crossing of the upper Jordan and built a tower in Lebanon, in order to hold Damascus in check, and saw to it that the road by Edom to Elzion-geber was open and safe. Otherwise Solomon's relations with neighboring kings were friendly, and he was able to devote himself to the organization of his kingdom and to the arts of peace.

David had amassed a great store of precious metals for the construction of a magnificent temple to Jehovah. Solomon took up the work, and with Tyrian help finished the Temple in 7 years (I Kings, chs. 5; 6). Then, after furniture had been made for it, it was dedicated (I Kings 7:13 to 8:66; II Chron., chs. 2 to 7). Next, the monarch erected a palace for himself, which took 13 years in building (I Kings 7:1-12); see PALACE. He also fortified and built cities in various parts of the country (ch. 9:17-19, R.V.; II Chron. 8:4-6, R.V.).

Solomon showed sagacity in government. He surrounded himself with eminent officials, among whom the son of the high priest held the 1st place (I Kings 4:2-6). He maintained the army at full strength. For administrative purposes he divided the kingdom into 12 districts, entirely independent of the old tribal lines (vs. 7-19). Nor did he fail to take a prominent part in the religion of the state. He led the nation in prayer at the dedication of the Temple, and invoked the divine blessing upon the assembled multitude.

Commerce flourished in his kingdom, and brought wealth (I Kings 10:14-29; II Chron. 9:13-27); and voyages were successfully made to Ophir and traffic was conducted with India (I Kings 10:22, 23; II Chron. 9:10-22). For the protection and fostering of trade, he built store cities, among others Palmyra, in the desert midway between Damascus and the Euphrates.

Solomon was interested in literary pursuits: he was a naturalist and wrote treatises on plants, "from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of birds, and of creeping things, and of fishes" (I Kings 4:33). He collected and composed many proverbs, some of which constitute part of the O.T.; see PROVERBS, THE. Two psalms (Psalms 72; 127) are attributed to him by their titles. See also ECCLESIASTES and SONG OF SOLOMON.

The splendor of his court, the magnificence of his table, and his pomp when on excursions corresponded to his wealth and political power (I Kings 10:4, 5, 21). People came from all parts to hear his wisdom (I Kings 4:34; 10:23-25). The report of his wisdom was carried even to S. Arabia, and the queen of Sheba journeyed to Jerusalem to test it and to see his magnificence (ch. 10:1-13).

Solomon erred in 2 respects. He established a harem, which included from 1st to last about 1,000 members. Doubtless not a few of these were hostages, princesses given him as pledges of political amity. Now many of these women were foreigners by birth and idolatrous in their religion, and he allowed himself to be persuaded by them to erect idol shrines (I Kings 11:1-8). For this apostasy Solomon was punished. The kingdom in its great extent and power was taken from the dynasty and only a fragment of it left to the family (vs. 9-13). The example of Solomon's disloyalty to Jehovah had direct influence in producing this penal result. Also influential to this end was the announcement by the Prophet Ahijah to Jeroboam that God would rend 10 tribes from Solomon and give them to him (vs. 28-39). Jeroboam became a recognized opponent of the king; but not until Solomon's son Rehoboam ascended the throne did Jeroboam secure a kingdom. A 2d less obvious yet an important error was Solomon's luxury, which imposed a burden on his overtaxed subjects, shook their loyalty to the throne, and sowed the seeds of future rebellion. See REHOBAM.

Solomon reigned 40 years, dying about 931 B.C. The events of his life and reign were recorded in the Book of the Acts of Solomon, the History of Nathan the Prophet, the Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, the Visions of Iddo the Seer (I Kings 11:41-43; II Chron. 9:29-31).

Sol'o'mon's (söl'ö-münz) Porch. A splendid colonnade, reputed to have been built by Solomon, on the e. side of the Temple area, on an artificial embankment built up from the valley of the Kidron (Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 7; War v. 5, 1). It is once mentioned that Christ walked in it (John 10:23); and the apostles were not infrequently there (Acts 3:11; 5:12).

Sol'o'mon's Serv'ants. Certain persons whose descendants were associated with the Nethinim, 390 or 392 of the 2 classes combined returning with Zerubbabel from the Captivity (Ezra 2:55-58; Neh. 7:57-60). Some of their names have a foreign aspect. They seem to have been the descendants of those Canaanites of various tribes from whom Solomon exacted bond service for the sake of the Temple and other magnificent buildings (I Kings 5:13-18; 9:21). See NETHINIM.

Sol'o'mon's Song. See SONG OF SOLOMON.

Sol'o'mon, Wis'dom of. See APOCRYPHA.

Son. 1. A male child; an immediate male descendant (Gen. 27:1). Other prominent significations follow.

2. A remoter male descendant. For instance, Jehu, son of Nimshi, was really Nimshi's grandson, for he was the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi (cf. II Kings 9:20 with v. 2). The Israelites were known as sons or children of Israel or Jacob centuries after the death of the Patriarch (Mal. 3:6; Luke 1:16).

3. A person received into filial relation by adoption or marriage (Ex. 2:10).

4. A kindly form of address used by an elderly man to a younger friend (Josh. 7:19; I Sam. 3:6, 16; 4:16; II Sam. 18:22).

5. Member of a guild or profession, as son of the apothecaries (Neh. 3:8, in R.V. one), sons of the singers (ch. 12:28), sons of the prophets (II Kings 2:3, 5; cf. Amos 7:14). Worshiper of a god, as the sons of Chemosh (Num. 21:29).

6. Inhabitant of a city or country, as sons of Zion* (Lam. 4:2), sons of Javan (Gen. 10:4).

7. Possessor of a quality, as son of Belial or worthlessness (I Sam. 25:17, A.V.), son of strength, i.e., a valiant man (I Sam. 14:52), son of peace (Luke 10:6).

Son of God. A title of the Messiah (Ps. 2:7; John 1:49); in its deepest sense expressive of the mysterious relation existing between the eternal Father and the eternal Son. In the Revised Version of the New Testament the designation Son of God is used about 45 times, in about 44 unequivocally denoting our Lord (Matt. 4:3, 6; 16:16; 26:63; 27:43; Mark 1:1; etc.), and in the remaining 1 characterizing Adam (Luke 3:38). In John 3:18 Christ is called the only begotten Son of God. Two reasons are suggested for the appellation: his eternal generation (Heb. 7:3), and his miraculous birth by the operation of the Holy Spirit (Luke 1:35). As Son of God, Christ is God with all the infinite perfections of the divine essence (John 1:1-14; 10:30-38; Phil. 2:6), and is equal with God (John 5:17-25). He is subordinate in mode of subsistence and operation; that is, he is of the Father, is sent by the Father, and the Father operates through him (John 3:16, 17; 8:42; Gal. 4:4; Heb. 1:2). Accordingly, the word "Son" is not a term of office, but of nature. He has the same nature, a fact which includes equality with God.

The claim was put forth by our Lord (Luke 22:70, R.V. marg.; John 5:17-47; 10:36; 11:4), and urged by the apostles (Acts 9:20; Gal. 2:20; I John 3:8; 5:5, 10, 13, 20), and it was for maintaining it that he was condemned by the sanhedrin on a charge of blasphemy (Matt. 26:63-66; Mark 14:61-64); but the justice of his claim had been acknowledged on the occasion of his baptism by the descent upon him of the Holy Spirit, accompanied by an audible utterance from his heavenly Father (Matt. 3:16, 17; Mark 1:10, 11; Luke 3:22; John 1:32-34). It was similarly acknowledged at the transfiguration (Matt. 17:5; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:35; II Peter 1:17). It was sustained by his character and by his works (John 1:14; 10:36-38; Heb. 1:3). And he "was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4), and by his ascension (Heb. 1:3).

In 1 passage of the O.T. the expression Son of God appears (Dan. 3:25, A.V.), but the R.V. alters this to a son of the gods. The speaker was a Babylonian heathen.

For the title "sons of God" applied to men, see SONS OF GOD.

Son of Man. A person possessed of humanity in distinction from divinity and the brute nature; a human being, with the emphasis on human (Num. 23:19; Job 25:6; Ps. 8:4; Isa.

51:12); see Son 7. When Daniel fell frightened on his face before the heavenly messenger, Gabriel addressed him as son of man (Dan. 8:17). When Ezekiel had seen the vision of Jehovah and fallen upon his face, a voice said: "Son of man, stand upon thy feet" (Ezek. 2:1), and thenceforth the prophet is constantly addressed as son of man. It was foretold (Dan. 7:13, 14, R.V.) that the hostile worldly power, represented by beasts, shall succumb before the Ancient of Days, and "one like unto a son of man," coming with the clouds of heaven, shall receive dominion and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages shall serve him; "his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom [nat] which shall not be destroyed." This figure seen in vision, a human being in contrast with the beasts that typified the kingdoms of the world, symbolized the saints of God in their corporate aspect, to whom universal and everlasting dominion shall be given (cf. v. 14 with v. 27).

The title was adopted by our Lord, evidently with reference to Dan. 7:13, 14, 27 (Matt. 24:30; Mark 14:62). He is recorded in the Gospels as having applied it to himself 78 times. It is also used of him by Stephen (Acts 7:56); cf. Heb. 2:6; Rev. 1:13; 14:14. Christ did not choose the title to assert that he had a fellow feeling for man and was a brother to all men; nor did he employ it to denote that he was a mere man and not divine, for he constantly claimed divine attributes (Luke 5:24). He chose a title which, by reason of its several possible interpretations, until fully defined by Jesus himself, could not be used against him by his foes. By it: 1. He identified himself with that human being in Daniel's vision who receives a universal and everlasting dominion (Dan. 7:14; cf. Matt. 16:28; 28:18). 2. He identified himself with the saints of the Most High, regarded collectively as a people, which the human figure in the vision symbolized, making himself their embodiment and their representative before God (Dan. 7:13, 27; cf. Matt. 25:31, 40; Mark 10:45 "a ransom for many"; Luke 12:8, 9). 3. He assumed for himself the sufferings and the glory that should follow which were predicted for that human kingdom in its efforts to establish itself and overcome the world (Dan. 7:21, 22, 25; cf. Matt. 17:22, 23; Luke 9:26; 18:31-33). 4. He implied that he will come with the clouds of heaven to receive the Kingdom (Dan. 7:13; cf. Matt. 24:30; 26:64). 5. He emphasized the human and humane in contrast with the brutal and bestial (Dan. 7:3-9, 13; cf. Matt. 25:31 with vs. 35, 36; Mark 10:45 "minister, and to give his life"; Luke 19:10).

Son of Man and Son of God are united in the same person. "Who do men say that the Son of man is? . . . Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven" (Matt. 16:13, 16, 17). "The high priest said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven" (Matt. 26:63, 64).

Song. A poetical composition, generally brief, capable of being set to music and sung, whether or not it was intended for singing or was ever actually sung (Ex. 15:1-18; Deut. 31:30 to 32:44). It was often sung to the accompaniment of music (Ex. 15:20, 21; Isa. 38:20). It might be secular or religious (Gen. 31:27; Num. 21:17, 18; Psalm 92, title; 137:3, 4); in praise of men or of God (I Sam. 18:6, 7; Ps. 28:7); the expression of light-heartedness or deep emotion; the utterance of innocent mirth or the outcome of a bacchanalian revel (Ps. 69:12).

Song of Sol'o-mon (sōl'ō-mūn), The. The last of the 5 poetical books of the O.T. in our present English Bible, an arrangement derived from the LXX. In the Hebrew Scriptures the Song stands between Job and Ruth, in the Writings (Hagiographa), or 3d section of the canon, and is the 1st of the 5 smaller rolls (Megilloth), which formed a group by themselves because they had come to be read on the 5 great anniversaries. The Song was read on the 8th day of the passover festival, the book being allegorically interpreted with reference to the history of the Exodus. The Song of Solomon is more fully called "The Song of songs, which is Solomon's" (S. of Sol. 1:1). The reduplication of the word song has superlative force, like servant of servants, Lord of lords, heaven of heavens, vanity of vanities (Gen. 9:25; Deut. 10:17; I Kings 8:27; Eccl. 1:2), and intimates that the production is a song of the highest character. In the Vulgate the title is literally translated Canticum Canticorum, from which the name Canticles is derived.

Several speakers take part in the dialogue. The distinction between them is quite clear in the Hebrew original, because the grammatical forms indicate gender. The R.V. marks change of speaker by space between the verses or sections. How many prominent personages are there in the poem? Are there 2, besides the daughters of Jerusalem, who resemble the chorus in a Greek play; or are there 3, either actually speaking or introduced in the remarks of the Shulammitte maid? According to the latter view, or shepherd theory, in its general form, the 3 chief speakers are a country maid, her rustic lover, and Solomon. The maid is betrothed to her country swain; but she is noticed by Solomon and his companions during some journey to the n. (ch. 6:10-13), brought to Jerusalem, and there, surrounded by the women of the palace, wooed by the king in the hope of gaining her affections. But the maid resists all enticements. When Solomon praises her, she responds by praising her rustic lover. She longs for him by day, and dreams of him by night. She sustains her devotion to him by recalling his speeches. She is true to him and to her vows. At length the parted lovers are reunited (ch. 8:5-7), and she is praised by her brothers for resisting all allurements. Throughout Solomon appears in an unfavorable light. He attempts to persuade the maid to forsake her proper allegiance (ch. 7:1-9). The poem, according to this view, celebrates a pure affection, which holds out against the temptations of a court, and is strong enough to resist the seductive arts of a king.

Many scholars have regarded the book as a collection of nuptial songs. In 1861 Wetzstein studied the marriage customs of a tribe living n. of Damascus. There in the first 7 days after their marriage the peasant couple play the part of king and queen, and they are treated as such by the community. These weddings generally are held in March. The threshing board is turned into a mock throne; songs are sung by the friends of the bride and groom, in which a description of the physical beauty of the couple holds a prominent place. While numerous parallels are apparent, there are difficulties in the theory, and it does not explain the unity of the poem.

Instead of regarding the Shulammitte as a country girl, some interpreters see in her the daughter of Pharaoh whom Solomon married. She is a stranger, dark of complexion, and a prince's daughter (chs. 1:5; 7:1). The blackness of skin, however, was due to sunburn (ch. 1:6), and the title of prince's daughter probably does not indicate her birth, which was apparently lowly, but her present high rank to which she has been raised (cf. ch. 6:12). According to this view the poem occupies an intermediate position between the dramatic and lyric conceptions of the book.

The Song has been regarded as a drama by many interpreters, but few have imagined that it was designed for presentation on the stage. It has been thought to consist of 4 acts (Ewald at 1st, Friedrich), or of 5 acts containing from 13 to 15 scenes (Ewald, Böttcher, and others), or of 6 acts with 2 scenes each (Delitzsch, Hahn). Bossuet discovered 7 acts, each filling a day, concluding with the Sabbath, inasmuch as the bridegroom on this day does not, as usual, go forth to his rural employments. His several days are: chs. 1:1 to 2:6; 2:7-17; 3:1 to 5:1; 5:2 to 6:9; 6:10 to 7:11; 7:12 to 8:3; 8:4-14.

Delitzsch follows the traditional view that there are but 2 main characters by whom the dialogue is sustained: Solomon and the Shulammitte maiden; his scheme is as follows: Act I. Mutual passion of the lovers (chs. 1:2 to 2:7), concluding with "I adjure you, O daughters of Jerusalem." The scene is laid in the palace of Solomon. Scene 1. Dialogue between the Shulammitte maid and the court ladies, daughters of Jerusalem (ch. 1:2-8). Scene 2. Enter Solomon: dialogue between him and the maiden, who is not yet his bride (chs. 1:9 to 2:7). Act II. Mutual seeking and finding (chs. 2:8 to 3:5), concluding with "I adjure you." The scene is the Shulammitte's country home. Scene 1. She relates a rapturous meeting with Solomon (ch. 2:8-17). Scene 2. She relates a dream, in which she thought she had lost her beloved, but found him again (ch. 3:1-5). Act III. Bringing the betrothed to the capital and the marriage (chs. 3:6 to 5:1), with the introduction, "Who is this?" and the conclusion, "Eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved." Scene 1. Procession to the palace (ch. 3:6-11). Scene 2. Dialogue between Solomon and his betrothed (ch. 4:1-16). The wedding must be supposed to follow; and then ch. 5:1, Solomon's morning greeting to his bride, and afterward his exhortation to the guests. Act IV. Love disdained, but regained (chs. 5:2 to 6:9). Scene 1. Shadows fall on the married life. The Shulammitte dreams of seeking her beloved, but finding him not (chs. 5:2 to 6:3). Scene 2. She has found her beloved again (ch. 6:4-9). Act V. The Shulammitte the beautiful but humble princess (chs. 6:10 to 8:4), with the introduction, "Who is she?" and the conclusion, "I adjure you." Scene 1. In the royal gardens; dialogue between the Shulammitte and the daughters of Jerusalem (chs. 6:10 to 7:5). Scene 2. In the palace; Solomon and the Shulammitte alone (chs. 7:6 to 8:4). Act VI. The confirmation of love's bond in the Shulammitte's old home (ch. 8:5-14), beginning "Who is this?" Scene 1. Solomon and his bride appear in the presence of her kinsfolk (ch. 8:5-7). Scene 2. The Shulammitte in her paternal home; dialogue between her and her brothers and the king (vs. 8-14).

A later and more probable view, accepted by the majority of modern critics and commentators, is that there are 3 principal characters: Solomon, a beautiful Shulammitte maiden, and her shepherd-lover. This was developed by Ewald and appears in outline as follows: Act I. Scene 1. The Shulammitte, longing for her absent shepherd-lover, complains that she is detained in the royal palace against her will (ch. 1:2-7). Ironical reply of the court ladies (v. 8). Scene 2 (chs. 1:9 to 2:7). Solomon seeks to win the Shulammitte's love. In ch. 2:5, 6 she sinks down in a fit of half-delirious sickness; in v. 7 she reminds the court ladies that love is a spontaneous affection and entreats them not to excite it in Solomon's favor. Act II. Scene 1 (ch. 2:8-17). The maiden recounts a scene from her past life, when her shepherd-lover visited her in her rural home. In vs. 16, 17 she declares her present unaltered devotion to him and expresses the hope that the separation may soon be at an end. Scene 2 (ch. 3:1-5). The Shulammitte narrates a dream which she recently had in the royal palace; she had gone in search of her absent lover through the city and found him. Verse 5 repeats the refrain of ch. 2:7. Act III. Scene 1 (ch. 3:6-11). Citizens of Jerusalem assembled in front of one of the gates; in the distance a royal pageant is seen approaching. Solomon is in the palanquin, wearing the crown which his mother gave him on his wedding day. The purpose is to dazzle the rustic maiden with the sense of the honor of becoming the king's bride. Scene 2 (ch. 4:1-7). Solomon, the maiden, and the court ladies. Solomon seeks to win the maiden's love. Scene 3 (chs. 4:8 to 5:1). The Shulammitte and the ladies. The maiden and her lover in ideal interview. Scene 4 (ch. 5:2-8). The maiden's 2d dream. This time she sought him in vain in the city, and with the memory of her dream she makes a fresh avowal of her love. Act IV. Scene 1 (chs. 5:9 to 6:3). The court ladies are surprised at the Shulammitte's persistent rejection of Solomon's advances and her devotion to one absent. Scene 2 (ch. 6:4-13). The king's renewed endeavor to win the maiden's affection; he praises her beauty and describes the honor in store for her. Scene 3 (ch. 7:1-9). Solomon's final endeavor to gain the Shulammitte's heart. Scene 4 (chs. 7:10 to 8:4). Heedless of the king's admiration, the maiden declares her unswerving devotion to her shepherd-lover. Act V. (ch. 8:5-14). The shepherds of Shulem seek the maiden leaning on her lover's arm. She declares that she has fulfilled her brothers' best expectations. In v. 13 the shepherd asks his love for a song; she responds in v. 14, inviting him to join her over the hills.

But the opinion that the Song is a drama, although widely entertained in modern times and unobjectionable in itself, has not failed to meet with decided opposition. The Song does not naturally conform to the rules of dramatic unity. A regular plot is not yielded by the poem itself. A consecutive narrative can be made out only by supplying connecting links of which the poem gives no indication. The several parts have been made to tell very different continuous tales, according as interpreters have supplied this or that connecting link. The several scenes are grouped rather than linked, and the transitions are abrupt. The arrangement may not be pleasing to the Occidental mind, which loves order and logical sequence, but the structure of the poem is in entire harmony with Oriental methods of literary composition. On account of the variety of subjects and situations, repetitions and parallels and lack of logical order some critics consider the book an anthology of love lyrics and related poems rather than a collection of songs for a specific purpose, or a single lyrical or dramatic poem.

Three leading methods of interpretation have been adopted, and all still find advocates: the allegorical, the literal, and the typical methods. The Jews, who have always greatly prized The Song of Solomon, have generally regarded it as a spiritual allegory. Its sole intention was to teach God's love for ancient Israel. He is the Lover, and it the one beloved. The allegorical interpretation was introduced into the Christian Church by Hippolytus of Rome in his commentary written early in the 3d century A.D. Origen, who lived in Palestine, a somewhat younger contemporary of Hippolytus, is the classic Christian commentator on the Song, having left a commentary in 5 books. Christ became the Lover, and his Church or the individual soul the beloved one. The details of this scheme may be learned from the headings of the several chapters in the A.V. The mystical or allegorical interpretation has found support among scholars who noted parallels in the Sufic literature in Islam. On the literal interpretation the poem is a historical tale, a true story of Solomon's love for the Shulamite. The typical interpretation, to a certain extent, harmonizes the other two. The pure, spontaneous, mutual love of a great king and a humble maid was seen to exemplify the mutual affection between Jehovah and his people, and the story was told, not merely because it was beautiful, but chiefly because it was typical of this great religious truth. The Song of Solomon is thus analogous to Messianic psalms, which are based on the personal experiences or official position of David or Solomon, and exhibit truths regarding the great king. The comparison of the mutual love between the Church and its divine Head to that of a bride and a bridegroom frequently occurs in the N.T. (Eph. 5:25-33; Rev. 19:7-9; 21:9; etc.).

During the years 1922-1924, however, the allegorical interpretation was revived in a pagan guise by attempting to find in the book remnants of an early fertility cult taken over by the Hebrews from the agricultural Canaanites on their settlement in Canaan. Such a view supposes that the Song consists of songs written originally in the cult language of the liturgies used in the worship of Tammuz (Adonis), that they were reinterpreted by the Hebrews, and that thus their original pagan significance was lost. According to this interpretation the poem would be one of the earliest of Hebrew compositions.

Regarding the date and authorship of the Song, it will be perceived at once that the shepherd theory disposes of the possibility that the poem proceeded from the pen of Solomon. This hypothesis requires the assumption of another and a later author than Solomon. Turning to the marks of authorship and date found in the poem, the title reads: "The Song of songs, which is Solomon's" (ch. 1:1). The words are ambiguous, according to the Hebrew idiom; they may mean either that Solomon was the author of the Song (cf. Hab. 3:1, Heb.), or that the Song is about Solomon (cf. Isa. 5:1, Heb.). The ambiguity is admitted, but tradition has attributed the poem to Solomon.

The Solomonic authorship, however, is no longer held even by conservative scholars; it is assumed that, at a time when the true origin of the Song was forgotten, it was attributed to Solomon because of references to him in the poem. The diction exhibits several peculiarities in the use of the relative she, which occurs also, among other places, in the song of Deborah. From the way in which Tirzah and Jerusalem are mentioned (S. of Sol. 6:4) Ewald and Hitzig concluded that it was written during the time that Tirzah was the capital of the Northern Kingdom (I Kings 14:17 to 16:24), i.e., in the 10th century B.C. But we find Tirzah mentioned afterward (II Kings 15:14, 16), and so this argument is not conclusive. The use of Tirzah may be only a literary reminiscence. The Aramaisms in the book may indicate that the work is late (postexilic). On the other hand, it may be early; in that case it would stem from northern Israel, the language of which differed dialectically from that of Judah. The purity and brightness of the style as well as the author's acquaintance with places in n. Palestine also suggest an early date. The foreign words, chiefly names of plants or articles of commerce, might have reached Palestine through Solomon's commercial relations with the East. It seems that the recollection of Solomon and of the pomp of his court are relatively fresh. If the poem was built upon a basis of fact, the dramatic form and the idyllic imagery were supplied by the poet.

Two words require special mention: pardēs (orchard, park, paradise) in S. of Sol. 4:13 is of Pers. origin (cf. Avestan pairi-dāeza, an enclosure); 'appiryōn (palanquin) in ch. 3:9 suggests Gr. phoreion (litter, palanquin). If these words are not editorial additions to an earlier work, the poem would probably date from the Greek period, c. 300, or perhaps the first half of the 3d century B.C. On account of the Aramaisms and these 2 words many critics favor the late date. It should be borne in mind, however, that most of the book may have an early origin and that it may have received its final form from editors at a late date. At any rate the evidence for dating the poem is far from conclusive, and the spontaneity of the diction rather suggests an early date.

The Song of Solomon is a gem of literature; it became an authoritative thesaurus of word and thought for the mystic's vocabulary, and its place in the canon has approved itself to those souls who have known how to use it in an allegorical and mystical sense.

Sons of God. Worshipers and beneficiaries of God; there is reason to believe that this is its signification in the celebrated passage where it first appears in the Bible. "It came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the ground, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all that they chose" (Gen. 6:1, 2). Many commentators regard Gen. 6:1-4 as a kind of preface to the narrative of the Flood and consider it as an isolated survival of early Hebrew mythology. Accordingly in the infancy of the human race marriages were formed between supernatural beings and mortal women, and thus there arose heroes or demigods. The implication is (v. 4) that such beings, intermediate between the divine and the human, introduced an element of disorder into the world which had to be checked by the special intervention of Jehovah (v. 3).

Three well-known interpretations have been proposed. The sons of God are: 1. The great and noble of the earth, and the daughters of men are women of inferior rank (Samaritan version; Greek translation of Symmachus; Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan). 2. Angels, who left their first estate and took wives from among the children of men (certain MSS. of LXX, Book of Enoch, Philo, Josephus, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian). 3. Pious men, worshipers of God, who were especially represented by the descendants of Seth. They were attracted by the beauty of women who did not belong to the godly line, married with them, and became secularized (Julius Africanus, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Augustine, Jerome). The 1st interpretation no longer has any advocates. In favor of the 2d, it is asserted that the term denotes angels everywhere else in the O.T. (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; cf. a similar expression Ps. 29:1; 89:6; R.V. marg.; but not Dan. 3:25); that the designation describes angels according to their nature, whereas the ordinary word for angels, mal'ākim, messengers, refers to their official employment; and that this interpretation is confirmed by Jude 6 and II Peter 2:4. But that the term relates to the nature of angels lacks proof; it is quite as natural that it should describe angels as worshipers of God. As to the passages in Jude and Peter, to cite them is begging the question, since exegetes point out other references, as Isa. 24:21-23; moreover in Jude the word "these" in v. 7 and elsewhere does not refer to angels that kept not their own principality (v. 6, R.V.), but to certain ungodly men (v. 4). And unless the title be restricted to the special form which it has in the passage under discussion, it is not true that the term denotes angels in all other places where it occurs in the O.T. The worshipers of the heathen deity Chemosh are called the people of Chemosh, and his sons and daughters (Num. 21:29; Jer. 48:46). When the men of Judah, professed worshipers of Jehovah, took heathen women to wife, Judah was said to have married the daughter of a strange god (Mal. 2:11). Moses was directed to say to Pharaoh: "Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son, . . . Let my son go" (Ex. 4:22, 23). Other passages are: "Ye are the children [or sons] of the LORD your God" (Deut. 14:1). "They have dealt corruptly with him [Jehovah], they are not his children [or sons]." "Is not he [Jehovah] thy father?" "The LORD saw it, and abhorred them, Because of the provocation of his sons and his daughters" (Deut. 32:5, 6, 19). "Ye are the sons of the living God" (Hos. 1:10). "When Israel was a child, . . . I . . . called my son out of Egypt" (Hos. 11:1). "Bring my sons from afar, and my daughters from the end of the earth; every one that is called by my name, and whom I have created for my glory" (Isa. 43:6, 7). The pious are the generation of God's children (Ps. 73:15), and Ephraim is his dear son (Jer. 31:20). Taking a broader survey, and examining Semitic literature other than Hebrew, one observes the same fact. Many a Babylonian styled himself the son of the god whom he worshiped and upon whom he relied for protection and care.

The interpretation that the sons of God in Gen. 6:2 were pious people, the worshipers of the true God, more especially that they were the godly descendants of Adam through Seth, whose genealogy is given in Gen., ch. 5, is not only in accordance with Semitic, and particularly Biblical, usage of the designation, as already shown, but it is consistent with the context. The sons of God are contrasted with the daughters of men, that is, of other men. So Jeremiah says that God set signs in Israel and among men; and the English version supplies the word "other" before men, in order to bring out the sense (Jer. 32:20). Likewise the psalmist says that the wicked "are not in trouble as men; neither are they plagued like men"; and again the English version supplies the word "other" (Ps. 73:5). After the same manner Gen. 6:1, 2 may perhaps be understood: "When mankind began to multiply on the face of the ground, and daughters were born unto them, the sons of God saw the daughters of other men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all that they chose." The meaning of the writer is that when men began to increase in number, the worshipers of God so far degenerated that in choosing wives for themselves they neglected character, and esteemed beauty of face and form above piety. The offspring of these marriages were perhaps stalwart and violent (v. 4). Mixture of race in marriage often produces physical strength in the descendants, and lack of religion in the parents is apt to be reproduced in the children. The intermarriage of the sons of God and the daughters of men was offensive in the sight of God. Sentence was pronounced against the wrongdoers (v. 3). The penalty is not denounced against angels, who were not only implicated, but were the chief sinners, if the sons of God were angels. The punishment is pronounced against man only. Man, not angels, had offended.

Sons of God means the worshipers and beneficiaries of God, both among mortal and immortal beings. But the content of this idea did not remain the same through the ages. It became larger with increasing knowledge of the riches of God. It enlarged, for example, at the time when the Israelites were delivered from Egypt. God said: "I have surely seen the affliction of my people" (Ex. 3:7); and again: "Say unto Pharaoh, . . . Israel is my son, my firstborn"; this implies that Israel is as dear to God as Pharaoh's first-born is to him (cf. ch. 4:22 with v. 23); and again: "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God" (ch. 6:7). Heretofore the title had emphasized a filial relation of men to God, their dependence upon him for protection and care, and their duty of reverence and obedience. Now God formally accepts the obligations which implicitly devolve on him. The content of the title was further enlarged through the teaching of Jesus Christ. He took truths already known, shed light on them, and connected them with this designation. He exhibited the fact that God is an actual father and that his people are actual children of God. They are such by the new birth (John 3:3, 5, 6, 8), begotten of God (John 1:12, 13; 5:21; and so Eph. 2:5; James 1:18; I Peter 1:23), made partakers of the divine nature through the mediation of the indwelling Spirit (John 6:48-51; 15:4, 5), and possessing a like character with God, resembling him in holiness, love, and elevation above the illusions of earth (I John 3:9; 4:7; 5:4), although falling far short of the divine character in this life. They have been adopted as sons (Gal. 4:5), are taught by the Spirit to say "Abba, Father" (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15), and are led by the Spirit (Rom. 8:14).

Sons of the Proph'ets. See PROPHETIC ASSOCIATIONS.

Sooth'say'er. A diviner (cf. Josh. 13:22, with Num. 22:7), one who prognosticates future events (Jer. 27:9, R.V.). As rendering of the Aram. gāzārīn, it denotes one who professed to be able to interpret dreams (Dan. 4:7) and explain dark sentences (chs. 4:9; 5:11, 12), and to whom men in desperation resorted to obtain, if possible, the revelation of secrets (ch. 2:27).

So'pa'ter (sō'pā-tēr) [Gr., of sound parentage]. A Christian of Berea, and one of Paul's companions from Greece as far as the province of Asia, when the apostle was returning from his Third Missionary Journey (Acts 20:4). He was son of Pyrrhus (R.V.).

So'phe'reth (sō-fē-rēth), in R.V. of Ezra Has-so'phe'reth, with the Heb. article [sec-retariat]. The name, probably denoting an office, belonging to a certain class of Solomon's servants. Members of it returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57).

Sor'cer-er. One who practices sorcery, uses potions that derive a supposed efficacy from magical spells, and professes to possess supernatural power or knowledge, gained in any manner, especially through the connivance of evil spirits (Ex. 7:11; Jos. Life 31). Sorcerers were found in Egypt, Assyria (Nahum 3:4), Babylonia (Isa. 47:9; Dan. 2:2), and other heathen lands; but were strictly forbidden in Israel (Ex. 22:18), and warning was uttered against their deception (Jer. 27:9), and their punishment was foretold (Micah 5:12; Mal. 3:5; Rev. 21:8). The Heb. and Gr. words for sorcerer and sorcery are sometimes rendered witch and witchcraft. Simon, called Magus or magician, and Bar-Jesus were prominent sorcerers in apostolic history (Acts 8:9-24; 13:6-12). A sorceress, and likewise the sorcerer and the practitioner of other forms of the black art, was not to be permitted to live (Ex. 22:18; Lev. 20:27; Deut. 18:10-12). God's own attitude toward such persons and those who consulted them was also one of destruction (Lev. 20:6, 23; Wisd. of Sol. 12:4-6).

Sō'rek (sō'rēk) [a choice vine]. A valley in which Delilah lived (Judg. 16:4). It is doubtless Wadi eš-Šārār, which commences about 13 miles w., slightly s., of Jerusalem, and pursues a tortuous course in a n.w. direction toward the Mediterranean Sea. It is traversed by a stream which falls into the sea about 8½ miles s. of Joppa. The name Sūrīk is still borne by a ruin n. of the valley, 2 miles from Zorah, Samson's birthplace.

Sō-sip'ā-ter (sō-sip'ā-tēr) [Gr., saving a father]. A Christian who joined with Paul in sending salutations (Rom. 16:21).

Sōs'the-nes (sōs'thē-nēz) [Gr., of sound strength]. A ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth when Paul was there. In the outbreak which Paul's preaching excited, the crowd seized Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment seat of Gallio (Acts 18:17). Perhaps he became a Christian, for one Sosthenes is associated with Paul as a brother Christian in the salutation to the Corinthians (I Cor. 1:1).

Sō'tai (sō'tī). One of the class known as Solomon's servants. He founded a family, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57).

Soul. In ordinary English usage, a spirit is an immaterial, incorporeal being, which may or may not be associated with a body, as "God is a Spirit," "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (John 4:24; Luke 1:47). A soul is also a spirit that is or at least has been embodied, as the souls of them that had been slain (Rev. 6:9).

Theologians entertain 2 main views as to the soul, and consequently as to the nature of man and irrational animals. One is embraced under the doctrine of trichotomy. Trichotomists differ considerably among themselves; but according to the doctrine, in its general outlines, man consists of 3 parts or essential elements, body, soul, and spirit (I Thess. 5:23). The body is the material part of man's constitution. The soul, in Heb. nephesh, in Gr. psychē, is the principle of animal life: man possesses it in common with the brutes; to it belong understanding, emotion, and sensibility, and it ceases to exist at death. The spirit, in Heb. rūah, in Gr. pneuma, is the mind, the principle of man's rational and immortal life, the possessor of reason, will, and conscience. God created man by giving life to inorganic matter formed into a body, and then creating a rational spirit and infusing it (Gen. 2:7); at death the dust or body returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns unto God who gave it (Eccl. 12:7). The soul of life (Heb. nephesh hayyāh, living soul), in the instance of the animal (Gen. 1:21, 24), is only the animal soul, which is physical and material in its nature, and perishes with the body of which it is the vital principle; but the soul of life in the instance of man (ch. 2:7) is a higher principle, the rational soul, which was inbreathed by the Creator and made in his image. Usually the Biblical writers do not distinguish the psychē or animal soul, which is the lower side of the human soul, from the pneuma or rational soul, the higher side, since they constitute one soul, psychē, in distinction from the body, and they are sometimes designated in their unity by pneuma, and sometimes by psychē. Commonly the sacred writers speak of man as constituted of body and soul, or body and spirit, and not of body, soul, and spirit; but in I Cor. 15:44, as in I Thess. 5:23 and Heb. 4:12, Paul requires the distinction between the animal and the rational soul for the purposes of his discussion, and he accordingly makes it.

According to dichotomy, on the other hand, there are only 2 essential elements in the constitution of man: the body formed from the dust of the earth, and the soul or principle of life (Gen. 2:7). The soul is the principle of the whole life of whatever subject is spoken of, whether man or beast. It is the principle of all life, physical, intellectual, moral, religious. There is not one substance, the soul, which feels and remembers, and another substance, the spirit, that has conscience and the knowledge of God. The soul of the brute is the living principle in the brute: it is conscious of the impressions which are made by external objects on the organs of sense belonging to the body; it is endowed with that measure of intelligence which experience shows the lower animals to possess, but it is irrational and mortal. Brutes perish because God does not will that the living principle in them should continue. The soul of man is the same in kind with that of the brute, but it differs in being of a higher order: in addition to the attributes of sensibility, memory, and instinct, it has the higher powers which pertain to the intellectual, moral, and religious life, and it has continued existence after the death of the body, not because of its inherent nature, but because God wills to preserve it. It is argued from the usage of words in Scripture in defense of this dualism that: 1. Living soul, nephesh hayyāh, means simply animate existence, a being in which there is a living soul, and there is no authority to make it mean one thing in the case of a brute and quite another thing in the case of a man. 2. The Bible does not ascribe to beasts a psychē only, and both a psychē and pneuma to man. The living principle in brutes is called spirit, rūah, as well as soul, nephesh, psychē. "Who knoweth the spirit of man, whether it goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast, whether it goeth downward to the earth?" (Eccl. 3:21; cf. v. 19, R.V. marg.; Gen. 7:15). 3. No distinction is observed in the use of the words soul and spirit. The souls of them that were slain for the word of God are in heaven (Rev. 6:9; 20:4), and likewise the spirits of just men made perfect (Heb. 12:23).

Trichotomists quote I Thess. 5:23: "The God of peace himself sanctify you wholly; and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (cf. Heb. 4:12), as evidence that Paul distinguishes the animal soul from the rational spirit. But dichotomists reply that Paul's language is quite analogous to that employed in the command, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength" (Mark 12:30; cf. Luke 1:46, 47). The intention in the demand for love, and in the prayer for preservation, is simply to lay stress on the whole man, and the description is accordingly plethoric. As heart, soul, strength, and mind are not so many essential elements in man's constitution, so there is no proof that body, soul, and spirit are. The main passage relied upon to support the trichotomist position is I Cor. 15:44: "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. If there is a natural body, there is also a spiritual body." Trichotomists interpret the sōma psychikon or natural body as one marked by the qualities of the psychē or animal soul; namely, by physical appetites and passions, such as hunger, thirst, and sexual appetite. These are founded in "flesh and blood," or that material substance of which the present human body is composed. The resurrection, or spiritual body, on the other hand, will be marked by the qualities of the pneuma or rational soul. It will not be composed of flesh and blood, but of a substance which is more like the rational than the animal soul. There is, however, another interpretation, not only in harmony with the doctrine of the dual constitution of man, but in accord with the general usage of the words psychikos and pneumatikos, natural and spiritual. The resurrection body of the redeemed will not be marked by the qualities of ordinary animal life, right and proper though that life is, but the resurrection body will be opposed to everything carnal, and will be characterized by the qualities which belong to the Spirit-led man. This appears from a study of the words. In established usage among the Greeks psychē was the common word for the vital principle; which, however, might be thought of as a disembodied soul, the immortal part of man, and the organ of thought and judgment (Herod. ii. 123; Plato Timaeus, 30B), hence psychikos referred primarily to the ordinary animal life, and is so used by Paul, James, and Jude (I Cor. 2:14; James 3:15; Jude 19). Pneumatikos, on the other hand, almost exclusively has reference in Scripture to the Pneuma Hagion, the Holy Spirit. It is opposed to carnal and fleshly, to human nature deprived of the Spirit of God; it refers to possession and control by the Holy Spirit as contrasted with the domination of the flesh (I Cor. 3:1); it denotes what is effected by the Spirit and pertains to the Spirit (Rom. 1:11; I Cor. 2:13; 12:1). Hence a spiritual body, contrasted with a natural body, is a body not only free from fleshly lusts, but elevated above the physical passions and appetites which are natural to man (Matt. 22:30), in vital union with the Spirit of God, and marked by the qualities which characterize the Spirit-led man.

South, The. See NEGEB, THE.

South Ra'moth (rā'mōth). See RAMAH 6.

Sow. See SWINE.

Sow'er and Sow'ing. Sowing began with the rain of October; see YEAR. The seed was required to be ceremonially clean (Lev. 11:37, 38). The sower held the vessel containing the seed in the left hand and scattered the seed with his right. When the soil was favorable, he seems sometimes to have cast in front of the plow, which then served the purpose of a harrow to cover the seed. Wheat was best sown, it was thought, in rows (Isa. 28:25, R.V.). The sowing of mixed seed was forbidden (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:9), as being contrary to nature as established by the Creator; but the planting of several kinds of seeds in different sections of the same field was permitted.

Sowing the Seed

Spain (spān). The well-known country in the s.w. portion of Europe. Its mines yielded gold and silver (I Macc. 8:3). Paul desired to visit it (Rom. 15:24, 28), and probably carried out his intention, for Clement of Rome, writing from Italy about A.D. 96, says that Paul "reached the bounds of the west," and the Muratorian fragment, written about A.D. 170, states explicitly that he went to Spain. This visit must have taken place after Paul's imprisonment at Rome which is recorded in The Acts. See TARSHISH 1.

Spar'row. The rendering of Heb. šippōr, in Ps. 84:3; 102:7; and R.V. of Prov. 26:2. The word is more frequently translated bird; in fact, it is often employed as a general term for bird or fowl (Ps. 8:8; 148:10; Ezek. 17:23). It may be a bird of prey (Jer. 12:9; Ezek. 39:17), such as the raven and crow, which are passerine birds, although they feed on carrion; or it may be a bird ceremonially clean and large enough to be eaten as food (Lev. 14:4; Neh. 5:18). It may live in the mountains or in the town (Ps. 11:1; 84:3), and may build its nest in trees or on the ground or about human habitations (Deut. 22:6; Ps. 84:3). The term includes doves and pigeons (Gen. 15:9, 10), and the ety. indicates that in the first instance it designates chirping birds, like the sparrow and the finch.

In the N.T. sparrow is the rendering of Gr. strouthion. It was sold and eaten (Matt. 10:29; Luke 12:6, 7).

The house sparrow (Passer domesticus), familiarly known as the English sparrow, is found through Europe, n. Africa, and w. Asia, and is common in the coast towns of Palestine. Two species of s. Europe, closely allied to it, the Italian sparrow (Passer italiae) and the marsh sparrow (Passer hispaniolensis), also occur, the latter chiefly in the Jordan Valley, where it breeds in vast numbers in the thorn trees. The tree sparrow (Passer montanus) is a near relative of the house sparrow, and perhaps in Palestine should not be separated from it; but the sparrows which frequent the sacred precincts on the Temple hill and are common on the Mount of Olives have sometimes been spoken of by writers of authority as tree sparrows. Another sparrow (Passer moabiticus) is found in the vicinity of the Dead Sea, but is rare. The rock or foolish sparrow (Petronia stulta) is common on the central ridge of Palestine. It never resorts to inhabited dwellings. Thomson says that a sparrow which has lost its mate is often seen sitting alone on the housetop, lamenting its fate (cf. Ps. 102:7). Tristram is inclined to see in this passage a reference to the blue thrush (Monticola cyaneus), a solitary bird which perches on the housetop, uttering meanwhile a monotonous and plaintive note.

Spartans (spär'tänz). Inhabitants of the celebrated city of Sparta in Greece. It was known also as Lacedaemon. Jonathan Macca-baeus refers to an ancient friendship which existed between the Spartans and the Jews in the days of King Arius and the high priest Onias, about 300 B.C. (I Macc. 12:7, 19-23; in A.V. Lacedemonians); and he sent letters to them, when he sent an embassy to Rome, to renew the friendship with them (vs. 2, 5). Jonathan did not live to hear their answer, but Simon received cordial letters from them (ch. 14:16, 20-23).

Spear. The spear, called in Heb. hānith, consisted of a metallic head on a shaft (I Sam. 13:19; 17:7; Isa. 2:4). It could be carried in the hand; stuck in the ground when not wanted; and, though used for thrusting, could be hurled (I Sam. 18:10, 11, in A.V. javelin; 26:7, 8; II Sam. 2:23; John 19:34).

A long spear was used (Judg. 5:8; I Chron. 12:8, 24; Neh. 4:13; Jer. 46:4). It was called rōmah by the Hebrews, and was used for thrusting (Num. 25:7, 8, R.V.), not for throwing. In R.V. it is once rendered lance (I Kings 18:28); in A.V. lancet.

Spear'men. The rendering of the pl. of Gr. Dexiolas or, as in Codex Alexandrinus, Dexiobolos in Acts 23:23, a body of troops distinguished from the legionary soldiers and the cavalry. In the only other passage where the word occurs, which is late, they are distinguished from archers and targeteers. Evidently they were light-armed soldiers who carried a weapon in the right hand.

Spelt. The revised rendering of Heb. kus-semeth (Ex. 9:32 and Isa. 28:25, in A.V. rye; Ezek. 4:9, in A.V. fitches). Spelt is an inferior kind of wheat, the chaff of which slightly adheres to the grain. It was sown in Egypt, springing up after the barley. The Egyptians made their bread of it (Herod. ii. 36). Rye is a n. plant, and is not grown in Egypt and Palestine.

Spelt

Spice. 1. The rendering of Heb. bōšem, bēšem, and its pl. bēšāmim, which are used generically for fragrant stuff, spice, spicery (Ex. 25:6; I Kings 10:10; S. of Sol. 4:10, 14). Spice is a vegetable substance possessing aromatic and pungent qualities (S. of Sol. 4:16).

The chief spices were myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia or costus (Ex. 30:23, 24). Southern Arabia was the great, but not exclusive, producer of them (I Kings 10:2; Ezek. 27:22). Bōšem in S. of Sol. 5:13; 6:2, and bāšām in ch. 5:1, are probably applied specifically to balsam or balm of Gilead (R.V. marg.).

2. Nēkō'th (Gen. 37:25; 43:11) is probably a specific term for tragacanth or storax (R.V. marg.). A form of this word is perhaps used in II Kings 20:13; Isa. 39:2 for spices in general.

3. Sammim, fragrant odors, were aromatic substances used in the preparation of incense (Ex. 30:7). Three are specified: stacte or opobalsamum, onycha, and galbanum (v. 34).

4. The rendering of Gr. arōma, a generic term (Mark 16:1), including myrrh and aloes (John 19:40).

Spice Mer'chant. The rendering of Heb. rōkēl in I Kings 10:15. It means simply, as the R.V. makes it, a merchant; and A.V. renders it so elsewhere, e.g., Ezek. 27:13.

Spī'der. An animal of the class Arachnida, called in Heb. 'akkābīsh. It weaves a web (Job 8:14; Isa. 59:5). The number of species in Palestine amounts to 600 or 700. In A.V. spider is the rendering of Heb. sēmāmīth (Prov. 30:28, in R.V. lizard).

Spīkē'nard. A fragrant plant, in Heb. nērd (S. of Sol. 4:13, 14), from which an aromatic ointment was made, called nardos in Gr. (Mark 14:3). It is believed to be Nardo-

Spikenard (Nardostachys jatamansi)

stachys jatamansi, a plant of the Valerian family, with fragrant roots, growing in the Himalaya Mountains at an elevation of 11,000 to 17,000 feet. It was used by the Hindus as a medicine and perfume from remote antiquity, and was early an article of commerce. The long distance which it had to be brought to Palestine rendered it on its arrival very precious. The alabaster cruse of it, which was poured over the head of Jesus, was worth 300 denarii (Mark 14:3, 5). In Mark 14:3; John 12:3 (see R.V. marg.), the spikenard is described by the Gr. adjective pistikos, a variant of pistos, genuine; less likely is the derivation from pistos, liquid. Some interpreters, however, think that the adjective denotes the place where this variety was obtained.

Spin'ing. Spinning was the work of the women (Ex. 35:25). The wheel was unknown, and spinning was done by hand. Distaff and spindle were used (Prov. 31:19). The flax or wool was wound on the distaff, which was held under the arm or stuck upright in the ground, and the thread was drawn out by hand. To the end of this thread the spindle, with a circular rim to steady it when revolving, was attached and by rotating it the spinner twisted the thread.

Spir'it. See SOUL and HOLY SPIRIT.

Spring. See FOUNTAIN.

Sta'chys (stā'kis) [Gr., an ear of grain]. A Christian at Rome to whom the Apostle Paul sent a salutation (Rom. 16:9).

Stac'te. The rendering of Heb. nātāph, a drop. It denotes a sweet spice, which was used for incense (Ex. 30:34; cf. Eccles. 24:15). The LXX interprets nātāph by staktē, which likewise signifies a drop or exudation, and was employed for the oil which trickles from fresh myrrh or cinnamon. It is believed, however, that nātāph is the gum of the storax tree, or else opobalsamum (R.V. marg.).

The storax (Styrax officinalis) is a resinous shrub or small tree, from 10 to 20 feet high, with flowers resembling those of the orange in color, size, and fragrance, and mostly growing in spikes of 4 or 5. The tree is very showy when in bloom. It is native in Asia Minor and Syria, and abounds in Galilee. The officinal storax is the inspissated juice of the bark; it is used medicinally as an expectorant, and also in perfumery. The liquid storax of commerce is the product of an entirely different plant.

Stacte (Styrax officinalis)

Opobalsamum (R.V. marg.) is a resinous juice, also called balm and balm of Gilead (q.v.).

Star. The number of the stars and their grouping in constellations early attracted man's attention (Gen. 22:17). Orion, Pleiades, the Bear, the zodiac were pointed out (Job 9:9; 38:31, 32), planets were known and named (see CHIUN, LUCIFER), perhaps meteors or comets are referred to (Jude 13), the position of certain stars served as dates (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 8, 2), and in Egypt the successive rising of 36 constellations marked off an equal number of 10-day periods in the year; see WEEK. The stars were recognized in Israel as the handiwork of God (Gen. 1:16; Ps. 8:3), and as under his control (Isa. 13:10; Jer. 31:35).

But among the heathen and the degenerate Israelites the stars became objects of worship (Deut. 4:19; II Kings 17:16); altars were reared, and incense was burnt to them (II Kings 21:5; 23:5). They were believed to exercise influence, not only in the ordinary economy of nature (cf. Job 38:31, A.V.; R.V. marg.), but also over the affairs of men. This belief was widespread among the heathen. Deborah may perhaps be using a phrase of current speech, in which a reminiscence of heathen notions lingers, when she poetically describes the stars from their courses fighting against Sisera (Judg. 5:20); but Bertheau is probably correct in understanding her to speak poetically of divine assistance (ch. 4:15), as if heaven or, to use her own words, as if the stars, forsaking their usual orbits, had fought against Sisera (cf. Ps. 18:9). A reference has also been seen in her words to a providential storm which discomfited the Canaanites; and Judg. 5:21 and Josephus (Antiq. v. 5, 4) are cited in confirmation: but Josephus probably deduces this storm from the analogy of Josh 10:10, 11 and I Sam. 7:10. The stars were also supposed by the heathen to portend coming events, and they were observed with a view to prognostication (Isa. 47:13). See ASTROLOGERS I.

J. D. D. (rev., H. S. G.)

Several stars mentioned in the N.T. require particular notice:

1. The day-star (II Peter 1:19) is probably a figurative description of the signs immediately preceding the Second Advent. Others understand it as the Spirit's illumination of the believer's heart.

2. The morning star (Rev. 2:28). This obscure symbol is perhaps derived from the familiar apocalyptic saying that in the Messianic Kingdom the righteous shall shine as the stars (cf. Dan. 12:3; II (IV) Esdras 7:97; Enoch 104:2). It refers to the glory which will be given to the victor, whose share in the Messiah's conquest over his enemies may suggest the glory that is to follow. "The bright, the morning star" (Rev. 22:16, R.V.) probably refers to Christ as the herald to his people of the eternal day. See LUCIFER.

3. The star of the Wise Men; see MAGI. The usual view has been that this was a purely supernatural phenomenon, a starlike object which appeared to the Magi in their e. sky, and suggested to them, perhaps through their acquaintance with the prophecy of Balaam (Num. 24:17) or other predictions, that the king of the Jews was born. Afterward it reappeared, as they journeyed from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, and guided them on their way until it rested over the house in which Jesus was. Others, however, consider it a natural phenomenon providentially used to direct the Magi. In Dec., 1603, the astronomer Kepler noted a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, joined in March, 1604, by Mars, and in Oct., 1604, by a brilliant new star, which gradually faded and vanished in Feb., 1606. Kepler calculated that the planets were in conjunction in 7 and 6 B.C., and, supposing that the new or variable star had followed the conjunction then as it did in 1604, believed it to be the star of the Magi. Others have identified the Magi's star with the planetary conjunction itself, and the calculations of Kepler have been corrected by Ideler, Fritch ard, and Encke, with the result that we know that in 7 B.C. there were 3 conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn, in May, September, and December. Hence, it has been supposed that the Magi saw the heavenly spectacle in May; connected it, through their astrology and knowledge of Hebrew prophecy and expectation, with the birth of a Jewish king; and, when going from Jerusalem to Bethlehem in December, saw again the conjunction overhead. But the word star can hardly mean a conjunction, and this view would place Christ's birth earlier than other considerations warrant. If we can believe that Kepler's variable star followed the conjunction, as he supposed, it would answer the conditions better than the conjunction itself. It is on some accounts more probable that the event was a natural rather than a supernatural phenomenon. The Magi were doubtless astrologers and would attach special ideas to the positions and variations of the stars. The star did not go before them to Judea, but only, after its reappearance, did it seem to lead them from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. On the other hand, many think that Matt. 2:9 cannot fairly be understood of anything but a supernatural phenomenon; nor can the astronomical calculations above described safely be held to have identified the star, even if it be regarded as a natural object.

A. T. Olmstead (1942), who sees here Babylonian, not Jewish lore, maintains that the Gr. verb for "appeared" (Matt. 2:7) is a literal and technical equivalent of Akkad. ereshu, which refers to the hellacal rising of a planet. Accordingly, the Magi reported that the star was seen, not "in the east," but "at its rising." In other words, the star made its first appearance in the e. sky exactly at sunrise. The expression that the star went before them (ch. 2:9) refers to its nightly shift of apparent position in the heavens. The star "stood over where the young child was" represents Akkad. izazu (stand still); this denotes the 2 periods of opposition when to the naked eye for about 4 days the planet does not appear to change its position in the celestial vault. Striking parallels to Matthew's account may be read in letters from the latter days of Esarhaddon when his sons Shamash-shum-ukin and Ashurbanipal were contending for the succession. There was accordingly the rising of Jupiter accompanied by that of the sun, Saturn, and Mars.

G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Sta'ter. A shekel; cf. Matt. 17:27, R.V. marg. See MONEY.

Steel. A modified form of iron, resulting in elasticity and hardness. The earliest known and simplest method of reducing iron from its ore was capable of yielding steel. The Chalybes in Pontus were celebrated for hardening iron, and their name was used by the Greeks for steel. Hebrew pelādāh in Nahum 2:3 apparently means steel (R.V., in A.V. torches).

Where steel occurs in A.V., brass is correctly substituted in R.V.

Steph'a-nas (stěf'á-nās) [Gr., crowned]. A Christian convert at Corinth. His household was the first fruit of Paul's labors in the province of Achaia. The apostle himself baptized its members, and they set themselves to minister unto the saints. Stephanas also visited the apostle, bringing him aid, and was with him when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was penned (I Cor. 1:16; 16:15, 17).

Stē'phen (stē'vén) [Gr., wreath or crown]. The first Christian martyr. He is first mentioned as 1st in the list of the 7 men chosen by the Jerusalem Christians, at the suggestion of the apostles, to superintend the distribution of the Church's alms (Acts 6:5). Since the appointment of these 7 men, usually regarded as the first deacons, arose from the complaints made by the Greek-speaking or Hellenistic Jewish Christians that their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations, and since Stephen is itself a Greek name, and since the subsequent persecution of Stephen arose among the Greek-speaking Jews of Jerusalem, it is probable that Stephen himself was a Hellenist, and perhaps had come from abroad. He was a notable man, who after his appointment became more than ever conspicuous as a preacher and worker of miracles (v. 8). His activity occasioned for the first time opposition to the Church among the foreign Jews, who had synagogues in Jerusalem. The trouble originated particularly when there disputed with Stephen "certain of them that were of the synagogue called the synagogue of the Libertines [or, Freedmen], and of the Cyrenians, and of the Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and Asia" (v. 9). These charged Stephen with blaspheming Moses and God, and, more especially, with declaring that Jesus would destroy the Temple and change the customs derived from Moses (vs. 11-14). Luke states that the witnesses produced against Stephen were suborned and false, as those against Christ had been; but Stephen must have said something which could be thus perverted. He was brought before the sanhedrin, and from his defense, reported in Acts 7:2-53, we can understand his position. He first recited God's early choice and guidance of the Patriarchs (vs. 2-22), apparently to bring out the fact that God from the beginning had been leading Israel to a definite goal; then, continuing the history, he showed that the Hebrews had repeatedly resisted God's purpose with them, both in the days of Moses and subsequently (vs. 23-43), and had failed to see the temporary and typical character of both tabernacle and Temple (vs. 44-50). Then, suddenly stopping his argument, he bitterly charged them with resisting, as their fathers had done, the Holy Spirit, with having slain the Christ as their fathers had slain the prophets, and with failing to keep in reality their own Law (vs. 51-53). At this point the listeners gnashed upon him with their teeth and prepared to rush upon him. A vision was given him of the Son of Man standing (as though to receive him) at the right hand of God; and, when he declared it, they seized him, cast him out of the city, and stoned him. It was not lawful for them to put anyone to death without permission from the Romans, but the martyrdom was evidently the result of an uncontrollable outbreak. The speech and death of Stephen mark the transition of Christianity from its earliest Jewish form to its extension among the Gentiles. Peter preached Christianity as the fulfillment of prophecy; Stephen preached it as the goal of Hebrew history. Yet while Stephen declared that Christianity could not be limited by Judaism, he did not set forth, like Paul afterward, its Gentile mission or its deliverance, by the doctrine of salvation by faith alone, from its Jewish environment. He marks, therefore, the transition from Jewish to Gentile Christianity. Moreover, the persecution which followed his martyrdom led to the dispersion of the disciples, and so in fact to the carrying of the gospel to the Samaritans and then to the Gentiles. Stephen's personal character also was very beautiful. As a man he was "full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (ch. 6:5); as a preacher, "full of grace and power" (v. 8); before the council, his enemies "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (v. 15); and his last words were:

"Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (ch. 7:60).

Stocks. An instrument of punishment, called in Heb. sad, consisting of a wooden frame, hence called xylon in Gr., in which the feet were put and firmly held (Job 13:27; 33:11; Acts 16:24). The prisoner remained in a sitting posture. A special form of the apparatus, apparently, was called in Heb. mahpeketh, turning, torsion, because the body was forced into an unnatural position (II Chron. 16:10, R.V. marg.; Jer. 20:2). It included shackles or rather a collar; at least these could be used on the prisoner at the same time (Jer. 29:26, R.V.), so that his neck, arms, and legs could all be held fast together.

Sto'les (stō'iks) [Gr. stoikos, pertaining to the porch]. A sect of philosophers, 1 of 2 which Paul encountered at Athens (Acts 17:18). Their founder was Zeno of Citium in Cyprus, who must not be confounded with an earlier philosopher, Zeno of Elea, in Italy. The Cyprian Zeno was born c. 336 and died c. 264 B.C. Removing from his native place to Athens, he taught for about 58 years in a stoa, or porch, on the public market place. His doctrine was essentially pantheistic. The Stoics distinguished matter and force as the ultimate principles in the universe; and the force working everywhere they called reason, providence, God, and regarded it as conscious and thinking, yet dependent and impersonal, a breath or a fire which forms, permeates, and vivifies all things, and which in accordance with inexorable necessity calls beings and worlds into existence and destroys them again, so that at the end of a cosmical period the universe is resolved into fire in a general conflagration, and the evolution of the world begins again, and so on without end. The human soul is a spark or emanation of this conscious but impersonal deity. It survives the body, but lives only for a cosmical period, and is reabsorbed at last into the source from which it came. The Stoics classed themselves among the followers of Socrates, and resembled him in their theory of life. They rigidly severed the morally good from the agreeable. They declared that an act is good or evil in itself, and that pleasure should never be made the end of an action. The highest good is virtue. Virtue is a life conformed to nature, or the agreement of human conduct with the law of the universe, and of the human with the divine will; it is especially resignation in respect to fate. The cardinal virtues are practical wisdom as to what is good and evil, courage, prudence or self-restraint, and justice. Zeno encouraged his followers to hold their feelings in rigid control, so as to be as much as possible independent of all disturbing influences, whatever occurrences might take place. Stoicism made noble characters. It continued as a power for about 400 years, its most eminent professors being the slave Epicuretus, the philosopher Seneca, and the emperor Marcus Aurelius.

Stom'ach'er. A part of dress, once worn by women, covering the pit of the stomach and the breast, and often highly ornamented. It is the rendering adopted in Isa. 3:24 of Heb. pethigil, applied to an article of female attire. The meaning of the Heb. word is uncertain. A.R.V. renders it "robe"; Luther, "wide mantle."

Stone. Palestine is a stony country, and it was often necessary to clear a field of stones preparatory to its cultivation (Isa. 5:2). An enemy's fields were marred by throwing stones on them, and his wells were choked with stones (II Kings 3:19, 25).

Stones were put to various uses: 1. For moles, quays (Jos. War 1. 21, 6), city walls

(Neh. 4:3); for dwellings (Lev. 14:45; Amos 5:11), palaces (I Kings 7:1, 9), fortresses, temples (I Kings 6:7); for the pavement of courtyards and for columns (Esth. 1:6), and in Herodian times at least for paving streets (see STREET); and for aqueducts, reservoirs, bridges; dykes about vineyards (Prov. 24:30, 31). In building altars the Israelites used unhewn stones (Ex. 20:25), likewise for an ordinary dyke, and when heaps of stones were made to commemorate an event (Gen. 31:46) or to mark the grave of a notorious offender (Josh. 7:26; 8:29; II Sam. 18:17), a custom still in vogue in Syria and Arabia, but not restricted to the graves of evildoers. But for some purposes the stones were sawed and hewn (I Kings 7:9-11); and, where suitable, stones of enormous size were used, as in the walls of the Temple and the mole at Caesarea.

2. Single stones were used to close the mouth of cisterns and wells, and the entrance of tombs (Gen. 29:2; Matt. 27:60; John 11:38), to mark boundaries (Deut. 19:14), and probably as way marks (Jer. 31:21). In Roman times milestones were erected along the chief public highways, as, for example, on the road between Tyre and Sidon and between Pella and Gerasa, where they are still to be seen. Stones were set up to mark graves and to commemorate events (Gen. 31:45; 35:14, 20; II Sam. 18:18), and were sometimes inscribed with a record of deeds (Herod. ii. 106; see MOABITE STONE). Stones, both in their natural state and graven, served as idols (Lev. 26:1; Deut. 29:17; II Kings 19:18; cf. Isa. 57:6). Certain small stones, called in Gr. baituloi and baitulia, which were often, if not always, meteorites and held sacred because they fell from heaven, played a part in Gentile superstition. They were said to move, talk, and guard from evil. The Greek name, which is doubtless of Semitic origin, is akin to beth'el and may indicate that the stone was regarded as the abode of a supernatural power, spirit, or god. The Israelites sometimes consecrated a single stone as a memorial to God (Gen. 28:18-22; I Sam. 7:12; Isa. 19:19), and they might give a religious name to the place (Gen. 35:7) or even to the stone, just as they sometimes called an altar by God's name (Gen. 33:20; Ex. 17:15; cf. Gen. 35:7); but in the recorded cases they did not regard deity or power as resident in the stone or altar and did not pay it divine honor. If they worshiped, they worshiped God apart from the memorial stone (Gen. 31:54; 35:1, 7; I Sam. 7:9).

3. Stones were hurled by slings and catapults (Judg. 20:16; I Sam. 17:40; II Chron. 26:15; Wisd. of Sol. 5:22; I Macc. 6:51), and were a means of putting criminals to death (see SWORDING). Flints were used for striking fire (II Macc. 10:3), and were shaped into rude form to serve as knives (Josh. 5:2). Weights for scales were often cut out of stone (Deut. 25:13; see WEIGHTS), and tablets of stone were employed for written documents (Ex. 24:12). Vessels for holding water were hewn from stone (Ex. 7:19; John 2:6), tables also (Ezek. 40:42). A rounded stone, of 30 pounds' weight or so, was rolled back and forth over grain to crush it to flour, or 2 stones were formed into a mill for grinding (Deut. 24:6).

The white stone mentioned in Rev. 2:17 has been variously interpreted, but the idea underlying this figure of speech is that of an amulet containing as its secret inscription the victor's name; through this he will have power against every enemy. The symbol is derived from familiar beliefs and practices regarding spiritual means of defense. The victor's new name characteristic of his new state will be given him on a pebble, whose color befits his victory and glory, but none save himself will know that name written on the stone. According to the best interpretation the writer has in mind a small stone, a common writing material, white to symbolize the heavenly character of the victorious believer, and marked with the name bestowed as sign and seal of his future glory.

Figuratively stone denotes hardness or insensibility (I Sam. 25:37; Ezek. 36:26), firmness or strength (Job 6:12; 41:24). A living stone is a stone in its natural condition, sound and not disintegrating. The followers of Christ are living stones built into the spiritual temple, of which Christ himself is the chief corner stone (Eph. 2:20-22; I Peter 2:4-8).

Stones, Precious. All the precious stones referred to in the canonical Scriptures, except 3, are enumerated in R.V. of Ex. 28:17-20 and Rev. 21:11, 19-21, text and marg. The 3 remaining ones are adamant (Ezek. 3:9), and ligure and sardine (Ex. 28:19; Rev. 4:3, both A.V.), and of these at least 2 are merely other names for 2 of those already mentioned. The precious stones are adamant, agate, amber, amethyst, beryl, carbuncle, chalcedony, chrysolite, chrysoprase or chrysoprasus, crystal, diamond, emerald, jacinth or hyacinth, jasper, lapis lazuli, ligure, onyx, pearl, ruby, sapphire, sardius or sardine, sardonyx, and topaz.

Ston'ing. The ordinary mode of capital punishment prescribed by Hebrew law (Lev. 20:2); see PUNISHMENT. It was an ancient method; and it was not confined to the Hebrews, but was practiced by the Macedonians and Persians as well. The execution took place outside the city (Lev. 24:14; I Kings 21:10, 13; Acts 7:58). The witnesses placed their hands on the head of the criminal in token that the guilt rested on him. They laid aside any clothing that might impede them in their solemn duty. In cases of idolatry, and apparently in other cases also, the witnesses hurled the first stones (Deut. 13:9; 17:7; cf. John 8:7). The rabbis state that the culprit was stripped of all clothing except a cloth about the loins, and was thrown to the ground from a scaffold about 10 feet high by the 1st witness; the 1st stone was cast by the 2d witness, on the chest over the heart of the criminal, and if it failed to cause death, the bystanders completed the execution. Sometimes the body was afterward suspended until sundown or burned (Deut. 21:23; Josh. 7:25; Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 24), and according to late Jewish law was not buried in the family grave.

Stool. See BIRTHSTOOL. A chair of peculiar form, upon which the patient sat during parturition. It was denominated 'obnāyim, double stones, by the Hebrews (Ex. 1:16).

Stork. A bird called in Heb. ḥāsīdāh, affectionate, on account of its love for its young. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18), dwelt in fir trees (Ps. 104:17), and was migratory (Jer. 8:7). It is the Ciconia alba, a white heronlike bird, which spends its winter in central and s. Africa, but in spring visits continental Europe, Palestine, and n. Syria in large numbers. It is about 4 feet high, with long red bill and legs, white plumage, and glossy black wings. It feeds on frogs and small reptiles or, lacking these, on offal, and hence was ceremonially unclean. It is regarded as a sacred bird, and in most places is unmolested, so that it fearlessly visits the haunts of man. The black stork, Ciconia nigra, named from the color of its back and neck, is also found in Palestine, being common in the valley of the Dead Sea; it breeds in trees.

Stran'ger, in R.V. generally So-journ'er. A stranger in the Mosaic Law, and in the O.T. generally, means one not of Israelitish descent dwelling with the Hebrews, as distinguished from a foreigner temporarily visiting the land (Ex. 20:10; Lev. 16:29; 17:8; II Sam. 1:13; Ezek. 14:7). The stranger was not a full citizen, yet he had recognized rights and duties. He was under the protection of God, and the Israelites were charged to treat him kindly (Lev. 19:33, 34; Deut. 10:18, 19). His rights were guarded by injunctions in the Law (Ex. 22:21; 23:9). When poor, he enjoyed the same privileges as the Hebrew poor (Deut. 24:19, 20). The prohibitions that rested on an Israelite rested on him (Ex. 12:19; Lev. 16:29; 17:10; 18:26; 20:2; 24:16; and 17:15, which was modified later by Deut. 14:21); but he was not obligated to all positive religious duties which devolved on the Israelite. He was exempt, if he chose to be and if he was a free man, from circumcision and barred from participation in the passover (Ex. 12:43-46). The Israelites were encouraged to invite him to the sacrificial meals (Deut. 16:11, 14). He was allowed to sacrifice to the Lord, he shared in the atonement made for the sin of the congregation on account of sin unwittingly committed, he had the privilege of a sin offering for aught done unwittingly by himself, and the city of refuge offered him asylum in case of need (Lev. 17:8; Num. 15:14, 26, 29; 35:15). In case he contracted uncleanness he was required to employ the rites of purification (Lev. 17:15; Num. 19:10). If he accepted circumcision for his household, he was admitted to the passover (Ex. 12:48, 49). The chief disability under which he labored was that in case he became a bondman, the year of jubilee did not bring him release; he could be bought and made an inheritance for the purchaser's children (Lev. 25:45, 46).

Ammonites and Moabites formed an exceptional class among the strangers. They were not allowed membership in Israel even by circumcision (Deut. 23:3), but the son of an Israelite and a Moabitess might be admitted (cf. JESSE and REHOBOAM). Inter-marriage with the idolatrous Canaanites who were in the land at the time of the Conquest was strictly forbidden (Deut. 7:3), but the remnant who were left after the Conquest eventually became to a large extent proselytes. In Solomon's reign the census revealed 153,600 strangers in the realm (II Chron. 2:17).

In the N.T. the word stranger does not have this technical signification, but denotes one who is unknown (John 10:5), an alien (Luke 17:16, 18), a sojourner away from home (Luke 24:18; Acts 2:10), an Israelite dwelling in the Dispersion (I Peter 1:1, A.V.).

Straw. Wheat and barley straw, ground and cut to small pieces in the process of threshing, and doubtless often mixed with beans or barley, was used by the ancient Hebrews as fodder for their cattle, camels, asses, and horses (Gen. 24:25, 32; Judg. 19:19; I Kings 4:28; Isa. 11:7). The Egyptians, in making bricks, mixed it with clay to render them more compact and to prevent their cracking. When Pharaoh withheld the chopped straw, the Hebrew slaves were compelled to go forth into the field and gather stubble, or rather stalks, for themselves, and chop their own straw (Ex. 5:7, 12, 16). Straw was probably not used by the ancient Hebrews as a litter in the stall. In Palestine today dried dung serves for this purpose.

Stream. See RIVER.

Street. The streets of Oriental towns were generally narrow, tortuous, and dirty (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 3; War ii. 14, 9; 15, 5). They were seldom wide enough to permit 2 laden camels to pass each other; but some were sufficiently broad for chariots to be driven through them (cf. Jer. 17:25; Nahum 2:4). Great cities were sometimes adorned by a grand avenue or even by several, as Alexandria and Babylon. In Damascus the street called Straight was a magnificent thoroughfare, 100 feet broad and divided into 3 avenues by rows of columns. Many streets were flanked by blank walls, seldom pierced except by doors, the windows of the houses opening on interior courts. The streets devoted to stores were lined by salesrooms with open fronts; and bazaar streets, each surrendered to 1 kind of business, were features of the ancient city (Jer. 37:21; Jos. War v. 8, 1). The intersections of the streets were centers of concourse and display (Prov. 1:21; Matt. 6:5; cf. Luke 13:26). At the gates were broad, open places where business was transacted. There is no evidence that the streets were paved in ancient times; but Josephus affirms that Solomon paved the roads leading to Jerusalem with black stones (Jos. Antiq. viii. 7, 4); and at the time of the Herods pavements were laid (Jos. Antiq. xvi. 5, 3; xx. 9, 7), and efforts were in some instances made toward keeping the streets clean (Jos. Antiq. xv. 9, 6).

Stripes. See SCOURGE.

Strong Drink. Intoxicating liquor, in Heb. shêkâr (I Sam. 1:13-15; Prov. 20:1; Isa. 29:9); cf. Eng. slang from Yiddish shicker, shickered (drunk). Wine and strong drink were forbidden to the priest when about to enter the sanctuary (Lev. 10:9; cf. Ezek. 44:21), and kings and princes were warned against its use, lest it lead to perversion of judgment (Prov. 31:4, 5); yet Isaiah was compelled to point to the sad spectacle of priests and prophets, even in Judah, scandalously failing in duty through wine and strong drink (Isa. 28:7). Wine, strong drink, vinegar, any liquor of grapes, and even fresh grapes were forbidden the Nazirite (Num. 6:3; cf. Judg. 13:4; Luke 1:15); see NAZIRITE. Both wine and strong drink were allowed at the feast spread by the bringer of tithes (Deut. 14:26). On the basis of the exhortation, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish" (Prov. 31:6), kindhearted women of Jerusalem provided stupefying draughts for criminals condemned to death (Mishnah; cf. Mark 15:23).

Sub'ble. See STRAW.

Su'ah (sû'â) [sweepings]. An Asherite, a son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:36).

Su'cath-ite (sû'kâth-î't), in A.V. Su'chath-ite. A native or an inhabitant of an unknown place called Suchah or Socah (I Chron. 2:55).

Suc'coth (sûk'ôth) [booths or huts]. 1. A place e. of the Jordan (Judg. 8:4, 5), at which Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, after crossing the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22), built himself a house, with booths for his cattle, giving the spot from the latter circumstance the name of Succoth (ch. 33:17). He journeyed thence to Shechem (v. 18). It was in the valley of the Jordan, near Zarethan (I Kings 7:46; Ps. 60:6; 108:7), and was assigned to the Gadites (Josh. 13:27). In the time of Gideon it was an important town, ruled by 77 elders. They refused him assistance when he was pursuing Zebah and Zalmunna, and were in consequence punished by him when he returned a victor (Judg. 8:5-16). The site is at Tell Ahsās, about 1½ miles n. of Nahr ez-Zerkā (Jabbok) and about 9 miles n.e. of Damiyeh; it is about 426 feet w. of Deir 'Alla (Tar'alāh, Dar'alāh), which the Talmud identifies with Succoth.

2. The first camping ground of the Israelites after leaving Rameses (Ex. 12:37; 13:

20; Num. 33:5, 6); by some identified with Thuku, the civil city surrounding the sacred buildings at Pithom. More recently it has been identified with Tell el-Maskhūtah. See PITHOM.

Suc'coth-be'noth (sûk'ôth-bē'nôth). An idol which the Babylonian colonists set up in Samaria (II Kings 17:30). The tutelary deity of Babylon was Marduk, and his consort was Zarpanitum, although numerous other deities were worshiped in the city. The historian Rawlinson, followed by Schrader, proposed to identify Succoth-benoth with Zarpanitum, the latter part of the 2 names being essentially the same. Friedrich Delitzsch regards Succoth-benoth as a Hebraization of the Akkad. words sakkut binūti, supreme judge of the universe, and he considers it to have been in this instance a title of Marduk.

Su'cath-ite (sû'kâth-î't). See SUCATHITE.

Suk'ki-im (sûk'î-îm), in A.V. Suk'ki-lms (sûk'î-lmz). One of the peoples furnishing soldiers to the army of Shishak, king of Egypt, when he invaded Palestine. They were evidently an African race (II Chron. 12:3).

Su'mer (sû'mēr). See BABYLONIA.

Sun. The luminary of the day, created by God (Gen. 1:16), preserved by God (Jer. 31:35; Matt. 5:45), and subject to God (Ps. 104:19); influential in promoting vegetation (Deut. 33:14; II Sam. 23:4), and also burning it with its heat. It is spoken of as rising and setting; is poetically described as occupying a tent in the heavens; its rising in the morning with vigor and joy is likened to a bridegroom coming forth from his chamber (Ps. 19:4-6). Death in the meridian of one's days, and the sudden loss of prosperity, are likened to the setting of the sun at midday (Jer. 15:9; Amos 8:9; Micah 3:6). The sun was worshiped by the nations contemporary with the Hebrews, notably by the Babylonians at Sippar and Larsa, and by the Assyrians under the name of Shamash, and by the Egyptians under that of Re. The Hebrews were warned against all such heathenism, but sun worship nevertheless found entrance among them. Altars were erected to all the host of heaven (II Kings 21:5), incense was burned to the sun and horses were dedicated to it (II Kings 23:5, 11; cf. the Persian worship, Herod. vii. 54), and kisses were thrown to it with the hand (Job 31:26, 27).

Joshua commanded the sun to stand still. The older commentators referred the words of Hab. 3:11 to this event, but the Heb. construction and the context are against it. Sun and moon withdraw into their habitation. Dread before the presence of the Lord seizes all nature and reveals itself in the trembling of the mountains, in the raging of the sea, and in the withdrawal of their light by sun and moon (vs. 10, 11). The first reference to the astronomical lengthening of the day at Beth-horon is found in Ecclesiasticus, and its author evidently believed that the sun and moon were checked in their courses. "Did not the sun go back by his hand? And did not one day become as two" (Ecclus. 46:4). Josephus also understood that the day was lengthened (Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 17). Unquestionably God could work this wonder, with all that it involved. The circumstances, however, scarcely afforded an adequate occasion for so stupendous a miracle. Another interpretation has much in its favor. It is certain that Josh. 10:12b and 13a are poetry. Verses 12-15 in all probability form a paragraph by themselves (cf. the repetition, v. 15 and v. 43), and are quoted from The Book of Jashar, a collection of poems with introductory and perhaps concluding remarks in prose (see JASHAR; cf. Job with its prose introduction and conclusion; cf. the position of the quoting clause in Josh. 10:13 and II Sam. 1:18). Joshua's words are the impassioned utterance of a general inspiring his army on the field of battle. Desirous that Israel may have time completely to overthrow the foe, he apostrophizes sun and moon. In fervent, imperious words, he demands time. "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon." God granted his wish. Before the light of day failed, the people had avenged themselves on their enemies. A hail-storm assisted the Israelites, and they drove the enemy to Azekah and Makkedah and made a great slaughter. This event, it seems, was worked up poetically in The Book of Jashar, and must be interpreted as poetry, as one interprets the psalmist when, telling of the gift of manna, he says: "He commanded the skies above, and opened the doors of heaven; and he rained down manna upon them to eat, and gave them of the corn of heaven" (Ps. 78:23, 24); or as one understands the poet who, after relating the passage of the Red Sea and the Jordan, adds: "The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs" (Ps. 114:6); or as one understands the Prophet Habakkuk when he pictures Jehovah as a warrior and says: "Thou didst ride upon thine horses, upon thy chariots of salvation" (Hab. 3:8).

R.V. translates Heb. hammānīm as sun-images (Lev. 26:30; II Chron. 14:5; 34:4, 7; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Ezek. 6:4, 6). There was found at Palmyra an altar inscribed with its name, a cognate of the above Heb. noun, and accordingly the term sun-images must be understood as altars of incense (cf. Hos. 4:13). Altars of incense were found at Megiddo which antedate the middle of the 10th century B.C.; they belong to the religion of Baal and not to orthodox Israelite worship.

For the recession of the sun's shadow on the dial of Ahaz, see DIAL.

Suph (sōf) [reeds]. A locality (Deut. 1:1, R.V.), situation unknown; there is a Khirbet Sufa 3¼ miles s.s.e. of Medaba. The A.V., following the Vulgate and the LXX, assumes that the Heb. word for sea has fallen out of the text. On this assumption the text originally was yām suph, Red Sea, and the reference was to that part of the sea known as the Gulf of 'Akabah.

Su'phah (sōf'ā). Probably a proper name, denoting the region in which Vaheb was situated (Num. 21:14, R.V.). See SUPH.

Sup'per. See MEALS.

Sure'ty. A person who makes himself liable for the obligations of another (Prov. 22:26, 27). A surety was sometimes offered for a service to be rendered (Gen. 44:32); and, when commercial transactions were common, a surety was often required to be found before credit was given. The formalities consisted in giving the hand, in the presence of witnesses, to the person to whom the debt was due, and promising to discharge the obligation in case the debtor defaulted (Prov. 6:1, 2; 17:18). The folly of becoming surety, especially in behalf of a stranger, was proverbial (Prov. 11:15; 17:18; 20:16); but it was regarded as proper under circumstances and for a moderate amount, and as a neighborly act (Ecclus. 8:13; 29:14, 20); yet its grave dangers and its liability to abuse by a dishonest client were recognized (Ecclus. 29:16-18).

Su'sa (sōf'sā). See SHUSHAN.

Su-san'chite (sū-sān'kit). See SHUSHAN-CHITES.

Su-san'na (sū-zān'ā) [Gr. from Heb., a lily]. One of the women who ministered to Jesus of their substance (Luke 8:3).

Su'si (sū'sī) [horseman]. Father of Gaddi, the spy from the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 13:11).

Swad'dling Band. A cloth in which infants were wrapped (Job 38:9; Ezek. 16:4; Luke 2:7, 12). The babe was laid diagonally on a square piece of cloth and 2 corners were turned over its body, 1 over its feet, and 1 under its head. The whole was then fastened by bands wound around the outside.

Swal'low. 1. A bird, in Biblical and Talmudic Heb. dērōr, shooting straight out or freedom. It frequented the sanctuary at Jerusalem, and nested there (Ps. 84:3), and it was found in company with other small birds, like the sparrow (ibid.; Prov. 26:2). The barn swallow (ibid.; Prov. 26:2). The barn swallow of Great Britain (Hirundo rustica) is abundant in Palestine from March to the approach of winter. Several other species also occur, but are less common.

2. The rendering in the R.V. of Heb. sūs or sis, a bird with a chattering note (Isa. 38:14) and migratory (Jer. 8:7). Swallow is the rendering adopted by the LXX, Vulgate, and Syriac versions, but the A.V., following the rabbis, translates it crane. Tristram believes that the swift is intended. He says that the common swift (Cypselus apus) is called šīš in the vernacular Arabic. It visits Palestine in immense numbers in its migrations, remaining from April to November, and building in the interval. Two other species of the genus occur in Palestine, the white-bellied swift (Cypselus melba) and the white-rumped swift (Cypselus affinis).

3. The rendering in A.V. of Heb. 'āgūr (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7). The R.V. in both passages renders it crane.

Swan. The rendering of Heb. tinshemeth, a name applied to an unclean bird (Lev. 11:18, R.V. marg.; Deut. 14:16; text of A.V.). The R.V. text makes it the horned owl. The same name belonged to a reptile classed with the lizards (Lev. 11:30, in R.V. chameleon, in A.V. mole). Tristram thinks that the bird was probably either the purple gallinule (Porphyrio caerules) or the glossy ibis (Ibis falcinellus).

Swear'ing. See OATH.

Sweat. It is a common occurrence for perspiration to break out suddenly over the body when the individual is under the influence of strong mental excitement. Well-authenticated cases have been recorded in which this perspiration has been colored with blood. The phenomenon is recognized in medical science, and is called diapedesis, or the oozing of the blood corpuscles through the walls of the blood vessels without rupture. During Christ's agony in Gethsemane his sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground (Luke 22:44).

Swine. The swine was a ceremonially unclean animal (Lev. 11:7; Deut. 14:8). It is dirty, does not refuse to eat offal and carrion, and the use of its flesh for food in hot countries is supposed to produce cutaneous diseases. It was not raised by the Arabs (Pliny Hist. Nat. viii. 78), and was regarded as unclean by Phoenicians, Ethiopians, and Egyptians. In Egypt, however, a pig was sacrificed and eaten on the annual festival of the moon-god and Osiris (Bacchus); nevertheless, a man who accidentally touched a pig at once washed, a swineherd was not allowed to enter a temple and was compelled to find a wife among the people of his own occupation, as no other man would give a daughter to him in marriage (Herod. ii. 47). To the Jews swine's flesh was abominable, the pig was the emblem of filth and coarseness (Prov. 11:22; Matt. 7:6; II Peter 2:22), and to feed swine was the lowest and most despicable occupation to which a Jew could be reduced (Luke 15:15). Yet pork found entrance to the idolatrous feasts of degenerate Hebrews (Isa. 65:4; 66:17). In the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes the command to a Jew to offer or to taste swine's flesh was used as a means of determining whether he was loyal to the religion of his fathers or was willing to accept the worship favored by his conquerors (I Macc. 1:47, 50; II Macc. 6:18, 21; 7:1, 7). But many Jews affected Grecian manners, and John Hyrcanus some years later found it advisable to issue an edict that no one should keep swine. In the time of Christ one large herd of swine at least was pastured in the Decapolis (Mark 5:11-13), a region colonized by Greeks, among whom the swine was highly esteemed as an article of food. There is no reason to suppose that Jews owned either these swine or those in the far country fed by the Prodigal Son (Luke 15:15). See BOAR.

Sword. A weapon with which an adversary was cut by being struck or was thrust through (I Sam. 17:51; 31:4; II Sam. 2:16; Matt. 26:51). It had hilt and blade (Judg. 3:22), was carried in a sheath (I Sam. 17:51; Jer. 47:6), and girded on the loins (Ex. 32:27; II Sam. 20:8), usually at the left side (cf. Judg. 3:16 with vs. 15, 21). The hilt was often highly ornamented, at least among the Egyptians, Babylonians, and Assyrians. The blade was commonly made of iron (Isa. 2:4), perhaps also of bronze, as not seldom in Egypt. It was straight or slightly curved, long or short (Judg. 3:16, a cubit long), single or double-edged (ibid.; Ps. 149:6).

In the Roman period a short, slightly curved dagger was worn under the clothing by the Jewish sicarii, or assassins (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 10; War ii. 13, 3). Roman infantry wore the sword on the left side and the dagger on the right, but the cavalry wore the sword on the right (Jos. War iii. 5, 5). This, however, was not an invariable rule.

Syc'amine Tree. The mulberry tree, called in Gr. sykaminos (Luke 17:6). The black mulberry (Morus nigra), a tree 20 or 30 feet high, is the species commonly cultivated for its leaves and fruit. The silkworm feeds on the leaves. The fruit is dark red or black, with an uneven surface. The tree has been planted extensively in Palestine.

Sy'char (sī'kār). A town of Samaria, in the vicinity of the land given by Jacob to his son Joseph, near Jacob's well (John 4:5; cf. Gen. 48:22). Formerly it was supposed to be a Gr. corruption of Shechem; in the Old Syriac Gospels the reading is Shechem. It is now believed to be the village of 'Askar, on the e. declivity of Mount Ebal, 1¾ miles e.n.e. from Nablus (Shechem) and a little over ½ mile n. of Jacob's well.

Sy'chem (sī'kēm). See SHECHEM.

Syc'o-more. A fig tree, called in Heb. shik-māh, in Gr. sykomoros, sykomorea. It was abundant in the lowland of Judah (I Kings 10:27; I Chron. 27:28; II Chron. 1:15; 9:27), grew in the Jordan Valley (Luke 19:4), and was cultivated in Egypt (Ps. 78:47). Its timber was much used, although less durable than cedar (Isa. 9:10). The tree is the Ficus sycomorus, a fig tree, 25 to 50 feet high and 60 feet broad, with persistent, heart-shaped leaves downy beneath. It is often planted by the wayside on account of its grateful shade (cf. Luke 19:4). The fruit grows in clusters on twigs which spring directly from the trunk and larger branches, but cannot be eaten until it has been punctured and the insect that infests it has been allowed to escape (cf. Amos 7:14).

This tree must not be confounded with our sycamore (Platanus occidentalis), although the modern spelling is sycamore.

Sy'e'ne (sī-ē'nē). See SEVENEH.

Sym'e-on (sīm'ē-ūn). See SIMEON.

Syn'a-gogue [Gr., assembly, place of meeting, synagogue]. A Jewish place of worship. The building served also for local law court and school. Previous to the Captivity, worship of the highest kind could be performed only at the Temple at Jerusalem. Of course, the Scriptures could be publicly read elsewhere (Jer. 36:6, 10, 12-15), and the people could resort to the prophets anywhere for religious instruction (II Kings 4:38). Worship at Jerusalem was impossible when the people were in captivity in Babylon, and it seems to have been then and there that synagogues first arose. They were designed to be places, not of sacrifice, but of Scriptural instruction and prayer. The Eng. word synagogue occurs only once in the O.T. (Ps. 74:8). The marg. of R.V. has "places of assembly" instead of synagogues, and the LXX renders by heortē (a feast, a festival, a holiday). It is not, therefore, certain that there is any reference to a synagogue in the O.T. In the 1st century they were found wherever Jews dwelt. Even small communities of Jews in the lesser cities outside of Palestine had their synagogues; as in Salamis in Cyprus (Acts 13:5), Antioch of Pisidia (v. 14), Iconium (ch. 14:1), Berea (ch. 17:10). In large cities synagogues were often numerous; as in Jerusalem (ch. 6:9) and Alexandria. These religious communities maintained an existence separate from the state and managed their own religious and civil affairs, subordinate, of course, to the law of the land (Jos. Antiq. xix. 5, 3). A board of elders managed the affairs of the synagogue and of the religious community which it represented (Luke 7:3-5). The special officers, who directed the worship, maintained order, and looked after the temporalities, were: 1. The ruler of the synagogue (Acts 13:8). In some synagogues several rulers were in office (Mark 5:22). The ruler presided at the service; appointed or permitted suitable members to pray, read the Scriptures, and exhort; and was responsible for the proprieties (Luke 13:

14). The services were not conducted by permanent officers set apart for the duty, but by private members who had shown qualifications for it. Thus Jesus read the Scriptures in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16), and he often taught in the synagogues (Matt. 4:23). Paul and Barnabas were called on by the rulers of the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia for words of exhortation (Acts 13:15). 2. One or more attendants for the humbler and menial duties. They brought the Scriptures to the reader and replaced the roll in its depository (Luke 4:20), and they inflicted the corporal punishment to which the authorities sentenced a member. 3. Dispensers of alms (cf. Matt. 6:2). 4. Wealthy men of leisure, if possible 10 or more, who represented the congregation at every service. The congregation assembled every Sabbath for worship (Acts 15:21), and on the 2d and 5th days of the week to hear a portion of the Law read. At the Sabbath service prayer was offered by a member of the congre-

a mixture of Corinthian and Ionic. The faces of the lintels over the gateways have as a frequent ornament the representation of a scroll of vine leaves with bunches of grapes. At Nebartein there is a figure of the 7-branched candlestick, with an inscription; at Kefr Bir'im what is intended apparently for the paschal lamb; while at Tell Hum there are both the lamb and the pot of manna. The synagogue at Dura-Europus (on the right bank of the Euphrates on the road from Aleppo to Baghdad) was excavated in 1934. It is dated by an inscription of the year A.D. 245; it contains a remarkable variety of frescoes illustrating Biblical scenes and marks an epoch in the origins of Christian art.

The assembly room was provided with a reading desk, a chest or closet for the Scriptures, and seats for at least the elders and richer members (Matt. 23:6; James 2:2, 3). The more honorable seats were near the place where the Scriptures were kept. The congregation was divided: the men on one side, the gation. It consisted chiefly in reading Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num. 15:37-41; and offering some or all of the 18 prayers and benedictions. The people were accustomed to stand during this prayer (Matt. 6:5; Mark 11:25), and united in saying "Amen" at its close. A lesson from the Law was read (Acts 15:21) by several members, each taking a short paragraph in turn. This reading was prefaced and concluded by thanksgiving. Then came a lesson from the Prophets, read by the person who had opened the service with prayer. The reading was followed by an exposition and an exhortation given by the reader or some other person (Luke 4:16-22; Acts 13:15). The service was concluded by a benediction, which was pronounced by a priest, if one were present, and the congregation said, "Amen." The synagogue was called by the Jews in their own language "assembly house." Ruins of these buildings still exist in Galilee at Tell Hum, which is perhaps the site of Capernaum, at Irbid, Kefr Bir'im, Nebartein, and some other places. These were rectangular structures. All lay n. and s., and had a large middle portal and 2 smaller side doors on the s. side. The interior was divided into 5 aisles by 4 rows of columns, and the 2 n. corners were formed by double-engaged columns. At Tell Hum there are Corinthian capitals; at Irbid women on the other. Punishment ordered by the authorities of the synagogue was inflicted in the building, possibly in some chamber (Matt. 10:17; Acts 22:19).

The Great Synagogue denotes a council, said to have been organized by Nehemiah about 410 B.C. It consisted of 120 members (Megilloth, 17, 18). Ezra was its president. To this body the prophets transmitted the Law of Moses (Pirke Aboth i. 1). Simon the Just, who died about 275 B.C., was one of the last of its members. It was succeeded by the sanhedrin (Aboth x. 1). Its special work was to reorganize religious worship among the returned captives and to gather together the canonical books. Such is the Jewish tradition. The existence of the Great Synagogue has been doubted, since there is no mention of any such body in the Apocrypha, in Josephus, or in Philo. Nor does the name appear anywhere in Scripture. But the tradition is not to be wholly rejected. The Great Synagogue was probably a council of scribes for the decision of theological questions, contained from first to last, during an existence of a little more than a century and a half, about 120 prominent members, and numbered among them all the leading scribes from Ezra to Simon the Just.

Syn'ty-che (sîn'tî-chê) [Gr., fortunate]. A woman in the Philippian church whom Paul exhorted (Phil. 4:2).

Syr'a-cuse (sir'â-kûs). A celebrated city on the e. coast of Sicily, founded about 735 B.C. by a colony of Corinthians and Dorians, led by Archias of Corinth. It greatly flourished and in 413 B.C. defeated and destroyed an Athenian fleet of 200 vessels. In 212 B.C. it was taken by the Romans. Paul saw it on his voyage to Rome (Acts 28:12). It was taken by the Moslems in A.D. 878.

Syr'ia (sir'î-â). A country along the e. coast of the Mediterranean and extending far inland. It comprised most of the regions known in O.T. times as Canaan and Aram. The name is sometimes used as a translation of Aram, but inaccurately, being much too broad a term. The word Syria is an abbreviated form of Assyria, and became current after the conquests of Alexander the Great. Syria formed the most important province, both commercially and from a military point of view, of the kingdom of the Seleucidae, whose capital was at Babylon. It soon became apparent that w. Asia required a government of its own, more in the Greek spirit than was the system suitable for the far east. For this purpose Antioch was founded as a royal city about 300 B.C. (cf. I Macc. 3:37). The kingdom of the Seleucidae was gradually reduced by the encroachment of its foes, until at the close of the 2d century B.C. only Syria was left. With the Roman conquest in 64 B.C., the kingdom was erected into the province of Syria, with a Roman governor resident in Antioch. The name Syria was limited to this province, which included the country w. of the Euphrates from the Taurus Mountains to the borders of Egypt. From the time of Augustus it was governed by a consular legate of the emperor. In A.D. 70 Judea was separated from Syria and made a distinct province under an imperial legate.

Syr'iac (sir'î-âk) Ver'sions. See VERSIONS, II. 1.

Syr'ian (sir'î-ân). One of the Syrian race, or an inhabitant of Syria. In O.T. times the word Syria was not in use; and where Syrian occurs in the E.V. of the O.T. it denotes a native of Aram, properly called an Aramaean (Gen. 28:5); see ARAM, DAMASCUS, and for the period after the conquests of Alexander the Great, SYRIA.

Sy'ro-phoe-ni'cian (sir'ô-fê-nîsh'ân), in A.V. Sy'ro-ph'e-ni'cian (sir'ô-fê-nîsh'ân). A Phoenician of Syria in distinction from the Libyphoenicians of n. Africa (Mark 7:26; cf. Matt. 15:22). A new distinction arose toward the end of the 2d century of the Christian era, when the province of Syria was divided into Syria Magna and Syria-Phoenice.

Syr'tis (sir'tis). See QUICKSAND.

T

Ta'an-nach (tâ'â-nâk), in A.V. once Ta'nach (Josh. 21:25). A Canaanite city, mentioned about 1600 B.C. in connection with the advance of Thothmes III against Megiddo. Its king was defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh. 12:21). It lay within the limits of Issachar, but was nominally possessed by the Manassites (Josh. 17:11; I Chron. 7:29). Residence in it was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:25). The Manassites failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants, but ultimately rendered them tributary (Judg. 1:27). The great battle between Barak and Sisera was fought near Taanach (Judg. 5:19). The place was important in Solomon's reign (I Kings 4:12). Tell Ta'annak, the site of the ancient city, is situated among the low hills on the s. edge of the plain of Jezreel, 5 miles to the s.e. of ancient Megiddo.

Ta'a-nath-shi'loh (tâ'â-nâth-shi'loh) [approach to Shiloh]. A town on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. 16:6). It is Khirbet Ta'na, 7 miles s.e. by e. of Shechem.

Ta'b-a'oth (tâ-bâ'ôth) [rings]. A family of Nethinim, represented in Zerubbabel's colony (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

Ta'b'ath (tâb'âth). A place near Abelmeholah (Judg. 7:22); located at Râs Abû Tabât.

Ta'b'e'al (tâ'bê-âl), A.V.; in R.V. Ta'be-el [good-not; a scornful modification of Tabeel]. A man whose son the allied kings, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel, attempted to place on the throne of David as their puppet king of Judah (Isa. 7:6).

Ta'be-el (tâ'bê-êl) [Aram., God is good]. 1. Probably the original pronunciation of Tabeel (q.v.).

2. A Persian petty governor, probably of Syrian descent, one of those who complained to Artaxerxes Longimanus that the wall of Jerusalem was being rebuilt (Ezra 4:7).

Ta'b'e-rah (tâ'bê-râ) [burning]. A place where the Israelites murmured, and the fire of the Lord burned among them in the uttermost part of the camp. The burning abated at the intercession of Moses. The event perhaps occurred at no formal encampment, but in the uttermost part of the camp at Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. 11:1-3, 35; Deut. 9:22).

Ta'ber-ing. Beating, as on a tabor, tabret, tamborine, or timbrel (Nahum 2:7, A.V.).

Ta'b'er-na-cle. 1. A provisional tent where the Lord met his people (Ex. 33:7-10); see TENT OF MEETING 1.

2. The movable sanctuary in the form of a tent which God directed Moses at Sinai to make, that God might dwell as king among his people (Ex. 25:8, 9). Hence it was called "the dwelling" (chs. 25:9 marg. of R.V.; 26:1), and, as the place where Jehovah met his people, "the tent of meeting" (Ex. 40:34, 35, R.V.), and as the depository of the tables of the Law or testimony, "the tabernacle of the testimony" (Ex. 38:21; cf. ch. 25:21, 22; Num. 9:15). It was also known by the general designation "house of Jehovah" (Ex. 34:26; Josh. 6:24). The materials for its construction were largely obtained in the vicinity: the acacia wood of the wilderness, hair and skins of the flocks, skin of the tachash, a porpoise or similar creature, from the Red Sea. Gold, silver, brass, and linen, or perhaps muslin, were liberally furnished by the people, who gave their ornaments for the work (Ex. 35:21-29). The lavish expenditure of precious metals for this temporary structure and its furniture was justified, since none of this wealth would be lost when the movable tent gave place to a permanent edifice. The sacred vessels might serve in a new sanctuary or be wrought into new forms.

The architectural specifications for the tabernacle are drawn up systematically, and begin with the Ark, which was the central and essential feature of the appointed meeting-place between Jehovah and his people (Ex. 25:22):

I. The essential and permanent features: the Ark, table of showbread, and candelabrum (Ex. 25:10-40), which were symbols of heavenly things (Heb. 9:23). Their housing (Ex., ch. 26). The altar of burnt offerings (ch. 27:1-8). The court (vs. 9-19). Continual testimony to be borne by the maintenance of light from pure beaten oil (vs. 20, 21). No such specifications for the showbread were required; the ordinance of ch. 25:30 sufficed, since the finest flour was always used in offerings.

II. The means of approach. A priesthood: authorized and appointed (ch. 28:1), garments (vs. 2-43), and consecration (ch. 29:1-35). After mediating priests have been provided, atonement of the altar is specified (vs. 36, 37) and the continual sacrifice (vs. 38-42).

III. When the way of approach has been opened, the specifications advance to the altar of incense (ch. 30:1-10), symbolical of the adoration of God by his people cleansed of sin. Only here is the altar of incense mentioned apart from the other furniture in a description of the tabernacle. It is ordered in its logical place in the worship of God by his people. Elsewhere it is named with the other furniture in the unvarying order of Ark, table, candlestick, altar of incense, altar of burnt offering; as in the account of the manufacture of the furniture (ch. 37:25-28), in the enumeration of the completed furniture (ch. 39:38), in the directions for the erection of the tabernacle (ch. 40:5), and in the record of its erection (v. 26).

IV. Provision for the needs of the service: the half shekel atonement money (Ex. 30:11-16), the laver (vs. 17-21), the holy anointing oil (vs. 22-33), and the incense (vs. 34-38).

The tabernacle formed a rectangle, 30 cubits long by 10 broad, with the entrance at the e. end. The rear end and the 2 sides were made of boards, 48 in number, 20 on each side and 8 in the rear, of which 2 formed the posts at the angles. Each plank was 10 cubits long by 1½ cubits broad, and was overlaid with gold. They were hardly cut from the log in a single piece, but were probably framed of several pieces. They were set on end and were held in place at the bottom by tenons sunk in sockets of silver, 2 to each plank, and they were bound together laterally by transverse bars of acacia wood, which were arranged 5 on a side externally and thrust through rings attached to each plank (Ex. 26:15-30). The entire front was left as an entrance. This portal consisted of a row of 5 pillars overlaid with gold, resting in sockets of brass and supporting a curtain. The interior was divided into 2 apartments by 4 similar pillars sunk in sockets of silver and hung with a curtain (vs. 32, 37). These rooms were respectively the w., called the Holy of Holies, measuring 10 cubits in every direction, and the sanctuary or Holy Place, which was 20 cubits long by 10 cubits in breadth and height (cf. Ex. 26:16 for height; vs. 16, 18 for length; v. 16 with vs. 22-24 for width; Jos. Antiq. iii. 6, 4). The hangings were 4: 1. The ceiling and apparently the walls were hung with a curtain of white twined linen, blue, purple, and scarlet, and figured with cherubim. This curtain was made in 10 pieces, each 28 cubits by 4, sewed together in 2 sheets. These sheets were then looped together. One formed the ceiling and 3 sides of the Holy of Holies, and the other the ceiling and 2 sides of the sanctuary (Ex. 26:1-6). 2. The main external covering was of goats' hair, and consisted of 11 narrow curtains, each 30 cubits by 4; that is, 2 cubits longer than the under curtain of linen (cf. v. 13). These strips were united into 2 great curtains, which were looped together. The smaller one, which was made of 5 strips, covered the top and 3 sides of the Holy of Holies; the larger one covered the top and sides of the sanctuary, and had 1 breadth depending over the portal in front (vs. 7-13). 3. Over this covering of goats' hair a double roof of red-dyed rams' skins and tahash (perhaps porpoise) skins was thrown (v. 14). 4. Two veils were hung, one at the entrance to the sanctuary and the other in front of the Holy of Holies. Each was wrought of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen; but on the inner veil, which separated the Holy of Holies, were figures of cherubim, in token of the presence and unapproachableness of Jehovah, while the outer veil, which was passed by the priests when they entered the sanctuary to minister, lacked symbols to prevent man's ingress (vs. 31-37).

The tabernacle stood in a courtyard, like itself rectangular in form; its longer sides,

Plan of the Tabernacle running e. and w., were 100 cubits, while the shorter 2, running n. and s., were 50. The court was inclosed by a fence, 5 cubits high, formed of pillars filleted with silver, resting in sockets of brass, placed 5 cubits apart, and hung with fine twined linen. The entrance was at the e. It was 20 cubits wide and was closed by a curtain of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen, hung on 4 pillars (Ex. 27:9-18). The tabernacle was pitched in the w. half of this area, the laver and the altar of burnt offering being erected in the open e. half. The Ark was the central feature. It stood in the Holy of Holies. In the sanctuary, immediately in front of the veil that separated it from the Holy of Holies, stood the altar of incense, which however belonged to the oracle (I Kings 6:22, R.V.; Heb. 9:3, 4). In this apartment also were the table of showbread on the right hand and the golden candlestick on the left. In the court stood the laver and the altar of burnt offering. For the description of these objects and their symbolism, see the several articles.

The tabernacle was dedicated on the 1st day of the 2d year after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt. A cloud rested on it by day and a pillar of fire by night during all the period of the wandering. When the people broke camp, the Levites took the structure to pieces and put it together again at the new camping ground (Ex. 40:34-38). During the Conquest of Canaan the Ark remained in the camp at Gilgal. After the settlement of the Israelites, Joshua set up the tabernacle at Shiloh, where it remained during the period of the Judges (Josh. 18:1). Apparently with the lapse of time chambers for the occupancy of the priests and for the storing of gifts came to cluster about it (I Sam. 3:3; cf. the encampment of the Levites about it, Num. 3:23, 29, 35), and not unlikely the court was surrounded by a more substantial structure than hangings of linen. It was spoken of as a tent (II Sam. 7:6), the tent of meeting (Josh. 19:51; I Sam. 2:22), Jehovah's dwelling (Josh. 22:19, 29, translated tabernacle); Jehovah's house (Judg. 19:18; I Sam. 1:7, 24; 3:15), and as the abode of Israel's king, Jehovah's residence or palace (I Sam. 1:9; 3:3, translated temple). By the capture of the Ark by the Philistines, the tabernacle lost its glory and its value (Ps. 78:60). In the reign of Saul it was at Nob (cf. I Sam. 21:1 with Mark 2:26). During the greater part of David's reign, and in that of Solomon until the building of the Temple, the tabernacle was at the high place of Gibeon (I Chron. 16:39; 21:29). Afterward Solomon laid it up in the Temple (I Kings 8:4; II Chron. 5:5), which was constructed on the same model, but in every part was of dimensions twice as great.

Tab'er-na'cles, Feast of. The last of the 3 great annual festivals at which every man of Israel was required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary, and the 2d of the harvest festivals (Deut. 16:16; II Chron. 8:12, 13; cf. I Kings 9:25; 12:32, 33; Zech. 14:16). It took its name from the custom of dwelling in booths during its celebration (Lev. 23:40-42), which, after the establishment of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, were erected in the open places of the city, on the roofs and in the courts of the houses, in the precincts of the Temple (Neh. 8:16), and in the open country outside the walls. It was the culminating festival of the year; and while preeminently and essentially agricultural, it combined a historical association, the reverse in this respect of the passover (Lev. 23:39, 43). It was kept in the 7th month, which by reason of the number was sacred, at the close of the agricultural season, when all the products of the year from grainfield, oliveyard, and vineyard were garnered. Hence the name "feast of ingathering," under which it was instituted (Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:39; Deut. 16:13-15). It began on the 15th day of the month, and was celebrated during 7 days. The special burnt offering amounted to 70 bullocks, distributed on a decreasing scale over the week, together with 2 rams and 14 lambs daily; and as a sin offering a he-goat was daily sacrificed (Num. 29:12-34; cf. Lev. 23:36; Ezra 3:4). The booths made of the boughs of trees suggested the vintage life; but they were also made a reminder of the march from Egypt through the wilderness (Lev. 23:43; cf. Hos. 12:9). Every 7 years the Law of Moses was publicly read, the year of reading coinciding with the year of release, when there was no occasion to celebrate an ingathered harvest (Deut. 31:9-13). The festival occurred almost immediately after the Day of Atonement. The people, purged ceremonially from their sinfulness, could keep the feast with a glad sense of their fitness to commune with the bountiful God. The needy were remembered (Deut. 16:14). An 8th day of solemn assembly was added to the festival. It was distinct from the festival; the requirement to dwell in booths did not extend to it, and its offerings stood in no relation to those of the festival proper (Lev. 23:36, 39; Num. 29:35-38). It was not intended to conclude the feast of tabernacles, but only to bring the annual cycle of festivals to a fitting close. Later, however, the festival was spoken of as continuing for 8 days (II Macc. 10:6; Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 4). It is disputed whether the 7th or the 8th day was the great day referred to in John 7:37. Splendid ceremonies were subsequently added to those prescribed in the Law for the festival. At the time of the morning sacrifice the people took branches of palm, myrtle, and willow intertwined and fruit in their hands, repaired to the Temple, and marched around the altar of burnt offering once daily and 7 times on the 7th day (Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 4; xiii. 13, 5; cf. II Macc. 10:6, 7). Another custom, possibly also in vogue in Christ's day, was that daily during the festival, at the time of the morning and evening oblation, a priest filled a golden vessel with water at the pool of Siloam and carried it to the Temple, where it was received with trumpet blast and the words of Isa. 12:3: "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." It was mixed with the wine of the sacrifices and, while priests blew trumpets and Levites played on instruments and sang psalms, was poured out beside the altar, whence it was conducted by a sewer into the Kidron Valley. It was also customary in the evening following the 1st day of the festival, and perhaps on the subsequent evenings, to illuminate the Court of the Women from 2 lofty stands, each supporting 4 immense lamps, which threw their light not only into the courts of the Temple, but far and wide over the city. The wicks were made of the cast-off linen of the priests. Levites, stationed on the steps of the court, rendered instrumental music and sang psalms; and a dance was performed by prominent laymen and priests.

Jews who were unable to attend the celebration at Jerusalem on account of the distance of the city from their home, especially Jews dwelling in foreign countries, kept the festival at the synagogue of the town where they lived, but of course without the offering of sacrifices.

Tab'i-tha (tăb'ī-thá). See DORCAS.

Ta'bor (tă'bēr). 1. A mountain on the boundary of the territory of Issachar (Jos. Antiq. v. 1, 22; perhaps Josh. 19:22), situated inland among the mountains (Jer. 46:18). It is a notable mountain (Ps. 89:12), though vastly inferior in size to Hermon. The forces of Issachar and Zebulun assembled there preparatory to fighting with Sisera (Judg. 4:6, 12, 14). In 218 B.C., Antiochus the Great captured a town on its summit and fortified the place (Polybius v. 70, 6). Josephus encircled the top with a wall for defense (Jos. Life 37; War iv. 1, 8). Tabor, now called Jebel et-Tūr, is a detached hill of limestone, rising 1,843 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, in the n.e. part of the plain of Jezreel, about 12 miles n. of Mount Gilboa, 5½ e. by s. of Nazareth, and 12 w. by s. of the s. curve of the Lake of Gennesaret. From the w.n.w. it looks like a truncated cone, and from the s.w. the segment of a sphere. The sides are steep. The n. side is covered with thickets of oak and terebinth. The top is flat and elliptical. In the 2d century the opinion was current that Tabor was the scene of the transfiguration, and ecclesiastical buildings in commemoration were erected from time to time on the summit. The theory is beset by the difficulty that there was a town on the summit in the days of Christ.

2. A town of Zebulun, given to the Merarite Levites (I Chron. 6:77), perhaps the place on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:22). The latter is scarcely identical with the border town Chisloth-tabor (Josh. 19:12), which rather corresponds with Chesulloth (v. 18). It may be identified with Khirbet Dabūra, which is situated on the ridge joining Mount Tabor to the hill of Nazareth.

3. The oak or terebinth of Tabor (I Sam. 10:3; not "plain," as in A.V.), apparently in the territory of Benjamin.

Tab'ret. A musical instrument (I Sam. 10:5), a timbrel (q.v.).

Tab'rim-mon (täb'rīm-ōn), in A.V. Tab'rimon (täb'rī-mōn) [Aram., Rimmon is good]. A son of Hezion, and father of Ben-hadad I, king of Syria (I Kings 15:18).

Tache. A catch for taking hold or holding together. It was used about the tabernacle for coupling curtains together (Ex. 26:6, 11, in R.V. clasp).

Tach'mo-nite (täk'mō-nīt). See TAHCHEMONITE.

Tadmōr (täd'mōr) [cf. Heb. tāmār, a palm tree]. A town in the desert (II Chron. 8:4). It was fortified by Solomon, doubtless to control the caravan route across it. In the parallel passage (I Kings 9:18, R.V.) it is called "Tamar in the wilderness," and described as being not only in the desert, but also "in the land." This latter phrase is probably broad enough to denote the extensive kingdom of Solomon (I Kings 9:19; 4:21, 24). The suggestion has been made that the town may be identical with Tamar at the s.e. corner of the promised boundaries of the land (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28), probably on the road from Hebron to Elath; see TAMAR 5. This identification is in itself suitable, and may include or correct Tadmōr in II Chron. 8:4, which has been proposed in explanation of I Kings 9:18. But the text of Kings is suspicious; for the phrase "in the land" is superfluous, since all the towns mentioned were in the land, and the text departs from the parallel enumeration in Chronicles in failing to locate in Hamath the store cities of Solomon. Perhaps the original text was "Tamar in the wilderness, in the land of Hamath all the store cities." Tadmōr eventually became subject to the Romans, who called it by its Greek name Palmyra (cf. Jos. Antiq. viii, 6, 1). Between A.D. 251 and 273 it was at first partially, and then for a time totally, independent. The place is called Tadmūr in modern Arabic. It is in an oasis about 140 miles e.n.e. of Damascus, and about 120 from the Euphrates. It is now a ruin, stretching more than a mile and a half. It has long rows of Corinthian columns and a few of the Ionic order, with a number of towerlike tombs.

Ta'han (tä'hān). A descendant of Ephraim, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:35). His descent was probably through Telah, Rephah, and Beriah to Ephraim (I Chron. 7:25).

Ta'hap'a-nes (tä'hāp'ā-nēz). See TAHAPAN-HES.

Ta'hash (tä'hāsh), in A.V. Tha'hash (thā'hāsh) [porpoise, dolphin]. A son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

Ta'hath (tä'hāth) [that which is beneath]. 1. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:26, 27).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, and of the line of Korah and Abiasaph (I Chron. 6:24, 37). From him 2 families branched, those of Uriel and Zephaniah.

3. An Ephraimite, son of Bered, family of Shuthelah (I Chron. 7:20).

4. A son of Eleadah, and a descendant of Tahath, son of Bered (I Chron. 7:20).

Tah'che-mo-nite (tä'kē-mō-nīt), in A.V. Tach'mo-nite. A word found in II Sam. 23:8. It is probably a corruption, in the Heb. text, of "the Hachmonite," a copyist having mistaken Heb. h for t. See HACHMONI.

Tah'pan-hes (tä'pān-hēz), and once Te'haph'nehes (Ezek. 30:18); in A.V. once also Tah'ap'anes (Jer. 2:16). An Egyptian city (Ezek. 30:18), to which Jews fled to escape Babylonian vengeance after the murder of Gedaliah (Jer. 43:7-9). Jews seem to have become permanent residents there (Jer. 44:1; 46:14). The LXX renders the name Taphnas, obviously the same as Daphne, a fortified city on the Pelusiatic channel of the Nile (Herod. ii. 30, 107), probably marked by Tell Defenneh, 12 miles n. of Pithom.

Tah'pe-nes (tä'pē-nēz). A queen of Egypt in the time of Solomon (I Kings 11:19, 20).

Tah're-a (tä'rē-ā). See TAREA.

Tah'tim-hod'shi (tä'tīm-hōd'shī). A region visited by David's census takers in connection with Gilead, before they came to Dan-jaan and roundabout to Zidon (II Sam. 24:6). The name is elsewhere unknown, and perhaps stands for "the Hittites toward Kadesh"; see KADESH 2.

Tal'ent. A weight used both for ordinary commodities and for the precious metals; see WEIGHTS. Naturally the talent as a money unit was not coined. From the parable of the Talents, in which a master distributes talents among his servants, according to their several abilities, to be put to profitable use (Matt. 25:14-30), is derived the English figurative use of the word talent.

Tal'i-tha eu'mi (tä'l'i-thā kōō'mē) [Aram., maiden arise] (Mark 5:41).

Tal'mai (tä'l'mī) [pertaining to furrows, plowman; but perhaps from Hurrian talma, big]. 1. A son of Anak, and probably founder of a family of Anakim (Num. 13:22), driven from Hebron by Caleb (Josh. 15:14; Judg. 1:10).

2. A king of Geshur, whose daughter Maacah was one of David's wives, and Absalom's mother (II Sam. 3:3; 13:37).

Tal'mon (tä'l'mōn). A porter (a Levite), and the family which he founded (I Chron. 9:17). Members of the family returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:40, 42; Neh. 7:45), and served as porters at the new Temple (Neh. 11:19; 12:25).

Ta'mah (tä'mā). See TEMAH.

Ta'mar (tä'mēr), in A. V. of N.T. Tha'mar [palm tree]. 1. The wife of Er, son of Judah. When left a widow, she became the mother of Perez and Zerah by Judah (Gen. 38:6-30), and thus the ancestress of several tribal families (Num. 26:20, 21).

2. Absalom's beautiful sister, abused by her half-brother Amnon (II Sam., ch. 13; I Chron. 3:9).

3. A daughter of Absalom, named doubtless after his sister (II Sam. 14:27). Perhaps she became Uriel's wife and the mother of Maacah, Rehoboam's wife (II Chron. 13:2; Jos. Antiq. viii. 10, 1). See MAACAH 9.

4. A town in the desert (I Kings 9:18). The Heb. kere, the A.V., the marg. of the R.V., and II Chron. 8:4 have Tadmor; see TADMOR.

5. A place at the e. end of the promised s. frontier of Palestine (Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). It would lie s. of the Dead Sea; and perhaps is identical with the village Thamara, which had a Roman garrison, on the road between Hebron and Elath.

Tam'arisk Tree. The tamarisk (Tamarix articulata) is called 'athl in Arab., 'athlā in Aram.; and accordingly the cognate Heb. word 'ēshel doubtless likewise denotes the tamarisk. Abraham planted 1 in Beer-sheba (Gen. 21:33; in A.V. grove), Saul dwelt beneath 1 in Ramah (I Sam. 22:6; in A.V. a tree), and the bones of Saul and his sons were buried beneath 1 in Jabesh-gilead (I Sam. 31:13; in A.V. a tree). The Chronicler states that the bones of the king and his sons were interred beneath the 'ēlāh in Jabesh (I Chron. 10:12, oak; J.V. and R.V. marg. terebinth). He may, however, use the term 'ēlāh in its broad signification of strong tree; see OAK. The tamarisk is a small tree, with durable wood, deciduous branches, and minute, scale-like, evergreen leaves. Nine species occur in Palestine. The most widely distributed is Tamarix pallasi, which attains a height of from 10 to 20 feet. The largest species is Tamarix articulata, from 15 to 30 feet. It is found along the w. border of the desert of the wandering. Tamarix mannifera, from 10 to 15 feet in height, growing in ancient Moab, Edom, and the peninsula of Sinai, yields the substance popularly known as manna; see MANNA.

Tam'muz (tām'üz). A deity of the Babylonians, called by them Dumu-zi; his full name in Sumerian was Dumu-zid-abzu (the faithful son of the Subterranean [fresh-water] Ocean), but he is also called in late Sumerian liturgies Sataran (lord of healing). The Tammuz literature was transmitted orally for many centuries before it was reduced to writing in Sumerian in the late 3d millennium. Tammuz was worshiped throughout Babylonia, and in Assyria, Phoenicia, and Palestine; and he gave name to the 4th month of the Semitic year; see YEAR. He was the husband of his sister, the goddess Ishtar, and king of the nether world. He was also god of the pasture, the patron of flocks and their keepers, and hence was himself entitled shepherd. He was represented as dying annually and returning to life with each recurring year. While Tammuz was in the underworld, all life on earth languished and died. Ishtar penetrated into the nether world and recovered him. The story is clearly a nature myth. However its details may be explained, it symbolizes more or less the alternation of summer heat and the spring inundation, the death and revival of vegetation. Ezekiel in vision saw the worship of Tammuz in favor among the Jews, and women sitting at the n. gate of the Temple weeping for the god (Ezek. 8:14). This is significant, since the cult of the Sumero-Akkadian Tammuz can scarcely have become popular in s. Palestine before the 7th century B.C. Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome identified him with the Phoenician Adonis. Jerome says that the Syrians celebrated an annual solemnity to Adonis in June, when he was lamented by the women as dead, and afterward his coming to life again was celebrated with songs. From other sources it appears that Byblos in Phoenicia was the headquarters of the Adonis worship. The annual feast in his honor was held at the neighboring temple of Aphrodite in Mount Lebanon, and lasted 7 days. It began with a commemoration of the disappearance of the god. Vessels filled with mold and containing stalks of wheat, barley, lettuce, and fennel, and called gardens of Adonis, were exposed to the heat of the sun. The withering of the plants symbolized the slaughter of the youth by a wild boar, which in later versions was said to have been sent by Ares (Mars). Then followed a search for Adonis by the women. At length his image was found in one of the gardens. The finding was celebrated by lewdness and song. The image was then confined, and the wound made by the boar which slew the young god was shown on his body. The people sat on the ground around the bier with their clothes rent, and the women raised loud lamentation. Sacrifice was offered for the dead god, and the image was buried.

Ta'nach (tā'nāk). See TAANACH.

Tan-hu'meth (tān-hū'mēth) [consolation]. A Netophathite (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

Tan'ner. A dresser of hides (Acts 9:43), who removes the hair by means of lime or other agent, steeps the skins in an infusion of bark, especially of oak bark, in order to impregnate them with the acid juice of the plant and render them firm, pliable, and durable, and thus converts the hide into leather. At Joppa Peter lodged with a tanner (Acts 10:5, 6). See LEATHER.

Ta'phath (tā'fāth) [a drop]. A daughter of Solomon, and wife of Abinadab's son (I Kings 4:11).

Ta'phon (tā'fōn). See TEPHON.

Tapp-ū'ah (tāp-pū'ā) [apple]. 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh 15:34), probably Beit-Nettif, formerly Beth-letepha, a corruption of Beth le-Taphua.

2. A town of Ephraim w. of Shechem and on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. 16:8; 17:7, 8), probably to be identified with Sheikh Abu Zarad, near the modern Jāsūf, about 8 miles s. of Shechem.

3. A son of Hebron (I Chron. 2:43).

Ta'rah (tā'rā). See TERAH.

Tar'a-lah (tār'ā-lā). A city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:27).

Tar'eva (tār'ē-ā). A descendant of King Saul through Jonathan (I Chron. 8:35; Tahrea, ch. 9:41).

Tares. The rendering of Gr. zizanon in Matt. 13:25-27, 29, 30; R.V. marg. darnel. The tare (Vicia sativa), a vetch, with pin-nate and purple-blue or red papilionaceous flowers, would be easily distinguished from the wheat. The Gr. word zizanon, which is probably of Semitic origin, corresponds to

Bearded Darnel

Arab. zuwān, which denotes Lolium, and to Talmudic zōm. The bearded darnel (Lolium temulentum) is a poisonous grass, almost indistinguishable from wheat while the 2 are only in blade, but which can be separated without difficulty when they come into ear (cf. vs. 29, 30).

Tar'get. See ARMOR.

Tar'gums (tär'gümz). See VERSIONS, I. 3.

Tar'pel-ites (tär'pēl-its). An unidentified people settled by the Assyrians in the cities of Samaria; the Tibareni of the coast of Pontus and Tripolis of n. Phoenicia have been conjectured. Some have supposed that the word is no ethnic name, but is the title of certain Persian officials in Samaria (Ezra 4:9).

Tar'shish (tär'shīsh), in A.V. 4 times Thar'shish (I Kings 10:22; 22:48; I Chron. 7:10) [Phoenician, from Akkad., smelting plant, refinery]. 1. A people descended from Javan (Gen. 10:4) and their country. Since Jonah (Jonah 1:3) entered a ship at Joppa in order to flee thither, the route to it was evidently across the waters of the Mediterranean. It was a distant land (Isa. 66:19). The imports from Tarshish were silver beaten into plates (Jer. 10:9), and iron, tin, and lead (Ezek. 27:12). It is believed that Tarshish was Tartessus, in s. Spain, near Gibraltar (Herod. iv. 152). The mineral wealth of the region attracted the Phoenicians, who established a colony there. Spain has long been noted for its mineral wealth.

Ships of Tarshish were originally ships trading to and from Tarshish, but ultimately ships of first-rate magnitude to whatever place their voyages may have been made (Ps. 48:7; Isa. 2:16; 23:1, 14; 60:9; Ezek. 27:25). Such vessels, built by Jehoshaphat to go to Ophir, lay in the harbor at Ezion-geber on the Red Sea (I Kings 22:48). The term Tarshish ship is paraphrased as "ship going to Tarshish" (II Chron. 9:21, Heb. text; cf. I Kings 10:22) and "ship to go to Tarshish" (II Chron. 20:36); on the other hand, it is possible that the term originally meant refinery ship, so called after similar ships which plied the Mediterranean, connecting the mines and refineries of Sardinia and later those of s. Spain with Phoenicia.

2. A Benjamite, son of Bilhan (I Chron. 7:10).

3. One of the 7 highest princes of Persia (Esth. 1:14).

Tar'sus (tär'sūs). The chief city of Cilicia, in the e. part of Asia Minor. It was situated on both banks of the river Cydnus, about 12 miles from the sea. About 833 B.C. it is mentioned by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. When the Romans formed the province of Cilicia in 64 B.C., they made Tarsus the residence of the governor. For its allegiance to Julius Caesar, Cassius ordered it to be plundered, but in compensation, Mark Antony granted it municipal freedom and exemption from taxation. It was famed for its schools, which almost rivaled those of Athens and Alexandria. It was the birthplace of the Apostle Paul (Acts 21:39; 22:3), and he revisited it at least once after his conversion (chs. 9:30; 11:25).

Tar'tak (tär'tāk). An idol set up by the Avvites in Samaria (II Kings 17:31).

Tar'tan (tär'tān). The title of the commander-in-chief of the Assyrian army (II Kings 18:17; Isa. 20:1). The name was pronounced by the Assyrians both tartānu and turtānu.

Tar'tenai (tät'ē-nī), in A.V. Tat'nai (tät'-nī). A Persian governor w. of the river Euphrates, who opposed the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezra 5:3; 6:6; in I Esdras 6:3; etc., Sisinnus).

Tau (tō, tou), in A.R.V. Tav (tō, tou). [Heb. tāw]. The 22d and last letter of the Heb. alphabet, pronounced t; or th, when followed by a vowel. English T comes from the same source, and with th represents it in Anglicized Hebrew names; as Tamar, Nathan. It heads the 22d section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Tax'es. Under the Judges the regular payments obligatory on the Israelites were for the worship of Jehovah. There was as yet no army and no royal court to support. But there was a tabernacle and a priesthood, and these were maintained by the tithes and other offerings, and by the land which was permanently placed at the disposal of the Levites.

After the establishment of the kingdom, revenue for its support was obtained from various sources: 1. Taxes in kind were levied by Solomon on the produce of the field and the flock (I Kings 4:7-28; cf. Amos 7:1). 2. Tribute was rendered by subject peoples (II Sam. 8:6, 14; I Kings 10:15; II Kings 3:4), and service was exacted of the Canaanites who dwelt in the midst of Israel (Judg. 1:28, 30; I Kings 9:20, 21). When the Hebrews were subject to a foreign prince, they had to pay tribute to him in addition to taxes for the support of their own government. 3. Duties were paid by tradesmen and merchants (I Kings 10:15). Without levying taxes in money or produce, and with little expense to himself, David attained the object of a standing army by dividing the men of military age into brigades of 24,000 men, and requiring each brigade in turn to hold itself in readiness during 1 month for instant service (I Chron. 27:1). Under Solomon the people were oppressed by taxation, and this grievous burden was an immediate cause of the disruption of the kingdom (I Kings 12:4).

Under the Persian empire, by decree of Darius Hystaspis the satraps of each province paid a fixed sum into the royal treasury (Herod. iii. 89). The inhabitants had to provide for the maintenance of the governor's household also. This provision was called the bread of the governor, and so far as Judah was concerned included food and 40 shekels daily in money (Neh. 5:14, 15). The revenue was derived from tribute, customs, and toll (Ezra 4:13). Priests, Levites, and Nethinim were exempted from these taxes in Judah (Ezra 7:24); but the burdens pressed heavily on the great body of the people, who had the sanctuary likewise to support, and many were forced to mortgage their fields and vineyards to raise money for the tribute (Neh. 5:4; 9:37).

Under the Ptolemies and the Seleucidae, instead of a fixed amount being levied by the crown on the people, the privilege of collecting the taxes of a district was put up at auction and sold to the highest responsible bidder. The party who promised the most revenue from a province was authorized to collect it and was furnished with military power sufficient to enable him to enforce his demands (Jos. Antiq. xii. 4, 1-5). The Syrian kings imposed a poll tax and a duty on salt, exacted a sum of money in lieu of the annual present of a crown of gold, which it had become customary to demand, took  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the grain and  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the fruit, and in addition levied on the tithes and tolls paid into the Temple at Jerusalem (I Macc. 10:29-31; 11:34, 35; 13:37, 39; Jos. Antiq. xii. 3, 3).

When the Romans under Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 B.C., tribute was imposed on the Jews which in a short time amounted to more than 10,000 talents (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 4 and 5). Julius Caesar decreed that the tribute should not be farmed, that it should not be levied in a Sabbatic year, and that in the year following a Sabbatic year only  $\frac{1}{4}$  the usual amount should be collected (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 10, 5 and 6); Herod the Great taxed the produce of the field (xv. 9, 1), and levied duties on commodities bought and sold (xvii. 8, 4). When Judea was placed under procurators, the financial system of the empire was introduced. The revenues were farmed; see PUBLICAN. There were levied: 1. Tribute of the soil, paid either in kind or in money. 2. A poll tax (Matt. 22:17) and, under the same name, a tax on personal property. 3. Export and import duties, collected at seaports and at the gates of cities. In Jerusalem a house duty was paid by the inhabitants (Jos. Antiq. xix. 6, 3).

After the Exile a Temple tax of half a shekel was imposed on every Israelite who had reached the age of 20 years (Matt. 17:24). The collectors visited each town of Judea annually at a fixed time, and in foreign countries places were designated where it might be paid. See TRIBUTE 2.

Tax'ing. An enrollment, ordered by the Roman emperor Augustus, which in the providence of God brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, and led to the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy that the Messiah should be born in that town (Micah 5:2; Matt. 2:5, 6; Luke 2:1-20). A later enrollment led to tumults among the Jews (Acts 5:37). See QUIRINIUS.

Te'bah (tē'bā) [slaughter]. A son of Nahor by Reumah, his concubine (Gen. 22:24), and the tribe descended from him. The name is found in II Sam. 8:8, in the Peshitta as Te'bah, and the Lucianic reading Matebak suggests the same name; in I Chron. 18:8 in the form Tibhath, it denotes a town of Aram-zobah.

Te'ba-li'ah (tē'bā-lī'ā) [Jehovah has immersed, i.e., ceremonially purified]. A Merarite Levite, the 3d son of Hosah (I Chron. 26:11).

Te'beth (tē'bēth) [Akkad. tebētu, month of sinking in, muddy month]. The 10th month of the Semitic calendar (Esth. 2:16). See YEAR.

Te'haph'ne-hes (tē-hāf'nē-hēz). See TAHPANHEES.

Te-hin'nah (tē-hīn'ā) [grace, supplication]. A man of Judah, descended from Chelub, and ancestor of the inhabitants of Ir-nahash (I Chron. 4:12).

Teil Tree. The linden, a tree of the genus Tilia. The Heb. word ēlāh is once translated thus in A.V. (Isa. 6:13; in R.V. terebinth); see OAK 1 and TEREBINTH. The teil tree does not grow in Palestine.

Te'kel (tē'kāl) [Aram. tekal = Heb. shākal, to weigh; cf. Aram. tekel = Heb. shekel, shekel]. See MENE.

Te-ko'a (tē-kō'ā), in A.V. thrice Te-ko'ah (tē-kō'ā) (II Sam. 14:2, 4, 9), and so in R.V. of I Macc. 9:33, where A.V. has The-co'e. A town in Judah (I Chron. 2:24; 4:5; LXX, Josh. 15:60), in the wilderness toward Engedi (II Chron. 20:20). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:6). It was the home of the Prophet Amos (Amos 1:1). In Nehemiah's time the common people of Tekoa helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, while the nobles of the place showed indifference to the work (Neh. 3:5, 27). The name still lingers as Takū'a, a ruined village 6 miles s. of Bethlehem. It is on a hill broad at the top, where are found the remains of the foundations of houses, often with beveled stones, the whole occupying an area of 4 or 5 acres.

Te-ko'ite (tē-kō'īt). A native or inhabitant of Tekoa (II Sam. 23:26).

Te'l-a'bib (tē'lā'bīb) [heap, or hill of ears of grain]. A place in Babylonia, near the river Chebar. Jewish exiles were located there (Ezek. 3:15).

Te'lah (tē'lā) [fracture]. A descendant of Ephraim, probably through Beriah (I Chron. 7:25).

Te-la'im (tē-lā'im) [little lambs]. A place where Saul assembled his army to fight against the Amalekites (I Sam. 15:4; cf. ch. 27:8, in some MSS. of the LXX). It may be Telem of Josh. 15:24; but the 2 names as traditionally pronounced have a different meaning.

Te-las'sar (tē-lās'ēr), in A.V. once The-la'sar (II Kings 19:12) [probably, hill of As-shur]. A place inhabited by the children of Eden (II Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12); it may have been one of the cities of Bit-Adini, a small kingdom on the upper Euphrates.

Te'lem (tē'lēm). 1. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:24). See TELAIM.

2. A porter, whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

Tel'-har'sha (têl'hâr'shâ), in A.V. Tel'-har'sa (têl'hâr'sâ) and Tel'-har'e'sha (têl'hâr'e'shâ) [mound of the artificer's work, of silence, or of enchantment, incantation]. A place in Babylonia whence certain people who claimed to be Israelite exiles returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

Tel' el-A-mar'na (têl' êl-â-mâr'nâ). Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton), who was Pharaoh from c. 1387 to c. 1366 B.C., built a new capital, which he named Akhetaton. It was situated on the east bank of the Nile River, about 160 miles above the Delta and nearly 300 below Thebes; the modern name is Tell el-Amarna. Here were found in the year 1887 more than 350 clay tablets. They were written in Akkadian, the international language of the 15th and 14th centuries B.C., and proved to be the correspondence of the vassal princes and governors in Syria and Palestine with their overlords, Amenhotep III and IV. Nearly all of them were written in Syria and Palestine, and accordingly they are of first-hand value for the light they shed on conditions in Palestine of that period. Whether they reflect the conditions of about the time of the conquest by Joshua or of about a century and a half before the Israelite conquest of Palestine depends upon the date of the Exodus. See EGYPT, III. 8.

Tel'-me'lah (têl'mê'lâ) [hill of salt]. A place in Babylonia, whence certain people who claimed to be Israelite exiles came to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

Te'ma (tê'mâ). A tribe of Ishmaelites and the district they inhabited (Gen. 25:15; Isa. 21:14). Their caravans were well known (Job 6:19). Tema denotes Taima (Taymâ) in Arabia, midway between Damascus and Mecca and equidistant from Babylonia and Egypt.

Te'mah (tê'mâ), in A.V. Ta'mah and Tha'mah. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the Captivity (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55).

Te'man (tê'mân) [on the right hand, southern]. A tribe descended from Esau and the district it inhabited (Gen. 36:11, 15, 34). The territory was in Edom (Jer. 49:20; Amos 1:12), apparently in the n. part (Ezek. 25:13). Its inhabitants were noted for their wisdom (Jer. 49:7).

Te'man·ite (tê'mân-î), in A.V. once Tem'a·ni (tê'mâ-nî). A member of the tribe of Teman (Gen. 36:34), or of Tema. It is not certain in which sense Eliphaz, Job's friend, was a Temanite (Job 2:11).

Te'm·eni (tê'mê-nî). A son of Ashhur (I Chron. 4:5, 6).

Tem'ple. A building dedicated to the worship of a deity (Joel 3:5; cf. Ezra 5:14 with ch. 1:7; Acts 19:27). In 3 passages it is applied to the tabernacle (I Sam. 1:9; 3:3; II Sam. 22:7; cf. Rev. 15:5); but generally the reference is to some one of the temples successively erected to Jehovah at Jerusalem.

1. Solomon's Temple. The erection of a permanent house of the Lord, instead of the movable tabernacle, was proposed by David, and the necessary materials were largely amassed by him (II Sam., ch. 7; I Kings 5:3-5; 8:17; I Chron., chs. 22; 28:11 to 29:9). He gathered 100,000 talents of gold and 1,000,000 talents of silver for the prospective structure and its furnishings (I Chron. 22:14), and added from his own private fortune 3,000 talents of gold and 7,000 talents of silver, and the princes contributed 5,000 talents of gold, 10,000 darics of gold, and 10,000 talents of silver (ch. 29:4, 7), making a total of 108,000 talents of gold, 10,000 darics of gold, and 1,017,000 talents of silver. It should also be borne in mind that the purchasing power of money was greater in those times than now. This large amount is perhaps not incredible, in view of the booty which David brought home from his wars and received as tribute. Still the sum is very large, and it is well to admit the probability of the text's being corrupt. This store of precious metals was placed at the disposal of Solomon for the use of the Temple, but it was not all expended (I Kings 7:51; II Chron. 5:1).

Solomon began the work in the 4th year of his reign, and it was completed in 7 years and 6 months (I Kings 6:1, 38). The alliance with Hiram, king of Tyre, rendered it easy to obtain timber from Lebanon, and skilled Phœnician artificers. 30,000 Israelites were levied and sent in detachments of 10,000 for a month to the Lebanon Mountains (I Kings 5:13, 14), and the remnant of the Canaanites was impressed to the number of 150,000 to serve as hewers of stone and carriers (I Kings 5:15; 9:20, 21; II Chron. 2:2, 17, 18). Overseers were appointed, apparently 550 chiefs and 3,300 subordinates (I Kings 5:16; 9:23), of whom 3,600 were Canaanites and 250 Israelites (II Chron. 2:18; 8:10). The building was erected on Mount Moriah, at the spot where the threshing floor of Ornan, or Araunah, the Jebusite, had stood (II Chron. 3:1). Its general plan was that of the tabernacle, but the dimensions were double and the ornamentation was richer. The interior of the edifice measured 60 cubits in length, 20 in breadth, and 30 in height, in this last particular deviating from the proportions of the tabernacle (I Kings 6:2). The walls were built of stone made ready at the quarry (v. 7). The roof was constructed of beams and planks of cedar (v. 9), the floor was laid with fir (cypress), and the walls from the floor to the ceiling were lined with cedar (v. 15). The whole interior was overlaid with gold (I Kings 6:20, 22, 30; II Chron. 3:7 et passim), and its walls were carved not only with cherubim, but also with palm trees and flowers.

The Holy of Holies was a cube. Each side measured 20 cubits (I Kings 6:16, 20). The space, nearly 10 cubits high, between its ceiling and the roof was probably occupied by upper chambers, gold-lined (I Chron. 28:11; II Chron. 3:9). In the Holy of Holies itself was placed the Ark (I Kings 8:6), under the wings of 2 colossal cherubim of olive wood overlaid with gold. Each cherub was 10 cubits in height, and had wings 5 cubits long. With the tip of 1 wing it touched a side wall, and with the other wing it reached forward to the center of the room and touched the corresponding wing of its companion. The 4 wings thus extended across the width of the house, while the cherubim turned their faces toward the sanctuary (I Kings 6:23-28; II Chron. 3:13). Under their wings the Ark was placed (I Kings 8:6). The partition between the Holy and the Most Holy Place was of cedar boards, overlaid on both sides with gold, and it had 2 doors of olive wood, decorated with palm trees, flowers, and cherubim, and overlaid with gold; see LEAR 2. There were hung, toward the sanctuary, chains of gold and a curtain patterned after that of the tabernacle (I Kings 6:16, 21, 31, 32; II Chron. 3:14; cf. Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 3 and 7).

The Holy Place or sanctuary was 40 cubits long, 20 wide, and 30 high. Its walls were pierced by latticed windows, probably near the roof, for ventilation and the escape of smoke (I Kings 6:4). The altar of incense was made of cedar, instead of acacia, and overlaid with gold (chs. 6:20, 22; 7:48). It belonged to the Holy of Holies (I Kings 6: 22, R.V.; Heb. 9:3, 4), but stood in the Holy Place, doubtless because the priest, who might enter the Holy of Holies but once in the year, had occasion to offer incense daily. There were 10 golden candlesticks instead of 1, and likewise 10 tables, although doubtless the showbread was displayed on but 1; see CANDLESTICK and SHOWBREAD. The entrance to the sanctuary from the court had doors of fir wood (I Kings 6:33, 34).

Against the 2 exterior sides and the rear of the Temple a 3-story building was erected, containing chambers for officials and for storage (I Kings 6:5-10). Before the front entrance a portico was built, 10 cubits wide, 20 long, and 120 or, more probably, 20 high (I Kings 6:3; II Chron. 3:4; cf. LXX; Syriac). By it stood the 2 brazen pillars, Boaz and Jachin, each 18 cubits high and richly ornamented (I Kings 7:15-22; II Chron. 3:15-17).

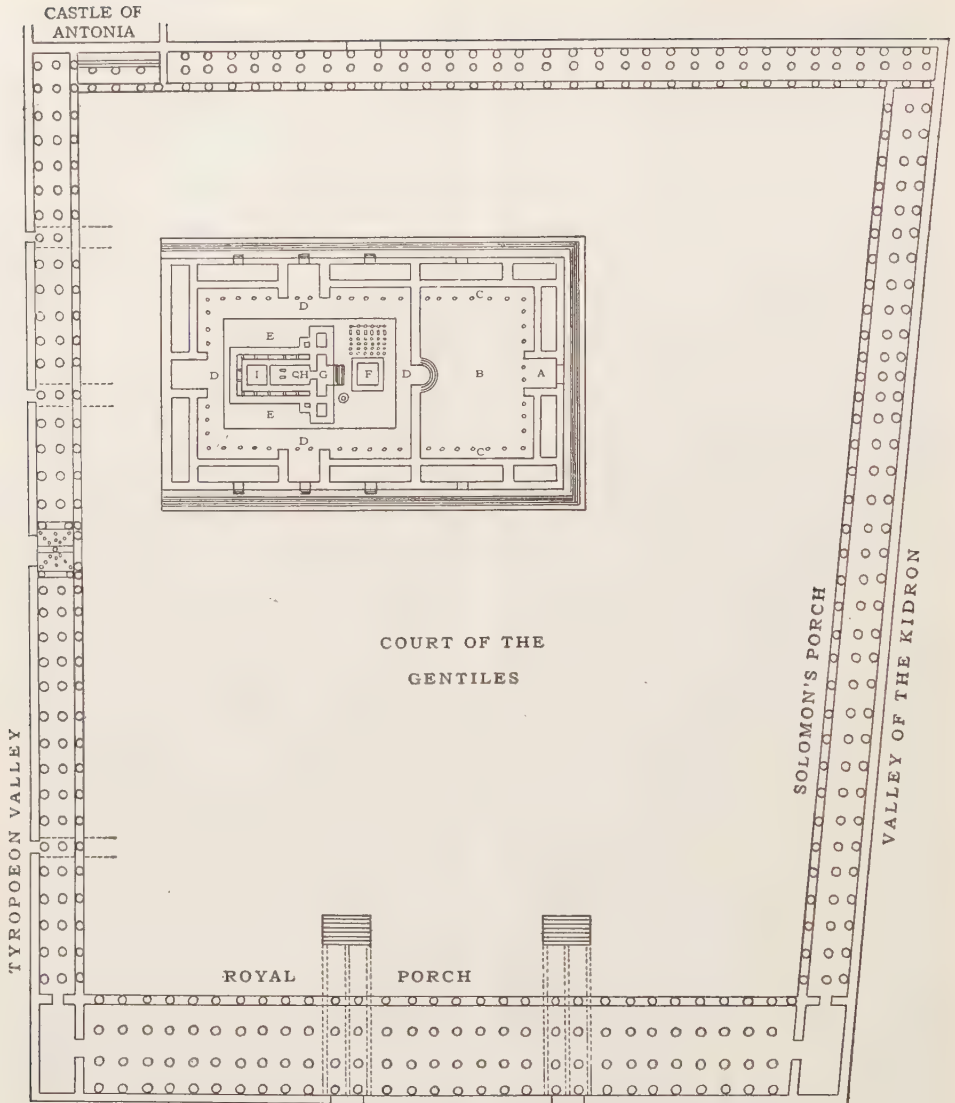

The courts of the Temple were 2: the inner, upper Court of the Priests, and the Great Court (II Kings 23:12; II Chron. 4:9; Jer. 36:10). They were separated from one another, both by the difference of level and by a low wall, consisting of 3 courses of hewn stone and 1 course of cedar beams (I Kings 6:36; 7:12). In the Court of the Priests were a brazen altar for sacrifice (I Kings 8:64; II Kings 16:14; II Chron. 15:8), in size nearly 4 times that used at the tabernacle (II Chron. 4:1), and a brazen sea and 10 brazen lavers (I Kings 7:23-39). The sea contained water for the priests to wash themselves; the lavers were for washing such things as belonged to the burnt offering (II Chron. 4:6); see ALTAR, MOLTEN SEA, LAVER. The Great outer Court was for Israel (cf. I Kings 8:14). It was paved (II Chron. 7:3); and it was surrounded by a wall, for it had gates (II Chron. 4:9; cf. Ezek. 40:5).

This Temple was plundered and burned by the Babylonians when they captured Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (II Kings 25:8-17).

2. Zerubbabel's Temple. Cyrus authorized the erection of a temple 60 cubits in breadth and height (Ezra 6:3; Jos. Antiq. xi. 4, 6; cf. xv. 11, 1). It was begun in the 2d year after the return from captivity; and, after much opposition from the inhabitants of Samaria, it was renewed the 2d year of Darius (520) and completed in the 6th year of Darius, 515 B.C. (Ezra 3:8; 6:15). The dimensions of the several parts are not known. The plan of Solomon's Temple was, however, followed; though the new building was projected on a scale of far less magnificence. In the construction of the house, cedar from Lebanon was used (Ezra 3:7); and precious metals which were provided, as in the wilderness, by the freewill offerings of the people (chs. 1:6; 2:68, 69). Many of the vessels used in the former Temple were restored (ch. 1:7-11). The interior walls were overlaid with gold; and the house was divided, as usual, into the Holy of Holies and the sanctuary, apparently separated from each other by at least a veil (I Macc. 1:21, 22; 4:48, 51). The Holy of Holies was empty, for the Ark of the Covenant had disappeared (Tacitus Hist. v. 9; cf. Cicero Pro Flac. 28). The sanctuary was furnished with an altar of incense, and, like the tabernacle, with only 1 candlestick and 1 table for showbread (I Macc. 1:21, 22; 4:49). Exterior chambers were attached to the building (Neh. 10:37-39; 12:44; 13:4; I Macc. 4:38); and the whole was surrounded with courts (Neh. 8:16; 13:7; Jos. Antiq. xiv. 16, 2). A brazen sea (Ecclus. 50:3) and an altar for sacrifice were used (Ezra 7:17). The altar was built of stones (I Macc. 4:44-47). The Court of the Priests was eventually separated from the Outer Court by a wooden railing (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 13, 5). The Temple and its precincts were closed by doors and gates (Neh. 6:10; I Macc. 4:38).

3. Herod's Temple superseded Zerubbabel's. It is fully described by Josephus, who was thoroughly familiar with the building (Jos. Antiq. xv. 11; War v. 5), and in the Mishnah (Middoth). The materials were brought together before the old structure was taken down. Work was commenced in the 18th year of Herod's reign, 20-19 B.C. The main edifice was built by priests in a year and a half, and the cloisters were finished in 8 years; but the work on the entire complex of courts and buildings was not completed until the procuratorship of Albinus, A.D. 62-64 (Jos. Antiq. xv. 15, 5 and 6; xx. 9, 7; cf. John 2:20). The old area was enlarged to twice its former dimensions (Jos. War i. 21, 1). The Temple proper stood upon the highest ground in the inclosure. It was built of great blocks of white stone. Its interior had the length and breadth of Solomon's Temple; but a height of 40 cubits, exclusive of an upper chamber, instead of 30 cubits. It was divided into the Holy of Holies and the sanctuary on the customary lines. The Holy of Holies was empty. It was separated from the Holy Place by a veil (Jos. War v. 5, 5). The rending of this veil by an earthquake at the death of Christ signified that the way to the mercy seat is no longer closed to all save the mediating high priest, but is at all times open to the sincere worshipper (Matt. 27:51; Heb. 6:19; 10:20). The Holy Place contained, as usual, a golden altar for incense, a table for showbread, and a candlestick. It was entered from the e. by a great doorway closed by golden doors, each 55 cubits high and 16 broad; hung with a veil of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen; and encompassed on the outer or court side by a golden vine from which depended immense clusters of golden grapes. Against the 2 sides and rear of the Temple, a 3-story building, 40 cubits high, containing chambers, was constructed (cf. Jos. War vi. 4, 7), and in addition 2 wings, 1 containing winding stairs, sprang from the front corners. The building measured externally 100 cubits in length and 54 or, including the 2 wings at the front, 70 cubits in width. Over the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies was an attic, which had the same dimensions as the sacred apartments beneath. This attic, together with its floor and the roof, increased the height of the sacred edifice to over 90 cubits. A vestibule or porch ran along the entire front of the house, 100 cubits long and high and 20 broad. Its portal was 70 cubits high by 25 broad (or, according to the Mishnah, 40 and 20), without doors, allowing the great doorway of the sanctuary to be seen from without. Above this porch, over the great gate of the Temple, Herod erected the celebrated golden eagle (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 2 and 3; War i. 33, 2 and 3). Twelve steps descended from the vestibule to the Court of the Priests. This court surrounded the sacred edifice. It contained the altar for burnt offerings, of which the height was 15 cubits, and the base a square measuring 50 cubits to the side. According to the Mishnah, it was built of unhewn stones; and contracted from a base 32 cubits square to a top 24 cubits square. It was reached by an inclined plane. A brazen sea or laver was also in use (Mishnah). This court was encompassed by a wall or coping about a cubit in height. All around the Court of the Priests lay, as of old, the Great Court, now double. It was inclosed by a wall, whose top was 25 cubits higher than the pavement. Against the inner side of this wall storage chambers were built (Jos. War vi. 5, 2), and in front of these, that is, on the Temple side, ran a covered colonnade. This court was divided into 2 parts by a wall. The w. portion, that encompassing the Court of the Priests, was the Court of Israel. Only the men of Israel were allowed within it. The Court of the Women was the e. and lower portion. It was reached from the Court of Israel through a great gate in the center of the partition wall and by a descent of 15 steps. Only Israelites might enter this court, and women might not advance farther. These 3 courts and the Temple were embraced in the sacred inclosure. The inclosing barrier was triple: the wall of the Courts of Israel and the Women, which has been already mentioned, and which was very thick, like the walls of a fortress (cf. Jos. War vi. 4, 1); a terrace, of which the top was level and 10 cubits broad; and at the foot of the terrace a wall 3 cubits in height, surmounted by pillars, on which were inscriptions forbidding all persons save those of the commonwealth of Israel from entering the inclosure. "Let no foreigner," so ran the Greek inscription, "enter inside of the barrier and the fence around the sanctuary. Whosoever is caught will be the cause of death following as a penalty (upon himself)." This triple wall of partition (Eph. 2:14) was pierced by 9 gates. These tower-like structures were sheathed with gold and silver. Four were on the n., and 4 on the s. side. Of these, 1 on each side led into the Court of the Women and 3 into that of Israel. The 9th was the great e. gate, the only one on that side, probably the gate Beautiful (Acts 3:2, 10). The difference of level between the vestibule of the Temple within the inclosure and the Court of the Gentiles without appears to have been about 15 cubits. From the vestibule to the Court of the Priests were 12 steps; from the Court of Israel to that of the Women 15; thence to the terrace 5; and thence to the Court of the Gentiles 14. This Court of the Gentiles occupied the remainder of the Temple yard and completely surrounded the sacred inclosure. It was foursquare (Jos. War vi. 5, known by the name of Huldah. In the e. wall was the Shushan gate. One is mentioned in the n. wall (Jos. War vi. 4, 1).

During the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, the Jews themselves, who were using the Temple yard as a fortress, set fire to the outer cloisters; but the Temple itself was fired by a Roman soldier contrary to the orders of Titus, and all that was combustible was destroyed (Jos. War vi. 3, 1; 4, 5; cf. 5, 1; 9, 2). Afterward the conquerors threw down the walls (Jos. War vii. 1, 1). On its site the emperor Hadrian dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in A.D. 136 or earlier. In A.D. 363 the emperor Julian, in order to defeat the prophecy of Christ (Matt. 24:1, 2), undertook to rebuild the Temple; but his plans were frustrated by flames which burst from the foundation. In A.D. 691 'Abd-al-Malik built on the site of the Temple of Solo-

Warning Tablet of Herod's Temple

4), and measured fully 6 stades, or  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile, in circuit (Jos. War v. 5, 2). It was paved throughout. At the n.w. corner stood the castle of Antonia. Except perhaps at that point, it was bordered on all sides by magnificent, covered colonnades or cloisters (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 10, 2; cf. War vi. 3, 2). Those on the s. were the finest. They contained 162 columns, arranged in 4 rows, forming 3 aisles. Each column was a monolith of white stone, 25 cubits high. The roof was ceiled with cedar, curiously carved and carefully polished. The other colonnades consisted of 2 rows of columns. That along the e. side of the court was regarded as a remnant of the 1st Temple, and was called Solomon's Porch (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; Jos. Antiq. xx. 9, 7; War v. 5, 1). It was this court which was so far abused that money changers were allowed to set up their tables and traders were permitted to expose cattle for sale there (Matt. 21:12; John 2:14). Finally the sacred area was surrounded by massive walls. The w. wall was pierced by 4 gates; the 2 more n. ones led to the suburbs; the 3d led to a way that crossed the Tyropoeon Valley at a point now marked by Wilson's Arch; and the 4th, still farther s., opened into the valley and was reached by steps from the Temple yard (Jos. Antiq. xv. 11, 5). In the s. wall were 2 gates, mon the Dome of the Rock, wrongly called the "Mosque of Omar."

Ten Commandments. The fundamental laws of the Hebrew state; see THEOCRACY. The Hebrews called them the 10 words (R.V. marg. of Ex. 34:28; Deut. 4:13; 10:4). They were spoken by God at Sinai, and written on 2 tables of stone (Ex. 31:18). The engraving was on both front and back surfaces (ch. 32:15). The laws appear in 2 forms: the original form, contained in Ex. 20:1-17, and the free citation of the words in Deut. 5:6-21. The principal difference is that the law of the Sabbath is enforced, in the original Law, by reference to God's resting on the 7th day from the work of creation; whereas when Moses cites the Law in his public address, he omits this fundamental basis of the command and urges the deliverance from Egypt as the reason why Israel should remember the day. Another difference, and one upon which undue stress has been laid, is that when Moses repeats the Tenth Commandment, he uses the word covet in 1 clause only and employs "desire" instead of "covet" in reference to a neighbor's house, field, etc. (R.V.). These differences are not contradictions, and they are fully explained by the character of Deuteronomy. See DEUTERONOMY, SABBATH.

The Ten Commandments are not individually numbered in the Bible. Later Jews regarded the words "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (Ex. 20:2) as the First Commandment. These words, however, are not in the form of a command. They constitute the preface to the 10 laws which follow. Omitting the preface, there are 2 methods of enumeration: 1. According to the received teaching of the Roman Catholic and Lutheran Churches, based on Augustine, the 1st table contains 3 commandments and the 2d table 7. Augustine adopted this classification because it exhibits the symbolical numbers 3, 7, 10, and represents a real difference in the nature of the commands, the first 3 being duties toward God and the last 7, duties toward man. The 1st division included the command to remember the Sabbath; and to make out 3 commands in this table, Augustine joined into 1 the commands to have no other gods and to make no graven image; and to secure 7 in the 2d table he divided the command against covetousness into 2 laws. He followed the text of Deuteronomy, and made the command not to covet a neighbor's wife the Ninth Commandment, and that against desiring a neighbor's property the Tenth. The Lutheran Church follows the text of Exodus, and makes the command not to covet a neighbor's house the Ninth, and that against coveting a neighbor's wife, manservant, etc., the Tenth. The great objections to this method of enumeration are that it makes no distinction between polytheism and idolatry, and introduces an arbitrary distinction regarding kinds of covetousness. 2. The division which numbers the command against polytheism as the First, that against idolatry as the Second, and that against covetousness as the Tenth. This division is the oldest that is known. It was recognized by Josephus (Antiq. iii. 5, 5), by Philo (Decalogue), and by Origen; and it was adopted by the Reformed Churches at the Reformation. But there are 2 methods of distributing the 10 between the 2 tables: 1. They are ordinarily grouped as 4 relating to man's duty toward God and 6 to his duty to his fellows. This division is simple enough, and it is ethically correct; but it lacks symmetry. 2. Five are assigned to each table (Jos. Antiq. iii. 5, 8). This arrangement preserves the grouping of laws into decads, subdivided into pentads, which characterizes much of the legislation. And from the Jewish point of view, doubtless, the division is ethically correct; for the 1st table includes duties of piety, which imply no corresponding rights, and the 2d table embraces duties of justice, which involve rights. The duty of honoring parents, to the extent of maintaining them if need be, was regarded as absolute and unconditional (Mark 7:10-13). It was a pious duty, a religious duty, and properly belonged to the 1st table. Paul is sometimes cited as lending countenance to this division; for when summing up the duties which are comprehended in the command to love one's neighbor as one's self, he enumerates the last commandments, and makes no mention of honoring parents (Rom. 13:9). But Paul's enumeration is not intended to be complete. He omits the Ninth Commandment. Jesus placed the Fifth Commandment in the same group with the last 5 (Mark 10:19).

Tent. 1. A movable habitation; such as is used by nomads, shepherds, and soldiers (Gen. 4:20; 25:27; Judg. 8:11). The tent was frequently made of black cloth woven from goats' hair (S. of Sol. 1:5), fastened with cords and stakes (Ex. 35:18; Isa. 54:2). There were both round and tapering tents; and flat, oblong tents.

2. A habitation generally (Gen. 9:27; I Kings 8:66; II Kings 13:5; Job 8:22, R.V.; Ps. 84:10; Jer. 30:18; Lam. 2:4, R.V.; Zech. 12:7; Mal. 2:12, R.V.).

Tent of the Cong're-ga'tion. See following article.

Tent of Meet'ing, in A.V. Tent or Tab'er-na-cle of the Cong're-ga'tion [tent where Jehovah meets his people]. 1. A provisional tent where Jehovah met with his people (Ex. 33:7-11; cf. ch. 34:34, 35). After the golden calf was made, Jehovah refused to acknowledge Israel any longer as his people and to dwell in their midst. He was estranged and distant. Because of this fact and to symbolize it, Moses used to pitch the tent outside the camp (ch. 33:7, R.V.), probably until God again promised to go in the midst of Israel (ch. 34:9). What tent this was is uncertain. But a tent unquestionably formed the headquarters of the camp. It was the place of judicial proceedings, where Moses sat to judge the people (Ex. 18:13). And it was the high tribunal after the administration of justice had been organized (vs. 21-26). Probably it was for the time being the depository of the Book of the Covenant (chs. 20 to 23), which was at once a sacred volume of the statutes of God (ch. 18:16) and the book containing the civil laws for the government of Israel. Moses called this tent the tent of meeting: (1) because it was the tribunal of justice, whither everyone went who sought the Lord (ch. 33:7); for the matter in dispute or doubt was laid before God or, to use their phrase, the party sought Jehovah's face (II Sam. 21:1, R.V.), inquired of God (Ex. 18:15), brought the cause to God (Ex. 18:19; Num. 27:5), came unto God or came before him (Ex. 21:6; 22:9, R.V.), stood before Jehovah (Deut. 19:17); and (2) because it was a place of revelation: there Jehovah met his people in their representative, when the pillar of cloud descended to the door of the tent (Ex. 33:9). It may have borne its appropriate name from the first; if not, Moses borrowed the name from the instructions which he received regarding the permanent tabernacle, since it represented the same truth (Ex. 27:21). An altar may have stood near it (ch. 18:12), but the tent was not a national sanctuary, did not contain an ark or appointments for worship, and did not possess a priesthood. This tent was cared for by Joshua (Ex. 33:11); the tabernacle by Aaron (Deut. 10:6). The cloud descended upon this tent when Moses entered it to inquire of God; but the cloud abode on the permanent tabernacle and the glory of the Lord filled it, and Moses could not enter it (Ex. 40:34, 35, 38).

2. The tabernacle (q.v.).

Tent of the Tes'ti-mo'ny (Num. 9:15). See TABERNACLE 2.

Te'phon (tē'fōn), in A.V. Ta'phon. A town of Judea fortified by Bacchides (I Macc. 9:50). Tephon is perhaps a modification of Tap-puah, a name which was borne by several towns.

Te'rah (tē'rā), in A.V. twice Ta'rah (Num. 33:27, 28) once Tha'ra (Luke 3:34) [cf. Akkad. turāhu, ibex]. 1. The son of Nahor, and the father of Abraham, another Nahor, and Haran. He was a resident at Ur of the Chaldees during the greater part of his life; serving other divinities than Jehovah (Josh. 24:2), probably among the rest the moon-god, who had a celebrated temple at Ur. With Abraham and Lot, he removed to Haran, where he died at the age of 205 (Gen. 11:25-32).

2. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 33:27, 28).

Ter'aphim. Images of household gods, which varied in size from such as were small enough to be easily carried in hasty flight and concealed in the saddle of a camel (Gen. 31: 19, 30, 34, R.V.) to one apparently large enough to represent a man (I Sam. 19:13, R.V.). Archaeology, however, has discovered no large teraphim. They were probably regarded as bringers of good luck. They were consulted with respect to the advisability of proposed actions (Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2, both R.V.). The word, like the usual word for God, is pl. in form, but may be sing. in signification (I Sam. 19:13). Teraphim were employed in Babylonia. Laban used them in Haran, and his daughter Rachel stole them and carried them with her to Canaan (Gen. 31:19, 34). This was done without Jacob's knowledge (v. 32); according to Hurrian law the possession of the teraphim ensured title to her father's property for her husband. When Jacob reached Shechem, he demanded the surrender of all the strange gods which members of his company had brought with them, and he removed them from his people (ch. 35:2-4). In the days of the Judges Micah of Mount Ephraim had a private sanctuary with priest, ephod, and teraphim and a molten image and a graven image (Judg. 17:4, 5; 18: 14). Through them probably the Lord was consulted (vs. 5, 6). All these idols were carried off by a band of Danites (vs. 17-20). Samuel the prophet classed teraphim with witchcraft and rebellion (I Sam. 15:23, R.V.); nevertheless, there was one in David's house, doubtless belonging to his wife (ch. 19:13, R.V.). Teraphim figured largely in the corrupt religion of the northern Israelites (Hos. 3:4). The teraphim were condemned with other idols as abominations, and were destroyed by Josiah in his work of reformation (II Kings 23:24, R.V.); but they still found favor with a part of the people after the Exile (Zech. 10:2).

Ter'e·binth. The rendering of Heb. 'ēlāh, a robust tree, in the R.V. marg. with oak in the text. Twice, when it is associated with 'allōn, which is rendered "oak," it appears in the text of the R.V. (Isa. 6:13; Hos. 4:13). See TEIL TREE. 'ēlāh is probably the terebinth. The terebinth or turpentine tree (Pistacia terebinthus) is a small tree with pinnate leaves, inconspicuous flowers, with the sexes separated, and little roundish dark-purple fruit; it reaches the height of 15 to 17, rarely 20, feet. It is a native of s. Europe, n. Africa, and w. Asia, including Palestine. The turpentine is obtained by making incisions in the trunk. It merges into Pistacia palaestina, which is also found in Palestine, and is but a variety of the species.

Te'resh (tê'rêsh) [cf. Avestan tarshav, dry, firm]. A chamberlain who kept a door in the palace of King Ahasuerus, and plotted the murder of his master and king, a crime for which he and an accomplice were executed (Esth. 2:21-23; 6:2).

Ter'ti·us (tûr'shî-ûs) [Lat., third]. Paul's amanuensis, who wrote for him the Epistle to the Romans (Rom. 16:22).

Ter·tul·lus (têr-tûl'ûs) [Lat., diminutive of Tertius]. A Roman advocate, employed by the Jewish authorities to prosecute Paul before the tribunal of Felix, the Roman procurator. His rhetorical address is thoroughly in the style affected by Roman advocates of the time (Acts 24:1-8).

Test'a·ment. The rendering of Gr. diathêkê, a will, a covenant. In Heb. 9:16, 17 diathêkê is clearly a will. But in chs. 8:16-10, 13; 9:1, 4 the meaning is evidently covenant, and the term is so translated in the text. The Old Covenant and the New Covenant would be more accurate designations of the 2 parts of the Bible than the Old Testament and the New Testament. See NEW TESTAMENT, OLD TESTAMENT.

Teth (tāth). The 9th letter of the Heb. alphabet. Greek theta comes from the same source; but the Gr. versions represent it in Heb. names by tau, reserving theta for the aspirated Heb. tau. In the Eng. versions teth is represented by t. It stands at the beginning of the 9th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse begins with that letter.

Te'trach. One who rules over the 4th part of a kingdom or province. Philip of Macedon divided Thessaly into 4 districts called tetrarchies. Eventually the word tetrarch was used loosely for a petty subject prince, even though the land was not divided among 4 such rulers. The Romans adopted the term and used it as a convenient title for a prince to whom they granted a small territory only, and whom they were unwilling to dignify with the authority and rank of a king. The N.T. names 3 of these petty dignitaries: Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, Philip, tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis, and Lysanias, tetrarch of Abilene (Luke 3:1). In the case of the tetrarchs Herod Antipas and Philip the title was appropriate, even in its original sense, for Augustus gave 1/2 of the kingdom of Herod the Great to Archelaus, with the title of ethnarch, and divided the remainder into 2 tetrarchies, which he gave to them (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4; War ii. 6, 3). A tetrarch was sometimes in courtesy called a king (cf. Matt. 14:1 with v. 9; Mark 6:14).

The'a·ter. A place where dramatic performances are given. The theater, with its auditorium, orchestra, and stage, and capable of seating immense throngs (see EPHESUS), was admirably adapted for large public meetings and the transaction of public business, and in Greek cities was often put to that use (Acts 19:29, 31; Jos. Antiq. xix. 8, 2).

Thebes (thēbz). See No.

The'bez (thē'bēz) [perhaps, brightness or splendor]. A town near Shechem, having in it a strong tower, in besieging which Abimelech was killed (Judg. 9:50-55; II Sam. 11:21). It continues to exist in the large village of Tūbās, 10 miles n.e. of Shechem, on the road to Beth-shean.

The-oc'ra-cy. Josephus coined the word theocracy to describe the government instituted at Sinai. "Our legislator . . . ordered our government to be what I may call by a strained expression a theocracy, attributing the power and the authority to God" (Jos. Apion ii. 16). Jehovah was the head of the nation, dwelling in its midst between the cherubim (Ex. 25:22). In him all the powers of the state, legislative, executive, judicial, were united. As legislator, he announced the fundamental law of the state in the hearing of the congregation. After that immediate presentation of himself to the nation, he exercised his governmental offices for the most part through men whom he raised up. Like all potentates, he delegated the judicial function for the most part to judges; only the most difficult matters were referred to Jehovah (Ex. 18:19); see URIM AND THUMMIM. His legislative function he exercised through Moses and through prophets (Deut. 18:15-19). Legislation was intermittent; the given body of laws was a sufficient rule, and seldom required modification or enlargement. The executive function was likewise exercised for many years intermittently through leaders, called Judges, who were raised up from time to time, and who, accredited by the great deeds which were wrought by their hands, secured public confidence and became the acknowledged head in state affairs.

The theocratic government was proposed by God at Sinai on condition of obedience (Ex. 19:4-9). The terms were accepted by the elders of the people (vs. 7, 8). The Ten Commandments, which formed the basis of the covenant, were proclaimed by Jehovah himself in such a manner that all the people could hear (Ex. 20:1, 19, 22; Deut. 4:12, 33, 36; 5:4, 22), in order that they might believe (Ex. 19:9). At the people's request the remaining laws, which are a practical application and interpretation of the Ten Commandments, were not spoken directly to them, but through Moses (ch. 20:18-21). Then the covenant was ratified. Moses wrote all the words of the Lord, erected an altar and 12 pillars, ordered a sacrifice, and sprinkled the altar with half the blood. He read the Book of the Covenant in the audience of the people, and, on their formal acceptance of it, sprinkled the remaining portion of the blood upon the people, saying: "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." Finally the covenant meal was eaten by the representatives of Israel, and thus the theocracy was established (ch. 24:3-11).

This Book of the Covenant contains the constitution and earliest laws of Israel. The Ten Commandments formed the fundamental law of the state. In Hebrew conception and as a matter of fact, they were a covenant between God and the nation. There was a treaty, not between several communities, but between the community and God. Being fundamental law, they were engraven on stone, and deposited in the Ark; they were known as the covenant (Deut. 4:13; 9:9, 11; I Kings 8:9-21; cf. Num. 10:33; Judg. 20:27; I Sam. 4:3); or the testimony (Ex. 31:18; 32:15). The laws which follow the Ten Commandments are by-laws or statutes. They are constitutional, involving no principle contrary to the organic law of the state; they are expository, being the application of the doctrines of the constitution to the affairs of daily life; they are temporary, liable to abrogation and amendment and numerical increase to meet the new conditions and peculiar needs of each age. They are presented in the form of a code; they are not a loose aggregation of statutes, but are disposed in orderly arrangement, mostly in groups of 10 or 5, and are usually introduced by the word "if." 1. Laws relating to the form of worship (Ex. 20:23-26). 2. Laws to protect the rights of man. (a) To protect liberty (ch. 21:2-11). (b) Concerning injury of person (vs. 12-32). (c) Concerning property rights (chs. 21:33 to 22:15). 3. Laws to govern personal conduct (chs. 22:16 to 23:9). 4. Laws concerning sacred seasons and sacrifice (vs. 10-19). 5. The promise annexed (vs. 20-33). Regarding the antiquity, character, and codification of these laws, see HAMMURABI and MOSES; and for the process of annulment and enactment during the ensuing 40 years, see ZELOPHEHAD and DEUTERONOMY.

At the institution of the theocratic government at Sinai, the idea before the people was simply that God was Ruler and Moses his accredited representative through whom he exercised the legislative, judicial, and executive offices. Moses already had subordinate judges to assist him (Ex. 18:21-26). The expectation was also entertained by Moses that God would appoint leaders to succeed him, and that eventually, on account of the people's lack of faith, a king would be needed as earthly, visible representative of the executive power when the people should be settled in Palestine. Accordingly a general law of the king was framed (Deut. 17:14-20).

The stability of the state under the theocratic form of government depended in the first instance and ultimately on the faithfulness of God to his election and his promises; but the success of the theocracy at any given period was conditioned by the attitude of the people toward God and toward the provisions of the covenant. Their obedience to God and reliance on him were requisite. The theocracy was based on the conception of Israel as a community, and it is well to note the weakness of the bond which at the first bound Israel into a community. The Children of Israel were divided into 12 tribes; they were bound together by common blood and common language, by common misfortune and common need. They were held together in pursuit of a great end by the enthusiasm and expectation which 1 man had awakened, by the hope of freedom and a country, by the promise and evidence of God's protection. They were kept together by Providence. All these unifying elements save the last were weak. They were bonds that might easily be, and constantly were, broken. This lack of communal strength was an obstacle to the theocracy, which even the establishment of the monarchy did not rectify.

The-oph'a-ny. A manifestation of God to man by actual appearance. It was not an immediate revelation of God the Father (John 1:18; I Tim. 6:16), but a manifestation of Jehovah in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. 16:7), the angel of the presence or the Lord's presence (Ex. 32:34; 33:14), the angel (messenger) of the covenant (Mal. 3:1), or Christ. A common classification is: 1. The O.T. theophany, an epiphany of the future Christ. 2. The incarnation of Christ, as the revelation of God in the flesh. 3. The Second Coming of Christ.

The O.T. theophanies were transient manifestations and became permanent localization. They were temporary manifestations to the Patriarchs, and became abiding in the Shekinah. The theophanies which were granted to the Patriarchs may have been unsubstantial manifestations, incorporeal and merely the appearance of the human form. Some interpreters, like Tertullian, believe that occasionally at least there was actual flesh, not putative flesh; but real and solid human substance. If the angel of the Lord assumed an actual body, he did so miraculously, and also again disappeared miraculously from men's sight. In the O.T. theophany the angel of the Lord ate actual food (Gen. 18:1-8). Does this prove that the angel had assumed an actual body? 1. Josephus interprets the eating as mere appearance (Jos. Antiq. i. 11, 2); so also Philo (Op. ii. 18) and the writer of Tobit (Tobit xii. 19). 2. Justin Martyr speaks of the angel as consuming food "as fire consumes" (Dial. c. Tryph. xxxiv.). The angel of the Lord who appeared to Manohah touched the food, and it was burned. "The thirsty earth absorbs water in one manner, the hot ray of the sun in another" (Augustine).

The transient manifestations gradually gave place to the permanent localization. The Shekinah was the visible majesty of the divine presence, especially when dwelling between the cherubim in the tabernacle and Temple in the midst of God's people Israel. It first appeared at the Exodus. The Lord went before the Israelites in a pillar of cloud by day, and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light (Ex. 13:21, 22). A thick cloud rested upon Mount Sinai, and the whole mountain smoked, because the Lord descended upon Mount Sinai in fire (ch. 19:16, 18). Later the glory of the Lord abode on Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it 6 days; and the 7th day he called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud, and the appearance of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel (ch. 24:16, 17). When Moses entered the 1st tent of meeting, the cloud descended and hovered at the door, and the Lord talked with Moses face to face (Ex. 33:10, 11; cf. Deut. 5:4). When the tabernacle was erected, the Lord took possession of it. The cloud, dark by day and luminous by night, covered the tent, and the glory of the Lord filled it (Ex. 40:34, 35; Num. 9:15, 16). When Moses appeared before the Lord in the tabernacle, he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy seat (Num. 7:89; cf. Ex. 25:22; Lev. 16:2). Probably the glory was not seen constantly but gleamed forth occasionally from the cloud which concealed it (Ex. 16:7, 10; Lev. 9:6, 23; Num. 14:10; 16:19, 42; 20:6). From frequent references it seems, however, that God continued to manifest his presence between the cherubim on the Ark. At length, when the Temple of Solomon was dedicated, the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house (1 Kings 8:10, 11).

The temporary manifestations had given place to the abiding presence in the tabernacle and Solomon's Temple; and finally the Word became flesh and dwelt among men; and men "beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father" (John 1:14). The latter glory of the house was greater than the former (Hag. 2:9, R.V.). The divine presence dwelt in Christ's body as in the Temple.

Theoph'li-us (thé-ôf'i-lŭs) [Gr., loved by God]. The Christian to whom Luke addressed his Gospel (Luke 1:3) and The Acts (Acts 1:1). See ACTS, THE.

Thes'sa-lo'ni-ans (thés'a-lŏ'nĭ-ănz), The Epistles of Paul to the. The First Epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians is the earliest of Paul's epistles. It was written by the apostle in conjunction with Silvanus (Silas) and Timothy, to the church at Thessalonica. Paul had founded this church on his Second Missionary Journey, and had been driven from Thessalonica to Berea and from Berea to Athens by the persecuting Jews; see PAUL 6. The epistle contains allusions (1 Thess., ch. 2) to his life at Thessalonica. It also relates that, when at Athens, he had sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to encourage the Christians amid their persecutions (ch. 3:1-3) and that Timothy had recently brought him good news of their steadfastness. In Acts 18:5 we learn that Silas and Timothy rejoined the apostle at Corinth. Hence the epistle was written from that city, probably in the year A.D. 52. The allusions which the epistle contains to Paul's life in Thessalonica and to the distress felt by the Thessalonians over the death of their friends, as well as the elementary character of the instruction given, confirm this date. There appear to have been 3 special features in the condition of the Thessalonians which occasioned anxiety to the apostle and led him to write this epistle: (1) a tendency to neglect their daily work, probably under the idea that the Second Advent would soon take place, and with this was sometimes found a failure to preserve moral purity of life; (2) distress lest their Christian friends who died would fail to enjoy the glories of the Kingdom which the returning Christ was to establish (3) friction between the regular officers of the Church and those who possessed miraculous endowments of the Spirit. Hence the analysis of the epistle: 1. A grateful statement of their Christian earnestness, their endurance of trial, and the influence they had already exerted over others (1 Thess., ch. 1). 2. A reminder of the uprightness and industry with which he had lived among them, and of the enthusiasm with which they had received his preaching even in the face of persecution from the Jews (ch. 2). 3. A recital of the joy he had had in Timothy's good report of their condition (ch. 3). 4. Instruction on special points (chs. 4:1 to 5:24): (a) Concerning purity in the relation of the sexes (ch. 4:3-8). (b) Concerning a life of mutual love and orderliness (vs. 9-12). (c) Concerning dead believers, declaring that at the Advent they will rise first and be caught up with the living to meet the Lord in the air, and thus will not fail of their reward (vs. 13-18). (d) Concerning watchfulness and sobriety of life (ch. 5:1-11). (e) Concerning respect for officers of the Church, consideration for those in need, cultivation of spiritual gifts, and other duties of the Christian life (vs. 12-24). 5. Closing words (vs. 25-28).

The epistle strikingly illustrates the difficulties natural to a newly formed Gentile church and the breadth and practical wisdom of the apostle's instructions.

The Second Epistle of Paul to the Thessalonians evidently followed the First after but a short period. It too, therefore, is to be assigned to c. A.D. 52, and was written from Corinth. We learn from it that the difficulties of the Thessalonians had become more serious, but were still of the same general character as those dealt with in the First Epistle. Like the First, this was written by Paul in conjunction with Silvanus (Silas) and Timothy; it deals largely with the Second Advent and misconceptions about it; and refers again to the tendency of some to disorderly living (II Thess. 3:6-12). If, however, the First Epistle treated of the relation of the Advent to believers, the Second treats of its relation to the wicked (ch. 1:5-10). Further, the apostle warns them not to suppose that "the day of the Lord is just at hand" (ch. 2:2, R.V.), and that the visible Advent would therefore soon come; for, before that happens, there must be the apostasy (predicted by Christ, cf. Matt. 24:9-12; and referred to by Paul in Acts 20:29, 30; Rom. 16:17-20; II Cor. 11:13-15; I Tim. 4:1) and the revelation of the man of lawlessness (II Thess. 2:3, 4, R.V.; Dan. 7:25; 11:36; I John 2:18; see ANTICHRIST), whom the Lord will destroy at his coming. He had, when with them, told them of these things (II Thess. 2:5).

The epistle may be divided as follows: 1. Thanksgiving for their fidelity amid persecution, and assurance that persecution should only make stronger their faith in the vindication of the saints and in the punishment of the ungodly which will take place at the Second Advent (ch. 1). 2. Warning against supposing that "the day of the Lord is just at hand," and description of the apostasy and rise of the man of lawlessness, which must precede the coming of the Lord (ch. 2:1-12). 3. Expression of his confidence in their election and fidelity (vs. 13-17). 4. Concluding exhortations: that they pray for him, that they avoid those who are disorderly, that they be industrious and faithful, that they all subject themselves to the authority which he as an apostle exercised, etc. (ch. 3). From ch. 2:2 it appears that a forged letter of Paul's had been circulated; hence in ch. 3:17 he appends his signature. We thus see also that from the beginning the same authority was attached in the Church to the apostle's letters as to his oral teaching. The statements concerning the apostasy and the man of lawlessness have been variously interpreted. We think it most probable that the apostasy was contemplated by Paul as arising within the Church; the man of lawlessness as the culmination of the apostasy in a personal Antichrist; and he or that which restrains (ch. 2:7) as either the civil power or else, and with much probability, the Holy Spirit. G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Thēs'sa'lo-ni'ca (thēs'á-lō-ni'ká). A city on the Thermoia Gulf, now called the Gulf of Salonika. The city was first called Therme, or Therma, hot spring; but Cassander, 1 of the successors of Alexander the Great, made it his residence and renamed it Thessalonica, after his wife Thessalonike, a daughter of the conqueror of the Chersonesus and sister of the great Alexander. Under the Romans it was the capital of the 2d district out of 4 into which they had divided Macedonia. It was a military and commercial station on the Via Egnatia; and was made a free city in 42 B.C. Its civil magistrates were called politarchs, rulers of the city (Acts 17:6, Gr. text; inscription on arch in Thessalonica); see RULER 3. The Jews had a synagogue in the city. Paul preached there and made converts, who became the nucleus of a Christian church (Acts 17:1-13; cf. Phil. 4:16). To this church Paul sent 2 letters. Two of his co-workers, Aristarchus and Secundus, were men of Thessalonica (Acts 20:4; 27:2). The modern name is Salonika.

Theu'das (thū'dās). Gamaliel, in his speech before the sanhedrin, about A.D. 32, referred to Theudas, who gave himself out to be somebody, to whom a number of men, about 400, joined themselves: "who was slain; and all, as many as obeyed him, were dispersed, and came to nought," and after whom Judas of Galilee rose up in the days of the enrollment (Acts 5:36, 37). There can be no doubt that the Judas here spoken of was Judas the Gaulonite of Gamala, who, in the time of Quirinius, during the procuratorship of Coponius, raised an insurrection by opposing the enrollment (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 1; War ii. 8, 1). Theudas accordingly arose sometime before A.D. 6. Now Josephus mentions a magician named Theudas, who, while Fadus was procurator of Judea, A.D. 44-c.46, persuaded a great part of the people to follow him to the river Jordan, for he told them that he was a prophet, and that at his command the waters would divide and allow them a passage. But Fadus sent a troop of horse against him, who fell upon the people unexpectedly, slew many and took many others alive, and secured Theudas, cut off his head and carried it to Jerusalem (Jos. Antiq. xx. 5, 1).

The question is whether Luke and Josephus refer to the same person. Some answer that they do, and accordingly say that either Luke or Josephus errs. Josephus scarcely is mistaken, for he gives details. But Luke has fully established his credibility as a historian, and it is a rash thing to accuse him of an error. Accordingly other interpreters conjecture that 2 persons by the name of Theudas, at a distance of 40 years or more from each other, laid themselves open to the just vengeance or justifiable suspicions of the Romans and were punished. It is not at all clear that Theudas the magician was an insurgent of the same class as Theudas whom Gamaliel cites. The one was an impostor, a pretended prophet, who, on the faith of the people in his supernatural powers, drew crowds of followers after him. The other made some sort of claim to greatness, gained a following of 400 men, and came to nought. Who then was Theudas to whom Gamaliel refers? He may have been one of the insurrectionary chiefs, who led belligerent bands in the closing year of Herod the Great. That year was remarkably turbulent. Josephus mentions 3 disturbers by name, and makes general allusion to others. Theudas was either: (1) one of these unnamed insurrectionists, whom Gamaliel cites to show that a bad cause and its leaders come to grief (Theudas was a common name and, within a period of half a century, might be borne by 2 persons of some prominence and somewhat similar careers. Analogously Josephus gives an account of 4 men named Simon, who followed each other within 40 years, and of 3 named Judas, within 10 years, who were all instigators of rebellion); or (2) one of the 3 insurgents who are named by Josephus. Two have been advocated by certain scholars as identical with Theudas: 1. Simon (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 10, 6; War ii. 4, 2), a slave of Herod, who attempted to make himself king when Herod died. Since it was quite common among the Jews to assume a new name on changing occupation or mode of life, it is possible that Gamaliel speaks of him as Theudas, the name he had borne longest, and by which he was best known in Jerusalem and to the members of the sanhedrin, while Josephus calls him by the name Simon, which he had adopted when appearing as king of the Jews and by which he was naturally known to the Roman government and people. 2. The man called Matthias by Josephus (Jos. Antiq. xvii. 6, 2; War i. 33, 2). Matthias is a Gr. form of Heb. Mattanyāh, gift of God, and is equivalent to the Gr. name Theudas, which possibly may be the same as Theodas, shortened from Theodōros, gift of God. However strongly these conjectures may commend themselves to their proponents, it must be admitted that we do not know enough to explain the historical difficulty in Acts 5:36, 37.

Thief. In a broad sense, anyone who appropriates what is not his own, as the petty pilferer (John 12:6), the robber or highwayman (Luke 10:30, R.V. robber), the burglar (Matt. 6:20). The highwayman was often a rebel against Roman rule and a fomentor of strife, like Barabbas (Mark 15:7), who was compelled by the exigencies of the case, as much as by the lust of plunder, to flee from the soldiers and adopt the wild robber life. Under the Mosaic Law a thief caught had to make restitution of twice the amount he had taken, and if he were unable, could be sold into temporary servitude till he had earned the requisite amount. If a thief entered a house and, coming into contact with the owner in the dark, was killed, the homicide was not to be charged with bloodguiltiness; but if the sun had risen, the householder was held to be guilty if he killed the intruder (Ex. 22:1-4). That the thieves on the cross were something far beyond petty pilferers is plain from the Gr. term (lēistēs) applied to them, the severity of their punishment (Jos. War ii. 13, 2), and the fact that one of them acknowledged the justice of the death penalty inflicted on him (Luke 23:41); he must have been a robber at the least (Matt. 27:38, R.V.), and quite possibly even a brigand. Both reviled Jesus on the cross (Matt. 27:44), but subsequently 1 was touched with awe at the meekness and forgiving spirit of Jesus, and, with the fear of God in his heart, the confession of the sinfulness of his past life, the acknowledgment that Jesus had done nothing amiss and was the true King and would reign in power after the death on the cross, turned to Jesus for acceptance after death (Luke 23:39-43).

Thīm'na-thah (thīm'ná-thā). See TIMNAH.

Thīs'tle. See THORNS AND THISTLES.

Thom'as (tōm'ás) [Gr., from Aram. te'ōmā, twin]. One of the 12 apostles (Matt. 10:3). He was also called Didymus, a Greek name, meaning, like Thomas, a twin. When the disciples were astonished that Jesus intended going again to Judea, where a little before the Jews had threatened to stone him (John 11:7, 8), Thomas, in devotion to Jesus, determined to share the peril, and said to his fellow disciples, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (v. 16). When Jesus, in anticipation of his departure, spoke of going to prepare a place for them, and added that they knew whither he was going and the way, Thomas said, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; how know we the way?" In reply Jesus spoke the well-known words: "I am the way, and the truth, and the life" (ch. 14:1-6). Thomas was not at the first meeting at which the privilege was granted of seeing the risen Lord, and when he heard that Jesus had been present he said, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe" (ch. 20:24, 25). This incident has given rise to his designation, "doubting Thomas." But God turned the doubt of Thomas to the good of others. "He doubted that we might not doubt" (Augustine), and 8 days later Jesus gave him the evidence he required and elicited from him the adoring exclamation, "My Lord and my God" (vs. 26-29). He was on the Sea of Galilee with 6 other disciples when Jesus hailed them from the beach and told them where to cast the net (ch. 21:1-8); and was with the rest of the apostles in the upper room at Jerusalem after the ascension (Acts 1:13). Tradition makes Thomas afterward labor in Parthia and Persia, dying in the latter country. At a later period India was named as the place where he had preached and suffered martyrdom, and a place near Madras is called St. Thomas' Mount.

Thorns and Thistles. In most passages where the words occur the terms are generic rather than specific. Thorny weeds, bushes, and small trees of various kinds are abundant in Palestine. Among them may be mentioned the thorny burnet (Poterium spinosum), which is burned as fuel in lime kilns and ovens; the thorny caper (Capparis spinosa), seen everywhere hanging from rocks and walls; the Jamestown or Jimson weed (Datura stramonium) by the roadside and in waste places; the artichoke (Cynara syriaca); and in the uplands the acanthus with its whitish flowers. The prickly pear (Opuntia ficus-indica), a cactus with yellow flowers, is the characteristic hedge plant of modern Syria; but it was introduced from America and was unknown in ancient times. For hedge purposes there are also used the box thorn (Lycium europaeum) and the bramble (Rubus discolor). Various hawthorns are found, Crataegus azarolus, C. monogyna, and e. of the Jordan C. orientalis. Numerous thistles grow in the fields and waste places: such as Cirsium acarna, with its leaves tipped with long, yellow spines; Carthamus lanatus, with yellow flowerets, C. glaucus, with purple, C. caeruleus, with blue, and C. tinctorius, with red flowerets, which are used as a red dye; Carduus pycnocephalus and argentalis; Echinops viscosus; the tall Notobasis syriaca, with pink flowers and powerful spines; cotton thistles (Onopordon illyricum and cynarocephalum); the milk thistle (Silybum marianum); sow thistles (Sonchus oleraceus and glaucescens); star thistles (Centaurea calcitrapa and verutum), the former with purple, the latter with yellow flowers. The cocklebur (Xanthium) is common, as is also teasel (Dipsacus sylvestris).

Several words rendered thorn or thistle appear to be used specifically, e.g., Heb. dardar, Gr. tribolos, which grows in fields (Gen. 3:18; Hos. 10:8; Matt. 7:16; all in E.V. thistle; and Heb. 6:8, in A.V. brier) is probably a species of Tribulus, perhaps T. terrestris, one of the plants called caltrop. It is common in the fields and by the roadside. The fruit is composed of bony cells armed with prickles on the back. It does not belong to the Compositae, as do the thistles.

See BRAMBLE, BRIER, NETTLE.

The crown of thorns, which was plaited by the Roman soldiers and placed on the head of Jesus to torture and insult him (Matt. 27:29), is generally believed to have been made of the Zizyphus spina Christi, a species of jujube or lotus tree, with soft, round, pliant branches, and with leaves resembling the ivy with which emperors and generals were wont to be crowned. See BRAMBLE.

The thorn in the flesh was some bodily pain or infirmity sent as a messenger of Satan to buffet the Apostle Paul and keep him humble amid all his spiritual triumphs (II Cor. 12:7). Its nature is unknown.

Thou'sand. A division of the tribe (Num. 31:5; Josh. 22:14); consisting nominally of 1,000 persons, but through birth and death ever varying and doubtless falling far short of the standard number; used for military and judicial purposes (Ex. 18:21, 25; Num. 31:14; I Sam. 8:12, 22:7; II Sam. 18:1); and practically, perhaps exactly, equivalent to the subdivision of the tribe which was technically known as a father's house (cf. Num. 1:2, 4 with v. 16, R.V.; Judg. 6:15, cf. R.V. marg.; cf. I Sam. 10:19 with v. 21).

A THRESHING FLOOR IN SAMARIA

Three Taverns. A small station on the Appian Way, about 10 miles from Appii Forum, and 30 miles from Rome, where a number of Roman Christians met Paul on his way to Rome (Acts 28:15).

Thresh'ing. The process of separating grain from the straw. Small quantities of grain were beaten out with a stick or flail (Judg. 6:11), and this was the customary method of hulling fitches and cummin (Isa. 28:27); but when much work was to be done, oxen and threshing floors were employed. The weather of Palestine permits the threshing floor to be under the open sky (Judg. 6:37). It is generally common to the whole village, but may have a private owner (II Sam. 24: 16). If possible, it is the surface of a flat rock on the top of a hill, exposed to any wind that blows. If such a natural floor is not available, an artificial floor is laid out by the roadside, and soon assumes a circular shape, about 50 feet in diameter, and becomes firm and hard under the trampling of the oxen. The sheaves are loosened and arranged in a circle on the floor; or, if the straw is to be preserved whole, the ears are cut from the stock and cast on the floor. Oxen, which to this day are unmuzzled except by the negligently (Deut. 25:4), are driven round and round to trample out the kernels; or else are made to drag a sled or cart, weighted by a heavy stone or the driver, to facilitate the operation. The sled is made of 2 heavy planks, curved upward at the front and fastened side by side. Sharp pieces of stone are fixed in holes bored in the bottom. The cart, at least as used in Egypt, consists of a frame containing 3 wooden rollers set with sharp iron knives. If there is any wind, the threshed grain is tossed high in the air with a shovel or a fork, when the chaff is blown away and the clean grain falls to the ground; but if there is no wind, a large fan is plied by one man, while another tosses the grain with his shovel (Isa. 30:24; Matt. 3:12; Iliad xiii. 588). The fan, however, is seldom used except to purge the floor of the refuse dust. Winnowing is done in the evening for the sake of the wind; and it is customary for the owner of the grain to spend the night at the floor during the time of threshing to prevent stealing (Ruth 3:2 seq.). The grain is finally passed through a sieve to cleanse it from dirt, after which it is ready for grinding (Amos 9:9).

Thresholds of the Gates. A building, in Heb. 'asuppim (stores), which was intended for the storage of Temple goods (Neh. 12: 25, A.V.); rendered "storehouses of the gates" in R.V. See ASUPPIM.

Throne. A chair of state, in Heb. kissē', in Gr. thronos, which was occupied by a person of authority, whether high priest, judge, military leader, governor, or king (Gen. 41:40; II Sam. 3:10; Neh. 3:7; Ps. 122:5; Jer. 1: 15; Matt. 19:28). Royal thrones were often portable, like those of Ahab and Jehoshaphat (I Kings 22:10), and the one used by Sennacherib at Lachish. Solomon's throne was an elevated seat reached by 6 steps. Its frame was probably made of cedar. It was inlaid with ivory, and elsewhere overlaid with gold; the back of it was arched or rounded off; it was furnished with arms and was provided with a footstool. A lion stood at each side, ornamenting the arms, and on each end of each of the 6 steps (I Kings 10: 18-20; II Chron. 9:17-19).

The king, arrayed in his royal robes, regularly sat on his throne when granting audiences, receiving homage, administering justice, or promulgating commands (I Kings 2: 19; 7:7; II Kings 11:19; Jonah 3:6).

The throne symbolized supreme power and authority, and is constantly attributed to Jehovah.

Thum'mim. See URIM AND THUMMIM.

Thunder. The noise that follows a flash of lightning. It intensifies the awfulness of a terrific storm (Ex. 9:23). Thunder is an unusual event during the summer, which is the dry season in Palestine (Prov. 26:1); and hence, when it occurred at that time of year after prayer for it, it was an evident answer and served as a sign (I Sam. 12:17). It was often called simply kōl, voice, sound, noise; and was poetically described as the voice of Jehovah (Job 37:2-5; 40:9; Ps. 29:3-9), who sends and directs the storm (Job 28: 26). It accompanied manifestations of God's presence when he came in dread majesty (Ex. 19:16; Rev. 4:5); it was an indication of divine power at work in nature; and since thunder is a precursor of the destructive storm, it symbolized divine vengeance (I Sam. 2:10; II Sam. 22:14, 15; Ps. 77:18).

Thy'at'ira (thi'ā-ti'rá). A city of Asia Minor, in Lydia, near the boundary of Mysia; the name probably is Lydian, meaning "the town or citadel of Thya." It was on the road from Pergamos to Sardis. When Seleucus Nicator between 301 and 281 B.C. colonized it with Greeks, he gave it the name of Thyatira. It had already been known as Pelopia and Euhippia (Pliny Hist. Nat. v. 31), but these names may have been mere epithets. Its inhabitants were famed for their skill in dyeing purple; and Lydia, the seller of purple at Philippi, came from Thyatira (Acts 16:14). It contained one of the 7 churches in Asia (Rev. 1:11; 2:18-29). Traces of its existence remain in fragments of columns built into the streets and edifices of its modern successor Ak Hissar.

Thy'ine Wood. An article sold in the markets of the mystic Babylon (Rev. 18:12). It was the wood of Callitris quadrivalvis, a large tree of the cypress family. It is reddish-brown, hard, and fragrant, and was greatly prized by the Romans for ornamental purposes. They ran it up to a high price. The resin which exudes from the tree is gum sandarac.

Ti-be'ri-as (ti-bē'rī-ās). A city on the Sea of Galilee (John 6:23), built by Herod the tetrarch, and named by him after the then reigning Roman emperor, Tiberius Caesar (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 2, 3; War ii. 9, 1). Tiberias was fortified by Josephus during the Jewish war (Jos. Life 8; War ii. 20, 6). It opened its gates to Vespasian, and a number of the inhabitants of Taricheae, a neighboring town, whom he had assured of their lives, were afterward slain in cold blood in the race course of Tiberias (Jos. War iii. 10, 1-10). After the destruction of Jerusalem and the expulsion of the Jews from Judea, consequent on the failure of Barcocheba's rebellion, Tiberias became the virtual metropolis of the Jewish nation, and coins of the city have been found, bearing the names of

Ancient Egyptian Throne

Tiberius, Claudius, Trajan, Adrian, and Antoninus Pius. The sanhedrin was transferred to Tiberias about the middle of the 2d century, and the city became the center of Jewish learning. A celebrated school was established in it, which produced the volume of tradition called the Mishnah, about A.D. 190 or 220, and much of its supplement, the Gemara, was codified in the same place by the 4th century. The Masorah, or body of traditions which transmitted the details of the Hebrew text of the O.T. and preserved its pronunciation by means of vowel signs, originated in a great measure at Tiberias; see OLD TESTAMENT. The Jews regard Tiberias as one of their 4 sacred cities, Jerusalem, Hebron, and

Thyine Wood

Safed being the others, in which prayer must be offered continually, or the world will instantly fall back into chaos. It still exists under the name of Tubariya, on the w. shore of the Sea of Galilee,  $11\frac{1}{2}$  miles from the entrance and 6 from the exit of the Jordan. At that place the steep mountain ridge does not closely approach the lake, but leaves on its margin a narrow strip of undulating land, at the n. part of which Tiberias stands. It extends about half a mile along the shore, and is defended on the land side by a wall, towers, and a castle.

The Sea of Tiberias is more commonly called the Sea of Galilee (John 6:1; 21:1).

Ti-ber'i-us Cae'sar (tî-bêr'î-ûs sê'zêr). See CAESAR 2.

Tib'hath (tîb'hâth) [slaughter]. A town of Aram-zobah (I Chron. 18:8). See BETAH and TEBAH.

Tib'ni (tîb'nî) [cf. Arab. tibn, straw]. A son of Ginath, and the unsuccessful competitor for the throne of Israel with Omri (I Kings 16:21, 22).

Ti'dal (tî'dāl). King of Goiim and one of Chedorlaomer's confederates (Gen. 14:1, 9, R.V.). The name may correspond to Hittite Tudhaliash.

Tig'lath-pî-lê'ser (tig'lâth-pî-lê'zêr), in Chronicles Til'gath-pîl-ne'ser [Assyrian Tukulti-apil-esharra, my trust is the son of Esharra, i.e., the god Ninib]. A king of Assyria, who reigned from 746/5 to 728/7 B.C. Tiglath-pileser is but another name for Pul, as appears from the fact that where Ptolemy's list of Babylonian kings gives Poros, and the so-called dynastic tablets of the Babylonians give Pulu, the Babylonian chronicle gives Tiglath-pileser. Probably Pul was his original name, and when he secured the throne he assumed the grander title of Tiglath-pileser, which had already been made famous by a great king of the past. The military power of Assyria had suffered serious reverses, but a new era began with the accession of Tiglath-pileser III. In the 1st year of his reign he began a new order of administration for subject territory. He divided the empire into 4 administrative provinces over which he placed native Assyrian governors who were responsible for collecting tribute and maintaining order. He seated himself upon the Assyrian throne on the 13th day of the 2d month and in the 7th month was marching against Babylonia. He first became known to the Israelites as Pul.

During the years 743-740 his military headquarters were at Arpad in n. Syria, not far from the site of the later Antioch; but he found opportunity to send or lead expeditions and terrify the country within a radius of 100 miles or more. Among other places against which he came at that time or a little later was the land of Israel, but Menahem paid him tribute and the Assyrian confirmed the kingdom to Menahem and left the country (II Kings 15:19, 20); see PEKAH. Tiglath-pileser records the names of kings who about 738 B.C. paid him tribute, and among others the name of Menahem of Samaria. During the next few years he was conducting war first in the far east, and then in the country n. and n.w. of Nineveh; but in 734 he was again in the west. The alliance of Pekah and Rezin against Ahaz of Judah impelled Ahaz, contrary to the exhortation of the Prophet Isaiah, to turn for help to a human potentate. Tiglath-pileser was induced by large money (II Kings 16:7, 8), and by the favorable opportunity afforded him of extending his authority, to side with Ahaz. He marched against Philistia, capturing cities on the Phoenician coast as he proceeded; Gaza fell in 734. Thus were punished the Philistines, who had taken advantage of Judah's straits to pillage (II Chron. 28:18).

It was either during his advance s. or as he returned n. that he took Ijon, Abel-beth-maacah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria (II Kings 15:29). At this time God "stirred up the spirit of Pul king of Assyria, and [or rather, as it may equally well be translated, even] the spirit of Tilgath-pileser king of Assyria, and he carried them away, even the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh" (I Chron. 5:26). Thus there was an extensive deportation from the Northern Kingdom to Assyria before the fall of Samaria, 722 (721). Tiglath-pileser reports his reception of tribute from many kings, among others from the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, and from Jehoahaz of Judah. This statement agrees with the Biblical record that King Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 16:10).

In 732 Damascus fell into his hands, and Assyria now controlled the west. Babylonia had been overrun by the Chaldeans, and so Tiglath-pileser went in 731 to pacify that land. In 729 he was again in the country, and he was determined to make an end of ruling Babylonia by native princes. So he became an adopted son of the god Marduk by taking hold of the hands of his image, and accordingly was proclaimed king of Babylonia.

In 730 B.C., according to Biblical chronology, Hoshea revolted against Pekah. The revolt was instigated or assisted by Tiglath-pileser. Tiglath-pileser carried on extensive exchanges of populations in his colonizing schemes. His plan of planting colonies and of transporting captives had been tried by other Assyrian kings on a small scale, but it had never been adopted as a fixed and settled policy. He hoped thereby to break down national feeling, sever local ties, and make the empire homogeneous. He died in the 10th month, Tebeth, 728/7 B.C., after having occupied the throne for 18 years and having raised the Assyrian empire to a power and glory unknown to it under any of his predecessors.

Ti'gris (tí'grís). See HIDDEKEL.

Tik'vah (tík'vā) [hope, expectation]. 1. The father of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (II Kings 22:14). In II Chron. 34:22 the name appears as Tokhath (in A.V. Tikvath), which suggests Arab. waḳīḥa, to obey, but the Heb. form is probably a corruption of Tikvah.

2. The father of a certain Jahaziah (Ezra 10:15).

Tik'vath (tík'vāth). See TIKVAH.

Tile. A slab or tablet of baked clay. Tiles were the common writing material of Babylonia (Ezek. 4:1). The characters were impressed on the surface while it was yet soft, and the clay was then baked to render the writing indelible. Tiles were used in many countries as roofing material (Luke 5:19), but not, or not commonly, in Palestine. Probably Luke, accustomed to the tiled roofs of Greek houses, uses the expression "through the tiles" for through the roof, without reference to the material of the roof in question, or else in this particular house there was an opening in the roof to permit the inmates to ascend from the room to the coolness of the outer air. During the winter, however, this opening may have been closed with a frame and bricked over.

Til'gath-pil-ne'ser (tíl'gāth-pīl-nē'zēr). See TIGLATH-PILESER.

Ti'lon (tí'lōn). A son of Shimon, whose registry was with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

Ti-mae'us (tí-mē'ūs) [Gr., highly prized]. Father of the blind beggar of Jericho (Mark 10:46).

Tim'brel or Tab'ret. A kind of drum, probably a hand drum or tambourine, called tōph in Heb.; this term is used in Modern

A Timbrel

Hebrew for drum. It was much used in domestic festivities, was often played by women to accompany song and beat time for dances, and was employed alone or in orchestra in the worship of God (Gen. 31:27; Ex. 15:20; Judg. 11:34; I Sam. 10:5; 18:6; I Chron. 13:8; Job 21:12; Ps. 81:2; Isa. 5:12).

Tim'na (tím'nā), in A.V. twice Tim'nah (Gen. 36:40; I Chron. 1:51) [Heb. Timna'; cf. the same name in S. Arab., the capital of Ḳatabān, about 50 miles s.e. of Mārib]. 1. Daughter of Seir and sister of Lotan. She became a concubine of Eliphaz, Esau's eldest son, and the mother of Amalek (Gen. 36:12, 22; I Chron. 1:39). In interpreting these statements, it must be remembered that terms of relationship are used in describing tribes as well as individuals.

2. A duke of Edom (Gen. 36:40; I Chron. 1:51).

Tim'nah (tím'nā), in A.V. 8 times Tim'nah (Gen. 38:12-14; Judg. 14:1-5), once Thim'na-thah (thīm'nā-thā) (Josh. 19:43), and once Tham'natha (thām'nā-thā) (I Macc. 9:50, A.V.) [Heb. timnāh, allotted portion].

1. A town on the border line of the territory assigned to Judah, and not far from Beth-shemesh (Josh. 15:10). It was subsequently given over to the tribe of Dan (ch. 19:43). It was occupied by the Philistines in the days of Samson (Judg. 14:2), and was captured by them in the reign of Ahaz (II Chron. 28:18). Its site is at Tibnah, about 3 miles w. by s. of Beth-shemesh, 15½ w. by s. of Jerusalem, and 16 e. of Ashdod.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:57), probably the place referred to in Gen. 38:12-14. It was near a certain Gibeah and is mentioned in connection with Adullam and Enaim. About 4 miles e. of Beit Netfif is found a certain Tibnah on a slope which rises toward el-Khader; near by to the s.e. is Jeba', and thus the Biblical data are fulfilled.

3. A town enumerated after Emmaus, Beth-horon, and Beth-el, and before Pharaathon (I Macc. 9:50). It was fortified by Bacchides. The data point to Thamna, chief city of a toparchy (Jos. War iii. 3, 5), which bordered on the toparchies of Gophna, Lydda, and Emmaus (Jos. War ii. 20, 4), and lay between Antipatris and Lydda (Jos. War iv. 8, 1). Its site is probably marked by Khirbet Tibnah, 7½ miles w.n.w. of Jufna (Gophna), on the old road from Antipatris by way of Gophna to Jerusalem. See TIMNATH-SERAH.

4. An improper spelling, found in both versions, of the name of Timna, daughter of Seir.

Tim'nath (tím'nāth). See TIMNAH.

Tim'nath-he'eres (tím'nāth-hē'rēz). See TIMNATH-SERAH.

Tim'nath-se'rah (tím'nāth-sē'rā) [extra portion]. A village in the hill country of Ephraim, on the n. side of the hill of Gaash. It was given to Joshua as an inheritance, and there he was buried (Josh. 19:50; 24:30). It is once written Timnath-heres, portion of the sun (Judg. 2:9), but heres is probably serah accidentally written backwards. It is probably Tibnah, which is 12 miles n.e. of Lydda and 8½ miles s. by w. of Kefr Hāris, where Samaritan tradition locates the graves of Joshua and Caleb. See TIMNAH 3.

Tim'nite (tím'nīt). A native or inhabitant of Timnah (Judg. 15:6).

Ti'mon (tí'mōn) [Gr., deeming worthy]. One of the 7 men chosen to relieve the apostles from semisecular work in the primitive Church (Acts 6:5).

Ti-mo'the-us (tí-mō'thē-ūs) [Gr., worshipping God]. 1. Leader of a large body of Ammonites, with whom Judas Maccabaeus fought several battles (I Macc. 5:6, 40).

2. Paul's convert and fellow worker. See TIMOTHY.

Tim'o-othy (tīm'ō-thī), in A.V. usually Tim'o'the-us [Gr., venerated or worshipping God]. The well-known companion and assistant of Paul. The terms which the apostle applies to him, "my beloved and faithful child in the Lord" (I Cor. 4:17), "my true child in faith" (I Tim. 1:2, etc.), seem to indicate not only the apostle's love for his youthful friend, but also that he had been the means of Timothy's conversion. At any rate it is clear (II Tim. 1:5) that when on his First Missionary Journey Paul visited Lystra in Lycaonia, Timothy's mother Eunice and grandmother Lois were led to Christ, and that Timothy was old enough to be instructed in the new faith which his mother had adopted. Though his mother was a Jewess, his father was a Gentile (Acts 16:1). On the one hand he had from a child been instructed in the O.T. (II Tim. 3:15); yet, on the other, he had not been circumcised (Acts 16:3). But, whether converted through Paul or afterward through the instruction of his mother, Timothy soon became active in Christian work, so that when, a few years later, Paul on his Second Journey again visited Lystra he found the young man well reported of by the brethren both at Lystra and Iconium (Acts 16:2). Already the voice of prophecy had indicated that Timothy was destined for special service (I Tim. 1:18; 4:14). Paul therefore determined to take him with him; and the young man was set apart to the work of an evangelist by the laying on of the hands both of Paul and of the presbytery (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6). In order also not to offend the Jews, Timothy was circumcised (Acts 16:3), the apostle thus indicating his wish, where no principle was involved, to conciliate those among whom in nearly every place he would have to begin work. Thereafter Timothy's fortunes were united with Paul's. He evidently accompanied the apostle through Galatia, then to Troas and Philippi, and then to Thessalonica and Berea, for it is mentioned (Acts 17:14) that he and Silas remained in Berea when Paul went on to Athens. Paul sent word for them to follow him to Athens speedily (Acts 17:15); but from I Thess. 3:1, 2 it appears that he sent Timothy back to Thessalonica, and that Silas and Timothy did not rejoin him until he had reached Corinth (Acts 18:5; I Thess. 3:6). Timothy then remained with Paul in Corinth (I Thess. 1:1; II Thess. 1:1) and probably, though his name is not mentioned, accompanied the apostle on his return voyage. We next hear of him during Paul's ministry in Ephesus. Paul informs us in I Cor. 4:17 that, before writing that epistle, he had sent Timothy to Corinth to correct abuses there. Yet for some reason, as I Cor. 16:10 intimates, there was a possibility that Timothy might not reach Corinth, and in fact we do not know whether he did so or not. At any rate he seems to have returned to Ephesus, for shortly before Paul left that city Timothy and Erastus preceded him into Macedonia (Acts 19:22), where Paul soon joined his young friend (II Cor. 1:1). Together they went to Corinth (Rom. 16:21), and Timothy is mentioned as one of the company who escorted the apostle on his return from the Third Journey toward Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Whether Timothy went with the apostle to Jerusalem does not appear. No mention of him occurs during the imprisonment at Caesarea or the voyage to Rome. But in the epistles which were probably written from Rome his name occurs (Phil. 1:1; 2:19-23; Col. 1:1; Philemon 1). He had evidently followed the apostle to the capital and was his devoted co-worker. After the apostle's release, he seems to have more than ever intrusted important duties to Timothy. In I Timothy we find that he had been left in charge of the church at Ephesus. It was a post of responsibility and difficulty, especially for one who was still a young man (I Tim. 4:12). False teachers were to be combated, officials were to be appointed, church customs were to be organized or regulated. The position of Timothy appears to have been that of an apostolic deputy, and it is not surprising that Paul wrote to him a special epistle with regard to his task. To Timothy he also wrote his last epistle shortly before his death (II Tim.). Almost alone, and with death impending, Paul desired ardently the presence of Timothy (ch. 4:9, 21), and to him he laid bare his whole heart. It is probable that Timothy reached Paul before the latter's death, but we do not know. The only further reference to him is Heb. 13:23. From it we learn that Timothy had suffered imprisonment, but had been set at liberty again. When this occurred, we do not know.

The First Epistle of Paul to Timothy probably was written after the apostle's traditional release from his 1st Roman imprisonment and resumption of missionary work (see above; also PAUL). Timothy had been left in charge of the church of Ephesus while Paul went into Macedonia (I Tim. 1:3). The epistle perhaps was written from Macedonia c. A.D. 64 or 65. It deals with the ecclesiastical difficulties that confronted Timothy, and gives him personal advice. It evinces the interest of the apostle in the practical working of the Church and his personal interest in Timothy's own welfare and success. Its contents may be arranged as follows: 1. Instructions concerning the Church (chs. 1 to 3); including warnings against false teachers (ch. 1), instructions concerning worship (ch. 2), instructions concerning church officers, closing with a brief statement of the dignity of the Church and the fundamental truths on which it rests (ch. 3). 2. Advice for Timothy's own guidance (chs. 4 to 6), with respect to the false doctrines and practical errors which he had to meet (ch. 4), and with respect to his treatment of various classes in the Church (chs. 5:1 to 6:2), followed by concluding exhortations partly of a personal character and partly to reinforce the previous instructions (ch. 6: 3-21).

The Second Epistle of Paul to Timothy probably was written from Rome after the apostle had been arrested the 2d time, c. A.D. 67. He speaks of himself as a prisoner (II Tim. 1:8, 16; 2:9), charged with being an evildoer (ch. 2:9), and he expected soon to suffer martyrdom (ch. 4:6). Many of his friends had left him (chs. 1:15; 4:10, 12). Luke only, of his former friends, was with him (ch. 4:11), though other friends had gathered round him (v. 21). He had already had 1 trial, at which he had not been condemned (vs. 16, 17), but he was still held on some other charge. In his loneliness and danger his heart turned to Timothy, and this letter was written partly to encourage Timothy in his work as an evangelist and partly to urge him to hasten to Rome and to perform some personal services for the apostle. It may be divided as follows: 1. After a brief introduction, expressive of his wish to see Timothy and his confidence in him (ch. 1:1-5), he urges him to be courageous in spite of existing trials (vs. 6-12), and to be faithful to the truth he had received in spite of all opponents (vs. 13-18). 2. He charges Timothy to be strong, to secure the preservation of the truth, to be a good soldier, to bear in mind the imperishable foundation of fact and truth on which the gospel rests, to avoid false teaching, and to take heed to his own spiritual life

(ch. 2). 3. He warns him that errors will increase, and bids him remember the example of steadfast endurance which Paul himself had shown him and the teaching of inspired Scripture in which he had been trained (ch. 3). 4. As his last direction, he bids Timothy preach the word and make full proof of his ministry (ch. 4:1-5), solemnly adding that he, Paul, on the verge of death, rejoiced that he had been able to do the same (vs. 6-8). The epistle then closes with some personal directions (vs. 9-22).

The epistles to Timothy and Titus are called, from their contents, the Pastoral Epistles. See PAUL. G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Tin. A metal, in Heb. bēdil, separated, dross, alloy. It was obtained from its ore by smelting. It was in use in Palestine and neighboring countries before the Exodus (Num. 31:22), in Egypt as early as Dyn. VI at least. Its principal use was in making bronze, which is an alloy of copper and tin. The Tyrians got their supply from Tarshish (Ezek. 27:12). Tin was obtained in Spain, but most of it came from islands in the w. ocean (Pliny Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 47; Herod. iii. 115). There is little doubt that these islands were the isles of Scilly, off the Cornwall coast, and that the mines of Britain were the chief source of supply to the ancient world, and that Phoenician mariners made direct voyages from Gades in Spain to Cornwall for the metal (Strabo iii. 175). Later it was transported across France to the mouth of the Rhone by a 30 days' journey (Diodorus Siculus v. 21, 22). The same word signifies the base metal existing in combination with silver in the ore (Isa. 1:25), and is supposed to denote the slag which separates from the lead when silver is being smelted from the ore.

Tiph'sah (tif'sá) [a passage, ford]. 1. A town at the extreme limit of Solomon's dominions, in the direction of the Euphrates (I Kings 4:24). It is generally identified with Thapsacus, on the right bank of the Euphrates, above the confluence of the Balikh. It was the most important crossing place in the middle course of the Euphrates; under the Seleucidae it was known as Amphipolis. The ford was used by the armies of Cyrus the Younger and Alexander the Great.

2. A place on the inhabitants of which Menahem inflicted barbarous cruelties (II Kings 15:16). It is mentioned in connection with Tirzah, from which it would seem not to have been far distant. Conder identifies it with the ruined village Tafsah, 6½ miles s.w. of Shechem. Many scholars follow Lucian's Gr. reading Taphōe and accordingly identify it with Tappuah (q.v.).

Ti'ras (ti'rās). A land and its inhabitants, who were a Japhetic people (Gen. 10:2). Ancient opinion identified it with Thrace (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 1), from slight similarity of sound. The river Tyrras, the modern Dneister, and the Tyritai, who dwelt on its banks (Herod. iv. 51), have also been suggested. The conditions are best met by the Tyrsenoi, an ancient Pelasgic people who occupied islands and coast lands of the Aegean Sea (Herod. i. 57, 94), probably the piratical Turusha who invaded Syria and Egypt in the 13th century B.C. Tyrsēnos is the Ionic and old Attic form of Tyrrēnos, Tyrrhenian.

Ti'rath-ites (ti'rāth-its). A family of scribes, Kenites from Tirah, dwelling at Jabez (I Chron. 2:55).

Tire. The rendering of Heb. pe'ēr, head-dress, from root meaning to beautify, glorify. It means an ornamental headdress (Ezek. 24:17, 23). Aaron in his priestly capacity wore one of fine linen (Ex. 39:28; in A.V. bonnet). Women also wore it (Isa. 3:20; in A.V. bonnet). The bridegroom decked himself with it (Isa. 61:10; in A.V. ornaments, R.V. garland; J.V. priestly diadem).

Tir'ha-kah (tūr'hā-kā). See PHARAOH 4.

Tir'ha-nah (tūr'hā-nā). A son of Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel, by Maacah, his concubine (I Chron. 2:48).

Tir'la (tir'ī-ā). A son of Jehallelel (I Chron. 4:16).

Tir-sha'tha (tūr-shā'thā) [Heb. from Pers.; cf. Avestan taršta, feared, revered]. The Persian title of the governor of Judah under the Persians, A.V.; R.V., "governor." It is borne by Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65, 70), and Nehemiah (Neh. 8:9; 10:1). In Neh. 12:26 the latter ruler is called pehāh, or governor, to which Tirshatha, therefore, must have been practically equivalent.

Tir'zah (tūr'zā) [pleasantry, delightfulness]. 1. The youngest among the 5 daughters of Zelophehad (Num. 26:33; 27:1; Josh. 17:3).

2. A town noted for beauty (S. of Sol. 6:4), which belonged originally to the Canaanites, but was captured by Joshua (Josh. 12:24). Jeroboam I took up his residence in Tirzah (I Kings 14:17), and it became the capital of the 10 tribes (chs. 15:21, 33; 16:6, 8, 9, 15, 17) till Omri built Samaria (vs. 23, 24), after which it sank into a provincial but still important town (II Kings 15:14, 16). It is probably to be identified with the large mound of Tell el-Fār'ah, about 7 miles n.e. of Nāblus (Shechem) in a straight line.

Tish'bite (tish'bit). A member of the family, or native of the town, called Tishbeh or something similar (I Kings 17:1). A family of this name is unknown. Towns only claim attention. One is mentioned in the Book of Tobit (ch. 1:2): "Tisbe, which is on the right [i.e., south] of Kydiōs of Naphtali in Galilee above Asher"; Kydiōs is Kedesh, and is so rendered in R.V. Another is discerned by the LXX and Josephus in the text of I Kings 17:1, lying e. of the Jordan, in Gilead. The construct pl. before Gilead in the Heb. text, which is rendered sojourners in the E.V., the LXX regarded as a local name, and made it Thesbōn (Lucian, Thessebōn). Josephus writes: "from the city of Thesbōnē [Thessebōnē, Niese's text] in the country of Galaditis" (Antiq. viii. 13, 2).

Tish'ri (tish'rē) [late Heb. from Akkad. tashrētu, tashritu, teshrētu, beginning]. The 7th month, also called Ethanim. The name implies a calendar in which the year began with this month; the 1st day of Ethanim or Tishri is the Jewish New Year (cf. Num. 29:1).

Tithe. A 10th part of one's income consecrated to God. The separation of a certain proportion of the products of one's industry or of the spoils of war as tribute to their gods was practiced by various nations of antiquity. The Lydians offered a tithe of their booty (Herod. i. 89). The Phoenicians and Carthaginians sent a tithe annually to the Tyrian Hercules. These tithes might be regular or occasional, voluntary or prescribed by law. The Egyptians were required to give a 5th part of their crops to Pharaoh (Gen. 47:24). Before the days of Joseph and Pharaoh, Abraham, returning with spoil from his victory over the confederate kings, gave to Melchizedek, priest-king of Salem, a 10th part of all (Gen. 14:20). Jacob said that if God conferred on him certain specified benefits, he would surely give 1/10 of it to God (ch. 28:22). Under the Mosaic Law the fruits of the ground and cattle were subject to tithing (Lev. 27:30, 32). The tithe of grain and fruit need not be paid in kind. The owner might redeem it by purchasing it at 1/5 more than its market value (v. 31). But the tithe of the herd and flock might not be redeemed. This tithe was separated by causing the cattle to pass under the rod, and every 10th animal was taken, whether it was defective or without blemish. The choice had been committed to God, and the beast might not be exchanged (vs. 32, 33). Grain was threshed before it was tithed, and the fruit of vineyard and oliveyard was converted into wine and oil before  $\frac{1}{10}$  of it was taken (Num. 18:27). All the tithe of Israel, which was offered as a heave offering, was given unto the Levites (vs. 21, 24). It was given to them as an inheritance in return for the service which they rendered at the sanctuary (v. 21), and as compensation for their lack of landed possessions. They paid a tithe of it to the priest (v. 26), and freely ate the rest anywhere (v. 31). On the eve of entering Canaan, where many of the Israelites would obtain homes far from the sanctuary, it was necessary to insist that the people should bring all prescribed sacrifices and freewill offerings, and all tithes, to the sanctuary (Deut. 12:5, 6, 11). They might not eat at home the tithe of their grain, wine, or oil, nor any offering, but before the Lord (vs. 17, 18). They must tithe all the increase of the field, and eat before the Lord the tithe of grain, wine, and oil, and the firstlings of flock and herd; but if the distance to the sanctuary was great, they might convert the offering into money, carry that to the sanctuary, and there buy what they chose for the eucharistic meal (ch. 14:23-27). Every 3d year each man's tithe should be laid up in his town, and the Levite, the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless should go to the store and eat (vs. 28, 29). After tithing the tithe in this 3d year, which was distinguished as the year of tithing and reminded the people that the tithe was to be kept in the town, it was put at the disposal of those for whom it was intended (ch. 26:12). There were 2 third-year tithings between Sabbatic years, when there was no tithe.

Inconsistencies between these laws do not exist, although interpreters often force them into contradiction. The Israelites took the tithe to the sanctuary both during the sojourn in the wilderness and after the settlement in the land (Num. 18:24; Deut. 12:6). There a portion was eaten by the offerer and the Levites in a eucharistic feast, and the rest was given to the Levites. The law was slightly modified in anticipation of the settlement of Canaan, and the residence of Levites and producers in many cases far from the sanctuary. Every 3d year they should store the tithe in the town where they dwelt, dispense with the eucharistic meal, place all the tithe at the disposal of the Levites and other dependent persons, and make solemn protestation before the Lord to having done this (Deut. 26:12-15). This asseveration before the Lord may have been made in the town, or at the sanctuary on occasion of attending one of the annual festivals. It is sometimes asserted that Deuteronomy is peculiar in 2 respects; it prescribes vegetable tithes only, and it enjoins that they shall be eaten at the altar by the offerer and the Levites in company. If Deuteronomy does actually differ from the law of Leviticus and Numbers in these points, it is a modification of the law 40 years after its first enactment and in view of new circumstances. In the later history, even when the Levitical legislation was in full force, the vegetable tithe alone is often mentioned (Neh. 10:37; 12:44; 13:12). It was the more prominent, since agriculture and horticulture were the chief industries of the people. The tithe of the cattle is, however, referred to (II Chron. 31:6). It would be in itself natural, if the eucharistic feast did not already exist, for Moses to introduce it in connection with tithes and firstlings, in view of the fact that the offerer frequently came from a distance and naturally required at least 1 meal at the sanctuary before returning. Still the omission of all mention of the feast in Leviticus and Numbers may be due to the feast's being regarded as a matter of course, a meal having been customary from time immemorial in connection with certain kinds of sacrifices and offerings. The tithe on agricultural and horticultural products alone is mentioned in Deuteronomy because, as regards tithes, it was only in connection with these tithes that a meal at the sanctuary was eaten, and the legislation in question is treating of eucharistic meals.

Another interpretation of the tithing laws requires mention. Not a few scholars have believed that the setting apart of  $\frac{1}{5}$  for Pharaoh, to which the Israelites had been accustomed in Egypt, was perpetuated by the Mosaic Law as tribute to Jehovah. This  $\frac{1}{5}$  was made up of 2 tithes. The 1st went to the Levites; the 2d was taken to the sanctuary and consumed there (Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 8), but in the 3d year was given to the Levites in addition to their own tithe. Some interpreters have even thought of 3 tithes. They regard the tithing of the 3d year as additional to the 2 others. This interpretation is as old as Josephus at least (Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 22), but it is unnecessary, and was scarcely the original intention of the law. The law is satisfied by the theory of 1 tithing.

In times of religious decline the people neglected to pay tithes. Hezekiah found it necessary to call authoritatively for their payment (II Chron. 31:4-12), and the Prophet Malachi was obliged to rebuke the people of his day for robbing God by withholding tithes and offerings (Mal. 3:7-12). The response of the people to Hezekiah's appeal was so hearty that he had to prepare chambers in the Temple precincts for storing the tithes (II Chron. 31:11). Whether he built additional quarters or cleared out old storehouses is not stated. The 2d Temple was likewise provided with storehouses (Neh. 13:10-14; Mal. 3:10), and Levites under the superintendence of a priest gathered the tithes into the towns and tithed them for the sanctuary (Neh. 10:37, 38). The payment of tithes continued (I Macc. 3:49; Luke 11:42; 18:12), but by the time of Christ changes had occurred. The tithe went to the priests (Jos. Antiq. xi. 5, 8; Apion i. 22; cf. Heb. 7:5), and was collected by them (Jos. Life 12, 15). Later the ordinary priests suffered from the cupidity of the chief priests, who forcibly took possession of the tithes (Jos. Antiq. xx. 8, 8; 9, 2).

TIT'le. A point or small line used to distinguish one letter of the Heb. alphabet from another as ב (beth) from כ (kaph), ש (sin) from ש (shin), or ר (resh) from ר (daleth); hence a minute requirement of the Law (Matt. 5:18, in Gr. kerata, horn, projection).

TIT'us (tīt'ūs). 1. A godly man of Corinth who was surnamed Justus (Acts 18:7, R.V.); see JUSTUS 2.

2. A trusted companion of Paul. He is not mentioned in The Acts, but is frequently referred to in Paul's epistles. He was born of Gentile parents (Gal. 2:3), and was one of the delegation from Antioch (Acts 15:2) who accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem at the time of the council (Gal. 2:1, 3). It is possible that he was a native of Antioch, and, since Paul calls him "my true child after a common faith" (Titus 1:4, R.V.), he may have been converted through the instrumentality of the apostle. He was evidently also much younger than Paul. His presence at the council gave offense to the Judaizers, but the Church refused to compel him to be circumcised, thus siding with Paul in his advocacy of the freedom of Gentiles from the Mosaic Law (Gal. 2:3-5). Titus next appears during and after Paul's residence in Ephesus. Titus had been sent to Corinth to correct certain abuses there which caused anxiety to the apostle (II Cor. 2:13; 7:6, 13; 8:6, 16; 12:18). He and another (ch. 12:18) probably were dispatched after I Corinthians had been sent, on account of later reports which the apostle had received. His task was a delicate one, and Paul awaited his return with much solicitude. When the apostle left Ephesus, he expected to meet Titus at Troas (II Cor. 2:12, 13), and, failing in this, went to Macedonia. There Titus rejoined him with good news (ch. 7:6, 13, 14), and was forthwith sent back to Corinth with our Second Epistle to the Corinthians (ch. 8:6, 18, 23). We do not read again of Titus until after Paul's release from his 1st Roman imprisonment; see PAUL. The Epistle to Titus informs us that he had been left in Crete to superintend the organization of the churches in that island. He seems to have been, like Timothy in Ephesus, an apostolic deputy. His mission, however, was but a temporary one, and he was told to rejoin the apostle in Nicopolis. The only remaining notice of him is in II Tim. 4:10, where he is said to have gone to Dalmatia.

The Epistle of Paul to Titus probably was written after Paul's traditional release from his 1st Roman imprisonment and his resumption of missionary work. It may be assigned to A.D. 65 or 66. Titus had been left as superintendent of the churches in Crete, and the epistle, like the First Epistle to Timothy, was intended to direct him in the performance of his difficult task. It may be divided as follows: 1. Salutation, particularly describing the dignity of the apostolic message (ch. 1:1-4). 2. Instructions concerning the character of those selected for bishops or elders, especially in view of the many false disciples whom Titus would be likely to meet and by whom he might be imposed upon (vs. 5-16). 3. Instructions which Titus should give to various classes in the Church, all to the effect that Christians should be "zealous of good works" (ch. 2). 4. Directions concerning the duty of Christians to society, bidding them emulate the love of man which God has shown in Christ (ch. 3:1-8). 5. Warnings against false teaching and heretics (vs. 9-11). 6. Personal directions and closing exhortation and benediction (vs. 12-15). The leading thought of the epistle is the importance of good works in all those representing or professing Christianity. On the Pastoral Epistles, see TIMOTHY and PAUL. G. T. P. (rev., H. S. G.)

Ti'zite (tī'zīt). The designation of a certain Joha (I Chron. 11:45), probably derived from the place of which he was a native.

To'ah (tō'ā) [cf. Akkad. taḫū, child]. A Kohathite Levite (I Chron. 6:34); see NAHATH 2.

Tob (tōb) [good]. A region e. of the Jordan, to which Jephunah fled when disowned by his brethren (Judg. 11:3, 5). Hanun, king of Ammon, who had given David just offense, drew soldiers from Tob among other places (II Sam. 10:6, R.V.), which indicates that it was beyond the borders of Israel. It was probably the district of Gilead known in Greek as the land of Tubias (I Macc. 5:13; cf. II Macc. 12:17). It may be et-Taiyibeh, 10 miles s. of Gadara (Mukeis or Umm Keis).

Tob'-ad-o-ni'jah (tōb'ād'ō-nī'jā) [good is Lord Jehovah]. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

To-bi'ah (tō-bī'ā) [Jehovah is good]. 1. Founder of a family, members of which, coming to Jerusalem after the Captivity, failed to prove their descent (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).

2. An Ammonite servant who ridiculed the efforts of the Jews to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10; 4:3, 7).

To'bie (tō'bī). See TUBIAS.

To-bi'jah (tō-bī'jā) [Jehovah is good]. 1. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

2. A Jew, one of those of the Captivity from whom the Prophet Zechariah obtained gold and silver to make crowns to put on the head of Joshua, the high priest (Zech. 6:10, 11, 14).

To'bit (tō'bīt). See APOCRYPHA 3.

To'chen (tō'kēn) [a weight, a measure]. A city belonging to the tribe of Simeon (I Chron. 4:32).

To-gar'mah (tō-gār'mā). A country of the far n. (Ezek. 38:6), inhabited by a people descended from Japheth through Gomer (Gen. 10:3). They traded in horses and mules (Ezek. 27:14). It is generally identified with Armenia. Friedrich Delitzsch, however, believes that the name appears in Til-garimmu, a city in the extreme e. of Cappadocia, mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions.

To'hu (tō'hū) [cf. Akkad. taḫū, child]. A son of Zuph, an ancestor of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1); see NAHATH 2.

To'i (tō'ē) and To'u. A king of Hamath, probably a Hittite, who was at war with Hadadezer, king of Zobah, a Syrian. He sent to congratulate David on his victory over their common foe (II Sam. 8:9-12; I Chron. 18:9-11).

Tok'hath (tōk'hāth). See TIKVAH 1.

To'la (tō'lā) [worm, scarlet]. 1. A son of Issachar, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 46:13; Num. 26:23; I Chron. 7:1).

2. Son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar, who judged Israel 23 years. He lived, died, and was buried at Shamir, on Mount Ephraim (Judg. 10:1, 2).

To'lad (tō'lād). See ELTOLAD.

Tomb. See SEPULCHER.

Tongue. 1. Besides signifying the organ of speech in the mouth, the word also denotes in a figurative sense speech or language (Gen. 10:5; cf. Acts 2:8 with v. 11). The descendants of Noah inherited and, for a long time after the Flood, spoke one language (Gen. 11:1). According to the Biblical account differences of speech were produced by divine judgment at Babel, which resulted in scattering abroad the people who had gathered there to all parts of the known world (vs. 2-9); see BABEL. In process of time the descendants of Noah came to speak several distinct languages and many different dialects. The Japhetic peoples largely used the languages now classed as Indo-European (ch. 10:2-5).

The Indo-European languages may be divided into: (1) Indo-Iranian: (a) Indic, including Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit, Hindi (Hindustani, Urdu), (b) Iranian, including Avestan, Old Persian, Modern Persian; (2) Armenian; (3) Balto-Slavonic: (a) Slavic or Slavonic (Bulgarian, Serbo-Croatian, Slovenian, Russian with its dialects, Czech, Slovak), (b) Lithuanian, Lettish; (4) Greek; (5) Italic, which includes Oscan and Umbrian, and Latin, with the Romance languages; (6) Celtic, including Welsh, Breton, Irish, Gaelic, Manx; (7) Germanic or Teutonic: (a) Gothic, (b) Scandinavian, which includes Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, and Icelandic, (c) West Germanic, including High German and Low German. (Under High German are grouped Old High German, Middle High German, and Modern German. Low German includes: on the one hand Plattdeutsch, Dutch and Afrikaans, Flemish, and Frisian; on the other hand, Anglo-Saxon, Middle English, and Modern English.)

The Semitic peoples generally spoke various dialects of the Semitic group (Gen. 10:21-31), embracing Akkadian (including Babylonian and Assyrian), Aramaic (v. 22), Arabic (vs. 26-29), Hebrew, and Ethiopic; see SEMITIC. In a very broad sense of the term the descendants of Ham spoke Hamitic languages. The Semitic and Hamitic languages are rather closely related, but they form 2 different groups. Under Hamitic languages we have: (1) the North African, of which the Berber languages are modern representatives; (2) Ethiopian or Cushitic of Abyssinia and the region s., as Afar, Galla, Somali; (3) Ancient Egyptian, together with its descendant Coptic. Since Egyptian bears a closer relationship to the Semitic languages than do the other 2 Hamitic groups, it may be called a Hamito-Semitic or Semito-Hamitic language.

The gift of tongues was granted on the Day of Pentecost which followed the feast of the passover at which Jesus suffered. The disciples were all together when suddenly there came from heaven a sound like that of a rushing, mighty wind, and visible tongues, having the appearance of fire, were distributed to each, and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:1-4). The Church was qualified and symbolically commissioned by the Spirit to declare the gospel to all men. Two general theories exist as to the nature of this gift: (1) The gift of tongues was manifested in ecstatic or elevated praise of God (Acts 10:46), which was unintelligible to man. The tongue was the organ of the Holy Spirit, and not of the person to whom the gift was given; and the words spoken were devotional and not for the instruction of the Church. In defense of this view it is urged that: (a) Paul makes no mention of foreign languages having been introduced at Corinth; and if tongues were referred to in I Cor., ch. 14 only, the impression would never have been made that they denote foreign languages. (b) Paul teaches that the understanding was not engaged (I Cor. 14:2). (c) The multitude could not understand them at Pentecost and accused the speakers of being drunken. It was necessary for Peter to interpret to the multitude what had taken place (Acts 2:13-17). Or if the disciples used foreign languages on the Day of Pentecost, this was a temporary form in which the gift of tongues was manifested and did not appear again. (2) The gift of tongues was manifested in intelligible discourse in tongues before unknown. (a) Luke's language clearly implies this (Acts 2:6-12). (b) Anybody could babble hysterically; only when the speakers used languages which they did not know before could the gift of tongues be recognized as miraculous. (c) The whole argument in I Corinthians assumes that the gift was speech in a foreign language, Paul contrasting speech and prayer in a foreign language uninterpreted with speaking and praying so as to be understood (I Cor. 12:10, 30; 14:13-16, 27, 28). Christians who had the gift should use it for missionary purposes and not exhibit their skill before their brethren, who did not understand what they said unless an interpreter were present.

Tongues were one of the signs that followed them that believed (Mark 16:17). They were a visible gift of the Holy Spirit bestowed in connection with the preaching of the apostles, or by the apostles through laying on of their hands (Acts 10:44-46; 19:1-7; cf. ch. 8:14-24). They were a phenomenon of the Apostolic Age, and gradually disappeared afterward. In the next century, perhaps 50 or 60 years after the death of the last apostle, Irenaeus could still report that he had heard many brethren who had prophetic gifts and spoke through the Spirit in all kinds of tongues (Haer. v. 6, 1).

2. A bar of gold (Josh. 7:21, 24, literally "tongue," but translated "wedge"). The Babylonians also spoke of tongues of gold, and a gold bar resembling a tongue has been found in the mound of ruined Gezer.

To'paz. A precious stone, called in Gr. topazion, and generally believed to be denoted by Heb. pit'dāh. It was the 2d stone in the 1st row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28:17; cf. the LXX and Jos. Antiq. iii. 7, 5). It was found in Ethiopia (Job 28:19) and on an island in the Red Sea (Diodorus Siculus iii. 38, 39; Pliny Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 9), and was known at Tyre (Ezek. 28:13). It adorns the 9th foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:20). The topaz of the ancients was a yellow variety of corundum.

To'phel (tō'fēl). A place, perhaps once a station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Deut. 1:1). Robinson and others have identified it with Tāfileh, about 14 miles s.e. of the s.e. curve of the Dead Sea. The consonants, however, are different, teth instead of taw, which raises a doubt as to the correctness of the identification.

To'pheth (tō'fēth), in A.V. To'phet (tō'fēt) (except II Kings 23:10) [ety. uncertain; spitting out, place of abhorrence; or perhaps originally from an Aram. word, place of burning]. Certain high places built in the valley of the son of Hinnom; on these the people of Jerusalem in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah were accustomed to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire (Jer. 7:31) as offerings to Molech (II Kings 23:10). Apparently on the top of the high place there was a deep and large hole in which much wood was piled, ignition being produced by a stream of brimstone (Isa. 30:33). Josiah defiled it, and Jeremiah prophesied that such a number of people should be killed there that the name Topheth should disappear, and the valley where it stood be called the valley of slaughter (Jer. 7:32, 33; 19:6). A Topheth, apparently of the same type, was to be prepared for the king of Assyria. See HINNOM, VALLEY OF.

Torch. A flambeau, giving a flaring light, and often portable (Judg. 7:16, R.V.; Matt. 25:3, R.V. marg.; John 18:3; see LAPPIDOTH); primitively, merely a piece of resinous wood, or a bunch or twist of absorbent material soaked in oil and borne on a rod or carried by some other form of holder or incased in a narrow, conical clay wrapping or vase.

Tor'mah (tōr'mā) [fraud]. A town in which Abimelech was once found (Judg. 9:31, R.V. marg.). More probably the word means craftily, as it is rendered in the R.V.; in which case the town of Tormah disappears.

Tor-men'tors. The jailers who were to keep the debtor safe and make his life miserable by chains, stocks, and doubtless other means of distress and torture until his debts were paid (Matt. 18:34). Torture was often applied to extort confessions (Acts 22:24; Jos. Antiq. xvi. 8, 4; 11, 6).

Tor'toise. See LIZARD.

To'u (tō'ū). See TOI.

Tow'er. A lofty building, much higher than broad. A booth was sufficient to shelter the watchman placed to guard a vineyard (Isa.

1:8); but a tower, being more permanent and ornamental, indicated the owner's interest in his vineyard and his expectation of many seasons of fruitfulness (Isa. 5:2; Matt. 21:33; Mark 12:1). Stronger towers were built for defense. They were erected in the wilderness for the security of the shepherds and to keep marauders away (II Kings 17:9; II Chron. 26:10). They formed part of the defenses of fortified cities (II Kings 14:7; Neh. 3:1). They were erected beside the city gates, at the corners of the walls, and at intervals in the intervening space (II Chron. 26:9). Watchmen were stationed on them (II Kings 9:17), military engines for shooting arrows and stones were mounted on them (II Chron. 26:15), and the citizens found refuge in them when sore pressed by the enemy (Judg. 9:51, 52; Ps. 61:3). Within their massive walls the inmates were secure; their height allowed openings for light and air, out of reach of the adversary; and from their top missiles could be advantageously discharged at the foe.

Tower of Ba'bel (bā'bēl). See BABEL.

Town Clerk. An official with the title of grammateus or scribe (Acts 19:35). Probably the duties of a grammateus originally were to record the laws and read them in public, but in course of time other functions were added to the office. Coins show that in the several cities of Asia Minor the town clerk presided in popular assemblies and was the virtual, or in some cases the actual, head of the municipal government.

Trach'on'i'tis (trāk'ō-nī'tis) [Gr., rough, i.e., hilly region]. A region which at the appearance of John the Baptist as a preacher constituted, with Ituraea, a tetrarchy ruled over by Philip, the brother of Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee (Luke 3:1). It lay s. of Damascus (Strabo xvi. 2, 20), and comprehended the stretch of volcanic rocks now called al-Laja', and extended w. to Ulatha and Paneas, and s. to the borders of Batanea and Jebel Hauran (Jos. Antiq. xv. 10, 3; xvii. 2, 1 and 2).

Trag'a-canth. A gum (Gen. 37:25, R.V. marg.; 43:11), produced by several low, spiny shrubs of the genus Astragalus, especially from Astragalus gummifer. The plant is leguminous. Those from which gum is obtained are dwarf shrubs, protected by a dense mass of long thorns. The flowers are axillary and in most species are yellow, but in some are white or purple. Under the heat of the sun the gum exudes from the trunk, branches, thorns, and leaves, and is collected in Palestine by passing over the shrub a cloth or bunch of threads to which the viscous exudation adheres. It is used to impart firmness to pills, to marble books, and to stiffen crepes and calicoes.

Trance. A state in which the functions of the senses are suspended and the soul seems to be liberated from the body while it contemplates some extraordinary object; ecstasy. Peter on 1 occasion (Acts 11:5), and Paul on another, fell into such a trance (ch. 22:17). See VISIONS.

Tres'pass Offer'ing. See OFFERINGS.

Tribes. See EGYPT, III. 7.

Trib'ute. 1. Money, goods, or service exacted by a nation or king from foreign subjects (Deut. 20:11; R.V. marg., taskwork; Judg. 1:28, A.V.; Ezra 4:13; Neh. 5:4; Esth. 10:1; Matt. 17:25). The Pharisees endeavored to put Jesus in a dilemma by asking him whether it was lawful to pay tribute to the Roman emperor (Matt. 22:17). If he answered in the affirmative, he would offend the people, since with them independence was a matter of religion and they paid the foreign tax with undisguised reluctance. The Pharisees expected him to declare that tribute to the Romans was unlawful, for they knew that he had publicly announced his claims to the throne of David; and an answer of this sort would justify a charge of rebellion against him. Jesus replied by calling for a coin. The coinage of money is the prerogative of the ruler. He pointed to the image of the Roman emperor which it bore, and his reply meant: "Give to the ruler whom you acknowledge whatever belongs to him, and to God whatever belongs to God." Jesus recognized the distinction between the 2 spheres of duty.

2. The didrachma or half shekel paid for the expenses of the Temple worship (Matt. 17:24; in R.V. half shekel). This payment was suggested at first by the half shekel which each male Israelite above 20 years of age paid as atonement money when he was numbered in the census (Ex. 30:11-16). In the time of Nehemiah the Israelites voluntarily assumed an annual payment of the 3d part of a shekel toward defraying the cost of the Temple service (Neh. 10:32, 33). Later the 3d part of a shekel was changed to half a shekel, and was made an annual tax collected from every Jew of 20 years of age and upward throughout the world (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 9, 1). The collector at Capernaum asked Peter whether his Master paid this half shekel, and Peter impulsively answered that he did (Matt. 17:24, 25). Jesus did indeed pay it; but it was incongruous for him to do so, and he drew Peter's attention to the matter. He pointed out to him that earthly kings exact tribute from aliens, not from their own children. Peter had recently confessed Jesus as the Son of God. It was for God's house and worship that this tax was levied, and it was scarcely proper for God's Son to be required to pay it. Such is the common interpretation of Christ's words on this occasion. After the fall of Jerusalem the Roman emperor Vespasian enjoined the Jews throughout the empire to bring to Jupiter Capitolinus in Rome the 2 drachmas which they had formerly paid to the Temple (Jos. War vii. 6, 6).

Tro'as (trō'ās) [Gr., the Troad, region around Troy]. A seaport (Acts 16:11) of Mysia; where Paul saw in vision a man of Macedonia inviting him to Europe (Acts 16:8-10; II Cor. 2:12). The apostle tarried there a week while returning from his Third Journey (Acts 20:6). On one occasion he left his cloak, books, and parchments there (II Tim. 4:13). It was founded by Antigonos, one of Alexander's successors, who called it Antigonias; but after his death his opponent Lysimachus, king of Thrace, altered its name to Alexandria, and Troas was added to distinguish it from Alexandria in Egypt. It was situated some distance s. of Homer's Troy, which furnished the name Troas to the district.

Tro'gy'l'i-um (trō-jī'lī-ūm). A town and a promontory on the w. coast of Asia Minor, opposite the island of Samos. Paul tarried there on the return to Jerusalem from his Third Journey (Acts 20:15; see R.V. marg.). An anchorage at the place is called St. Paul's Port.

Troph'i-mus (trōf'i-mūs) [Gr., nourishing]. A Gentile Christian of Ephesus, who was with Paul for a time on his missionary travels, and whom he was falsely accused of having brought into the Temple in defiance of the Law (Acts 20:4; 21:29). The last we hear of him is that he was left by the apostle at Miletus sick (II Tim. 4:20, in A.V. Miletus).

Trum'pet. 1. A wind instrument, made of the horn of an animal or in imitation of it (Josh. 6:5; cf. Dan. 3:5, where keren, horn, is rendered cornet), and called in Heb. shôphâr. The latter word is rendered cornet in 4 passages where the hāsôs-râh is mentioned with it and rendered trumpet (I Chron. 15:28; II Chron. 15:14; Ps. 98:6; Hos. 5:8). Its sound was loud, and audible at a great distance (Ex. 19:16, 19); and was well adapted to increase the noise of shouting (II Sam. 6:15; Ps. 98:6), but was ill-suited to be played with harps and pipes in an orchestra. At the shout of the people and the blast of the trumpets the walls of Jericho came tumbling down (Josh. 6:1-20). It was used in war to assemble the army (Judg. 3:27; 6:34; I Sam. 13:3), to sound the attack (Job 39:24), to signal the cessation of the pursuit (II Sam. 2:28; 18:16), and to announce the disbanding of the army (II Sam. 20:1, 22). Watchmen blew it to sound the alarm (Jer. 6:1; Amos 3:6). Its blast proclaimed the accession of the king (II Sam. 15:10; I Kings 1:34; II Kings 9:13), and the commencement of the year of jubilee (Lev. 25:9). The 1st day of the 7th month was celebrated by solemn rest from ordinary labor, a holy convocation, and the offering of special burnt offerings (Lev. 23:24, 25; Num. 29:1-6), because the day marked a recurring 7th portion of time. It was a day or memorial of blowing of trumpets, designed to bring the people into remembrance before the Lord. The Jewish tradition is doubtless correct which states that the trumpet used was the shôphâr (cf. Lev. 25:9).

2. The invariable rendering of Heb. hāsôs-râh. Two were made of silver for use at the tabernacle (Num. 10:2); but the number was increased as time went on. One hundred and twenty were blown at the dedication of the Temple (II Chron. 5:12). The doubling of trumpets is noteworthy; 2 trumpets are shown on the Arch of Titus and likewise on Jewish coins. The priests often functioned in pairs, and 2 priests would need 2 trumpets. Probably they played in unison, but they may have given some passages antiphonally. The trumpets were a little less than a cubit in length. The tube was narrow, somewhat thicker than a flute, and ended in the form of a bell, like common trumpets (Jos. Antiq.

Assyrian and Egyptian Trumpets

iii. 12, 6). They were used by the priests to announce festivals, to call the congregation, and on advancing to battle (Num. 10:1-10; 31:6). The trumpet was used to give the alarm in war (Hos. 5:8). Priests may have blown them at the coronation of Joash (II Kings 11:14; II Chron. 23:13). For their use in the Temple orchestra, see MUSIC.

3. Trumpet is expressed by the Gr. word salpi(n)gx in the N.T. It was used in war (I Cor. 14:8), and will announce the Second Advent of Christ (Matt. 24:31), and the resurrection of the dead (I Cor. 15:52). Seven trumpets were sounded to introduce as many apocalyptic visions (Rev., chs. 8 to 11). By salpi(n)gx the hāsôs-râh or sacred trumpet is meant in Ecclus. 50:16; I Macc. 3:54; and probably chs. 4:40; 5:33; 16:8.

Try-phae'na (trî-fē'nâ), in A.V. Try-phe'na (trî-fē'nâ) [Lat. from Gr., delicate, dainty]. A woman at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutation, commending her for laboring in the Lord (Rom. 16:12).

Try'phon (trî'fôn) [Gr., luxurious]. A general of Alexander Balas (I Macc. 11:39). He was a native of Casiana near Apamea in Syria, and originally bore the name of Diodotus (Strabo xvi. 2, 10). After the death of Balas and the recognition of Demetrius II as king of Syria, 145 B.C., Tryphon set up Antiochus VI, the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a rival to Demetrius (I Macc. 11:39, 40), and with the help of the Jews was rapidly conquering the country. His treachery to Jonathan Maccabaeus, however (chs. 12:39; 13:31, 32), caused his Jewish allies to go over to the side of Demetrius. Tryphon meantime had murdered young Antiochus and declared himself king (ch. 12:31, 39). The capture of Demetrius by Arsaces, the Parthian king, left Tryphon to his own schemes for a while, but Demetrius' brother, Antiochus VII, opposed him and succeeded in besieging him, first in Dor on the Phoenician coast (ch. 15:10-14, 37), and afterward in Apamea, where Tryphon lost his life in 138 B.C. (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 7, 2).

Try-pho'sa (trî-fō'sâ) [Gr., dainty, delicate]. A woman at Rome whose name is coupled with that of Tryphaena in the list of those Romans to whom Paul sent his salutation. They may have been sisters or fellow deaconesses. They are mentioned as laboring in the Lord (Rom. 16:12).

Tsa-dhe' (tsä-dä'), in A.V. Tzad'di; E.R.V. Tza-de' (tsä-dä') [Heb. šādē]. The 18th letter of the Heb. alphabet. No letter in the Eng. alphabet corresponds to it, but it is a strong s sound. In Anglicizing Hebrew names, s, t, or z is used to represent it. It heads the 18th section of Psalm 119, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Tu'bal (tū'bāl). A tribe descended from Japheth (Gen. 10:2). It is mentioned with Javan (Isa. 66:19) and with Meshech as trading in the Tyrian markets with slaves and vessels of brass (Ezek. 27:13; 32:26). Gog was prince of Meshech and Tubal (chs. 38:2, 3; 39:1). The descendants of Tubal are the Tibareni or Tibarenoi of the classical writers. For their country and history, see MESHECH.

Tu'bal-cain' (tū'bāl-kān') [Tubal, the smith]. A son of the Cainite Lamech by his wife Zillah. He was the forger of cutting instruments of brass and iron (Gen. 4:22). Tubal represents the Tibarenoi, who were iron workers, and so the name Tubal-cain looks like a doublet denoting the occupation of the smith.

Tu'bi-as (tū'bi-ās), in A.V. To'bie. A district e. of the Jordan (I Macc. 5:13; cf. II Macc. 12:17), probably the land of Tob; see TOB.

Tur'ban. See DIADEM.

Tur'tle and Tur'tle-dove'. A species of pigeon. It is gentle and harmless, fit emblem of a defenseless and innocent people (Ps. 74:19). It is migratory (Jer. 8:7), and a herald of spring (S. of Sol. 2:12). Abraham sacrificed a turtle dove and other victims when the Lord's covenant was made with him (Gen. 15:9). Under the Law it served as a burnt offering (Lev. 1:14) and for a sin offering; and 2 turtle doves were prescribed for these 2 sacrifices in case a poor person was obliged to make a guilt offering, and for the purification of a woman after childbirth if she was poor, of a man or woman with an issue, and of a Nazirite (Lev. 5:7; 12:6, 8; 15:14, 29, 30; Num. 6:10, 11). It was readily obtainable by the poor, for it abounds in Palestine and is easily trapped. Three species of turtle dove are described by Tristram as occurring in Palestine. The most abundant is the common turtle dove (Turtur vulgaris), which reaches Palestine from the s. in countless numbers at the beginning of March, and departs again at the approach of winter. The 2d is the collared turtle dove (Turtur risorius). It is a summer migrant, breeding in Palestine in trees and bushes. The 3d species, the palm turtle dove (Turtur senegalensis), does not migrate, but remains permanently in the Dead Sea Valley, which has a tropical climate.

Tu'tor. See SCHOOLMASTER.

Twin Brothers. See CASTOR and POLLUX.

Tych'icus (tik'ī-kūs) [Gr. fortuitus]. A Christian of the province of Asia who, with others, traveled on in advance of Paul from Macedonia to Troas, and awaited the apostle's arrival in that city (Acts 20:4). He was a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, and was sent by Paul to carry to their destination the Epistles to the Ephesians and to the Colossians (Eph. 6:21; Col. 4:7). Paul proposed also to send him as a messenger to Titus in Crete (Titus 3:12). Afterward he was dispatched to Ephesus (II Tim. 4:12).

Ty-ran'us (tī-rān'ūs) [Lat. from Gr., an absolute sovereign, a tyrant]. A man at Ephesus who was either a teacher of philosophy or rhetoric, or else a Jewish scribe who gave instruction in the Law. In his school Paul disputed, with the view of making Christianity known after he no longer had access for this purpose to the Jewish synagogue (Acts 19:9).

Tyre (tīr), in A.V. often Ty'rus (tī'rūs) [a rock]. An important city of Phoenicia. It was a place of great antiquity (Isa. 23:7; Jos. Antiq. viii. 3, 1); but it was founded or attained to importance after Sidon (Gen. 10:15; Isa. 23:12). The priests of Melkarth told Herodotus that it was founded 2,300 years before his visit, which would make the city come into existence about 2,750 B.C. (Herod. ii. 44). According to ancient testimony, Tyre originally stood on the mainland; but in course of time, for safety against besiegers, it was transferred to the neighboring rocky island which gave name to the locality. Ancient writers frequently allude to its situation in the sea (Ezek. 26:17; 27:32). The town on the mainland became known as Palaetyrus or Old Tyre. Tyre was nearer to the Israelites than Sidon, and this fact, with the increasing greatness of Tyre over Sidon, established the constant order observed in speaking of the 2 cities, Tyre and Sidon. Tyre was subject to Egypt in the 15th century B.C. (Tell el-Amarna tablets). In the time of Joshua it was a strong place (Josh. 19:29). It lay on the border of Asher, but was not assigned to that or any other tribe, nor do the Israelites appear to have possessed it at any period of their history. In the time of David it was regarded as a stronghold (II Sam. 24:7). Hiram, king of Tyre, was friendly with David and Solomon, and aided them with materials for the erection by the former of his palace (II Sam. 5:11; I Kings 5:1; I Chron. 14:1) and by the latter of the Temple and the other edifices which he built (I Kings 9:10-14; II Chron. 2:3-16). Another Hiram, a brass founder, who cast pillars and other work for the Temple, was of mixed Tyrian and Hebrew parentage (I Kings 7:13, 14, 40, 45). The taste of the Tyrians was not for war, but for manufacture, commerce, money-making, sea voyages, and colonization. They produced purple dyes, metal work, and glassware; and they trafficked even with remotest peoples (cf. I Kings 9:28). Their merchants were princes, the honorable of the earth (Isa. 23:8). In the 9th century B.C. a colony from Tyre founded Carthage, which became a formidable rival to Rome. Still, though by taste a commercial people, they were often forced into war. Early in the 9th century they purchased immunity from Ashur-nasir-pal, king of Assyria, and later were represented in the alliance, which included Ahab, formed to resist Ashur-nasir-pal's son and successor Shalmaneser. But at length Tyre with others paid him tribute. About 724 B.C. Shalmaneser V, king of Assyria, after receiving the submission of Old Tyre, laid siege to island Tyre, but he died in 722 without effecting its capture (Jos. Antiq. ix. 14, 2; cf. probably Isa., ch. 23). It yielded to his successor Sargon. The friendliness of the Tyrians toward Israel had ceased by this time. The prophets denounced the Tyrians for delivering Israelites to the Edomites (Amos 1:9), and despoiling them of goods, and selling them as slaves to the Greeks (Joel 3:5, 6). The city was not plundered, as were the neighboring towns by Sennacherib, but was besieged by Esarhaddon, and yielded on honorable terms to Ashurbanipal in 664 B.C. In the next century it enjoyed great commercial prosperity, and its merchants traded with all the countries of the known world (Ezek., ch. 27). Jeremiah prophesied Tyre's subjection (Jer. 27:1-11). The classic prophecy against Tyre, entering into more detail, is that of Ezekiel (Ezek. 26:1 to 28:19; 29:18-20). These prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel refer largely to a siege of Tyre (585-573 B.C.) by Nebuchadnezzar, lasting 13 years (Jos. Apion i. 21). It is not certainly known whether he actually captured any part of the 2 cities (cf. Ezek. 29:18-20); if he did, it was probably only the one on the shore (ch. 26:7-11 and perhaps 12), and the result did not compensate the besiegers for their toil. However, Tyre finally made terms and acknowledged Nebuchadnezzar's suzerainty. In 332 B.C. Alexander the Great took the city on the island after a siege of 7 months, having made his way to it by building a mole from the mainland across the narrow strait. But it soon recovered considerable prosperity (cf. Isa. 23:15-18).

Our Lord once visited the coasts of Tyre and Sidon (Matt. 15:21-28; Mark 7:24-31), and people from the region occasionally attended on his ministry (Mark 3:8; Luke 6:17). He pointed out that the responsibilities of those heathen cities were much less than those of the places around the Sea of Galilee, which constantly heard his preaching and saw his miracles (Matt. 11:21, 22; Luke 10:13, 14). A Christian community existed there in the 1st century (Acts 21:3-6). The scholar Origen, who died about A.D. 254, was buried in the Christian basilica in Tyre. A larger and grander basilica was erected by the bishop Paulinus, and at its consecration in 323 the church historian Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, preached the sermon.

In 638 the city was captured by the Moslems. The lives and property of the citizens were spared on the condition that no new churches be built, no bells be rung, no horses be ridden by Christians, no insults be offered to Islam. On the 27th of June, 1124, Tyre was taken by the Crusaders. The German emperor Barbarossa, who was drowned on his crusade in 1190, was buried in their cathedral. They lost the city again in March, 1291, when it was reduced almost to a heap of stones. Quantities of its stones have been carried away to Beirut, Acre, and Joppa, for building purposes. The walls are in ruinous condition and have in part disappeared or been covered with sand. Tyre had 2 harbors: the Sidonian on the n.e. part of the island, and the Egyptian on the s. end. The Sidonian was within the circumvallation of the city, and its entrance could be blocked by stretching a chain from one side to the other. The Egyptian was an open harbor, outside the fortifications, but adjoining them; it is now filled with sand and no longer used. Alexander's mole still remains; its breadth is nearly half a mile. Most of the ruins, including the cathedral, are of Crusader times. The fountains and reservoirs called Rās el-'Ain supplied the city with water by means of an aqueduct starting 15 or 20 feet above the level of the ground, so as to give a sufficient slope for its descent. Tyre was for a considerable period all but destitute of inhabitants. It has, however, slightly revived and is called Sūr, the old name in Arabic form. Its houses are chiefly on the e. part of what was once the island, but the former island has been converted by Alexander's mole and accumulated sand into a promontory jutting out from the shore. In its prime Tyre was as important in commerce as Jerusalem is for religion, Athens for philosophy, and Rome for law and government.

The Ladder of Tyre is a high mountain on the coast of Syria, 100 stades or about 11 miles n. of Ptolemais (Jos. War ii. 10, 2). This statement of distance and direction identifies it with a part or the whole of the massive, mountainous promontory, 7 miles in width, which thrusts itself into the sea and forms the natural boundary between Palestine and Phoenicia (I Macc. 11:59). At its s.w. angle Rās en-Nākūrah, a bold headland, projects, leaving no beach between its base and the water, and forcing the coast road to ascend and cross it. This part of the great promontory is commonly identified with the Ladder. Some travelers, however, localize the Ladder at the n.w. angle, where Rās el-'Abyad, the white promontory, stands. A road is cut through its precipitous cliffs for about a mile; it overhangs the sea and rises at points to the height of 200 feet above the water.

Tzad'di (tsād'ē; tsā-dē'). See TSADHE.

U

U'cal (ū'kāl) [I am strong]. One of 2 sons, pupils, or contemporaries, to whom Agur addressed his prophecy or proverbs (Prov. 30:1). This interpretation represents the traditional Hebrew punctuation and derives support from v. 4, where a person is addressed and asked to answer if he knows. Another interpretation (I am consumed), which, however, rejects the Masoretic punctuation, is given in the margin of the R.V.

U'el (ū'ēl) [will of God]. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:34).

Uk'naz (ūk'nāz). The marginal reading of I Chron. 4:15, A.V.; but a Hebrew proper name would not begin as this word does. In the text it is properly regarded as 2 words, and the R.V. correctly, renders it "and Kenaz."

U'lai (ū'lī). A river on the banks of which Daniel was in vision when he saw the prophetic ram, the he-goat, etc. (Dan. 8:2, 16). The Ulai is undoubtedly the Eulaeus. Among the 3 streams near Susa, the Ulai can best be identified with an artificial canal some 900 feet wide; it left the Choaspes at Pai Pul, about 20 miles n.w. of Susa, passed close to the town of Susa on the n. or n.e., and afterward joined the Coprates.

U'lam (ū'lām) [first, leader; cf. Arab. 'awwal, first]. 1. A Manassite (I Chron. 7:16, 17).

2. A son of Eshek, a Benjamite descended from Saul through Jonathan (I Chron. 8:39, 40).

U'lā (ūl'ā). An Asherite (I Chron. 7:39), probably descended from Helem (v. 35).

Um'mah (üm'ā) [juxtaposition]. A town of Asher (Josh. 19:30); not identified. Thomson proposes 'Alma, about 5 miles from the shore at Rās en-Nākūrah. Some considerations suggest that Akko may be the original text. Kaph(k) was not infrequently mistaken for mem(m).

Un'cle. The brother of one's father (II Kings 24:17, Heb.). The Heb. word is dōd, which is of broader meaning than uncle and denotes any kinsman on the father's side (Lev. 10:4; Amos 6:10); as a cousin (cf. Jer. 32:12 with vs. 8, 9), or a member of the same tribe (Num. 36:11).

Unclean' An'i-mals. A general distinction between clean and unclean meats was made by the nations of antiquity. Some animals were recognized as fit for food and sacrifice, while others were not. The distinction was based partly on the discovered unsuitableness or unwholesomeness of the flesh for food, partly on habits and prey, and partly on an inexplicable natural abhorrence to certain animals. Regard was paid in the Mosaic legislation to this customary attitude of the men of the age, and the distinction between clean and unclean meats was incorporated in the Law. Other animals were added to the list of the unclean, out of special considerations involved in the religion of the Israelites; in some cases no doubt ancient taboos were considered. Unclean animals were classified as follows: 1. Beasts that do not both part the hoof entirely and chew the cud (Lev. 11:3, 4), including all that go on 4 paws (v. 27). The Law accordingly allows only animals of the ox, sheep, and goat kind, and deer and gazelles (Deut. 14:4, 5). It excludes among other animals all carnivorous beasts. They eat blood or carrion, and were therefore intolerable to the Israelite. 2. Carnivorous birds, of which 20 or 21 are specially named (Lev. 11:13-19; Deut. 14:12-18). The enumeration included the bat, which was classed as a bird. They eat blood or carrion. 3. Winged insects which do not have in addition to the 4 legs 2 hind legs for leaping (Lev. 11:20-23). All insects are excluded except the locust (grasshopper). 4. Whatever in the water has not both fins and scales (vs. 9, 10). This prohibition left for use the most wholesome varieties of fish found in the waters of Palestine. It excluded eels and water animals which are not fish, such as crabs. Numa forbade the Romans to offer scaleless fish in sacrifice (Pliny Hist. Nat. xxxii. 10); and the modern Egyptians are said to regard such fish as unwholesome. Some of these scaleless and finless creatures were snake-like, and recalled the first sin and its curse. 5. Small creeping things (Lev. 11:29, 30); every creeping thing that goes upon its belly or upon all fours, or has many feet (vs. 41, 42). Some were unwholesome; others crept in the dust or through slime; still others were snakelike. Not improbably there was a religious repugnance to creeping things in general, because their mode of locomotion was a reminder of the serpent and the curse on the tempter.

These animals were unclean under any circumstance. But the flesh of even clean animals might become unclean. The Law forbade the eating of things offered in sacrifice to idols, things strangled or dead of themselves or killed by beast or bird of prey. Blood and fat of bird and beast were sacred to the Lord. None might eat of the blood, not even the stranger that sojourned in Israel (Lev. 17:10-14). The violator of the law respecting blood was cut off from his people (chs. 7:27; 17:10, 14). The offender against the laws regarding unclean animals was unclean until the evening (chs. 11:24, 40; 17:15). Animals that died of themselves might be sold to strangers and eaten by them (Deut. 14:21).

Unclean'ness. The Law distinguished between clean and holy (Lev. 10:10); for example, animals are clean or unclean, not holy or unholy. Uncleanness, when not presumptuously incurred, was ceremonial, not moral defilement. It excluded man from the sanctuary (ch. 7:20, 21) and from fellowship with members of the commonwealth of Israel, but it did not interrupt spiritual communion with God in prayer. At the same time, the laws that defined uncleanness were in some cases enforced by the injunction, "Be ye holy; for I am holy" (ch. 11:44, 45). In keeping himself from the unclean, man had regard to the fact that he was set apart from a common to a sacred service, and that as a man of God he was holy unto the Lord and must be separate and touch no unclean thing. Furthermore, ceremonial uncleanness was typical of sin. Physical cleanliness also is different from ceremonial cleanness. The 2 were not synonymous, although the 2 conditions sometimes coincided. Comfort and the demands of society required bodily cleanliness on the part of the Hebrews. There were divers washings which had nothing to do with ceremonial purity. The laws of cleanliness which governed men in their intercourse with each other were instinctively observed by reverent persons in their approach to God, and found expression in commands and institutions (Ex. 19:12, 14; 30:18-21; Josh. 3:5). Ceremonial defilement, for which purification was provided, was incurred in a special manner and was restricted to certain acts and processes. It was acquired by: 1. Contact with a human corpse (Num. 19:11-22). This defilement was the gravest, for the effect of sin is revealed in strongest light in the death of man and the dissolution of the body. Uncleanness arising from this cause continued 7 days, and was removed by the water of separation. Even the necessary handling of the ashes of the red heifer, which were used to cleanse from defilement by contact with the dead, rendered unclean (vs. 7-10); and contact with the unclean person rendered the clean person unclean until evening (v. 22). 2. Leprosy in man, clothing, or building (Lev., chs. 13; 14). The leper was excluded from human society (ch. 13:46), and for his cleansing he required special ablution and sacrifice. 3. Natural and morbid issues from the generative organs (Lev., ch. 15), including puerperal uncleanness (ch. 12). Generation and parturition were not sinful in themselves; they were ordained by the Creator (Gen. 1:27, 28). The bodily issues connected with them, however, in man or woman, whether voluntary or involuntary, defiled; man's affinity to the lower animals is apparent in reproduction, for right though marriage is, in heaven they neither marry nor are given in marriage; and probably the divine judgment pronounced on Eve for sin was remembered in connection with childbirth. 4. Eating the flesh of an unclean animal, or contact with its carcass or with that of a clean animal not slain for food and which had thus become subject to the corruption of death (Lev., ch. 11). See UNCLEAN ANIMALS AND PURIFICATION.

U'ni-corn. Any 1-horned animal, as the rhinoceros (Isa. 34:7, A.V. marg.; the word is rendered "wild-ox" in R.V.). The idea of the unicorn may have its origin in art, where the artist depicted the animal from 1 side so that the 2 horns were merged into 1. The Biblical animal, however, was 2-horned (Deut. 33:17, where the word is sing., and not pl., as in A.V.). It was possessed of great strength (Num. 23:22; 24:8), but was too untamable to bend its neck to the yoke or assist man in his agricultural labors (Job 39:9-12). It was frisky in youth (Ps. 29:6). It was not the wild buffalo, for this beast is quite tamable. The R.V. marg. (Num. 23:22) renders it by "ox-antelope," meaning the oryx (Antelope leucoryx); see ANTELOPE. This interpretation is supported by the analogy of Heb. re'em to Arab. rim, (white antelope or gazelle); but the oryx is timid and in ancient Egypt was frequently tamed and used in the plow. There is every reason to believe that the Heb. word signifies the wild ox (R.V.); for this animal is denoted by the corresponding Akkad. word rimu. Admirable representations of it by Assyrian artists show it to be the aurochs (Bos primigenius). Tiglath-pileser I (c. 1115-1102 B.C.) hunted it in the land of the Hittites, at the foot of Lebanon. It is now extinct, and its name has been transferred in Syria to another animal; but its previous occurrence on and around Lebanon is independently proved by the fact that Tristram discovered its teeth in the bone caves of Lebanon. It is distinguished from its descendant, the common ox, by having a flatter forehead and large horns with double curvature.

Un'ni (ûn'î) [(Jehovah) has answered].
1. A Levite of the 2d degree in David's reign, who played the psaltery (I Chron. 15:18, 20). It is doubtful whether the word doorkeepers (v. 18) is intended to include him.

2. A Levite in the time of Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:9, A.V.); see UNNO.

Un'no (ûn'ô), in A.V. Un'ni [the former is the kethib; the latter, the kere]. A Levite who was a contemporary of the high priest Jeshua (Neh. 12:9).

U'phar'sin (û-fâr'sin). See MENE.

U'phaz (û-fâz). A place from which gold was brought (Jer. 10:9; Dan. 10:5). No such place is known, but it has been understood to refer to Ophir. But paz is Heb. for fine gold, and the word has accordingly been rendered by some commentators "and fine gold."

Ur, I (ûr). A city of ancient Sumer (later Babylonia, which finally was occupied by the Chaldeans or Chaldees), the birthplace of Abraham (Gen. 11:28, 31; 15:7; Neh. 9:7). Its site is now identified with Mukayyar (Arab., bitumened, or pitched), in Lower Babylonia, on the w. bank of the Euphrates. It may have been settled somewhere around 4000 B.C., when settlers began to appear in the marshlands. It was a seat of the worship of the moon-god. See BABYLONIA.

Ur, II (ûr) [flame]. Father of one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:35). The transcriber perhaps made 2 heroes, Ur and Hopher, out of 1 whose name was Ahasbai or perhaps ûrihaph (cf. II Sam. 23:34).

Ur-ba'nus (ûr-bâ'nûs), in A.V. Ur'bane (ûr'bân) [Lat., urbane, polite]. A Christian to whom the Apostle Paul sent his salutation (Rom. 16:9).

U'ri (ûrî) [an abbreviation of Urijah, q.v.]. 1. Father of Bezalel, the craftsman (Ex. 31:2).

2. Father of Solomon's taxgatherer Geber (I Kings 4:19).

3. A porter whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

U'ri'ah (û-rî'â), in A.V. of N.T. U'ri'as (û-rî'âs) [Jehovah is a light]. The Hebrew name is often rendered Urijah. 1. A Hittite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:39; I Chron. 11:41), whom the king arranged to have placed at an exposed point in a battle with the Ammonites so that he would lose his life and thus be prevented from discovering an intrigue which his sovereign had been carrying on with the faithful soldier's wife (II Sam. 11:1-27; Matt. 1:6). It is possible that his name was Hurrian Ariya, which was transformed by popular etymology into Uriah.

Excavating in the Royal Cemetery at Ur

2. A priest, 1 of 2 witnesses to a tablet written by Isaiah (Isa. 8:2); see URIAH 1.

3. A prophet, the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim. He predicted that the Kingdom of Judah was about to be temporarily destroyed, which so enraged King Jehoiakim that he sought to kill the prophet of evil. Uriah fled to Egypt but was brought back and slain (Jer. 26:20-23; in A.V. Urijah).

4. A priest, father of a certain Meremoth (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4, 21, in A.V. Urijah).

5. One of those, probably priests, who stood by Ezra while he addressed the people (Neh. 8:4, in A.V. Urijah).

U'ri-el (û-rî-êl) [El (God) is a light]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, descended through Korah, Abiasaph, and Tahath (I Chron. 6:24). He is probably a different person from Zephaniah (v. 36), and belonged to the collateral line which sprang from Tahath. The head of the Kohathite family in David's reign bore this name (ch. 15:5, 11) and is conceivably the same person.

2. A man of Gibeah whose daughter Micah was Abijah's mother (II Chron. 13:2).

U'ri'jah (û-rî-jâ) [Jehovah is a light]. 1. The high priest in Ahaz' reign who was directed to make an altar like that which caught the king's fancy at Damascus (II Kings 16:10-16). He was probably 1 of the 2 witnesses to the enigmatical inscription written by Isaiah (Isa. 8:2, in E.V. Uriah).

2. A prophet (Jer. 26:20, A.V.); see URIAH 3.

3. A priest (Neh. 3:4, 21, A.V.); see URIAH 4.

4. One who stood by Ezra while he addressed the people (Neh. 8:4, A.V.); see URIAH 5.

U'rim (û'rîm) and Thum'mim (thûm'im) [lights and perfections]. It should be observed that the 2 Heb. words begin with the 1st and last letters of the alphabet respectively. The order is once reversed (Deut. 33:8), and twice Urim alone is used (Num. 27:21; I Sam. 28:6). One or more objects belonging to the ephod of the high priest, put in the breastplate of judgment so as to be on the high priest's heart when he went in before the Lord (Ex. 28:30; Lev. 8:8; cf. Ecclus. 45:10). The receptacle was probably a fold of the breastplate or the space underneath it. In connection with the Urim and Thummim, the high priest learned the will of God in doubtful cases. This method was not adopted for inquiring the divine will concerning private individuals or private matters, but was employed only in behalf of the nation; hence the required place for the Urim and Thummim was in the breastplate of judgment, which bore the names of the 12 tribes of Israel on 12 precious stones. With the Urim and Thummim, the will of Jehovah, the Judge, concerning judicial matters, and the royal desire of Jehovah, the King, were learned (Num. 27:21; cf. Josh. 9:14; Judg. 1:1; 20:18, 23, 27, 28; I Sam. 10:22; 14:36-42; 22:10, 13; 23:9-12; 28:6; 30:7, 8; II Sam. 2:1; 5:19, 23, 24). The will of Jehovah was inquired with Urim and Thummim, not only in the sanctuary or where the Ark was (Judg. 20:27, 28; I Sam. 22:10), but in any place, provided the authorized priest with the ephod was present. The answer was usually quite simple, often a mere affirmation or denial, or a choice of 1 tribe or place out of several; but it was not always so (I Sam. 10:22; II Sam. 5:23, 24).

Occasionally, also, when sin had interrupted communion with God, no answer was granted (I Sam. 14:37; 28:6). There is no reference to the use of Urim and Thummim after the reign of David, and at the time of the Return from exile there was no priest with Urim and Thummim (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65); hence Josephus is probably wrong in saying that the virtue or use ceased 200 years before his time (Jos. Antiq. iii. 8, 9). The use of this method was a prerogative of the high priest alone; and, since he belonged to the tribe of Levi, the possession of the Urim and Thummim was a glory of that tribe (Deut. 33:8).

Different explanations of the Urim and Thummim have been offered. For example, an analogue has been sought in the badge of office which the Egyptian high priest, as supreme judge, is reported by classical writers to have worn, consisting of an emblem of truth suspended from his neck on a golden chain; but the Egyptian high priest carried this official token during the judicial proceedings only, and hung it on the person in whose favor judgment was pronounced; and there is no evidence that it was ever used as a means for inquiring the divine will. Other interpreters have supposed that when to the high priest, clad in the ephod with the Urim and Thummim and offering prayer, an idea occurred, its divine origin and truth were confirmed by the unwonted gleaming of the gems in the breastplate. From this phenomenon was derived the name Urim, lights. It has been suggested that the answer was spelled out by the successive gleaming of the letters which composed the proper names on the stones; but, to say nothing of the fact that the complete alphabet is not yielded by these names, and that in several of the recorded responses letters occur which are not found on the stones, the whole idea smacks of the feigned miracles of Greek and Roman priests, and is foreign to the methods and conceptions of the Hebrew ritual.

Only 2 theories are important: 1. The Urim and Thummim probably were 2 appendages of the ephod and detachable, and were used as the lot, cast like dice, and by their fall somehow revealed the divine will. Support is sought for this theory in the fact that the casting of the lot is twice referred to in close association with seeking revelation through Urim and Thummim (I Sam. 10:19-22; 14:37-42). In the latter case, Saul prayed, "Give a perfect lot" (ch. 14:41, R.V. marg.). The word thānim is used, which it is proposed to pronounce thummim, and thus make the Urim and Thummim to have been a kind of sacred lot. The text of the LXX favors this interpretation. While there is much uncertainty about Urim and Thummim in the sacred lot, some have supposed that they were flat stones, white on the one side and black on the other. If both fell white side up, the answer was in the affirmative; if black, then negative. But if one had the white side and the other the black side upwards, no reply was vouchsafed to the question. 2. The Urim and Thummim gave no outward manifestation, but served as a symbol. The high priest arrayed himself in the ephod with Urim and Thummim, which betokened his authority to obtain light and truth, as the name indicates, in order that he might seek counsel of Jehovah in the divinely appointed manner. He laid the matter humbly before God in prayer; the answer dawned in his mind; he believed that the response was correct, because he had made his request in the manner of God's appointment, and because he had God's promise that he should receive light and truth. The answer was inward illumination, without any external sign, and finds its parallel in the revelations granted to the prophets.

U'su-ry. Interest paid on borrowed money; the word is used in its primary sense, without any imputation that the interest is excessive in amount or above the legal rate. See LOAN.

U'thai (ū'thī) [probably, Jehovah has shown himself as surpassing; cf. Arab. atā, to be proud, go beyond bounds]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Perez, and son of Ammihud. He was the head of the father's house to which he belonged, and dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:4).

2. A descendant of Bigvai. He accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:14).

Uz (ūz), in A.V. once Huz (Gen. 22:21). A tribe of the Aramaeans (Gen. 10:23), able to trace their descent partly from Nahor (ch. 22:21), and connected by blood or political ties with Dishan the Horite (ch. 36:28). Job resided in the land of Uz (Job. 1:1), and was exposed to attack from the Sabaeans and Chaldeans (vs. 15, 17). At the time of Jeremiah, Edomites dwelt in the land of Uz (Lam. 4:21). Josephus regarded Uz as the founder of Trachonitis and Damascus (Jos. Antiq. i. 6, 4). Ptolemy locates the Ausitai in the desert w. of the Euphrates. Uz, according to these data, was in the Syrian desert between the latitudes of Damascus and Edom.

U'zal (ū'zāl) [perhaps, Jehovah has heard]. Father of one who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25).

U'zal (ū'zāl). A people of Arabia descended from Joktan (Gen. 10:27; I Chron. 1:21; Ezek. 27:19, R.V. marg.). The kindred name Azal was, according to Arabian tradition, the ancient name of Ṣan'ā, the capital of Yemen, in Arabia.

Uz'za (ū'zā) [(Jehovah is) strength]. 1. A Benjamite, a son or a descendant of Ehud (I Chron. 8:7).

2. The founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51).

3. A man known only as the original owner of a garden. This garden ultimately passed into the hands of Manasseh, king of Judah, and was within the precincts of his palace. Both Manasseh and his son Amon were buried in it (II Kings 21:18, 26; cf. II Chron. 33:20). The garden was apparently at or near Jerusalem, but the exact spot is undetermined.

4 and 5. Two men otherwise called Uzzah.

Uz'zah (ūz'ā), and Uz'za in I Chron. 13:7-11 and A.V. of ch. 6:29 [(Jehovah is) strength]. 1. A son of Abinadab, of what tribe is unknown. When the Ark had reached the threshing floor of Nacon, or Chidon, on its way to the city of David, the oxen stumbled, and Uzzah, putting forth his hand to support the sacred symbol, was struck dead. The place was therefore called Perez-uzzah, breach of Uzzah, or breaking out against Uzzah, and long retained the name (II Sam. 6:3-11; I Chron. 13:7-14).

2. A son of Merari (I Chron. 6:29).

Uz'zen-she'er-rah (ūz'ēn-shē'ē-rā), in A.V. Uz'zen-she'rah (ūz'ēn-shē'rā). A village built by Sheerah, daughter of an Ephraimite named Ephraim (I Chron. 7:24). It is mentioned in connection with the 2 Beth-horons, and is considered to have been at Beit Širā, 3 miles w. by s. of the nether Beth-horon, and 13 w. by n. of Jerusalem.

Uz'zi (ūz'ī) [(Jehovah is) strength]. 1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola, and head of a father's house (I Chron. 7:2, 3).

2. A priest, son of Bukki, and father of Zerariah, of the line of Eleazar (I Chron. 6:5, 6, 51). He was an ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:4).

3. A Benjamite, family of Bela, and head of a father's house (I Chron. 7:7).

4. Another Benjamite, son of Michri, and father of Elah (I Chron. 9:8).

5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph. He was son of Bani, and overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem (Neh. 11:22).

6. A priest, head of the house of Jedaiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:19).

7. A priest, one of those who assisted at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

Uz'zi'a (ū-zī'ā) [Jehovah is strength]. A man from the town of Ashtaroth, and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:44).

Uz'ziah (ū-zī'ā), in A.V. of N.T. Oz'ias [Jehovah is strength]. 1. A Kohathite Levite, the son of Shaul (I Chron. 6:24).

2. The father of a certain Jehonathan in David's time (I Chron. 27:25).

3. A king of Judah (II Kings 15:13, 30-34; II Chronicles; Isaiah; Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5; Matt. 1:9); called Azariah in II Kings 14:21; 15:1-8, 17-27; I Chron. 3:12 (see AZARIAH 11). He succeeded his father Amaziah about 785 B.C. during the latter's lifetime, a few years after the crushing defeat inflicted on Amaziah by the king of Israel. That he reigned during his father's lifetime is evident from the statement, made in connection with the record of his reign, that he built Elath after the death of the king (II Kings 14:22). He was 16 years old when he ascended the throne (v. 21). After conducting the government for 24 years, it is recorded, "In the twenty and seventh year of Jeroboam . . . began Azariah [Uzziah] . . . to reign" (ch. 15:1; the word "began" is not in the Heb. text). This statement "is most easily explained," says Kleinert, "by the assumption that in this year the kingdom of Judah had regained the full sovereignty"; freeing itself from vassalage to Jeroboam, in which it had been held since the overthrow of Amaziah, the capture and dismantlement of Jerusalem, and the enforcement of hostages. Uzziel organized the army; and he improved the fortifications of Jerusalem and the weapons and military engines of his troops. He gained important victories over the Philistines and Arabs, razed the walls of Gath, Jabneh, and Ashdod, and received tribute from the Ammonites and other foes (II Chron. 26:6-8). Thus Judah became strong, and Uzziel promoted agriculture by building towers in the desert and digging wells. Uzziel himself worshiped Jehovah, but did not take away the high places at which his people sacrificed to other gods. At length, elated by his prosperity, he entered the Temple against priestly remonstrance and attempted to offer incense, and was struck with leprosy from which he never recovered. He had therefore to associate his son Jotham with him in the government. A notable earthquake occurred during his reign (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5); this event came, in the popular memory, to be connected with his attempt to invade the priest's office (Jos. Antiq. ix. 10, 4). His reign extended to 52 years. He died about the year 734 B.C. (II Kings 15:1-7; II Chron., ch. 26). Before his decease the prophets Isaiah, Hosea, and Amos had begun their public careers (Isa. 1:1; 6:1; Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1).

4. A priest, son of Harim. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:21).

5. A man of Judah, family of Perez (Neh. 11:4).

Uz-zî'el (û-zî'êl) [El (God) is strength]. 1. A Levite, son of Kohath, and founder of a tribal family (Ex. 6:18, 22; Num. 3:19, 27, 30). He was a kinsman of Aaron on the father's side (Lev. 10:4). Amminadab, the chief of the Uzzielites, and 112 of his brethren were organized by David for service when he brought up the Ark to the city of David (I Chron. 15:10).

2. A Benjamite, family of Bela (I Chron. 7:7).

3. A Levite, instrumentalist in David's reign (I Chron. 25:4). Called in v. 18 Azarel; see AZAREL 2.

4. A Levite, son of Jeduthun. He assisted King Hezekiah in his work of reformation (II Chron. 29:14).

5. A Simeonite captain, one of those who, in Hezekiah's reign, led a successful expedition against the Amalekites of Mount Seir (I Chron. 4:41-43).

6. A goldsmith, son of Harhaiah. He helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

V

Va'heb (vā'hēb). A place near the Arnon (Num. 21:14, 15, R.V.). See DI-ZAHAB.

Va'-za'tha (vî-zā'thā), in A.V. Va'-jez'a'tha (vā-jēz'ā-thā) [from Old Pers., son of the atmosphere; cf. Avestan vaya (air) + zāta (born)]. A son of Haman (Esth. 9:9).

Vale and Val'ley. The vale or the valley, par excellence, is in A.V. the Shephelah or lowland (q.v.).

Va-nî'ah (vā-nî'ā). A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

Vash'ni (vāsh'nî). According to I Chron. 6:28 (A.V. following the Heb. text), the eldest son of Samuel, in which case he would be the same as Joel of v. 33, and of I Sam. 8:2. But the text is corrupt. Joel has accidentally slipped out, the conjunction vav (vav, vau) before Abiah has crept in, and vashni should be rendered "and the second" (R.V. following Syriac and I Sam. 8:2).

Vash'ti (vāsh'tî) [Old Pers., the desired one, the beloved; cf. Avestan vas (wish, desire), past participle ushta. Cf. also Modern Pers. vash'ti (beauty). There may also be considered Avestan vahishta (best)]. The queen of the Persian sovereign Ahasuerus. For refusing to show herself to the king's guests at a feast celebrated in his 3d year, she was divorced and deposed (Esth. 1:3, 9 to 2:1). Amestris, daughter of Otanes, was the wife of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 61, 114). If she was Vash'ti, Vash'ti was ultimately restored to favor, for Amestris was the recognized wife of Xerxes sometime after the battle of Mycale, 479 B.C. (Herod. ix. 109).

Vav (vāv), in A.V. and E.R.V. Vau (vō) [Heb. vāw]. The 6th letter of the Heb. alphabet. The Eng. F, through the Gr. dīgammā or vau, has the same origin. Where it is a consonant in Hebrew names it appears as v in the Anglicized form. In Heb. it is pronounced as Eng. v.

It stands at the head of the 6th section of Psalm 119 in the Eng. Bible, in which section each verse begins with this letter in the original Heb.

Vē'a-dar (vē'ā-dār) [and Adar, i.e., the 2d or intercalary Adar]. In a cycle of 19 years Veadar is introduced 7 times in order to render the average length of the year nearly correct. This month falls in the latter part of March and the beginning of April. See YEAR.

Vē'dan (vē'dān). A place with which Tyre traded (Ezek. 27:19, R.V.); possibly either Adin or Weddān, between Mecca and Medina. But the text may be corrupt. The A.V. has the rendering "Dan also," the first syllable being regarded as the Heb. conjunction vav (vav, vau), meaning "and."

Veil, in A.V. often Vail. See CLOTHING, TABERNACLE 2, and TEMPLE 3.

Ver'mil'ion. A red pigment obtained by grinding the mineral cinnabar (Pliny Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 38). It was called shāshar in Heb., milto in Gr.; and was used to paint walls, mural decorations, and idols (Jer. 22:14; Ezek. 23:14; Wisd. of Sol. 13:14). Ver'milion is a satisfactory translation of the word in these passages; but milto was of broader meaning and denoted any red mineral coloring matter; as red lead, or clay mingled with the oxide of iron and known as ochre. Rude Africans bedaubed the body with it (Herod. iv. 191, 194), and certain tribes used it as war paint (Herod. vii. 69).

Ver'sions. Translations of the Bible or of any portions of it into vernacular tongues, for the benefit of those who understand the original imperfectly or not at all.

Versions are immediate or mediate, according as they are made directly from the original text or through the medium of other translations. Four ancient immediate versions of the O.T. have come down to modern times: the Septuagint (LXX), the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel, the Syriac Peshitta with a considerable portion of its predecessors, and the Latin Vulgate. They derive special critical value from the fact that they were made before the Hebrew text of the Masoretes was established.

The Samaritan Pentateuch is not a version; it is the Hebrew text written in Samaritan or old Hebrew characters, with various divergences from the Hebrew text of the Masoretes (see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH); and the Samaritan version of the Pentateuch is a translation of this divergent text into the Samaritan dialect.

I. ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE O.T., MADE FOR THE USE OF JEWS.

I. 1. The Septuagint. The most celebrated Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures and the oldest complete translation of them. It was called the Septuagint, commonly designated by LXX, after the 70 translators reputed to have been employed on the Pentateuch in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285–246 B.C. Originally the name was applied to the translation of the Pentateuch, but eventually to the whole Greek O.T. Aristobolus, a Jewish priest who lived in Alexandria during the reign of Ptolemy Philometor 181/0–145 B.C., and who is mentioned in II Macc. 1:10, is quoted by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius as stating that while portions relating to Hebrew history had been translated into Greek previously, the entire Law was translated from the Hebrew in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus. The same tradition, but considerably embellished, is contained in a letter purporting to have been written by Aristaeus to his brother Philocrates. This letter is condemned by modern scholars as spurious. The same story as that told by Aristaeus is repeated with slight variations by Josephus, who may have had the letter before him. Josephus relates that Demetrius Phalereus, librarian to Ptolemy Philadelphus, wished to add to the 200,000 volumes in the library a copy of the Hebrew books of the Law, and to have them translated into Greek, as they were unintelligible in the original. The king consented, and made application to Eleazar, the high priest at Jerusalem, for 72 aged and skillful interpreters, 6 from each tribe, to make the translation. They arrived in Alexandria, bringing the Law written in golden letters on books of parchment. They were hospitably received, were assigned a quiet house on the island of Pharos in the harbor of Alexandria, and transcribed and interpreted the Law in 72 days (Jos. Antiq. xii. 2, 1–13; Apion ii. 4).

These ancient reports concerning the origin of the LXX have great value, although reliance cannot be placed on the details, and the statements regarding the scope of the work are difficult of interpretation. It is, however, commonly agreed that the LXX originated in Egypt, that the Pentateuch was translated into Greek in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, that the other books followed gradually, and that the entire work was completed by 150 B.C. Reference to a Greek version of the Law, the Prophets, and the other books is made by Jesus, son of Sirach, as early as 132 B.C. (Ecclus., prologue). The version is the work of many translators, as differences in style and method show, and its quality is unequal in different parts; it is also much corrupted. The translation of the Pentateuch, except poetic portions (Gen., ch. 49; Deut., chs. 32; 33), is the best part of the work, and on the whole is well executed, although not literal. The translators of Proverbs and Job were masters of a good Greek style, but were imperfectly acquainted with Hebrew and handled the original arbitrarily. The translation of Proverbs is based on a Hebrew text that varied considerably from the present Masoretic text. The general sense of Psalms is fairly well reproduced. Ecclesiastes is rendered with slavish literalness. The translation of the Prophets is unequal in quality. That of Amos and Ezekiel is tolerably well done, but that of Isaiah is quite inferior. The version of Jeremiah was possibly made from a Hebrew text different from the Masoretic. In The Book of Daniel the early Christians, since the time of Irenaeus and Hippolytus, substituted for the Old Greek the version of Theodotion.

The quotations from the O.T. in the N.T. are usually citations from the LXX, either verbatim or with unimportant verbal changes; in other cases, the N.T. writers apparently themselves translated from the original Hebrew. The Ethiopian eunuch whom Philip met was reading the LXX (Acts 8:30–33).

Three main recensions of the LXX were made. One was issued c. A.D. 245, and the others previous to A.D. 311. They were that of Origen in Palestine, of Lucian in Antioch and Constantinople, and of Hesychius in Egypt. Codex Vaticanus (B) of the early 4th century, although not the original LXX, is acknowledged to exhibit relatively the most original text, and it probably descended from that upon which Origen based the text of the LXX given in the 5th column of his Hexapla. It should be noted, however, that there is no prominent Biblical MS. in which there occur such gross cases of misspelling, faulty grammar, and omissions, as in B; in proper names it is often very bad. The Chester Beatty and the John H. Scheide papyri (2d and early 3d centuries A.D.) yield further important evidence of the original LXX. Lucian's recension has been edited in part by Lagarde and by Oesterley. Lucian was a presbyter of Antioch, and died a martyr's death at Nicomedia in A.D. 311 or 312. He issued a revised text of the LXX based on a comparison of the common Greek text with the Hebrew text, which proves to have been a good text, but different from that of the Masoretes. Hesychius was bishop of Egypt, and suffered martyrdom A.D. 311; his text has been lost; but Codex Marchalianus (Q) of the 6th century, preserved in the Vatican library and containing the Prophets, is believed to show it for these books.

I. 2. Minor Greek versions. After the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the LXX lost favor among the Jews, partly because of the successful use made of it by the Christians in establishing the claims of Jesus, and partly because they discovered that its style lacked elegance. Accordingly, 3 translations of the canonical books of the O.T. were made by Jews in the 2d century; they are known to us only in isolated fragments or citations. (1) The translation (c. A.D. 128) by Aquila, a native of Pontus and a proselyte to Judaism. He lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian, and he undertook to make a literal version of the Hebrew Scriptures in order to counteract the use of the LXX made by the Christians in advancing their doctrines. It was so slavishly literal as often to be unintelligible to readers who did not know Hebrew so well as Greek. (2) The revision of the LXX by Theodotion, a Jewish proselyte of Ephesus according to Irenaeus, and according to Eusebius an Ebionite, believing in the Messiahship, but not in the deity of Christ. We know next to nothing as to Theodotion's person and date; he may be placed in the first 3d of the 2d century A.D. and may even precede Aquila. In his revision of the LXX he made use of the Hebrew original. (3) The elegant, but periphrastic, translation toward the end of the 2d century A.D. by Symmachus, a Samaritan Ebionite. Origen knew also of 3 anonymous Greek versions known as the Quinta, the Sexta, and the Septima.

Origen (c. 185–c. 254) arranged the Hebrew text and 4 different versions in 6 parallel columns for purposes of comparison. In the 1st column he put the Hebrew text, in the 2d the Hebrew written in Greek letters, in the 3d the version of Aquila, in the 4th that of Symmachus, in the 5th the LXX or Old Greek, in the 6th the revision by Theodotion. From these 6 columns his work takes its name of Hexapla. In the column devoted to the LXX he marked with an obelus (— or ÷) words which were not in his Hebrew text. He emended the Greek text by supplying words lacking in it but found in the Hebrew. These he indicated with an asterisk (*). A metobelus (; or % or 1) marked the conclusion of the passage to which the asterisk or obelus referred. The Hexapla was completed by c. A.D. 245, and was followed by a shortened edition, or Tetrapla, in which the 2 Hebrew columns were omitted. These 2 works were deposited in the library founded by Origen's disciple, Pamphilus, at Caesarea in Palestine. They were consulted by Jerome in the 4th century, and were still in existence in the 6th century. It is thought that they were destroyed when the Arabs took the town in A.D. 638.

Fragments of Origen's great work are preserved in quotations made by the fathers. The LXX column was separately published by Pamphilus and Eusebius, who supplied Constantine with 50 copies of that edition; and it was translated into Syriac (616-617) by Paul, bishop of Tella, who retained Origen's critical symbols. Origen pursued an unfortunate method when he conformed the text of the LXX to the Hebrew text of his day; since the great desideratum of scholars is the Greek text as it left the translators' hands, for that text would throw light on the Hebrew text which they used. Moreover, the obeli and asterisks, which Origen had so carefully used, were often neglected or carelessly employed by copyists; furthermore when the 5th column circulated separately, the interest in comparison with the Hebrew and the various Greek versions was lost. In this way Origen's critical studies unwittingly introduced chaos into the text of the original Greek version.

I. 3. The Targums. When the Jews returned from the Babylonian Exile, the Hebrew of their forefathers ceased to be their ordinary speech, and Aramaic, misnamed Chaldee, took its place. It soon became necessary at the public reading of the Scriptures for the reader or his assistant to translate the passage orally that the people might understand. The custom of explaining obscure words and phrases at the public reading was in vogue in Ezra's time (Neh. 8:8). The event referred to has been cited as evidence that the words read were translated; but this is more than the statement warrants, and depends upon the answer to the question of whether or not the Hebrews had adopted a foreign language during the Exile. The oral targum—that is, interpretation or translation—which became necessary, was at first a simple paraphrase in Aramaic, but eventually it became elaborate; and in order to fix it as a translation and render it authoritative as an interpretation, it was reduced to writing. These written Targums are a valuable aid in determining the text as read in the early synagogues and in discovering the meanings which the Jews attached to difficult passages. The principal Targums are the Targum of Onkelos on the Pentateuch and the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the Prophets. Onkelos is sometimes identified with the translator Aquila (see VERSIONS, I. 2), but the best opinion seems to be that this Targum was produced in its present form about the 3d century on the basis of an earlier paraphrase. It is quite literal. The Targum ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a pupil of Hillel, of the 1st century A.D., on the other hand, is periphrastic; it received its final form in Babylon about the 5th century.

II. ANCIENT VERSIONS OF A PART OR THE WHOLE OF THE BIBLE, AND INTENDED CHIEFLY FOR CHRISTIANS.

II. 1. Syriac versions.

(1) The Diatessaron. Tatian (fl., c. 160-c. 180), a native of the Euphrates Valley and a former disciple of Justin Martyr in Rome, wove into 1 narrative the material of the 4 Gospels. This harmony in Syriac, known by a Greek title, the Diatessaron, circulated widely among the churches of Syria from about the beginning of the 3d quarter of the 2d century to the 4th or 5th century. It is now extant only in translations into Arabic and Latin; we have also an Armenian translation of St. Ephraem's commentary on it. In 1933 a vellum fragment containing 14 imperfect lines of the Diatessaron in Greek was discovered among the ruins of a Roman fortress at Dura-Europos on the w. bank of the upper Euphrates.

(2) The Old Syriac Gospels. At the close of the 2d century the 4 Gospels circulated in Syria also in a separated form (da-mepharreshē). Two MSS. (with numerous losses) of this version were discovered, one in 1842 by William Cureton in a Syrian convent in the Nitrian desert s.w. of the Nile Delta, and the other in 1892 by Agnes Smith Lewis in the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. No doubt there was an Old Syriac version of the rest of the N.T. books accepted by the Syrian Church, but that has not been recovered.

(3) The Peshitta. Peshitta means "simple" or "vulgate." The O.T. was made directly from the Hebrew, probably in the 2d or 3d century A.D. At a later date it was revised by a comparison with the Greek. The N.T. owes its origin to the effort of Rabbula, bishop of Edessa (411-435), to establish a uniform text by revising divergent copies of the Old Syriac in accord with Greek MSS. of a later type of text. Since the Syrian Church did not accept as canonical the 4 minor Catholic Epistles (II Peter, II and III John, Jude) and the Apocalypse, the Peshitta did not include these 5 books.

(4) The Philoxenian and Harclean Versions of the N.T. About 508 Philoxenus, Jacobite bishop of Hierapolis in e. Syria, had a translation made of the entire N.T. For the first time the minor Catholic Epistles and the Apocalypse were included in a Syriac Bible. In 616 Thomas of Haraclea (Harkel) elaborately revised this version with the help of some MSS. in Alexandria. His work is literal in the extreme.

(5) The Palestinian Syriac Version probably originated in the late 5th or early 6th century. Nearly all the surviving MSS. are in the form of lectionaries, or church reading books. The version is remarkable in that it was the only Syriac version used by any considerable body of Syrian Christians which contained the pericope de adultera (John 7: 53 to 8:11).

II. 2. Latin versions.

(1) The Old Latin. Probably by the end of the 2d century A.D. a Latin version of the Scriptures was in circulation in n. Africa. Tertullian (c. 150-c. 220) shows that he was familiar with parts of it, and Cyprian (c. 200-258), bishop of Carthage, used it freely. The O.T. was not translated from the Hebrew, but was based upon the Old Greek (LXX). The earliest translation was made in n. Africa and is known as the Afra, while the Itala was rendered at a later date in Italy. From a study of the text of Ezekiel it appears that the Itala in that particular book is based upon a B-type of text; the Afra comes from a type related to the A-Q-type and the Scheide papyri. The Old Latin is important for determining the pre-Origenian reading of LXX passages. A study of the Old Latin of Ezekiel furthermore indicates definitely a 3d stratum; Jerome apparently revised the Old Latin from a Q-type of text on the basis of the Itala or a Latin version which was translated from a B-type of Greek. Augustine (354-430) testifies, probably with reference to the N.T., that anyone who thought that he had sufficient knowledge of Greek and Latin ventured to make a translation. Consequently there grew up a welter of diverse translations. Among them there gradually developed 3 types of text; Cyprian represents the African text, Irenaeus (c. 130–c. 202) of s. Gaul the European, and Augustine the Italian.

(2) The Vulgate. Amid this confusion of vernacular Latin texts a need was felt for a dignified and accurate Latin version. Damasus, bishop of Rome, urged Jerome, or Hieronymus (c. 340–420), the most learned Christian scholar of his day, to undertake a revision of the Latin N.T. In 384, Jerome published his work on the Gospels, having compared the Latin with the original Greek in order to correct gross errors. He also made 2 revisions of the Old Latin version of The Psalms by comparing it with the LXX. These are known as the Roman (384) and Gallican (387–390) Psalters, because they were introduced into Rome and Gaul respectively. In 387 Jerome took up his residence in a monastery at Bethlehem, and ultimately he made a version of the O.T. directly from the Hebrew, with constant reference to the Greek versions and with special respect for Symmachus. As a youth he had pursued the study of Hebrew, and after his removal to Bethlehem he resumed it with the aid of Jewish teachers; he began his work on the Vulgate c. 390, and the entire work was completed in 405. His own generation gave him abuse rather than gratitude for the very important service he had rendered it; and the eminent father, whose temper was none of the best, retorted by expressing the contempt which knowledge feels for blatant and aggressive ignorance. As the ages rolled forward his work, which was done not for one generation but for all succeeding time, was more and more appreciated. The Vulgate became the Bible of the whole Western Church in the Middle Ages and, notwithstanding vernacular translations, still remains the Bible of the Roman Catholic Church. Jerome's final revision of the Psalter from the Hebrew is known as the Hebrew Psalter, but it never attained to general use or popularity. The Roman Psalter is still in use in St. Peter's, Rome; the Gallican Psalter is in general use in the Roman Catholic Church in spite of the superior accuracy of the 3d edition or Hebrew Psalter. A recension of the text was made by Alcuin, at the instance of Charlemagne, about 802. The Latin Vulgate was the 1st book ever printed, having been issued from the press about 1455, soon after the invention of printing. On April 8, 1546, the Council of Trent made a decree which expressed the wish for a fresh revision. Scholars were dilatory about undertaking the duty, till a pontiff of iron will, Sixtus V, urged on the work and even took a personal part in its accomplishment. The revision was published in 1590. A different one came forth under the auspices of Pope Clement VIII in 1592; this became the standard edition of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1907 work on a critical edition of the Vulgate was begun, and since 1926 various books in quarto have been appearing. It is from the Vulgate that a large part of the technical language used in theology is derived. For instance, sacrament, justification, and sanctification are simply the Anglicized forms of sacramentum, justificatio, and sanctificatio, occurring in the Vulgate.

II. 3. Coptic versions of the Bible. These appear in several dialects, the most important of which are the Sahidic and the Bohairic. The Sahidic was the earlier, but the Bohairic became the accepted version of the Coptic Church. We cannot determine definite dates of translation. Probably portions of the N.T.

were translated into Sahidic and Bohairic before the close of the 2d century A.D. Perhaps the Sahidic Bible was complete in the 3d century; some make it c. A.D. 350. The Bohairic Bible is somewhat later, some dating it in the 6th century or even c. 650. In The Book of Daniel the Sahidic was translated from Theodotion with Origenian or Hexaplaric influence on an Egyptian or Hesiychian background; the Bohairic is definitely Hexaplaric, and the text is specifically Egyptian or Hesiychian.

II. 4. The Ethiopic Version. According to tradition Christianity was brought to Ethiopia in the time of Constantine the Great (324–337). Frumentius, a Syrian, was consecrated as bishop of Ethiopia before 370, perhaps c. 330, by Athanasius, the patriarch of Alexandria. About 340 Ezānā, king of Axum, who had become a Christian, made his kingdom Christian. It is possible that Frumentius began the work of translating the Scriptures or had it done under his supervision. According to another tradition the Bible was turned into Ethiopic by the Nine Saints, who as Monophysites fled after the Council of Chalcedon in 451 from Syria to Egypt, whence they made their way to Abyssinia. Probably the translation was begun in the 2d half of the 4th century before the arrival of the Nine Saints, who, however, may have revised the original translation. In I Kings the Ethiopic Bible is based on a text like B (Codex Vaticanus) with a strong Lucianic influence; this may indicate the entrance of Christianity into Ethiopia from Alexandria and from Syria. In the 14th century and later the Ethiopic Bible was revised with the help of Arabic translations.

II. 5. The Gothic Version was made c. 350 by Ulphilas, bishop of the West Goths. It embraced the whole Bible except the books of Samuel and Kings, which the bishop omitted, because he thought it would be dangerous to place them, with their warlike spirit and opposition to idolatry, in the hands of the Goths. Most of the N.T. and a few fragments of the O.T. in this version are extant. It is the earliest surviving literature in any Teutonic language. The O.T. was made from Lucian's recension.

II. 6. The Arabic Version. The expansion of Islam beyond the limits of Arabia after the death of Mohammed (632) was followed by the translation of the Scriptures into Arabic. Partial translations probably were prepared in the 7th century for Christians in the Orient, but we have the definite record that in 724 a version was made in Spain by John, bishop of Seville, with the intention of helping the Christians and the Moors. Padre Juan de Mariana (1537–1624) says that copies of this translation were preserved until his day and seen in parts of Spain. In 946 Isaak Velásquez of Córdoba translated Luke (and presumably the other Gospels also) into Arabic. Saadia Gaon (892–942) rendered the O.T. from Hebrew into Arabic for the Jews. With the exception of the Pentateuch and Joshua none of the other books published in the Paris (1645) and the London (1657) Polyglots was rendered from the Hebrew. A study of the Arabic of Daniel in these two Polyglot Bibles shows that that book was rendered from the Greek and represents a Hexaplaric text of Constantinople in a recension superior to Codex A (Alexandrinus); it doubtless is the best representative of that group.

II. 7. The Armenian and Georgian Versions. An Armenian writer of the 5th century, Moses of Chorene, says that the 1st edition was translated from a Syriac text by Sahak (patriarch, 390–428). Koriun (5th century) records that by 411 Mesrop (the inventor of the Armenian alphabet, c. 406), with the aid of a Greek scribe, Rufinus, had translated the entire Bible from Greek, beginning with The Proverbs.

This may imply that the previous books had been rendered by unknown translators. After the Council of Ephesus (431) there was brought from Constantinople a Greek Bible, on the basis of which Sahak and Mesrop revised the Armenian Bible. Later Moses of Chorene and others were sent to Alexandria, and this visit had a decided influence upon the Armenian text. In general the Armenian version of the O.T. follows the Hexaplaric recension. In the case of The Book of Daniel it represents an Origenian-Constantinopolitan text, but it has decided agreements with the Hesychian group; the Syriac influence is also apparent. It seems that the Gospels were done from the Old Syriac. The Armenian is so well adapted to render the Greek literally without being literalistic that an Armenian codex has almost the same value for the critic as the Greek original on which it is based.

The Georgian Bible, aptly called "the twin sister of the Armenian," was completed by the end of the 6th century. The original version, made by several hands, had an Armenian-Syriac foundation, but discloses also some Greek influence.

II. 8. The Slavonic Version was made in the 9th century by Cyril and Methodius. Except for fragments embedded in the official Slavonic Bible, the original translation has perished. It seems in the O.T. to have been based on a Lucianic text, but in the present Bible some books are rendered from the Hebrew or the Vulgate.

III. ENGLISH VERSIONS.

III. 1. Early English versions. In Anglo-Saxon times portions of Scripture, especially The Psalms, the Ten Commandments, and portions of the Gospels, were translated into the vernacular tongue. After the language had been modified by the Norman Conquest, various portions of Scripture, especially the Gospels, were rendered into the language of the nation. But no effort was made similarly to treat the Bible as a whole.

III. 2. Wycliffe and Purvey's Bible. Of this there are 2 versions: the 1st apparently between 1382 and 1383, and the 2d about 1388. The 1st, which was robust and terse, but unpolished in language, was mainly Wycliffe's; the 2d, which was more refined and became better known, emanated chiefly from Wycliffe's disciple, John Purvey. Both versions were made from the Latin Vulgate. Wycliffe's version was the 1st extensive rendering of the Scriptures into any form of modern English; it helped to mold the language and also exerted great influence on the national life. It circulated in manuscript copies only, and the complete Wycliffe Bible was not printed until 1850.

III. 3. Tyndale's Bible. About 1526 there arrived in England from abroad a translation of the N.T. from the original Greek by the reformer William Tyndale, who had left his native England to escape persecution. It was published at Worms, and was made from the Greek of Erasmus, probably from the edition of 1519, although the edition of 1522 was consulted. Tyndale translated directly from the Greek, using the German N.T. of Luther and the Vulgate as aids. His work excited great opposition from the leading dignitaries of the then dominant Church, though many of the common people received it gladly. The book was pronounced full of pestilent errors, and was publicly burned at Paul's Cross. In 1530, and again in 1534, he published a translation of the Pentateuch, and in 1531 of The Book of Jonah. He made these directly from the original Hebrew, using Luther and the Vulgate as aids. In 1534 a fresh edition of his N.T. was issued from Antwerp. There is evidence that he translated other portions of the O.T. besides those already mentioned, most probably to the end of Chronicles with several prophetic books; but he did not live to publish them. He was arrested on May 23 or 24, 1535, at Antwerp, where he had permanently settled, and on Oct. 6, 1536, was strangled and burned as a heretic. But his work remained. It fixed the English standard of Bible translation, and its diction and style still live in the English version and lend it literary charm and character.

III. 4. Coverdale's Bible. This work was published in 1535, with no mention who the printer was nor from what city or town it issued; possibly Zürich is entitled to the honor. It was the 1st complete English Bible issued from the press. The N.T. and much of the O.T. are practically Tyndale's. Only the portion from Job to Malachi was translated independently by Miles Coverdale, and he used, not the original Hebrew, but the Vulgate and Pagninus' Latin Bible and 2 German versions, Luther's and the Zürich Bible. He describes the book as "translated out of Douche and Latyn in to Englishe." It was dedicated to Henry VIII, but not issued under royal license. Coverdale's version of The Psalms, virtually unchanged, is still used by the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in The Book of Common Prayer.

III. 5. Matthew's Bible. Thomas Matthew is believed to have been only a name assumed by John Rogers, an associate of Tyndale. In 1537 he printed an edition of the Bible, perhaps at Antwerp. It contains Tyndale's translations in their latest form. For books not translated by Tyndale, the text is taken from Coverdale's version. On the title page appear the words, "Set forth with the Kinges most gracyous lycence." This royal license was also extended to Coverdale's Bible, as appears on the title page of his quarto edition of 1537.

III. 6. Taverner's Bible. This was published in the year 1539 by Richard Taverner; it was a revision of Matthew's Bible.

III. 7. The Great Bible; called also Cranmer's Bible. The 1st name was given it on account of its size, the pages measuring 15 by 10 inches, and the 2d name came into use because Cranmer wrote the preface to the 2d and subsequent editions. It was undertaken by Coverdale at Cromwell's suggestion, was produced mainly by the revision of the text of Matthew's Bible, and appeared in 7 editions, 1539-1541. King Henry VIII gave to Cromwell the absolute right of licensing the publication of the Bible for 5 years. The edition of April, 1540, which was a revision of the one of 1539, had on the title page, "This is the Byble apointed to the use of the churches."

III. 8. The Geneva Bible. This revision was the work of 2 exiles who had taken refuge in Geneva during the Marian persecution, Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson. It was a revision of Tyndale, collated with the Great Bible. From the occurrence of the word "breeches" in Gen. 3:7, where the A.V. was subsequently to have "aprons," it is sometimes called the Breeches Bible. The N.T. appeared anonymously in 1557, and the whole Bible in 1560. These 2 editions were the 1st English translations to use the division into verses. The translators availed themselves of the aids furnished by the best Biblical scholarship of the age, and it is itself the most scholarly of the early English versions. It was a handy volume, being small quarto in size. It was well received among the common people, especially those of Puritan tendency, and for 75 years was the Bible in current use. It was provided with marginal notes, supplying a sound and helpful commentary along practical, expository, and doctrinal lines.

III. 9. The Bishops' Bible. The popularity of the Geneva Bible was not acceptable to the bishops, and in 1568 they issued one of their own. It borrowed from the Geneva version the division of the chapters into verses. In 1571 the Convocation of Canterbury pronounced in its favor and ordered copies to be placed in all the churches. It was founded chiefly on the Great Bible, though borrowing variations from the Geneva version. The work was of uneven value on account of the lack of editorial oversight and of co-ordination of the work of the churchmen who worked on the various books. The revision of 1572, in the 1602 edition, was used as the official basis of the A.V., but other translations were freely used when they were better.

III. 10. The Rheims and Douay Bible. This is the Roman Catholic version of the Scriptures in English. It was made from the Vulgate, and published, the N.T. at Rheims in 1582, and the O.T. at Douay in 1609-1610. Its language and style smack more of Latin than English; but it gave currency to many words borrowed from the Latin, and not a few of them, such as impenitent, propitiation, and remission, found a place in the A.V.

III. 11. The Authorized Version. The proposal to make this version came from Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, during the discussion between the Anglicans and the Puritans at the Hampton Court Conference, on Jan. 16, 1604. King James I, whose interest in theology is well known, was pleased by the proposal, and on Feb. 10, 1604, he ordered, among other things, "that a translation be made of the whole Bible, as consonant as can be to the original Hebrew and Greek; and this to be set out and printed, without any marginal notes, and only to be used in all Churches of England in time of Divine Service." The king appointed 54 translators, but only 47 took part in the work. They were formed into 6 companies, 2 of which met at Westminster, 2 at Oxford, and 2 at Cambridge. The work was issued in 1611, with a fulsome dedication to King James. The title page of the 1611 edition bears the legend: "Newly Translated out of the Originall tongues: & with the former Translations diligently compared and reuised by his Maiesties Speciall Commandement. Appointed to be read in Churches." Although the promotion and preparation of this version was under a direct order of the king and his chief advisers, there is no record that its use was sanctioned or authorized as is implied on the title page. Yet the King James Version is known as the Authorized Version. It was not a new translation, but a scholarly revision on the basis of the original languages of Scripture; about  $\frac{9}{10}$  of the language of the N.T. is still that of Tyndale. It has endeared itself to all English-speaking Christians, and is the translation now in common use.

III. 12. The Revised Version. A revision of the A.V. became necessary because in the course of more than 2½ centuries, through the discovery of MSS. older than those used heretofore, a superior text of the N.T. had been provided. Greek and Hebrew scholarship had also made great advances during the same period. In February, 1870, the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury planned, not a new translation, but a fresh revision of the time-honored version. Two companies were formed for the purpose, 1 for each Testament. The O.T. group consisted originally of 37 members, but the O.T. was completed eventually by only 27; the N.T. group consisted of 28 at first, but for the greater part of the time of 24. About  $\frac{3}{4}$  of these belonged to the Church of England. Two companies of scholars in America co-operated, 15 for the O.T. and 19 (but only 15 took an active part) for the N.T., representing 9 different Protestant Churches. The work was begun on June 22, 1870. The N.T. took 10½ years, and was published in May, 1881. The revision of the O.T. was commenced on June 30, 1870, and was completed in 14 years, on June 20, 1884, and published in 1885. The American Revised Version is the Revised Version of 1881 and 1884 newly edited, the N.T. in the year 1900, and the O.T. in 1901. The American edition incorporates in the text the readings and renderings preferred by the 2 American committees, adds references to parallel and illustrative passages, provides a running headline to indicate the topics in the page, removes the verse numbers from the margin to the text, substitutes the name Jehovah for LORD and GOD, wherever YHWH (Jehovah) is found in the original, and uses Holy Spirit for Holy Ghost. It also increases the number of changes made for the sake of euphemism. The R.V. is inferior to the A.V. in felicity of expression, and the sentences are less perfect in their rhythm and their cadence. But as a work of exact scholarship it is an improvement on the A.V. Especially in the prophetic portions of the O.T. and in the Epistles of the N.T. has the true meaning been made clear. The orthography also of the proper names has been vastly improved. Nowhere does A.V. distinguish poetry from prose, but in R.V. much of the poetry is printed as poetry. Yet in many places, e.g., in the Prophets, J.V. indicates the poetry where R.V. has not done so.

A new Version of the American Standard Bible is in process of preparation.

III. 13. The Jewish Version. This translation of the O.T., the work of a committee of Jewish scholars with Max L. Margolis as editor in chief, was concluded in 1916; it bears the title of The Holy Scriptures According to the Masoretic Text—a New Translation. Although it was intended primarily for Jews, its many merits are recognized by a number of Christian scholars. The basis of the language is generally that of the A.V., but the translators consulted the R.V. as well as the older English versions.

IV. GERMAN VERSIONS.

Between 1466 and 1518, 14 complete German Bibles were published; between 1480 and 1522 there appeared also 4 Bibles in Low German. The translation by Martin Luther, however, became the people's Bible. He began his work on the N.T. early in Dec., 1521, and it left the press Sept. 21, 1522. From that year until his death Luther's N.T. was reprinted 115 times, and often in large editions. It was based chiefly on Erasmus' Greek N.T., 2d edition, 1519. For the O.T. Luther used the Hebrew Bible published at Brescia, 1494. He began his work on the O.T. in 1522 before the N.T. had left the press, and the Pentateuch was published the following year. Other parts followed in due course until the publication of the Prophets in 1532. Revisions were continuously made, and finally the complete Bible was published at Wittenberg in 1534. Luther continued his revisions until the edition of 1545.

Because of delays in Luther's work there appeared 2 other translations of the Prophets, one at Worms, 1527, and one at Zürich, 1529. The preachers of Zürich had issued a complete Bible in 6 parts (1525-1529), turning Luther's work as far as available into Swiss German and adding their own rendering of the Prophets and that of the Apocrypha by Leo Juda. The 1st Zürich Bible in one volume appeared in 1530; the complete Worms Bible was published in 1529, and the Strassburg Bible in 1530. These German versions simply incorporated, or were based upon, Luther's Bible as far as it had appeared, while they added the other part or parts.

Vine. Any plant with a long, slender, prostrate or climbing stem, with tendrils, as a gourd (II Kings 4:39). The word usually denotes the common or grape vine (Vitis vinifera). It is believed to be indigenous in w. Asia s. of the Caspian Sea (cf. Gen. 9:20, 21). It was largely cultivated in Egypt (Gen. 40: 9-11; Ps. 78:47); and Egyptian sculptures of the Old Empire represent vineyards, vines laden with grapes, presses, and the manufacture of wine. The soil and climate of Palestine were favorable to the vine, and it was early cultivated in Canaan (Gen. 14:18; see the Egyptian Tale of Sinuhe for grapes and wine). It is incidentally referred to as growing in the lowland of Philistia, at Jezreel, and in the plain of Gennesaret (I Kings 21:1; Jos. War iii. 10, 8), and especially in the mountainous districts, as near Hebron, Shiloh, and Shechem (Num. 13:23; Judg. 9:27; 21:20; Jer. 31:5). Especial mention is made of the vines of Eshcol in the hill country of Judah (Num. 13:23), of En-ge-di in the valley of the Dead Sea (S. of Sol. 1:14), of Heshbon, Elealeh, and Sibmah beyond Jordan (Isa. 16: 8-10; Jer. 48:32), and of Lebanon (Hos. 14: 7). There was great difference in value between the choicest, noble vines and the degenerate plant of a strange vine (Isa. 5:2; Jer. 2:21). Israel is compared to a vine (Ps. 80:8-16), and our Lord to the stem of a vine, and his true followers to the branches (John 15:1-8).

The vineyard was frequently on a hillside or peak (Isa. 5:1; Joel 3:18), which was terraced when necessary. It was surrounded by a hedge or a stone wall to keep out destructive animals (Num. 22:24; Ps. 80:8-13; Prov. 24: 30, 31; S. of Sol. 2:15; Isa. 5:5). The ground was cleared of stones, the vines were planted, a booth or tower was erected for the watchman, a press was constructed, and a vat was hewn in the rock (Isa. 1:8; 5:1-7; Matt. 21: 33-41). Laborers were sometimes hired to work in it (Matt. 20:1-16), for it was necessary to prune the vines, dig about them, and keep the ground free from weeds (Lev. 25:3; Prov. 24:30, 31; Isa. 5:6; John 15:2). The vines were allowed to spread on the ground, the stock not being supported, only the fruit-bearing branches being slightly raised from the earth (Isa. 16:8; Ezek. 17:6). Other vines were doubtless trained to trees; and yet others were probably planted, as at present in Palestine, in rows, 8 to 10 feet apart, the stock being allowed to grow 6 or 8 feet high and then fastened to stout stakes, and the branches trained from stock to stock.

The grapes ordinarily grown were red (Isa. 63:2; Rev. 14:19, 20); but at the present day a white variety is almost exclusively raised at Bethlehem and Hebron. The grapes began to ripen about August, in favored localities somewhat earlier. They were eaten both fresh and dried (Num. 6:3; Deut. 23:24). The dried grapes or raisins were preserved in clusters or pressed into cakes, and were esteemed as food (I Sam. 25:18; I Chron. 16:3). The juice of grapes was expressed, and was drunk fresh and fermented; see WINE.

The vintage began in the middle of September and continued into October. It was a season of festivity. In the vineyards there were singing and joyful noise, and the treaders in the press kept time by shouting as they trod the grapes (Judg. 9:27; Isa. 16:10; Jer. 25:30; 48:33).

Vine of Sod'om (sôd'ûm). A plant growing near Sodom, and bearing clusters of bitter fruit (Deut. 32:32). But the language may be figurative. Josephus describes fruits growing near the site of Sodom, which bear a color as if they are fit to be eaten but contain ashes, and if plucked with the hands, dissolve into smoke and ashes (Jos. War iv. 8, 4; cf. Tacitus Hist. v. 6). This fruit does not correspond to the grapes of gall and bitter clusters which apparently characterize the vine of Sodom. Excluding plants which are common elsewhere in Palestine, the principal claimants are: 1. What the Arabs call the 'ushar, an asclepiadaceous plant (Calotropis gigantea or procera), a native of Upper Egypt, Arabia, and India. It grows at En-ge-di and other parts of the tropical Dead Sea Valley, is a tree 10 or 15 feet high, and bears a fruit resembling an apple or orange, 3 or 4 of them in a cluster. They are pleasant to the eye and to the touch; but if pressed or struck they explode like a puffball, leaving only fragments of the rind and a few fibers in the hand. A formidable objection to the identification is the difficulty of seeing how the term vine can be applied to a small, erect tree. 2. The colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), a trailing plant. Its fruit is "fair to look upon; but when fully ripe, merely a quantity of dusty powder with the seeds inside its beautiful orange rind" (Tristram); see GOURD, WILD.

Vine'gar. Wine or other strong drink turned sour by acetous fermentation (Num. 6:3). If vinous fermentation was pushed too far, or if the wine was kept too long, it became vinegar. Vinegar is acid, setting the teeth on edge (Prov. 10:26), and hardening soap or neutralizing its alkali (ch. 25:20). In itself it is unfit to drink (Ps. 69:21); but mingled with a little oil it is drunk by the common people in the East to quench thirst when fresh water is not obtainable; and it was used at meals in the heat of harvest, bread being dipped in it, since it brought grateful refreshment to the system (Ruth 2:14). The vinegar used by Boaz' reapers is, however, regarded by many interpreters as sour, not soured, wine. The Roman soldiers when in camp drank a thin, sour wine called acetum, vinegar, both in its pure state and diluted with water. It was probably a drink of this sort which the Roman soldier offered to Jesus on the cross to quench his burning thirst (Mark 15:36; John 19:29, 30). This draught, which Jesus accepted, was different from the sour wine, previously offered and refused, which was mingled with a bitter substance or more definitely with myrrh, which is astringent (Matt. 27:34; Mark 15: 23).

Vine'yard. See VINE.

Vine'yards, Plain of. See ABEL-CHERAMIM.

Vi'ol. See PSALTERY.

Vi'per. 1. The rendering of Heb. 'eph'eh, a venomous serpent referred to as inhabiting the s. country (Job 20:16; Isa. 30:6; 59:5).

2. A poisonous reptile, in Gr. echidna, incidentally mentioned as found on the island of Melita (Acts 28:3) and familiar to the Jews (Matt. 3:7); probably the common viper (Vipera communis or Pelias berus), which is common on the Mediterranean coast.

Vi'sions. No sharp line of demarcation is discernible between visions and dreams (q.v.). The one shades into the other. The Bible recognizes: 1. Vain visions (Job 20:8; Isa. 29:7). 2. Visions of the prophets. These were for the most part private; they were apprehended by the individual, not by his companions. A natural cause sometimes co-operated in producing the vision: the vision of the great sheet let down from heaven, which Peter saw, and the voice heard saying, "Rise, Peter; kill and eat," stood in some relation to his bodily hunger, as the account in The Acts clearly intimates (ch. 10:9 seq.). Thus far the visions of the prophets have points in common with visions begotten of an abnormal mental condition, and to this extent are to be classed as mental phenomena. These facts are only additional proofs of what might be expected, namely, that God, in holding communication with men, works in accordance with the laws of man's mind. The visions of the prophets, however, form a unique class. With perhaps 1 exception (Num. 24:4), they were granted to holy men only, men who were surrendered to God's service, men between whom and their divine Sovereign there "had arisen an understanding." These visions, again, were clearly distinguished by those who saw them from ordinary visions and were recognized as proceeding from God. They were cautiously accepted by the Church; by law they were not received as genuine until their teaching and their credentials had been subjected to tests (Jer. 23:16, 21, 22, 27; cf. Isa. 8:20; Deut. 18:10 seq.). The visions recorded in the Bible stand alone, in the history of religions, for purity and righteousness. They are never vain, never meaningless vagaries or lying wonders. They always have a clearly discernible moral and didactic content. They were often predictive, upon which fulfillment has set the seal of truth. They belonged to an age of revelation and came to men who in manifold manner proved themselves to be vehicles of revelation.

Because there were genuine visions, false prophets feigned visions. These men are denounced and their destruction foretold (Jer. 14:14; 23:16; Ezek. 13:7 seq.).

Voph'si (vöf'si). Father of Nahbi, the Naphthalite spy (Num. 13:14).

Vow. A voluntary obligation to God, generally assumed on condition of his bestowing certain specified blessings. Man has shown a tendency during sickness or any other affliction, or in time of anxiety or earnest desire, to make a vow to God to be fulfilled when the calamity is over or the desired object obtained (Gen. 28:20-22; Num. 21:2; I Sam. 1:11; II Sam. 15:8). The vow sprang primarily from the consciousness of entire dependence on the will of God and of the obligation of thankfulness. Vows were taken by persons of every nation (Jonah 1:16), and not by the Jews only. The earliest mention of a vow in Scripture, and a typical case, is that of Jacob at Beth-el, who promised that if God would care for him and bring him again to his father's house, the place where he was should be a sanctuary and  $\frac{1}{10}$  of his income should be the Lord's (Gen. 28:18-22).

The Mosaic Law did not prescribe vows; it only regulated them. Three kinds were the subject of legislation: vows of devotion, of abstinence, and of devotion to destruction. 1. By the vow of devotion, any person or possession, not already set apart for sacred uses, or otherwise removed from the legal control of the devotee, might be devoted and turned over to the sanctuary; but anything thus devoted to the service of God was redeemable, except a sacrificial animal (Lev. 27:1-27), usually at  $\frac{1}{2}$  more than its assessed value. Devoted land sold by the owner, without having been first redeemed, was retained by the buyer, but at the year of jubilee did not return to the seller, but became the possession of the sanctuary (vs. 20, 21). Persons devoted to God served at the sanctuary (I Sam. 1:11, 24, 28), but were usually redeemed (II Kings 12:4), especially as the service of the Levites rendered such devotion as a rule useless. The price of redemption varied with age and sex. 2. The vow of abstinence involved a renunciation of some enjoyment, otherwise allowable, for the glory of God. It included such acts as fasting, in testimony of penitence, and such obligation as was assumed by the Nazirite. 3. It has been inferred from Ex. 22:20; Deut. 13:16, that only what was under judgment for idolatry could be devoted by a vow of destruction. Nothing devoted by such a vow was redeemable (Lev. 27:28, 29).

General principles applying to vows were: 1. Vows were assumed voluntarily, but once made were regarded as compulsory (Num. 30:2; Deut. 23:21-23); only in exceptional cases, as in those of Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist, who had special missions to fulfill, was the Nazirite vow prescribed. 2. A vow, especially a vow of abstinence, made by an unmarried daughter or a wife, was void if disallowed by the father or husband (Num. 30:3-16). 3. The produce of sinful traffic could not be devoted (Deut. 23:18); see Dog. 4. Vows must not be taken rashly. This principle was enforced by the example of Jephthah, and inculcated by proverb (Prov. 20:25).

Vul'gate (vül'gät). See VERSIONS.

Vulture. A bird of prey, which has the head naked or but thinly covered with feathers, and feeds largely or wholly on carrion. It is employed in the A.V. to render Heb. 'ayyäh (Job 28:7, elsewhere kite; in R.V. always falcon), dā'ah (Lev. 11:14; in R.V. kite), and dayyäh (Deut. 14:13; Isa. 34:15; in R.V. kite). In the R.V. it is used to translate rāḥām (Lev. 11:18; in A.V. gier eagle); and frequently in the margin, where the text has eagle, to render Heb. nesher, Gr. aetos.

The great vulture (Lev. 11:13, R.V. marg.) is the fulvous or tawny vulture, generally called the griffon (Gyps fulvus). The neck and head are bald, covered with down. The whole of the body, the wings, and the back on to the tail are yellowish-brown. It is about 4 feet high. Its talons are not formidable, but its bill is. "The griffon," says Tristram, "is the most striking ornithological feature of Palestine. It is impossible in any part of the country to look up without seeing some of them majestically soaring at an immense height, and their eyries abound in great colonies in all the ravines of the country."

W

Wag'es. In early times and not infrequently at a comparatively late date wages were paid in kind (Gen. 29:15, 20; 30:28-34). In Egypt money or goods were given as hire at the time of the sojourn of the Israelites there (Ex. 2:9). By the Law of Moses, wages were to be paid each evening (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14, 15), and the withholding of wages due was severely denounced by religious teachers (Jer. 22:13; Mal. 3:5; James 5:4). Tobit offered a drachma, or 16 cents, a day and food as wages (Tobit 5:14). When our Lord was on earth, the rate for a day's labor was a denarius, worth about 17 cents (Matt. 20:2, in A.V. penny). What the purchasing power of that amount was is, however, unknown; it was evidently great (cf. Luke 10:35). In the later days of the Roman republic, the usual pay of a Roman soldier was 10 asses, or about a dime, a day (Tacitus Ann. i. 17).

Wag'on. See CART.

Wal'let. See SCRIP.

War. Before engaging in aggressive war, the Israelites consulted God's will in the matter (Judg. 20:23, 27, 28; I Sam. 14:37; 23:2; I Kings 22:6) or, when conflict was unavoidable, invoked God's help by prayer and sometimes by sacrifice (I Sam. 7:8, 9; 13:12; II Chron. 20:5-12; I Macc. 3:47-54). The heathen had recourse to divination for the same purpose (Ezek. 21:21), and were careful to set forth on a day pronounced to be propitious. Frequently before entering a hostile country or engaging in battle spies were sent forward to obtain information regarding the country and the preparation for resistance (Num. 13:17; Josh. 2:1; Judg. 7:9-11; I Sam. 26:4); and, when captives were taken, they were questioned with the same intention (Judg. 8:14; I Sam. 30:11-15). When the host drew nigh unto battle, a priest or the commander encouraged the people by reminding them of God's presence and help; and the officers exempted from service those who were faint-hearted and those who had built a new house but not inhabited it, planted a vineyard but not enjoyed the fruit of it, betrothed a wife but not married her (Deut. 20:2-9; II Chron. 20:14-20; I Macc. 3:56; 4:8-11). Various stratagems were practiced, such as surprise, ambush, pretended flight, circumvention (Gen. 14:15; Josh. 8:2-7; Judg. 7:16-22; II Sam. 5:23). Occasionally when the opposing armies were drawn up in battle array, a champion was chosen by each party (I Sam., ch. 17). Otherwise the battle was joined. A trumpet sounded the attack, the blast being both a signal to advance and an appeal to God (Num. 10:9; Josh. 6:5; Judg. 7:20; II Chron. 13:12; I Macc. 4:13; 5:83). The host pressed forward with shouting (Josh. 6:5; I Sam. 17:52; Jer. 50:42; Ezek. 21:22; Amos 1:14), and engaged in hand-to-hand conflict. The pursuit was bloody. Like other nations of their time, the Israelites when victorious pillaged the camp of the enemy, robbed the dead (Judg. 8:24-26; I Sam. 31:9; II Chron. 20:25; I Macc. 4:17-23), and sometimes killed or mutilated the prisoners (Josh. 8:23, 29; 10:22-27; Judg. 1:6; 8:21; II Sam. 8:2), but more frequently reduced them to slavery.

When a city was besieged, the besiegers fortified their own camp against attack (Jos. War v. 2, 3); if possible, they cut off the water supply from the city (Judith 7:7). In order to bring their engines into play they cast up mounds in the direction of the city (II Sam. 20:15; Ezek. 4:2). The mound gradually increased in height until it was sometimes half as high as the city wall. Upon this inclined plane the battering-ram was rolled into position; from its roof and from the mound, archers and slingers discharged their missiles, and from the summit of the mound scaling-ladders were leaned against the wall. Sometimes fuel was laid against the gates and fired in order to burn them and afford ingress (Judg. 9:52); and often the defenders of the wall were attacked by archers posted, not on the mound, but at the base of the wall. The besieged were not idle: they prepared for the investment by protecting their water supply, and repairing and strengthening the fortifications (II Chron. 32:3-5); they harassed the enemy and attempted to drive them off by sallies; they repelled attack and hindered the besiegers in their aggressive operations by casting darts and stones and shooting arrows at them from the walls; and they destroyed or attempted to destroy the military engines by hurling burning torches at them and by undermining the banks on which the battering-rams stood (II Sam. 11:21, 24; II Chron. 26:15; I Macc. 6:31; Jos. War v. 2, 2 and 4; 6, 4; 11, 4). Captured cities were often destroyed and their inhabitants slaughtered, neither age nor sex being spared (Josh. 6:21, 24; 8:24-29; 10:22-27; II Kings 15:16). Victory was celebrated with song and dance (Ex. 15:1-21; Judg., ch. 5; I Sam. 18:6; II Chron. 20:26-28; I Macc. 4:24). See ARMY.

Wash'ing. See BATHING.

Watch. See NIGHT.

Water of Bit'ter-ness. Holy water in an earthen vessel, mingled with dust from the floor of the sanctuary (Num. 5:17), intended to reveal the innocence or guilt of a woman accused of adultery by her husband, when there were no witnesses. The charge was perhaps brought only when suspicion was aroused by the woman's being found with child. The accused woman, with loosened hair, sat before the Lord in the sanctuary, and held an offering of dry, unscented, barley meal in her hand (v. 18, R.V.). The priest, taking the water of bitterness, asked that it have no effect upon the woman if she were innocent, but that God would cause her body to swell and her thigh to fall away if she were guilty. The woman responded, Amen. The priest wrote the imprecation in a book, and washed it out into the water; and having waved the meal offering before the Lord and thrown a handful of it on the altar, he gave the water of bitterness to the woman to drink. If she was guilty, it became bitter within her and the curse went into effect; if innocent, the potion remained inoperative, and the woman was pronounced clean and received or retained ability to conceive. The essential part of this procedure was the oath: the ritual was symbolic; the effect was left to God. It is probable that this ordeal was an old custom which the Mosaic Law took up in order to regulate and elevate it.

Water of Sep'a-ra'tion. A.V. and E.R.V. (text); E.R.V. marg., "water of impurity"; A.R.V., "water for impurity" (Num. 19:9, 13, 20, 21; 31:23). It means water for the removal of impurity. Cf. PURIFICATION 1.

Water-pot'. See PITCHER, POT.

Wave Offer-ing. The rite of waving was regularly performed in connection with: 1. Peace offerings: the right thigh or shoulder of the animal sacrificed was heaved and the breast was waved before the Lord and, after having been thus consecrated, they were eaten by the priest. 2. The sheaf of first-ripe grain on the 2d day of the passover, whereby the harvest was consecrated to the Lord (Lev. 23:10, 11). 3. The 2 loaves made from the new grain and the 2 lambs for a peace offering at Pentecost, 50 days from the waving of the sheaf at the passover (Lev. 23:15, 20). 4. The guilt offering of the leper (Lev. 14:12, 21), whereby the offerer represented by it was consecrated again to the service of God. 5. The meal offering of jealousy (Num. 5:25).

When the peace offering was private, the wave breast and the heave shoulder or thigh went to the priest, and the rest of the flesh was eaten by the offerer and his friends before the Lord at the sanctuary (Lev. 7:30-34; 10:14, 15; Num. 18:18). Of the peace offering brought by the Nazirite, the sodden shoulder of the ram went to the priest, in addition to his regular perquisites (Num. 6:17-20). At Pentecost, the whole of the 2 lambs of the peace offering and the loaves went to the priests (Lev. 23:20), since they were offered in behalf of the nation.

In performing the rite the priest laid the matter to be waved upon the hands of the offerer, probably placed his own hands under the hands of the latter, and moved them (Ex. 29:24, 25; Num. 6:19, 20).

Waw (wou). See VAV.

Wea'sel. The rendering of Heb. hōled, applied to an unclean quadruped (Lev. 11:29). It is confessedly either a weasel or a mole. The corresponding word in Arab. and Syriac signifies a mole; but probably the former meaning is intended by the Heb. word, as it is rendered in the LXX and Vulgate. The A.V. and R.V. render it by "weasel"; in the Talmud the huldāh is often mentioned as an animal that captures birds and creeping things, like the mouse, can run with such prey in its mouth, and can lap water out of a dish; and, finally, the typical mole genus

Talpa is not believed to occur in Palestine (see MOLE 2), while the weasel (Putorius vulgaris) and the polecat (Putorius foetidus) are found throughout the country.

Weaving. The Egyptians practiced the art of weaving before the arrival of the Israelites in their midst, producing woven goods such as linen (Gen. 41:42). The work was usually done by men (Herod. ii. 35), but not exclusively, for women appear at the loom in ancient Egyptian pictures. At the time of the Exodus the Hebrews understood both simple and elaborate weaving (Ex. 35:35). They produced various textures on the looms. Coarse kinds, such as tent cloth, and rough garments for the poor, were made of goats' and camels' hair (Ex. 26:7; Matt. 3:4); finer goods were woven of flax and wool (Lev. 13:47); chequered and figured patterns, as well as variegated stuffs, were made by the use of differently colored threads (Ex. 26:1; cf. ch. 28:39, R.V.; cf. Herod. iii. 47), and gold threads were even woven in (Ex. 39:3); cloth was also embroidered with figures or patterns (chs. 27:16; 38:23) with the needle; see EMBROIDERY. Many interpreters, however, believe that the Heb. word rōkēm, rendered "embroiderer," denotes one who inweaves designs, a variegator. Among the Hebrews, the weaving as well as the spinning was usually

Week. The division of time into periods of 7 days appears in Scripture in connection with the institution of the Sabbath (Gen. 2:1-3), and according to both the Hebrew and Babylonian account was in vogue at the time of the Flood (chs. 7:4, 10; 8:10, 12); see FLOOD. In the Babylonian legend of Adapa it is mentioned that the wind ceased to blow for 7 days. There is reason to believe that the reference to its cessation for 7 days is more than the mere note of a chance fact. Gudea, prince of Lagash, celebrated the completion of a temple by a festival of 7 days' duration. Seven days was the conventional period for marriage festivities in Syria at the time of Laban and Jacob (Gen. 29:27, 28); and the same custom prevailed among the Philistines in the days of Samson (Judg. 14:12, 17). Funeral obsequies also, like those of Jacob and others, were conducted for 7 days (Gen. 50:10; I Sam. 31:13). Weeks constantly entered into all the arrangements of the ceremonial law (Ex. 12:15; 13:6, 7; 22:30; 29:30, 35, 37; Lev. 12:2; 13:5; 14:8; etc.). A week with a fixed beginning, which everybody reckoned as the 1st day, is, of course, not intended in all or even in the majority of these cases. The week of nuptial festivities, for example, began on the day of the wedding on whatever date it occurred. Nevertheless these numerous instances show that the 7-day period was done by the women (II Kings 23:7; cf. I Sam. 2:19; Prov. 31:22, 24; Acts 9:39). Mantles and even tunics came from the loom ready for use; the latter, when thus woven complete, required no seam. Such tunics were prescribed for the priests (Ex. 28:6, 8; Jos. Antiq. iii. 7, 4); and one was worn by Jesus previous to his crucifixion (John 19:23).

The loom in Egypt was placed either vertically or horizontally. In Egyptian representations the frame is but slightly raised above the ground; the weaver squats at his work and apparently treads on the threads. The warp threads run in parallel relation and extend between the 2 beams to which they are attached; heddles of primitive sort, which separate the warp threads into 2 series and form a shed for the passage of the shuttle or other bearer of the woof threads, are next to him, between him and the woven cloth. With a reed he strikes the last thread which he shot through against the woof, pressing it close.

The Hebrew loom likewise had its beam and shuttle (I Sam. 17:7; II Sam. 21:19; Job 7:6). The pin of the beam, or rather weaving pin, for a different Heb. word is used from that elsewhere rendered "beam," may have been the sley or reed by which the thread of the woof was struck home (Judg. 16:13, 14). The web was cut off from the thrum (Isa. 38:12, R.V. marg.), or, to speak more generally, from the loom (R.V. text).

a standard in common use; and it is worthy of notice that the periods are consecutive in the narrative of the Flood (see FLOOD), as well as later, in determining the date of Pentecost. For the origin of the week, see SABBATH.

The ancient Hebrews named none of the days of the week except the 7th day, which they called the Sabbath. They numbered the days of the festivals, and the Babylonian narrator enumerates each of the 7 days during which the ark lay stranded. In the N.T. period the Hebrews numbered the days of the week (Matt. 28:1; Acts 20:7), and besides the 7th day named also the preceding day, which they called the preparation (Mark 15:42).

The week and the names of its days were introduced at a comparatively late period into the Roman Empire. The ancient Romans had a week of 8 days. The Greeks divided the month into 3 periods. The Egyptians, as early as the time when the pyramids were built, had periods of 10 days, each one of which began with the rising of 1 of 36 constellations in succession. Dio Cassius, who wrote in the 2d century A.D., speaks of the hebdomadal division of time being universal in his day in the Roman Empire, and a recent introduction. He represents it as borrowed from the Egyptians, and as based upon astrology. Of the 2 schemes, by one or the other of which he considers that the planetary names of the different days were fixed, only 1 has plausibility: each day in succession was assigned to one of the planets as regent, and the hours were also allotted to the planets. If the planets are arranged in the order of their distance from the earth, as believed at the time of Dio Cassius, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, Mercury, Moon, and if, further, the 1st hour is allotted to Saturn, the 2d to Jupiter, and so on, the 25th hour, or the 1st hour of the morrow, will fall to the sun and on the following morning to the moon, and so on to Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, and Venus. If the planet to which the 1st hour of the day belongs be reckoned as the regent of the day, the days of the week will be, Saturn's day, Sun's day, Moon's day, and so on. This theory must be held with cautious reserve. There may be an entirely different reason from that given for the order of the planets. There are various orders of the arrangement of the sun, moon, and 5 known planets among the Babylonians, but our succession of the names of the days of the week does not correspond to any one of them. There was, however, among the Sabians of Haran in Mesopotamia a list, doubtless of Babylonian origin with modifications, which corresponds to the order and names used by the Romans: Shamash (Sun), Sin (Moon), Nergal (Mars), Nabu (Mercury), Marduk or Bel (Jupiter), Ishtar (Venus), and Ninib (Saturn). The names passed from Roman to later European use, both in their Latin form and also, when translated into the Germanic languages, with the names of Germanic deities substituted for the corresponding Roman ones. The names are of heathen origin, but no associations of any kind are now connected with the heathen divinities; the use of the names of the days of the week is simply a matter of convenience.

The Heb. word for week, shabua', hebdomad, refers to a period of 7 days, and by extension the term is applied to a week of years; cf. the Sabbatic year and the Heb. word for week used by Daniel for a period of 7 years, as interpreters commonly understand (Dan. 9: 24-27; cf. Lev. 25:8).

Weeks, Feast of. The 2d of the 3 annual festivals at which every male Israelite was required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary, and the 1st of the 2 agricultural festivals (Ex. 34:22, 23; II Chron. 8:12, 13; cf. I Kings 9:25). It was so called because its date was set 7 complete weeks after the consecration of the harvest season by the offering of the sheaf of the first-ripe barley (Lev. 23:15, 16; cf. Deut. 16:9, 10). This sheaf was waved on the morrow after the Sabbath (Lev. 23:11). The Boethusians (associated with the Sadducees) interpreted this Sabbath as meaning the weekly Sabbath which occurred during the festival of unleavened bread; and some modern scholars have adopted this view. The opinion has even been held that it denoted merely the weekly Sabbath which fell immediately before the harvest. The older and better opinion is that it denotes the 1st day of the festival of unleavened bread. The Greek translators understood it so (Lev. 23:7, 11, LXX), as did also those who directed the services of the 2d Temple (Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 5); this 1st day was kept as a Sabbath: no work was done on it and there was a holy convocation; and such rest days, no less than the 7th day of the week, were called Sabbath (Lev. 23:32; 25: 2); on the morrow after the passover the new grain was used, which could not be eaten until the sheaf had been waved before the Lord (Lev. 23:14; Josh. 5:10, 11, R.V.). The festival fell on the 50th day after the waving of the sheaf, which gave rise to the name Pentecost or 50th day (Acts 2:1). It was also called the feast of harvest or day of first fruits, because the first fruits of the wheat harvest, then ended in most districts, were presented (Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Num. 28:26).

It celebrated the close of the grain harvest. It was bound up with the cycle of religious feasts by the number 7. It was observed as a Sabbath, ordinary labors were suspended, and there was a holy convocation (Lev. 23: 21; Num. 28:26); 2 loaves of leavened bread, such as was used in the household, representing the first fruits of the grain harvest, were offered to the Lord (Lev. 23:17, 20; cf. Ex. 34:22; Num. 28:26; Deut. 16:10); and with them 10 proper animals were sacrificed for a burnt offering, a kid for a sin offering, and 2 lambs for a peace offering (Lev. 23:18, 19).

The sacrifices for the entire day were distributed into: 1. The regular daily burnt offering of 2 lambs (Num. 28:3, 31). 2. The special sacrifices for the feast day (vs. 27-30), which were the same as on the day of the new moon and each day of unleavened bread (vs. 11, 19). 3. The sacrifices connected with the offering of the loaves and the 2 lambs (Lev. 23:17-19). Josephus correctly sums up the offerings additional to the daily burnt offering, except that he or his text as transmitted mentions 2 instead of 3 rams (Jos. Antiq. iii. 10, 6). As at the culminating agricultural festival, so at this the people were urged to remember the needy (Deut. 16:11, 12). Pentecost came to be regarded in later times, especially in the early Christian centuries, as the commemoration of the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai; but there is no authority for this belief in the O.T., and it cannot be shown that the Law was given exactly 50 days after the passover.

The most notable Pentecost was the 1st which occurred after the resurrection and ascension of Christ (Acts, ch. 2). From it dates the founding of the Christian Church. The essential traits of an institution are seen in the history of its establishment. At the institution of the Church, the Holy Spirit descended into all believers, without distinction of age, sex, or class (Acts 2:1-4, 14-21); see TONGUE. Life had been imparted. The Spirit had been given to men before, but now the Church entered upon what is characteristically the dispensation of the Spirit. The Spirit is now given in full measure to all believers without the intervention of prescribed rites. He had preserved a people of God on earth; in this new era of his power he devotes his divine energy to enlarging, perfecting, and edifying the Church.

Weights. The Hebrews used scales and weights (Lev. 19:36), and they weighed money as well as other commodities (Jer. 32: 10). The Hebrew denominations were talent (Gr. talanton, translation of Heb. kikkār, round, oval), mina (Gr. mnā) or maneh (Heb. māneh, from Akkad. manū; in both languages, the root means to count or reckon), shekel (weight), gerah (Heb. grain, bean; but probably from Akkad. geru, originally  $\frac{1}{2}$  shekel), and beka (half [shekel]).

Exact weights are necessary in the economic life of a nation (cf. Deut. 25:13-16; Prov. 11:1; 20:10). The inscriptions or marks on weights are doubtless more or less a guarantee of the exactness of the weight, and accordingly a few early inscribed Hebrew weights which have been found are important. It is highly probable that the inscribed ones were standard, but in general unmarked weights were used. The number of the latter is relatively much greater. Nearly all early Hebrew weights were of stone. There was found at Lachish a stone weight with the inscription nešeph; it weighed 10.515 grams (.371 oz., avoirdupois). Ten other examples of weights of the same class range from 10.21 to 9.28 grams. Two stone weights from Lachish with the inscription pym (payim, pim) weighed 8.13 and 7.805 grams (.287 and .275 oz., avoirdupois, respectively); at the same place appeared also 2 stone weights with the inscription beka', weighing 6.15 and 6.095 grams (.217 and .215 oz., avoirdupois, respectively). Most of the Lachish weights belong probably to the end of the 7th and the beginning of the 6th century B.C. From the varying weight of the same denomination we may infer that there were different local standards in Palestine and that they varied throughout the country and were subject to considerable fluctuations. There is a possibility that there were different standards analogous to our avoirdupois, troy, and apothecaries' weight. Furthermore ancient balances did not conform to modern standards in accuracy and sensitiveness.

In Babylonia and Assyria 60 shekels made a maneh. There were also a heavy talent, a heavy maneh, and a heavy shekel; they were exactly double the weight of the ordinary standards. By contrast the regular weights merians. One such Babylonian maneh, a medium weight, consists of 505 grams, while in a series preserved in the British Museum the weights vary between 570.60 grams and 423 grams. On the basis of a mathematical analysis there have been distinguished among these weights 3 distinct standards of the Babylonian maneh: 491.14, 502.20, and 511.83 grams.

Various values may be determined for the shekel according to the weights from Lachish. On the basis of a weight marked neseph, one may assume a shekel of 10.515 grams (.371 oz., avoirdupois); on the basis of the payim (pim) one may calculate a shekel of 11.951 grams (.421 oz., avoirdupois); on the basis of weights marked beka', a shekel of 12.245 grams (.432 oz., avoirdupois) may be assumed. There were also found at Lachish six weights marked with a sign  $\pi$  accompanied by T; the latter probably is a numerical sign denoting 8. If this be the case, these weights are called light talent, light maneh, and light shekel.

A Weight Found at Lachish; and Weights in the Form of a Lion and of a Duck, Which Were Used at Nineveh

In Palestine a maneh consisted of 50 shekels. At Ras Shamra (q.v.) the maneh of 50 shekels was in vogue during the 14th and 13th centuries B.C. The following is the Hebrew table of weights:

20 gerahs = 1 shekel
50 shekels = 1 maneh
60 manehs = 1 talent.

In this connection should be considered Ezek. 45:12, which gives a total of 60 shekels to the maneh. This may represent a theoretical reform to restore the original weight of the maneh for use in the sanctuary, since the maneh of the market place apparently had been reduced in weight. The series given by Ezekiel of 20, 25, 15 shekels (a total of 60) suggests an artificial scheme to attain a total of 60. If the maneh is reckoned at 60 shekels, we have the sequence 4/12, 5/12, 3/12, which when added together give one maneh. On the other hand, if we reckon the maneh at 50 shekels, we have the sequence 4/10, 5/10, 3/10, making a total of 12/10 of 50 shekels, or 60 shekels. In other words, if the maneh of 50 shekels was to have the value of 60 shekels, the weight of the shekel had to be increased. Many scholars, however, prefer the Greek reading of this passage according to Codex Alexandrinus: "Five shekels are five, and ten shekels are ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh." In other words, the current weights shall be neither more nor less than the standard value; just weighing shall prevail.

The pim (q.v.) was  $\frac{2}{3}$  of a shekel. See PIM, SHEKEL. Reckoning the shekel at 176.85 grains, a talent would weigh 75.793 lbs., avoirdupois, or 92.109 lbs., troy.

In Babylonia there were local standards existing beside the maneh (mina) of the Sumerians. One such Babylonian maneh, a medium weight, consists of 505 grams, while in a series preserved in the British Museum the weights vary between 570.60 grams and 423 grams. On the basis of a mathematical analysis there have been distinguished among these weights 3 distinct standards of the Babylonian maneh: 491.14, 502.20, and 511.83 grams. Various values may be determined for the shekel according to the weights from Lachish. On the basis of a weight marked neseph, one may assume a shekel of 10.515 grams (.371 oz., avoirdupois); on the basis of the payim (pim) one may calculate a shekel of 11.951 grams (.421 oz., avoirdupois); on the basis of weights marked beka', a shekel of 12.245 grams (.432 oz., avoirdupois) may be assumed. There were also found at Lachish six weights marked with a sign  $\pi$  accompanied by T; the latter probably is a numerical sign denoting 8. If this be the case, these weights are based on a unit averaging 11.389 grams or .402 oz., avoirdupois; this unit also may be regarded as a shekel. The weights found at Lachish agree substantially with evidence previously discovered at other places in Palestine. At Ras Shamra there was found a weight of about 470 grams, occupying a middle place between the Babylonian maneh of 505 and 491.14 grams on the one hand and the Egyptian maneh of 437 grams on the other. For practical purposes the shekel should be considered as 11.46 grams or 176.85 grains (.404 oz., avoirdupois; .368 oz., troy). See SHEKEL.

For the talent as a monetary value, see MONEY, TALENT. Sometimes it may be desirable to compare ancient values with modern money, but such comparisons are often misleading, especially since the purchasing power of money in antiquity was much higher than in the present era. If we should reckon the mina at about $16, the Attic talent would be worth approximately $960. This, however, is only a very rough approximation, and sometimes the statement is made that a talent in N.T. times was worth in round numbers $1,000. If such a parallel be considered, it should be clearly understood that such an equating is made only as a matter of convenience for visualizing ancient values and that it does not approach scientific accuracy. The talent was never coined.

Pound is the rendering of: 1. Heb. māneh (1 Kings 10:17). 2. Gr. mnā (1 Macc. 14:24; 15:18). 3. Litra (John 12:3; 19:39), equivalent to the Roman libra, of which 2½ equaled a Hebrew maneh of gold (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 7, 1). The Roman pound contained 327.45 grams.

Well. A pit sunk in the earth to reach a supply of water. It was called in Heb. b'ēr, a word often used in compound names like

Beer-sheba. The water reached was found collected in a depression, or slowly percolating through the sand on its way to a lower level, or flowing as an underground stream (cf. Gen. 16:7 with v. 14; ch. 24:11 with v. 13). Wells were often scooped in the sandy soil by those who knew of the presence of water. They were dug in the wadies and fed by an underflow, even when the bed of the torrent was dry, as at Beer-sheba and in the valley of Gerar (Gen. 21:30, 31; 24:19). They were sunk far and wide through the surface soil of the Philistine plain into the lower sand, where an inexhaustible stream makes its way to the sea. In hilly Palestine they were dug in the limestone rock. The well did not essentially differ in outward appearance from a cistern. To prevent accidents to man or beast the mouth was covered by a stone or plank (Gen. 29:2, 3; Ex. 21:33; II Sam. 17:19; Jos. Antiq. iv. 8, 37). When the well was shallow, steps were cut in the rock which led down to the water. Troughs of wood or stone were placed near the mouth for the benefit of the cattle (Ex. 2:16). The water was dipped with the pitcher (Gen. 24:16), or, when the well was deep, was drawn by a rope with bucket, jar, or waterskin attached (John 4:11). The rope was either dragged over the curb by the person getting the water, or perhaps an ox or ass was sometimes employed, as now, for the purpose, and occasionally a wheel was, as now, fixed over the well to assist in the work. See CISTERN, FOUNTAIN.

Whale. The word rendered "whale" in the A.V. of the O.T. denotes any great animal of the sea, except in Ezek. 32:2, where the Hebrew text must be emended and translated "dragon" (E.R.V., J.V., and A.V. marg.) or "monster" (A.R.V.). This interpretation is supported by 2 Heb. MSS., the LXX, and the Vulgate. Cf. also DRAGON.

The Gr. word kētos, which is used in Matt. 12:40, and rendered "whale," means any huge fish or other large animal of the sea, such as the dolphin, sea dog, and seal, and later whale. The LXX employs kētos mega in Jonah 1:17 (in LXX, ch. 2:1) to render the 2 words "great fish" of the Hebrew text, and thus the word kētos passed into Matt. 12:40.

Wheat. Wheat was cultivated in Babylonia (Herod. i. 193), in Mesopotamia (Gen. 30:14), in Egypt (Ex. 9:32), in Palestine (Ex. 34:22; Deut. 8:8; Judg. 6:11), and elsewhere, from a very early period.

In Palestine wheat was sown in November or December, after the rains began. The harvest was in April, May, or June in Palestine, varying according to the locality, the soil at the place, and the weather at the time; see YEAR.

The ordinary bread of the Hebrews was made of the flour of wheat (Ex. 29:2). The ears were also roasted and eaten (Lev. 2:14, 16; Ruth 2:14); see PARCHED CORN. The wheat, bruised and crushed, was also used as food. New wheat thus prepared, or else the fresh ear, is mentioned as eaten (Lev. 23:14; II Kings 4:42).

Egypt was the granary of the Mediterranean region, and vast quantities were shipped annually to Rome from Alexandria (Acts 27:6, 38). The best quality, according to Pliny, was grown in Upper Egypt, in the Thebaid (Hist. Nat. xviii. 47). The Egyptian wheat was a bearded variety, with many ears on the head (Triticum compositum). It is mentioned in Gen. 41:22, is depicted on the ancient monuments, and is still grown. The wheat generally cultivated in Palestine is the common variety, Triticum vulgare, with a simple head.

Wheel. See GARDEN, WELL.

Whore. See HARLOT.

Wid'ow. A widow from early times wore an appropriate garb (Gen. 38:14, 19); she laid aside her ornaments, clothed herself in sackcloth, let her hair hang unbound, and did not anoint her face (Judith 10:3, 4; 16:8). God shows special compassion to the more helpless classes, among whom he reckons widows (Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68:5; 116:9; Prov. 15:25; Jer. 49:11). Under the Mosaic Law, and subsequently, the Hebrews were enjoined to treat widows with justice and consideration, threatening judgment on those who did differently (Ex. 22:22; Deut. 14:29; 16:11, 14; 24:17-21; 26:12, 13; Isa. 1:17; Jer. 7:6; 22:3; Zech. 7:10; Mal. 3:5), as our Lord also did in his preaching (Mark 12:40). The Apostolic Church looked after poor widows (Acts 6:1;

Egyptian Wheat

James 1:27). In the churches under Timothy's care certain widows, who were widows indeed, and had neither children nor grandchildren to provide for them (I Tim. 5:4), were enrolled and cared for by the Church (v. 16). To obtain enrollment it was required that they be at least 60 years of age, have been married but once, and be well reported of for good works (vs. 9, 10). Here are the beginnings of an institution. From the end of the 2d century to the 4th they are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers as elder widows or the order of widows. Their duty was to serve the Church, and they had oversight over the women of the congregation, especially over widows and orphans. The office was abolished by the synod of Laodicea, A.D. 364.

Wilderness of the Wandering. 1. Boundaries and extent of the wilderness. Nature has defined a large inverted triangle, having for its base the s.e. shore of the Mediterranean Sea and the s. boundary of Palestine, for its w. side the depression in which the Gulf of Suez and the Bitter Lakes lie, and for its e. side the depression occupied by the Gulf of 'Akabah and the gorge of the Arabah. The base of this triangle measures 200 miles, and its area about 22,000 square miles. This district may be called the wilderness of the wandering; but this designation in Arabic, Badiyah et-Tih, is restricted to the tableland n. of Sinai. The region is barren, little desired by man; and the great nations of antiquity accordingly left it virtually to itself. The Israelites pushed their s. boundary but a short distance into its limits, and the Egyptians fortified a frontier for themselves where its sands began.

2. Physical features of the wilderness. The chief features of the territory are 4: a region of sand, or the n. and n.w. coast; a region of limestone, or the tableland; a region of sandstone, or the low mountains; and a region of granite, or the high mountains. (1) The region of sand extends in a broad band from Philistia along the shore of the Mediterranean Sea to the boundary of Egypt and beyond, bending to the s. and continuing in a strip about 10 miles wide past Suez to a point  $\frac{1}{2}$  the way down the coast. This sandy region is more or less coextensive with the wilderness of Shur. (2) The n. and central portion of the triangle is a sterile tableland of limestone, from 2,000 to 2,500 feet high; sloping down on the n. to the sandy region on the Mediterranean; swelling in the n.e. into a mountainous country; and confined on the other sides by an encircling chain of mountains, 4,000 and more feet high, now called Jebel et-Tih. The middle of this desert is occupied by a long central basin, which is drained into the Mediterranean by Wadi el-'Arish and its tributaries. These water courses are dry most of the year, but filled by the rains they become raging torrents. West of this basin, other wadies run by themselves down to the sea. On the e. of the same central basin, between it and the Arabah, is another similar and parallel one, extending from Jebel et-Tih nearly to Jebel 'Araif and the mountainous country of the n.e., and drained throughout by Wadi el-Jerafi. The tableland proper, with its continuation in the adjacent clusters of mountains in the n.e. as far as the cleft of Wadi el-Fikreh, was the wilderness of Paran (Num. 10:11, 12; 13:26; 1 Sam. 25:1), in which the Israelites wandered for 38 years, and of which the portion lying between Horeb and Kadesh was remembered by them as "that great and terrible wilderness" (Deut. 1:19). This plateau is mostly naked of vegetation, and has a gravelly surface. The wadies, however, seldom fail to show vegetation of some sort, and after the rainy season are covered with a thin herbage. The springs are few, and generally send forth impure water; but in the region about Kadesh and along the border of the Arabah there are a considerable number of living fountains, and near Kadesh and even at other places in the very heart of the desert water is obtainable by digging. (3) The sandstone formation crosses the peninsula in a broad belt immediately s. of Jebel et-Tih and extends nearly from shore to shore, separating the limestone tableland from the granite mountains. It is rich in mineral wealth. It may be compared to a dumbbell in shape; for it consists of 2 groups of mountains connected by a central plateau. This sandy tableland has an altitude of about 1,500 feet. (4) The region of granite consists of the groups of mountain ranges about Mount Sinai. The watershed runs n. and s. and lies just e. of Wadi esh-Sheikh.

3. Possibility of a sojourn of forty years in the wilderness. The Israelites numbered 600,000 men from 20 years old and upward, according to the repeated testimony of the Hebrew records. According to statistics of population, which yield the proportion of 4 to 5 between those under and those above 20 years of age in a given community, the whole body of fugitives from Egypt numbered 2,100,000. The Bible, as well as exploration, teaches that this great host could not have survived for any great length of time in the wilderness save by the providence and miracles of God. Moses reminded the people that in the wilderness they had seen how that the Lord their God did bear them, "as a man doth bear his son," in all the way that they went (Deut. 1:31). The recorded miracles of sustenance are few. In the wilderness of Sin, at the beginning of their journey, manna was given to the Children of Israel and they continued to eat of this food for 40 years, until they came into the borders of Canaan (Ex. 16:1, 4, 14, 15, 35). This was the permanent provision for their needs. The occasional supplies were the quails, given at the same time as the manna, but apparently only as a sign and temporarily, for they are not again mentioned (Ex. 16:12, 13); the water provided shortly afterward from the rock near Rephidim (ch. 17:3-7); the quails given in the 2d year for a month (Num. 10:11; 11:4-6, 31); and the water caused to gush from the rock at Kadesh toward the end of the 40 years' sojourn (ch. 20:2-11). The Bible teaches further that, notwithstanding these miracles, certain periods of the sojourn remained a horrible memory (Deut. 1:19; 8:15); that though it could be said, "Thou hast lacked nothing" (ch. 2:7), yet the life in the wilderness was one of repeated privation and hardship. The water was insufficient at Rephidim and Kadesh (Ex. 17:1; Num. 20:2); the people were murmuring 3 days after leaving Sinai before reaching Hazeroth (Num. 10:33; 11:1, 35) and as they journeyed from Mount Hor toward the Red Sea (Num. 21:4, 5); and the wilderness was found to be terrible (Deut. 8:15).

It appears from the Biblical narrative that the manna sufficed as staple fare, though the people grew weary of it; and that the water supply, though scanty often to distress, was ordinarily sufficient. Food was furnished continuously. In regard to the supply of water in this region of desolation, there are 2 considerations of importance: (1) The ability of the people to alleviate the distress of the desert journey arising from the scarcity of water. The power of man and beast to endure thirst is great in these dry countries. The camel drivers of Egypt, both men and boys, escort travelers across scorching sands and under a burning sun without tasting a drop of water from early morning until after nightfall, because unable to obtain it. Dr. Robinson relates that his Arab guide spent a fortnight on the Sinaitic peninsula near Mount Serbal pasturing his camels, without a drop of water for himself or them. He drank the milk of the camels; and they, as well as sheep and goats, when they have fresh pasture, need no water, sometimes going 3 or 4 months without it (Researches i. 150). Again, like other travelers in the desert, the Israelites undoubtedly carried a supply of water with them, which they replenished at every opportunity. It is evident from the narrative that at the beginning of their journey they provided water sufficient for a march of at least 3 days into the wilderness (Ex. 15:22). Again, the Israelites discovered hidden natural supplies. Frequently when the bed of the wadi or the surface of the plain is dry, a stream flows or water lies in a basin underground. According to the geologist Fraas, the so-called wells of Moses, which bubble up in the desert a short distance from Suez, are fed by a subterranean stream which flows from the mountains of er-Rahah, 10 or 14 miles away. In Wadi Gharandel, which is commonly identified with Elim, there is a subterranean stream which the Arabs open when the upper watercourse is dry. Though the rains fail for 2 or 3 years, water is always to be found by digging a little below the surface (Robinson, Researches i. 69). Back of Tur, at Mabuk, at Kubab, and elsewhere, water collects beneath the surface and may be reached with slight effort (Ritter, Erdkunde xiv. 161, 185; Robinson, Researches i. 167). The Hebrews understood this fact and took advantage of it during their sojourn in the wilderness, as the song of the well testifies (Num. 21:17, 18). Again, if the manner of travel was like the migrations of other large bodies of people, the Israelites scattered in order to utilize for man and beast all the soil and herbage and water. Again, the Israelites husbanded the resources of water. The rainfall is considerable; the wadies bear evidence of the torrents which at times sweep down their courses. The early Christian monks who dwelt in the mountains of Sinai and the former inhabitants and cultivators of the district about Kadesh built dams across the ravines and dug cisterns, and thus secured water for themselves, their cattle, and their gardens. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the forefathers of these Israelites of the Exodus, had likewise husbanded the rainfall, and the descendants of these Israelites dug trenches in the valleys and built reservoirs for a like purpose; and doubtless so did the Israelites during their sojourn of 38 years in the wilderness (Deut. 2:14). (2) A 2d important consideration is the evidence that the country was better wooded in former times. Charcoal has been made in the peninsula from the acacia tree for ages, but the improvident Arabs have never been wont to replace the destroyed timber by replanting. Bartlett in 1874 mentions seeing stumps where the Arabs had burned down the trees, and acacias with the boughs lopped off for the camels to eat (From Egypt to Palestine). Burckhardt, one of the earliest travelers to explore Sinai, in his journey across the country in 1812 came across charcoal burners (Erdkunde xiv. 183); and Rüppell in 1822 mentioned the burning of charcoal for sale in Egypt as an immemorial industry of the Bedouin, and ascribed the nakedness of the valleys to the neglect of the Arabs to replant the ground which they had denuded (Erdkunde xiv. 274, 342). But charcoal burning for domestic purposes and export has not been the only means whereby the peninsula has been impoverished of wood; mining and smelting have also caused the destruction of great quantities of timber. The ancient Egyptians worked copper mines in the sandstone mountains of the w. intermittently from a very early period, and were still operating them subsequently to the Exodus. Acacia wood was sometimes used as supports for the roofs of the mines (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus i. 205), and the smelting operations, which were of magnitude, demanded large quantities of timber for fuel (ibid., 26, 43, 231-235; Erdkunde xiv. 786, 787). One should recall the disappearance of the cedars of Lebanon and of wide stretches of forest in America. It is clear that, beginning long before the Exodus and continuing down to the present day, causes have been at work reducing the timber in the region traversed by the Israelites. This fact has a direct bearing on the question of the water supply in earlier times; for, the country being better wooded, there was a natural preservation of the rainfall. As always where there is vegetation, the rain fell more regularly; the water was admitted to the wadies more slowly and gently; soil and vegetation were less ruthlessly swept away; springs were more numerous and flowed more copiously; and streams endured longer into the dry season and were more frequently perennial.

Under an energetic, competent, and provident leader who was acquainted with the desert and its resources, by husbanding the supply, by extending the bounds of the encampment, and by scattering from the central camp in groups of various size, and with no failure of the annual rains, it is not to be doubted that a large host could have secured a sufficient though scant supply of water for man and beast.

4. The route of the Israelites through the wilderness. Certain sites have been identified: Succoth in Egypt at the beginning of the journey, the river Arnon which was reached at the close of the 40 years, when the wilderness was left, and the encampments beyond the Arnon which are mentioned in the itinerary, Kadesh, which has been identified with 'Ain Kadis, where the camp was twice pitched, and whence the Israelites expected to march directly into the Promised Land, and Ezion-geber, where the camp was located just before the 2d march to Kadesh, and near which they afterward passed on their way to the Arnon. Mount Sinai is almost universally located in the peninsula, which is accordingly called the peninsula of Sinai. The camp at Moserah was hard by Mount Hor, on the border of Edom; and the wells of Bene-jaakan and Hor-haggidgad were also near the boundary of Edom. Punon was e. of Edom and n.e. of Petra. With a knowledge of the location of these places, one may readily trace the general route.

An itinerary covering the journey from Rameses and Succoth to the camp opposite Jericho was drawn up by Moses (Num., ch. 33). The encampments recorded in it after Sinai represent the movements of the tabernacle. The people were, however, doubtless often dispersed through the wilderness, tending their flocks wherever herbage and water were found. When they were collected and encamping in a body, their camp was very large and, in a settled country, covered the distance between several towns; hence the same encampment may be differently described or designated (cf. Num. 33:49 with ch. 25:1). Besides the itinerary there is the narrative of the journey (Ex., ch. 12, to Num., ch. 25), and there are also scattered allusions in the address of Moses to various incidents that occurred on the way. It is important to remember that each of these 3 recitals was prepared for a special purpose of its own. The itinerary records formal encampments and does not mention every halting place and every place of spending the night (Ex. 15:22; Num. 10:33). It is doubtful whether it omits a single encampment where the tabernacle was set up. In the address events are cited as illustrations or to enforce the argument; and of course they are chosen at random, without reference to chronological sequence, and they are frequently alluded to broadly and by comprehensive statement.

Willow, Willow Tree. 1. Any tree of the genus Salix, called saphsāphāh in Heb. (Ezek. 17:5). Several species are common in Palestine.

2. The rendering of Heb. ‘arābāh. The Israelites were directed to take branches from it, as well as from other trees, to make booths at the feast of tabernacles (Lev. 23:40). It grew beside brooks or watercourses (Isa. 44:4), and afforded cover even to the bulky behemoth (Job. 40:22). It was the tree on which the Hebrews hung their harps when exiles at Babylon (Ps. 137:2). The LXX and Vulgate render the Heb. word by willow, and they are followed by the English version. It may have been the weeping willow (Salix babylonica), which is found abundantly on the Euphrates and is cultivated in Palestine. But leading interpreters, following Wetzstein, understand the Arab. gharab, and consequently its etymological Heb. equivalent, ‘arābāh, to denote the Euphratean poplar (Populus euphratica).

Willows, Brook of the. A brook in Moab (Isa. 15:7), the lower course of Wadi el-Hesā at the junction of the upper course of Seil el-Kerāhi, where there is a small plain covered with willow trees. It was at the boundary between Moab and Edom. It may be identical with the brook of the Arabah (Amos 6:14, R.V.).

Wim'ple. An article of woman's attire, made of silk or linen, and worn as a covering for the neck, chin, and sides of the face; it may have been a long pendulous kerchief. In A.V. of Isa. 3:22, it is the rendering of Heb. mitpaphath, a shawl or mantle (ibid.; Ruth 3:15, both R.V.).

Wind. The Hebrews, who did not define direction with the minuteness customary in modern times, recognized 4 winds: the e., the w., the n., and the s. winds (Jer. 49:36; Ezek. 37:9; Rev. 7:1). God created the wind (Amos 4:13); and it stands at his summons, is under his control, and performs his pleasure (Job 28:25; Ps. 78:26; 107:25; 135:7; 148:8; Matt. 8:26). The wind that blew from the w., s.w., and n.w. brought rain to Palestine, and accompanied the storm (I Kings 18:43-45; Ps. 147:18; Prov. 25:23, R.V.; Ezek. 13:13). Wind was often destructive to houses and shipping (Job 1:19; Ps. 48:7; Matt. 7:27). The scorching wind dried up streams and blasted vegetation (Gen. 41:6; Isa. 11:15; Ezek. 19:12; Jonah 4:8); see EAST WIND. The s. and s.e. winds traversed the Arabian desert, and were dry and hot (Job 37:17; Luke 12:55). The n. wind was cooler (Ecclus. 43:20), and was favorable to vegetation (S. of Sol. 4:16). Wind was taken advantage of by the thresher to blow away the chaff and broken straw (Job 21:18; Ps. 1:4); see THRESHING. The mariner also availed himself of the wind (Acts 27:40). The words which are rendered "whirlwind" in English do not denote a rotary wind specifically, but signify a violent storm of any kind.

Win'dow. An aperture, especially in the wall of a building (Gen. 26:8; I Kings 6:4; Jer. 22:14), which was opened and closed at convenience by means of a movable shutter of some sort (Gen. 8:6; II Kings 13:17; Dan. 6:10), generally a lattice (Judg. 5:28; II Kings 1:2; Prov. 7:6; S. of Sol. 2:9); but a window on the ground floor, that looked into the street, was doubtless in ancient as in modern times small, high up in the wall, and strongly barred. In the better class of houses most of the windows faced the court. Houses that abutted on the town wall usually had windows looking toward the country (Josh. 2:15; II Cor. 11:33).

Wine. Wine was made from grapes. The ripe clusters were gathered in baskets (Jer. 6:9), carried to the press, and thrown into it. The press consisted of a shallow vat, built above ground or excavated in the rock (Isa. 5:2) and, through holes in the bottom, communicating with a lower vat also frequently excavated in the rock. An upper vat measuring 8 feet square and 15 inches deep had at times a lower vat 4 feet square and 3 feet deep. The grapes were crushed by treading (Neh. 13:15; Job 24:11), 1 or more men being employed according to the size of the vat. In Egypt, and probably in Palestine, the treaders held to ropes overhead to keep from falling; they sang at their work and shouted, doubtless to keep time (Isa. 16:10; Jer. 25:30; 48:33); and the red blood of the grapes flowed around them and stained their skin and their garments (Isa. 63:1-3). From the upper vat the juice trickled into the lower. From this receptacle the juice was put in bottles of skin (Job 32:19; Matt. 9:17), or in large earthenware jars, where it was allowed to ferment. When fermentation had proceeded far enough, the wine was drawn off into other vessels (Jer. 48:11, 12).

The juice of the grape when expressed was used in various conditions: as must, fresh from the press; as wine, which was produced by vinous fermentation; and as vinegar, which resulted when the fermentation was continued too long. Probably in ancient times, as at the present day, some of the must was reduced to a syrup or honey by boiling. As vinegar it was called hōmez, in Gr., oxos; see VINEGAR. Various names were applied to it in the other states:

Hebrew tirōsh, must, fresh or new wine; the R.V. sometimes renders this word by "vintage" (Num. 18:12; Neh. 10:37, marg.); and the attempt has been made by some interpreters to limit the meaning to this sense, and to deny that it ever signifies new wine or must. It means juice of the grape or must in Joel 2:24: "The floors shall be full of wheat, and the vats [A.V., fats] shall overflow with new wine and oil"; cf. ch. 3:13: "Put ye in the sickle; for the harvest is ripe: come, tread ye; for the winepress is full [of grapes], the vats [both of them] overflow." It also means juice of the grape or new wine, as it is rendered in Hos. 4:11: "Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the understanding." There is no need to depart from this meaning of tirōsh anywhere and render it vintage; for example: 1. Isa. 62:8, 9: "Surely I will no more give thy grain to be food for thine enemies; and foreigners shall not drink thy new wine, for which thou hast labored: but they that have garnered it shall eat it, and praise Jehovah; and they

that have gathered it shall drink it in the courts of my sanctuary." There is no need to give tirōsh the meaning of vintage here, as the R.V. shows by placing wine in the text, as the A.V. did. It is said indeed to be gathered; but this is a proleptic form of speech, and elsewhere wine and oil are said to be gathered (Jer. 40:10; the Heb. word for wine being yayin). 2. Isa. 65:8: "As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it." Cheyne renders, "As when [a few good] grapes are found in the cluster, and one saith [to the other gleaners] destroy it not, for a blessing is in it." But the same meaning exactly is yielded by rendering, "As when the juice is found in the cluster," etc. 3. Micah 6:15: "Thou shalt sow, but shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the olives, but shalt not anoint thee with oil; and the vintage [A.V., sweet wine], but shalt not drink the wine." The Hebrews spoke of treading grapes (Amos 9:13) and of treading wine (Isa. 16:10, yayin being used). 4. Not even in those numerous passages where the fruits of the ground are mentioned comprehensively as corn, wine, and oil (Num. 18:12, R.V. vintage; Deut. 7:13; 11:14; 12:17; Hos. 2:8, 22; Joel 1:10; 2:19, in all 18 times). In many of these passages the tithe of the corn, wine, and oil is spoken of. Since yishār denotes the oil which is found in the olive (II Kings 18:32; Zech. 4:12), tirōsh may denote the juice which is found in the grape; and as the grain was thought of as threshed, the tirōsh and the oil may be thought of as expressed. The only question then is: Were not first fruits and tithes brought from the other produce of the vineyard which was not reduced to wine? They were; but they are not specifically included in the threefold designation so often employed. The first fruits of all that was in the land were presented to the Lord, as is more explicitly stated in Num. 18:13; and mint and anise were tithed, although the threefold designation does not when interpreted literally embrace them.

Hebrew ʾāsīs, something trodden out; hence grape juice, must (Isa. 49:26; Amos 9:13). It does not denote the expressed juice of the grape only, but of other fruits as the pomegranate.

Greek gleukos is used by Josephus in speaking of the grape juice squeezed into Pharaoh's cup (Gen. 40:11; Jos. Antiq. ii. 5, 2). It is explained by Hesychius as the juice that flowed spontaneously from the grapes before the treading commenced. It was drawn off and kept separate from the juice which flowed under pressure. It was with this that the apostles were accused of being filled on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:13).

Must was drunk; and, after fermentation had set in, was intoxicating (Hos. 4:11, tirōsh; Acts 2:13, gleukos; and probably Isa. 49:26, ʾāsīs). But although must was used as a drink, the old wine was preferred (Ecclus. 9:10; Luke 5:39). Pliny regarded must as hurtful to the stomach (Hist. Nat. xxiii. 18).

Hebrew yayin is the cognate of the Semitic word from which are derived Gr. oinos and Lat. vinum. Hāmar is the Aram. name for the same thing; and hemer is the etymological equivalent of the Aram. word, and is occasionally used in Hebrew poetry. When the Heb. word yayin first occurs in Scripture, it is the fermented juice of the grape (Gen. 9:21), and there is no reason to believe that it has a different meaning elsewhere. The Gr. oinos also means the fermented juice of the grape, except when it is qualified by the word new, and even then there are not 2 wines, 1 fermented and the other unfermented. New wine is must, which only becomes wine by fermentation. An argument for the use of the term wine for unfermented grape juice has been sought in the fact that wine was used in later times at the passover, and yet leaven was strictly forbidden during the 7 days of the paschal festival; hence the term wine, it has been argued, must have been applied to unfermented juice. But the reason is invalid. Vinous fermentation was not regarded as leaven. Wine was drunk at the passover (Mishnah, Pesāḥim x); at that season it was unlawful to put meal or flour into the hārōseth (a sauce made of fruits and spices with wine or vinegar), probably since the fermentation that ensued would be considered like the leaven of bread (Mishnah, Pesāḥim ii). There were numerous varieties of wine which differed in body and flavor, such as the wine of Lebanon, the wine of Helbon. See VINE.

"Fruit of the vine," the designation used by Jesus at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Matt. 26:29), is the expression employed by the Jews from time immemorial for the wine partaken of on sacred occasions, as at the passover and on the evening of the Sabbath (Mishnah, Berākōth vi. 1). The Greeks also used the term as a synonym of wine which was capable of producing intoxication (Herod. i. 211 f.). The juice of the grape that was ordinarily planted was red (Isa. 63:2; Rev. 14:18-20) and was called the blood of the grape (Gen. 49:11; Deut. 32:14; I Macc. 6:34; Ecclus. 50:15).

Mixed wine was known by the specific names of meseḳ (Ps. 75:8), mimsāk (Prov. 23:30; Isa. 65:11), and mezeg (S. of Sol. 7:2), each of which means mixture and denotes wine mixed with spices to give it a pleasant flavor (S. of Sol. 8:2; Pliny Hist. Nat. xiv. 19, 5), or with water to diminish its strength (cf. Herod. vi. 84).

Wine differed from shēkār, rendered "strong drink" in E.V., in that wine was made from the juice of the grape, and shēkār from the juice of other fruits and of grain. Shēkār was fermented, for it was capable of producing intoxication (Isa. 28:7; 29:9). It was prepared from barley (Herod. ii. 77), from honey, or from dates (i. 193; Jerome Epist. ad Nepotianum), or from the lotus (Herod. iv. 177). The drink made from dates is wholesome and refreshing, but in 1 day's heat it undergoes rapid fermentation, effervesces, and produces intoxication if taken immoderately. Shēkār is once used in a broad sense for strong drink generally in distinction from water, and refers to the drink offering, which consisted of wine exclusively (Num. 28:7).

Other words are sōbe, derived from a root which signifies to drink to excess (Isa. 1:22; Nahum 1:10); and shemārīm, which strictly denotes the lees of wine and then is used for wine kept long on the lees, and hence, old.

Wine was employed medicinally (Prov. 31:6; Luke 10:34; I Tim. 5:23); was used in the service of God (Ex. 29:39-41; Lev. 23:13); and light wine was a staple article of diet in Palestine, as it has been in other Mediterranean lands from time immemorial (Num. 6:20; Deut. 14:26; II Chron. 2:15; Neh. 5:18; Matt. 11:19; I Tim. 3:8). According to the Egyptian Tale of Sinuhe wine was abundant in Palestine before and in Dyn. XII. Palestine was a country where meat was difficult to obtain and vegetables were rare; and wine supplied the lack. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that wine was the invariable accompaniment of a meal; many a repast was doubtless partaken of without it. Still wine was in common use. Bread and wine signified the staples of life (Ps. 104:14, 15; Prov. 4:17). Wine was offered as an ordinary hospitality (Gen. 14:18) and was served at festivities (Job 1:13, 18; John 2:3). The Hebrew people were, as a rule, simple in their mode of living, and temperate; but the danger of excess in the use of even light wine, especially at feasts, was clearly discerned. Its use was accordingly forbidden to priests when ministering at the sanctuary (Lev. 10:9), and was declared to be improper for those about to sit on the judgment seat (Prov. 31:4, 5; cf. Eccl. 10:17; Isa. 28:7); and precautions were taken to guard all men against excess. The means employed to prevent the danger line from being crossed were: 1. The wine was weakened with water (II Macc. 15:39; cf. Herod. vi. 84). That this was done further appears, for example, in connection with the kettle of warm water and the servants to mix the wine, which were employed at the passover (Mishnah, Pesāḥim vii. 13; x. 2, 4, 7); hence in the Early Christian Church it was customary to mix the sacramental wine with water (Justin Martyr Apol. i. 65). 2. There was a governor of the feast (Ecclus. 32:1, 2; John 2:9, 10), one of whose duties, at least where Greek customs were observed, was to fix the proportion in which the wine and water should be mixed and to determine how much wine each guest might drink; see MEALS. 3. Warnings against the danger of lingering over the wine, of tampering with the cup when it delights the eye, and of making strong intoxicants were urgently given, and the degradation of the drunkard was pointed out by sad example (Gen. 9:21; Prov. 23:29-35; Isa. 5:22). 4. The folly of excess even from a worldly standpoint was emphasized and expressed in proverbs, and put on record in the religious literature of the people (Prov. 20:1; 21:17; 23:20, 21; Hab. 2:5; Eccles. 31:25-31). 5. The sinfulness of drunkenness was earnestly taught and the condemnation of the drunkard by God the Judge was fully known (I Sam. 1:14-16; Isa. 5:11-17; I Cor. 5:11; 6:10; Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:18; I Peter 4:3).

Wis'dom. One of the 3 departments of knowledge among the Hebrews, the other 2 being the law and prophecy. The law presents the commandments and claims of Jehovah to man; prophecy passes judgment on conduct in the light of God's revealed will and explains the object of God's dealings with men; wisdom seeks by observation, experience, and reflection to know things in their essence and reality as they stand related to man and God. The law and prophecy proceed directly from God, and in the highest sense are the word of God. Wisdom proceeds from man, and is the product of his own experience and observation. But while it is a human effort, it recognizes that a good understanding is the gift of God, and it postulates the fear of God and obedience to his commandments as its first principle (Ps. 111:10; Prov. 9:10; Eccles. 12:13). In the earlier chapters of The Proverbs, in The Book of Job, and in The Wisdom of Solomon, wisdom is personified. See PHILOSOPHY.

The wise in counsel (Jer. 18:18) are met with from time to time during Israel's national history; as the wise woman of Tekoa (II Sam. 14:2), the wise woman of Abel-beth-maacah (II Sam. 20:18), the 4 celebrities Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Darda (I Kings 4:31). Their utterances took the form of parable (II Sam. 14:4-11), precept (Prov. 24:27-29), proverb (vs. 23-26), riddle (ch. 1:6), the story of real life and its lesson (ch. 24:30-34); and it is customary to see specimens of their keen observation, method, and shrewd sayings in Jotham's fable (Judg. 9:7-20), Samson's riddle or dark saying (ch. 14:14), Nathan's parable and those enacted by the wise woman of Tekoa and a certain prophet (II Sam. 12:1-7; 14:4-17; I Kings 20:35-43), and the fable uttered by King Jehoash (II Kings 14:9, 10). But the great books of Hebrew wisdom are Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, and The Wisdom of Solomon.

Wise Men. See MAGI.

Witch and Witch'craft'. See SORCERER.

Wit'ness. Evidence which could be appealed to in the future was secured by some tangible token or memorial, as a heap of stones (Gen. 31:46-52), or by calling in men to witness the event (ch. 23:10-18), by a written document, as a deed or a letter of divorce (Deut. 24:1, 3; Jer. 32:10).

The concurrent testimony of at least 2 witnesses was required under the Mosaic Law to establish guilt of a capital crime (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6; Heb. 10:28; cf. I Kings 21:10, 13; Matt. 26:60). This principle was a general rule in all judicial procedure (Deut. 19:15). The Mosaic Law did not sanction the use of torture to extract testimony; see PUNISHMENT. The witness, before his testimony was given, was adjured to tell the truth and to conceal nothing; and then it was sin for him to withhold evidence in his possession (Lev. 5:1; Prov. 29:24). False witness bearing was denounced in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:16), and when detected, it drew upon the false witness the same penalty that he had attempted to get imposed on the accused (Deut. 19:16, 19). The witnesses aided in executing a sentence of death; see STONING. Josephus asserts that women and children were excluded from giving testimony by the Mosaic Law (Antiq. iv. 8, 15). The Law itself says nothing on the subject; but the participation of the witnesses in the execution of the death penalty would make the exclusion of women and children from witness bearing expedient. Josephus' statement evidently represents the current interpretation of the Mosaic Law in his day.

The excellent principle involved in having at least 2 witnesses is capable of broad application in the dealings of man with man (Isa. 8:2; Matt. 17:1, 2; 18:16; John 8:17, 18; I Tim. 5:19).

Those who in the face of danger and distress testify to the truth of God are witnesses in the highest sense (Heb., chs. 10; 11; 12:1). Martyr is a Gr. word meaning witness, and it came to signify one who sealed his testimony with his blood, as Stephen and Antipas (Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13).

Wiz'ard. A professed possessor of supernatural knowledge derived, in the form of wizardry referred to in the Bible, from the pretended ability to converse with the spirits of the dead (Isa. 8:19). The wizard chirped and muttered in imitation of the voice of the spirit (cf. Isa. 29:4). The wizard is never mentioned alone, but always in connection with them that have familiar spirits, because he belonged to the same class of questioners of the dead. The Canaanites consulted wizards (Deut. 18:9-12); so did the Egyptians (Isa. 19:3); but for a Hebrew to go to such an oracle defiled him, and was apostasy from Jehovah (Lev. 19:31; 20:6; Isa. 8:19). The offense of wizardry was punished with death (Lev. 20:27). Saul, and subsequently Josiah, put the law in force (I Sam. 28:3, 9; II Kings 23:24); while Manasseh violated it shamelessly (II Kings 21:6).

Wolf. 1. A carnivorous animal, wild and fierce (Isa. 11:6; Hab. 1:8), that kills sheep (Eccles. 13:17; John 10:12), and is accustomed to remain in hiding by day and seek its prey in the evening (Zeph. 3:3). Benjamin was compared to the fierce and dreaded wolf (Gen. 49:9, 27; see the warrior ZEEB). But comparison with the wolf was not always intended as an honor. Violent princes who prey upon the helpless are likened to ravening wolves (Ezek. 22:27), and so are false teachers (Matt. 7:15; Acts 20:29) and enemies of the flock of God (Matt. 10:16). The wolf of Palestine is a variety of the European species (Canis lupus), and is found throughout the country. Owing to the ease with which food is obtained and the mildness of the winter, wolves do not hunt in packs, as in the colder n., but prowls alone.

2. The rendering of Heb. 'iyiyim, howling creatures (Isa. 13:22; 34:14; Jer. 50:39; in A.V. wild beasts of the islands). The wolf belongs to the same genus as the dog, but it cannot bark; it can only howl.

Wom'an. The counterpart of man, made to be "a help meet unto him" and his social equal (Gen. 2:21-24; see EVE). Monogamy, or the marriage of 1 man and 1 woman, was the Creator's intention; see MARRIAGE.

The younger women of the family, especially in the earlier times and among the nomads, tended the sheep (Gen. 29:6; Ex. 2:16), and they went to the harvest field and gleaned (Ruth 2:3, 8); but the main duties of women were concerned with the household. They brought water from the well (Gen. 24:

13; John 4:7), ground the grain for daily use (Matt. 24:41), prepared the meals (Gen. 18: 6; II Sam. 13:8; Luke 10:40), spun wool and made clothing (I Sam. 2:19; Prov. 31:13, 19; Acts 9:36-39), taught the children religious truth (Prov. 1:8; 31:1; cf. II Tim. 3:15), and directed the household (Prov. 31:27; I Tim. 5:14).

The Mosaic Law and also public opinion among the Hebrews secured to women the enjoyment of many rights; see CONCUBINE, DIVORCE, MARRIAGE. Marriage was regarded by the Hebrews as a sacred relation (Mal. 2:14-16). The wife was spoken of with respect, and accorded honor (Prov. 5:18; 18: 22; 31:10-12; Eccl. 9:9). To the mother honor was due, and her law had authority (Ex. 20:12; Prov. 1:8). The capable woman was highly praised (Prov. 31:10-31), and examples of noble womanhood were freely and purposely admitted to the sacred writings. The spirit of the N.T. was equally opposed to woman's degradation. It insisted that man and woman shall occupy their respective spheres as indicated by the Creator in mutual respect and dependence (Mark 10: 6-9; Eph. 5:31; I Tim. 2:12-15). The sanctity and permanence of the marriage relation were taught, and divorce was permitted only for extreme causes (Matt. 19:8, 9; I Cor. 7: 15; Eph. 5:22-33). Woman was made the recipient of the same grace as man, and heir of the same promises (Gal. 3:28); she was accorded honorable position in the Church, and her services in the cause of Christ were fully appreciated and acknowledged (Rom. 16:1-4, 6, 12). The practical precepts in the Epistles were calculated, whether addressed to saints generally or to woman in particular, to refine and ennoble her, and to bring her best qualities into exercise (I Tim. 2:9, 10; 3:11).

Wool. See SHEEP, SPINNING, WEAVING.

World. The world as known in the Mosaic age was small (Gen., ch. 10). On the s. it extended from the mountains e. of the Persian Gulf to the Nile, and on the n. from the Caspian Sea to the Grecian islands; in other words, it measured about 1,500 miles from e. to w., and 900, or including s. Arabia about 1,500, miles from n. to s. The area was about 2,250,000 square miles; but a large part of the surface was occupied by sea, so that, roughly speaking, the land was scarcely  $\frac{2}{3}$  the extent of the United States, excluding Alaska. The history which is recorded in the Bible, and the great events of the world's history, were enacted in the n. portion of this region, in an area about  $\frac{1}{3}$  that of the United States.

During O.T. times these limits remained essentially unchanged, although the geographical horizon widened a little. Media and Persia rose to importance before the close of this period, making themselves known as never before and taking the 1st place among the nations. India became a boundary (Esth. 1:1). The existence of the Sinim was known (Isa. 49:12). In the w., Africa was circumnavigated during the reign of Necho, but the navigators did not realize the meaning of their achievement. They had spent more than 2 years on the voyage, and what appeared most noteworthy to them was that in sailing round Libya (i.e., Africa) they had the sun on their right hand (Herod. iv. 42). In Italy and on the opposite coast of Africa population was increasing and civilization was slowly developing; but these facts seldom reached the ears of men in the e., and then only through the reports of traders. Almost at the close of the O.T. period Greece emerged from obscurity by the vigorous resistance which it offered to the Persians.

Alexander the Great conquered the world. He extended its e. limits, and added immensely to geographical knowledge, by carrying his arms across the Oxus, e. beyond the bounds of modern Afghanistan, and s. into n. India. The Romans followed him. In the time of Christ the world, as currently thought of by men, extended from Spain and Britain to the plateau of Iran and India, and from the desert of Sahara on the s. to the forests of Germany and the steppes of Russia and Siberia on the n. Knowledge of inhabited regions beyond these limits existed; but there was little contact with this outside world, it seldom engaged men's attention, and the ideas of its geography were confused.

"World" is frequently used for the inhabitants of the world (Ps. 9:8; Isa. 13:11; John 3:16; 7:7; Rom. 3:19), and in the N.T. for that which pertains to the earth and this present state of existence merely (I Cor. 7: 31; Gal. 6:14; Eph. 2:2; James 1:27; 4:4; I John 2:15).

Worm. Any small, creeping animal, whose body is boneless and consists of a number of movable joints or rings, and which has no limbs or only very short ones. It was generically called tôl'âh or tôl'a'ath in Heb., skôlēx in Gr.; and it is mentioned as destroying grapes and the gourd vine (Deut. 28:39; Jonah 4:7), being bred over night in manna (Ex. 16:20), consuming the corpse (Isa. 14: 11; cf. ch. 66:24 with Mark 9:48), and causing death to the living (Acts 12:23). Man as feeble and despised is likened to a worm (Job 25:6; Isa. 41:14).

Specific worms referred to are:

1. Maggots, in Heb. a collective term rim-mâh, putridity and the worm bred in it. They feed on corpses (Job 21:26; 24:20; Isa. 14: 11), and might be expected in putrid manna (Ex. 16:24). Man as very small and despicable is likened to the maggot (Job 25:6). In all these passages the E.V. uses the general term worm.

2. The larva of the moth, in Heb. sâs (Isa. 51:8); see MOTH.

Wormwood (Artemisia absinthium)

3. The coccus worm, tōla'ath shānī, which, however, is not a worm, but an insect, according to modern classification; see SCARLET.

Hebrew zāhal, the kal participle of which means creeper, denotes something that crawls on the ground, and is rendered by worm in A.V. (Micah 7:17), in R.V. crawling things (cf. Deut. 32:24).

Worm'wood. A plant ranked with gall, having very bitter juice (Deut. 29:18; Prov. 5:4), unpalatable and, when exclusively drunk, noxious (Rev. 8:11); called in Heb. la'ānāh, in Gr. of N.T. apsinthos. It is used figuratively for injustice (Amos 5:7; 6:12; in latter passage rendered hemlock in A.V.), for sore punishment (Jer. 9:15), for bitter Sam. 24:20), or worship rendered to God (Gen. 24:52, R.V.; Ps. 95:6), the same Heb. word being used in all these passages. The performance of this outward act to idols was strictly forbidden (Ex. 20:5).

For public worship in apostolic times see CHURCH.

Writing. The Hebrews, or rather some of them, were able to write (Ex. 17:14; 24:4; Num. 33:2). The Sumerians invented in the Uruk period pictographic writing, out of which developed the cuneiform; in other words writing was in vogue in Babylonia centuries before Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees, and in Egypt centuries before the Israelites sojourned on the Nile. It was in use suffering (Lam. 3:19) with which one is sated, not intoxicated (v. 15). It seems to be some species of the great composite genus Artemisia. About 180 species are known. Post enumerates 5 species and several varieties as occurring in Palestine or the adjacent regions. The type is the common wormwood (Artemisia absinthium) cultivated in gardens.

Wor'ship. Respect and honor shown to a person (Luke 14:10, in R.V. glory), but this sense of the word has become obsolete. Respect which implies that the object thereof possesses divine attributes (Matt. 14:33; 15:25; Rev. 14:7). Man is forbidden to give this worship to any but God alone (Ex. 34:14; Matt. 4:10; Acts 10:25; Rev. 19:10). The same outward act may be civility shown to man, as when people bowed down to Esau, to Joseph, or to the king (Gen. 33:3; 42:6; II in the towns of Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews. It is recorded that the Hebrews at the time of the Exodus wrote documents (Deut. 31:24), inscribed the Law on the plaster of an altar (Ex. 27:4, 8; Josh. 8:32), and engraved words on gems and metallic plates (Ex. 39:14, 30). In the time of Gideon a young man of Succoth wrote down the princes and elders of Succoth, 77 men (Judg. 8:14, R.V. marg., and A.V. marg.). The ancient cuneiform inscriptions of Babylonia were impressed on soft clay, afterward baked; and were engraven on stone tablets, on the surface of stone statues, on metal, and on the gem of which the seal was made. The letters sent from Canaan to Pharaoh previous to the Exodus were written on clay tablets. The Egyptians, long before the sojourn of the Israelites among them, cut records in stone and wrote on papyrus. See

Year. The year of the Hebrews consisted of 12 months (I Kings 4:7; I Chron. 27:1-15). These appear to have been lunar (see MONTH), and the year would accordingly contain 354 days, 8 hours, 48 minutes, 34 seconds. The annual festivals were inseparably connected with the agricultural seasons. A strictly lunar year would cause these festivals, as fixed by the calendar, constantly to recede from their appropriate season. It was necessary to bring the lunar year into correspondence with the solar year of 365 days. This was accomplished by the intercalation of an additional month (Veadar, q.v.) every leap year, although the custom is not mentioned in the Bible. Nineteen years constitute a lunar cycle, of which the 3d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 14th, 17th, and 19th are leap years. The year began with the month Abib or Nisan (Ex. 12:2; 23:15; Esth. 3:7), with the new moon next before or next after the vernal equinox, when the sun is in Aries (Jos. Antiq. iii. 8, 4; 10, 5); but there was from the earliest times a civil, or rather agricultural, year which began in the autumn (cf. Ex. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 25:4, 9 seq.). It was convenient for a people devoted to horticulture and agriculture to begin the year with the season of plowing and sowing, and to close it with harvest. In practice they frequently preferred to indicate the time of year by the particular harvest or agricultural occupation rather than by the number or name of the month (e.g., Num. 13:20; Ruth 1:22). Sometime after the Exile the day of the new moon of the 7th month came to be kept as new year's day. The custom was probably not started by the events recorded in Ezra 3:6 and Neh. 8:2, although in course of time they may have stimulated such a trend.

Yodh (yôd), A.R.V.; in A.V. Jod. The 10th letter of the Heb. alphabet. Eng. I and its modification J come from the same source, and both are used to represent it in Anglicizing Heb. names, as in Jechoniah. It stands at the head of the 10th section of Psalm 119 in several versions, in which section each verse begins with this letter. It was often confused by copyists and readers with waw, vav, vau (q.v.).

Yoke. A small transverse bar of timber, generally with 2 portions of the lower surface hollowed so as to rest on the necks of 2 oxen, used to draw a cart or a plow (Num. 19:2). Two oxen thus held together were also called a yoke (I Kings 19:19), and so, figuratively, was any burden imposed on one as a token and means of subjection (I Kings 12:4; Matt. 11:30; Acts 15:10).

Za'a-na'im (zâ'a-nâ'im). See ZAAANANNIM.

Za'a-nan (zâ'a-nân). A town (Micah 1:11), perhaps the same as Zenan.

Za'a-nan'nim (zâ'a-nân'im), in A.V. once Za'a-na'im (Judg. 4:11), where A.V. follows the kethib instead of the kere. A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), near Kedesh (Judg. 4:11). It may be identified with Khân et-Tujjâr, about 3 miles n.e. of Mount Tabor. Conder, however, follows the LXX which has Besemîn, having made 1 word of "in Zaanannim" (so Josh. 19:33, R.V. marg.), and he believes it to have been probably near Bessûm, on the tableland w. of the Sea of Galilee, about 3 miles n.e. of Mount Tabor, and about 5 miles w. of the s. end of the Sea of Galilee.

Za'a-van (zâ'a-vân), in A.V. once Za'van [unquiet]. A son of Ezer the Horite (Gen. 36:27; I Chron. 1:42).

Za'bad (zâ'bâd) [S. Arab., he (God) has given, or gift]. 1. A descendant of Ephraim, family of Shuthelah (I Chron. 7:21).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel, descended through She-shan, and a great-grandson of Ahlai (I Chron. 2:31, 34-37). Possibly he was David's mighty man of this name (ch. 11:41).

3. Corrupt form of Jozacar (II Chron. 24:26); see JOZACAR.

4, 5, 6. Three Hebrews, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:27, 33, 43).

Zab'a-de'ans (zâb'a-dê'ânz), in A.V. Zab'a-de'ans (zâb'a-dê'ânz). An Arabian tribe which dwelt between the river Eleutherus, Hamath, and Damascus (I Macc. 12:30-32; cf. v. 25), and hence probably occupied that part of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains where the villages of Zebedani and Zebad are situated, on the route from Ba'al-bek to Damascus.

Zab'ba-i (zâb'â-i) [cf. S. Arab. Zabbay; probably for Zabday, he (God) has given]. A son of Bebal. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28). He was the father of a certain Baruch (Neh. 3:20).

Zab'bud (zâb'ûd) [given (by God); cf. ZABAD, ZABBAI, ZABDI]. Head of a family among the sons of Bigvai, who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:14).

Zab'di (zâb'dî) [he (God) has given; probably of S. Arab. origin]. 1. A man of Judah, family of Zerah, and founder of a house (Josh. 7:1). Called in I Chron. 2:6 Zimri. For the possibility of confusion of beth (b) and mem (m), daleth (d) and resh (r), see table of the alphabet, under ALPHABET.

2. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:19).

3. A Shiphmite, David's officer over the increase of the vineyards for the wine cellars (I Chron. 27:27).

4. A Levite, son of Asaph (Neh. 11:17); see ZICHRİ 5.

Zab'di-el (zâb'dî-êl) [S. Arab., El (God) has given]. 1. Father of Jashobeam (I Chron. 27:2).

2. Son of Haggadolim (Neh. 11:14), or one of the great men (A.V. and marg. of R.V.).

3. An Arabian prince who treacherously decapitated Alexander Balas and sent the head to Ptolemy Philometor (I Macc. 11:17; Jos. Antiq. xiii. 4, 8). He is possibly the person referred to by Diodorus Siculus as Diocles, ruler of Abae, to whose care Alexander committed his infant son. While Alexander was sojourning with Diocles, the former was murdered.

Za'bud (zâ'bûd) [given (by God)]. Son of Nathan and chief minister in Solomon's reign (I Kings 4:5).

Zab'u-lon (zâb'û-lôn). See ZEBULON.

Zac'ca-i (zâk'â-i) [probably contraction for Zechariah]. Founder of a family, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the Captivity (Ezra 2:9; Neh. 7:14).

*In every month the new moon falls on the 1st day of the month.

Zacchae'us (zā-kē'ūs) [Gr. from Heb. Zakkai (Zaccai)]. A wealthy man of Jericho who farmed the revenue for the Roman government. He became a disciple of Christ (Luke 19:1-10).

Zac'eur (zāk'ūr), in A.V. once Zac'chur (zāk'ūr) (I Chron. 4:26) [remembered]. 1. A Reubenite (Num. 13:4).

2. A Simeonite, descended through Mishma (I Chron. 4:26).

3. A Merarite Levite, a son of Jaaziah (I Chron. 24:27).

4. A Gershonite Levite, a son of Asaph, and head of a course of musicians in David's reign (I Chron. 25:2, 10; Neh. 12:35). See ZICHRI 5.

5. A son of Imri, who helped to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2).

6. A Levite, who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:12).

7. Son of Mattaniah and father of Hanan (Neh. 13:13).

Zach'a-ri'as (zāk'ā-rī'ās) twice Zach'a-ri'ah (zāk'ā-rī'ā) (Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51) [Gr. form of Heb. Zekaryāh, Jehovah has remembered]. 1. Father of the captain Joseph (I Macc. 5:18).

2. Father of John the Baptist. He was a priest of the course of Abijah (Luke 1:5); see ABIJAH 8. He and his wife were godly people, and she was related to Mary of Nazareth (vs. 6, 36). Their home was in the hill country of Judea (vs. 39, 40). It was customary to allot to the members of the course on duty at the sanctuary the several parts to be performed in the daily ministrations. When Zacharias' course assembled at Jerusalem, the lot fell to him to burn incense; and while he was discharging this service at the hour of prayer, an angel appeared to him and announced that his supplication was heard. His old prayer for a son, although long abandoned as denied by God (v. 18), and the prayer which he continually offered for the Advent of the Messiah (vs. 68-75), were heard; and he was told that his wife should bear a son who should go before the face of the Lord to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him (vs. 13-17). Zacharias questioned the promise on account of the advanced age of himself and his wife, and asked for a sign. The sign was granted in the form of a punishment. Zacharias was smitten with dumbness until the promise was fulfilled (vs. 18-22, 62-64). When the child was born, not only was the tongue of Zacharias released from its speechlessness, but he himself was filled with the Spirit and prophesied in words of thanksgiving and praise (vs. 67-79).

3. A righteous man who was murdered in the court of the Temple, between the sanctuary and the house (Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51); see ZECHARIAH 11.

Za'cher (zā'kēr). See ZECHARIAH 1.

Za'dok (zā'dōk) [just, righteous]. 1. A descendant of Eleazar, the son of Aaron (I Chron. 24:3). He was the son of Ahitub (II Sam. 8:17). He was doubtless the young man, mighty of valor, who went with the chief men of the tribes of Israel to David at Hebron to turn the kingdom of Saul to David (I Chron. 12:27, 28). Early in David's reign he was joint high priest with Abiathar (II Sam. 8:17). During the rebellion of Absalom the 2 colleagues joined in David's flight from Jerusalem, carrying with them the Ark, but the king desired them to return to the capital and there await the issue of the contest (II Sam. 15:24-29). After the death of Absalom a message, on which they acted, was sent by David to Zadok and Abiathar, requesting them to suggest to the people that the king should be called back (II Sam. 19:11). When, in David's old age, Adonijah plotted to usurp the throne, Zadok remained faithful, while his colleague Abiathar went with the usurper (I Kings 1:7, 8). When the plot was made known to David, Zadok, with Nathan the prophet, received instructions immediately to anoint Solomon king (vs. 32-45). Abiathar was deposed from the priesthood, and Zadok was the sole occupant of the high office till his death, during the reign of the new monarch (ch. 2:26, 27; cf. ch. 4:4). The office of the high priest was thus restored to the line of Eleazar; see HIGH PRIEST.

2. A priest in the line of high priests, father of Shallum (I Chron. 6:12). He was descended from the 2d Ahitub (ibid.; Ezra 7:2) through the 2d Meraioth (I Chron. 9:11; Neh. 11:11).

3. Father of Jerusha, King Uzziah's mother (II Kings 15:33).

4. A son of Baaha. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4), and was perhaps the person of the name who sealed the covenant (ch. 10:21).

5. A priest, son of Immer. He repaired the city wall opposite to his house (Neh. 3:29), and was perhaps the scribe who was made a treasurer (ch. 13:13).

Za'ham (zā'hām) [foul, loathsome]. A son of Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:19).

Za'in (zā'in). See ZAYIN.

Za'ir (zā'ir) [little]. A place in or near Edom, where King Joram, of Judah, encamped before making a night attack on the Edomites (II Kings 8:21; cf. the different text in II Chron. 21:9). It is probably to be identified with Ša'ir or Ši'ir, a village about 5 miles n.e. of Hebron, where is venerated the tomb of Esau. See ZIOR.

Za'laph (zā'lāf) [cf. neo-Heb., šālāph, caper-plant]. Father of a certain Hanun (Neh. 3:30).

Zal'mon (zāl'mōn), in A.V. once Sal'mon (Ps. 68:14) [dark; cf. Arab. ṣalima and Ethiopic šalma, to be dark]. 1. An Ahoite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:28). Also called Ilai (I Chron. 11:29).

2. A wooded mountain near Shechem probably a branch of Gerizim (Judg. 9:48; cf. Ps. 68:14).

Zal'mo'nah (zāl-mō'nā) [dark, shady; cf. ZALMON]. An encampment of the Israelites (Num. 33:41, 42), probably e. of Jebel Hārūn, at Bir Madhkūr.

Zal'mun'na (zāl-mūn'ā) [popular ety., shadow (protection) is withheld; but it may mean (the god) Šalm, i.e., the dark one, or Saturn, rules]. One of the 2 kings of Midian slain by Gideon (Judg. 8:4-28; Ps. 83:11).

Zam'bri (zām'bri). See ZIMRI 2.

Zam-zum'mim (zām-zūm'im), in A.V. Zam-zum'nims (zām-zūm'imz) [murmurers, makers of noise; cf. Arab. zamzama, to hum, mumble]. A tribe of Rephaim, who in ancient times inhabited the region e. of the Jordan, afterward occupied by the Ammonites (Deut. 2:20); probably the same as the Zuzim.

Za-no'ah (zā-nō'ā) [perhaps, stretch]. 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:34). It was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:30), and seems to have been the Zanoah whose inhabitants restored the valley gate of Jerusalem (ch. 3:13). It is Khirbet Zanū' or Zanuh, nearly 3 miles s.e. by s. of Beth-shemesh.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:56; and probably I Chron. 4:18). It is probably to be located about 1¼ miles n.w. of Yaṭṭā at a place called Khirbet Beit

'Amra on Wadi Abu Zenah, a section of the long Wadi el-Khallil.

Zaph'enath-pa-ne'ah (zāf'è-nāth-pā-nē'ā), in A.V. Zaph'nath-pa'a-ne'ah (zāf'nāth-pā'a-nē'ā) [Egypt., food, sustenance of the land is the living one, or is this living one]. Joseph's name, given him by Pharaoh (Gen. 41:45). From the sound of the name the Jews guessed that it meant revealer of secrets (Targum Onkelos; Jos. Antiq. ii. 6, 1).

Zaphon (zāf'ōn) [north]. A town of the Gadites in the Jordan Valley (Josh. 13:27; cf. Judg. 12:1, R.V. marg.). The Talmud identifies it with 'Amatho, i.e., Amathus (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 13, 5; xiv. 5, 4), and its site would be Tell 'Ammatah, in the Jordan Valley, e. of the river and 8 miles n. by e. of the mouth of the Jabbok. It has been proposed to identify it with Tell es-Sa'idiyeh, which is situated near the confluence of Wadi Kafirinji with the Jordan, but Glueck (1943) locates it at Tell el-Kos.

Za'ra (zā'rā) and Za'rah (zā'rā). See ZERAH.

Za're-ah (zā'rē-ā). See ZORAH.

Za'reath-ite (zā'rē-āth-it). See ZORATHITE.

Za'red (zā'rēd). See ZERED.

Zarephath (zār'è-fāth), in A.V. of N.T. Sarepta (Luke 4:26). A town belonging to Sidon (I Kings 17:9; Luke 4:26; Jos. Antiq. viii. 13, 2). Thither Elijah repaired when the brook Cherith dried up. Trusting his word, spoken in the name of Jehovah, a widow of Zarephath gave him a home while the famine lasted. As a reward of her faith her oil and meal failed not, and her boy was brought back to life (I Kings 17:8-24). The town yielded to Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Its future possession by Israel is announced (Obad. 20). The name still lingers in the form of Šara-fend, a village on a hill near the sea, 14 miles n. of Tyre, and 8 s. of Sidon. The ancient city was, however, on the shore, along which the ruins extend for a mile or more.

Zar'e-athan (zār'è-thān), in A.V. Zar'e-tan (zār'è-tān) (Josh. 3:16), and Zar'ta'nah (I Kings 4:12), and Zar'than (I Kings 7:46). A village beneath Jezreel near the towns of Beth-shean and Adam (Josh. 3:16; I Kings 4:12); evidently in the territory of Manasseh. In clayey ground between Succoth, e. of the Jordan, and Zarethan, w. of the river, bronze work for the Temple was cast (I Kings 7:46). In II Chron. 4:17 the name is given as Zeredah. It is difficult to determine the exact site; many place it at Kārn Šar'tabah, which projects from the mountains of Ephraim into the valley of the Jordan opposite the mouth of the Jabbok. But it may be beyond the Jordan, n. of Rās Abū Tābāt, and Tell Sleihāt has been suggested. Glueck (1943) identifies it with Tell es-Sa'idiyeh.

Zar'hite (zār'hīt). See ZERAHITE.

Zar'ta'nah (zār-tā'nā). See ZARETHAN.

Zar'than (zār'thān). See ZARETHAN.

Za'tu (zā'tū), in A.V. once Za'thu (zā't-thū) (Neh. 10:14). Founder of a family, members of which returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:8; Neh. 7:13). Some of them married foreign wives, but were induced to put them away (Ezra 10:27). The representative of the family sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:14).

Za'van (zā'vān). See ZAAVAN.

Za'yin (zā'yīn) in A.V. Za'in. The 7th letter of the Heb. alphabet. English Z, which ultimately goes back to this letter, represents it in Hebrew names in the English version. It heads the 7th section of Psalm 119 in several versions, because each verse of the section begins with this letter.

Za'za (zā'zā) [cf. Arab. za'za'a, to move, frighten]. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jeremiah (I Chron. 2:33).

Zeal'ot, in A.V. Ze-lo'tes [Gr., zealous one]; Gr. for Aram. Cananaean (q.v.). A member of a Jewish patriotic party (Jos. War iv. 3, 9; vii. 8, 1). Simon the apostle was distinguished from Simon Peter and others by this epithet (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13). The party was a movement started by Judas the Galilean in the time of Cyrenius to resist Roman aggression. Its increasing fanaticism contributed to provoke the Roman war. Ultimately it degenerated into a body of mere assassins, called Sicarii (Jos. Antiq. xviii. 1, 1 and 6; War ii. 8, 1; 17, 8; iv. 3, 9 seq.).

Zeb'a-dī'ah (zēb'ā-dī'ā) [Jehovah has given; cf. ZABAD, ZABBUD, ZABDI, ZABDIEL]. 1. A Benjamite, of the house of Beriah (I Chron. 8:15, 16).

2. A Benjamite, descended from Elpaal (I Chron. 8:17, 18).

3. A son of Jeroham of Gedor. He joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:7).

4. Son of Asahel, who was Joab's brother (I Chron. 27:7).

5. A Korahite Levite, a son of Meshelemiah, in David's reign (I Chron. 26:1, 2).

6. One of the Levites sent forth by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law (II Chron. 17:8).

7. A prince of Judah, who was the chief judicial functionary for civil cases in the court which Jehoshaphat established at Jerusalem (II Chron. 19:11).

8. A descendant of Shephatiah. He was one of those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:8).

9. A priest of the house of Immer. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:20).

Ze'bah (zē'bā) [slaughter, sacrifice]. One of the 2 kings of Midian pursued and slain by Gideon (Judg. 8:4-28; Ps. 83:11).

Ze-ba'im (zē-bā'im). See POCHERETH-HAZ-ZEBAIM.

Zeb'e-dee (zēb'è-dē) [Gr. form of Heb. Zebadyah, Jehovah has given]. The husband of Salome (q.v.), and father of James and John. Like his sons, he was a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:21, 22), and was a man of some substance, for he had hired servants (Mark 1:19, 20).

Ze-bī'dah (zē-bī'dā), in A.V. Ze-bu'dah, which follows the kere [given, bestowed]. A daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah, and mother of King Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:36).

Ze-bī'na (zē-bī'nā) [Aram., purchased]. A descendant of Nebo. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:43).

Ze-boi'im, I (zē-boi'im) and Ze-bo'im (zē-bō'im) (A.V., Gen. 10:19; Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8) [Heb. šēbōyim, gazelles]. One of the 5 cities of the Plain (Gen. 10:19). Its king was defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2, 8, 10). It was destroyed with the other cities of the Plain by fire from heaven (Gen. 19:17-29; Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8).

Ze-bo'im, II (zē-bō'im) [Heb. šēbō'im, hyenas]. 1. A valley in the territory of Benjamin, between Michmash and the wilderness on the e. (I Sam. 13:16-18). The name is preserved in modern Arab.; Wadi Abu Dībā' (father of hyenas) is a s. tributary of Wadi el-Kelt. North of the latter wadi is a small branch valley called Shakk eq-Dībā' (ravine of the hyenas).

2. A town occupied by Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh. 11:34). It is evidently to be sought in the hills bordering the plain of Sharon, n. of Lydda.

Ze-bu'dah (zē-bū'dā). See ZEBIDAH.

Ze'bul (zē'būl) [habitation]. The governor of the city of Shechem in the time of Abimelech, to whom he showed unswerving fidelity (Judg. 9:28, 36-39).

Zeb'u-lon-ite (zēb'ū-lūn-it). See ZEBULUN-ITE.

Zeb'u-lun (zēb'ū-lūn), in A.V. of N.T. Zab'u-lon [habitation, dwelling]. 1. The 10th son of Jacob, and the 6th by Leah (Gen. 30:19, 20). He went down with his father into Egypt (Ex. 1:3). He had 3 sons: Sered, Elon, and Jahleel (Gen. 46:14). Jacob, in his farewell address, blessing his sons, pictured Zebulun as dwelling at the haven of the sea, being a haven of ships and having his border on Sidon (Gen. 49:13). This picture was realized in its essentials, but not in its details. Zebulun was allotted territory in the vicinity of the sea and enjoyed the markets of the towns on the coast; but it was itself separated from the Sea of Galilee by Naphtali and Issachar, and from the Mediterranean Sea and the city of Sidon by the tribe of Asher.

2. The tribe of which Zebulun was the progenitor. From his 3 sons sprang the great families into which the tribe was divided (Num. 26:26, 27). The prince of the tribe early in the wilderness wanderings was Eliab, son of Helon (chs. 1:9; 10:16), and at a later period Elizaphan, son of Parnach, was a prince (ch. 34:25). The spy from the tribe was Gaddiel, son of Sodi (ch. 13:10). At the 1st census it contained 57,400 fighting men (ch. 1:30, 31); at the 2d, 60,500 (ch. 26:27). It was 1 of the 6 tribes the representatives of which stood on Mount Ebal to pronounce curses on transgressors (Deut. 27:13; cf. Josh. 8:32-35). Moses before his departure, associating the 2 brothers, later sons of Leah, and with the prophecy of Jacob in mind, thus indicated their future history: "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents. They shall call the peoples unto the mountain; There shall they offer sacrifices of righteousness: For they shall suck the abundance of the seas, and the hidden treasures of the sand" (Deut. 33:18, 19). In the mountain of Jehovah's inheritance (Ex. 15:17), where he will establish his chosen people, Zebulun and Issachar will bring rich offerings to their bountiful Benefactor. After the Conquest of Canaan, Zebulun was allotted territory in the n. part of the country. It lay n. of Issachar, e. of Asher, and s. and w. of Naphtali (Josh. 19:27, 34). Its s. boundary ran by Daberath on the w. foot of Mount Tabor, passed Chisloth-tabor, and after skirting the Plain of Esdraelon and then crossing it reached the brook that is before Jokneam (vs. 10-12), probably Wadi el-Milh, a s. tributary of the Kishon. Its e. boundary went to Gath-hepher, which was probably 3 miles n. by e. of Nazareth, and on to Rimmon, 6 miles almost due n. of Nazareth (v. 13, R.V.). At the n.w. corner of the territory was the valley of Iphtah-el (v. 14), probably about 9 miles n. by w. of Nazareth, and leaving the fertile plain of el-Buttauf within the bounds of Zebulun. Since Bethlehem, 7 miles w.n.w. of Nazareth, belonged to Zebulun (v. 15), the w. boundary was doubtless in part Wadi el-Khalladiyeh. The region possessed by Zebulun was fertile. It embraced a part of the mountainous country of lower Galilee and the n.w. corner of the Plain of Esdraelon. The Zebulunites constituted an important part of Barak's force in the fight with Sisera (Judg. 4:6-10; 5:14, 18), and of Gideon's army in the war with Midian (ch. 6:35). According to Deborah, there were in the tribe they that handle the marshal's staff, or the staff of the scribe (Judg. 5:14, R.V. text and marg.); she means the scribes who gathered and mustered the army (II Kings 25:19). The judge Elon was a member of the tribe, exercised his office, died, and was buried at Aijalon, within its territory (Judg. 12:12). Fifty thousand warriors of the tribe, with skillful and faithful commanders, went with the other tribes to Hebron to make David king (I Chron. 12:33, 40). Ishmaiah was the ruler of the Zebulunites in David's reign (ch. 27:19). The tribe with the rest of Galilee suffered severely during the Assyrian wars, but Isaiah prophesied that it would obtain compensatory blessings in Messianic times (Isa. 9:1, 2; Matt. 4:12-16). Some men of the tribe accepted Hezekiah's invitation to come to Jerusalem for his great passover (II Chron. 30:10, 11, 18). The Prophet Ezekiel assigns a gate for the Zebulunites in the Jerusalem which he describes (Ezek. 48:33), and of the tribe there were sealed in the apocalyptic vision the normal number 12,000 (Rev. 7:8).

Zeb'u-lun-ite (zēb'ū-lūn-it), in A.V. in Judges Zeb'u-lon-ite (zēb'ū-lūn-it). One belonging to the tribe of Zebulun, or resident within its territory (Num. 26:27; Judg. 12:11, 12).

Zech'a-ri'ah (zēk'ā-rī'ā), in A.V. 4 times Zach'a-ri'ah (II Kings 14:29; 15:8, 11; 18:2) [Jehovah has remembered]. 1. A Benjamite of the family of Jeiel (A.V., Jehiel) of Gibeon (I Chron. 9:35, 37); called in I Chron. 8:31 Zecher (A.V., Zacher). If the traditional vocalization is correct, Zecher is a synonymous name meaning memory. Probably, however, it was an abbreviation of Zechariah, as Ahaz is of Ahaziah, and was pronounced Zachar, meaning "he has remembered."

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, descended through Ebiasaph. He was the eldest son of Meshelemiah. He was porter of the door of the tent of meeting in David's reign (I Chron. 9:21, 22; 26:2). He was a discreet counselor (ch. 26:14).

3. A Levite of the 2d degree who played a psaltery in the procession that escorted the Ark to Jerusalem, and afterward was permanently employed in the tabernacle which David pitched for the Ark (I Chron. 15:18, 20; 16:5). It is doubtful whether the word doorkeepers (ch. 15:18) is intended to include him.

4. A priest who blew a trumpet when the Ark was brought up from the house of Obededom (I Chron. 15:24).

5. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel. He was a son of Isshiah and lived in the reign of David (I Chron. 24:25).

6. A Levite, family of Merari, and 4th son of Hosah. He was one of the doorkeepers in David's reign (I Chron. 26:10, 11).

7. A Manassite of Gilead and father of Iddo, who lived in David's reign (I Chron. 27:21).

8. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, and hence of the family of Gershon (II Chron. 20:14).

9. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

10. Fourth son of King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 21:2).

11. Son of Jehoiada, the high priest, and a righteous man like his father. He lived in the reign of King Joash of Judah. The Spirit of God came upon him and he remonstrated with the people on their apostasy from Jehovah which ensued on the death of Jehoiada. At the instance of the king he was stoned to death in the court of the Temple (II Chron. 24:20-22). It is commonly believed that he is referred to by our Lord when speaking of the righteous blood shed on earth, "from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zachariah, who perished between the altar and the sanctuary" (Luke 11:51). Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, is the only person mentioned in Scripture as being thus slain; his violent death was memorable and was familiar to succeeding generations; and he is the last of the righteous men wickedly slain, as Abel was the 1st, who are mentioned in the Hebrew Scriptures, Chronicles being the last book in the Hebrew Bible. He is called the son of Barachiah in the parallel passage (Matt. 23:35, in A.V. Barachias), which naturally identifies him with the well-known prophet who lived after the Exile. But this explanatory clause in Matthew is not improbably a gloss which was written on the margin by a reader and afterward crept into the text.

12. A man who had understanding in the vision of God, and gave wise counsel to King Uzziah, which for a time he followed (II Chron. 26:5).

13. A king of Israel and last ruler of the dynasty of Jehu. He came to the throne of Samaria in the 38th year of Azariah, king of Judah, and reigned 6 months. See CHRONOLOGY, IV. He was the son of Jeroboam II, and was murdered at Ibleam by Shallum, who succeeded him as king (II Kings 14:29; 15:10, Greek text of Lucian). By his occupancy of the throne the prediction was fulfilled that the 4th generation of Jehu's sons should sit on the throne (ch. 10:30).

14. A Reubenite chief (I Chron. 5:7).

15. Son of Jeberechiah. He was a witness that Isaiah wrote certain enigmatical words about a year before their meaning was explained by a prophecy (Isa. 8:2).

16. Maternal grandfather of Hezekiah (II Kings 18:1, 2).

17. A Levite descended from Asaph. He took part in the cleansing of the Temple during the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:13).

18. A Kohathite Levite, overseer of the workmen employed to repair the Temple in Josiah's reign (II Chron. 34:12).

19. A ruler of the house of God in Josiah's reign and doubtless a priest (II Chron. 35:8).

20. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (Neh. 11:5).

21. A man of Judah, family of Perez (Neh. 11:4).

22. A priest descended from Pashhur of the house of Malchijah (Neh. 11:12).

23. A descendant of Parosh. He returned from Babylon with a party along with Ezra (Ezra 8:3).

24. A son of Bebai who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:11).

25. One of the chief men whom Ezra sent to secure Levites and Nethinim to accompany the returning exiles (Ezra 8:16).

26. One of the men, probably priests, who stood beside Ezra at the public reading of the Law (Neh. 8:4).

27. A son of Elam, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:26).

28. A Levite, son of Jonathan, and a descendant of Asaph. He led a division of Levitical musicians at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:35, 36).

29. A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41).

30. A priest, head of the father's house of Iddo in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:16). See the following.

31. A prophet, son of Berechiah, and grandson of Iddo (Zech. 1:1). His first recorded prophecy was delivered in the 2d year of Darius Hystaspis, 520 B.C. (ibid.; Ezra 4:24; 5:1). He was a contemporary of Zerubbabel the governor, Jeshua (Joshua) the high priest, and Haggai the prophet (Zech. 3:1; 4:6; 6:11; Ezra 5:1, 2), and united with Haggai in exhorting the leaders of the Jewish colony to resume work on the house of God. It scarcely admits of question that he was born in Babylonia, for the exiles had been back in Palestine 18 years only and Zechariah hardly began to prophesy before he was 18. Not improbably Zechariah belonged to the tribe of Levi and, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, was a priest as well as a prophet; for, according to Nehemiah (Neh. 12:1, 4, 7) Iddo was head of a priestly family and one who returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel; and a descendant of his, Zechariah by name, was head of the priestly house of Iddo during the high priesthood of Joiakim, son of Jeshua (vs. 10, 12, 16). It is true that the lineage which is involved in Nehemiah's statements may be quite distinct from the genealogy of the prophet, although it contains the same names in the same order, but the theory which identifies the 2 has not a little confirmation: (1) Since Iddo had attained to the headship of a priestly family, he is rightly judged to have been an elderly man in the year of the Return, 538 B.C. His descendant, Zechariah, attained to the same position in the next generation, which would naturally involve his being of such an age in 520 B.C. that he could be called a young man. In fact the Prophet Zechariah is referred to by an angel as a young man in the year 520 B.C. (Zech. 2:4).

(2) Assuming that the prophet's father Berechiah was the son of the priest Iddo and died prior to 520, without attaining to the headship of the family, then the Prophet Zechariah was left next in the line of succession, and this would lead Ezra to call him the son of Iddo, naming him both as descendant and successor of Iddo. But even if Berechiah were alive, his name might be omitted; for it was only necessary to name the father's house to which a man belonged in order to locate him among the tribes and families of Israel. The assumption of Berechiah's death would also account for the fact that in the generation after the Return, Zechariah was head of the father's house.

(3) The theory that the Prophet Zechariah was a priest accounts for his familiarity with priestly functions and ideas (chs. 3; 4).

Another view is that favored by Kimchi. According to him, the term prophet in ch. 1:1, 7 refers to Iddo (for position of the title, cf. Ezra 7:5), and the latter is the seer who prophesied in the reign of Rehoboam (II Chron. 12:15; 13:22). The theory is improbable, but it is not to be rejected because 4 centuries intervened between the seer Iddo and the Prophet Zechariah.

The Book of Zechariah is the 11th of the Minor Prophets. It may be divided as follows:

I. Introduction to the book and a series of 8 visions. The introduction (ch. 1:1-6) strikes the keynote, not to these visions only, but to the whole book. Learn the lesson of the past: "Return unto me . . . and I will return unto you." Vision 1: Jehovah's horsemen (vs. 7-17), fleet, tireless messengers. By this picture it is shown that God is watching the events of earth; there is no sign of relief for God's people or of the punishment of their oppressors; the nations are at rest. Yet God is jealous for Zion and sore displeased with its oppressors; therefore, he is returned to Jerusalem with mercies; his house and his city shall be built; the land shall greatly prosper. The first vision is introductory to the 7 that follow. Vision 2: the 4 horns and the 4 smiths (vs. 18-21). The vision means that for each of the horns, i.e., nations that scattered Judah, destruction is appointed. Vision 3: the man with a measuring line (ch. 2). The comfortable message of the 1st vision is unfolded, namely, the rebuilding of the city. The idea is expanded, however. Jerusalem shall not be measured, as cities usually are, by the extent of its walls; for, enjoying unbounded prosperity, it shall spread abroad without walls. It will not be insecure, however; Jehovah will be a wall of fire about it. Vision 4: Joshua, the high priest, and Satan (ch. 3). The priesthood, although human and defiled, a brand being consumed in the fire of God's wrath, is by grace plucked forth, cleansed, and, on condition of obedience, promised continuance. The restored priesthood is a pledge of the approach of the Messianic Kingdom; the Messiah is called "my servant the Branch." Vision 5: the golden candlestick and the 2 olive trees (ch. 4). It seems as if the light of the Church, burning feebly after the Exile, must needs go out; but it is not so, for God has provided an abundant, unailing, self-furnishing supply of oil. Vision 6: the flying roll (ch. 5:1-4). God has pronounced a curse for the destruction of wickedness. Vision 7: the departing ephah (vs. 5-11). This is the sequel of the 6th vision. Wickedness, personified as a woman in an ephah, is removed from the land. Vision 8: the 4 chariots issuing from the presence of the Lord of all the earth (ch. 6:1-8). The 4 chariots are declared to represent the 4 winds, which commonly denote the unseen power of God; and the vision is a promise that the entire plan outlined in the preceding series will be executed by the Lord of all the earth.

II. Symbolic action: crowning of the high priest (ch. 6:9-15). This procedure is expressly declared to belong to the future and to relate to the well-known branch who was the expected king of David's line.

III. Deputation from Beth-el to inquire whether the fasts shall still be kept, now that the disasters which they commemorated have been in part retrieved, and the prophet's 4 answers (chs. 7; 8): 1. Fasts terminate on the faster; they do not affect God; obedience is the 1 thing God requires (ch. 7:4-7). 2. Justice and truth are the will of God, which is to be obeyed. The desolation of the land and dispersion of the people were not a calamity to be bewailed; they were a punishment for disobedience and intended to work reform (vs. 8-14). 3. God returns to Zion in jealousy, and will secure truth and holiness (ch. 8:1-17). 4. The fasts will become festivals (vs. 18-23).

IV. Burdens naturally follow the visions which revealed God's purpose to destroy the oppressors of Judah and bring many nations into the Kingdom. Burden 1: Jehovah's overthrow of the enemies of God's Kingdom. Punishments are impending which shall bring the surrounding nations low. A remnant of Philistia, however, shall be incorporated in God's Kingdom; and Jerusalem shall be safe amid the widespread desolation, for God shall encamp about Judah and Judah's king shall come (ch. 9). Episode: exhortation to look to the Lord for promised blessings, and not to idols and soothsayers, who only cause the flock to err (ch. 10:1, 2). Resumption of the prophecy. The Lord, however, as already said, has visited his flock, and because of his wrath will make it as his goodly horse in battle, free Judah from all oppressors, gather both Judah and Ephraim, and make Ephraim joyful in his former habitation (vs. 3-12). These promised blessings, however, will not be enjoyed for some time to come. "Desolation to the land!" is the prophet's cry (ch. 11:1-3). The reason for this desolation is explained by the parable of the rejected shepherd (vs. 4-17): because of the continued rejection of God's righteous government, the covenant with the nations is broken, and Israel is open to desolation; because of the same sin, the unity of Judah and Ephraim remains unaccomplished, and weakness, discord, and desolation result. Burden 2: the conflict and final triumph of the Kingdom of God. The nations of the earth are arrayed against Jerusalem and Judah, which at the time of the writer were coextensive with the visible Church of Jehovah; but Jehovah makes Jerusalem "a cup of reeling" and a burdensome stone to the nations, smiting the enemy with madness, and revealing the fact that the citizens of Zion are strong in the Lord (ch. 12:1-8). The preparation of Jerusalem (chs. 12:9 to 14:5): God will prepare Jerusalem, 1st, by gracious spiritual change wrought by himself (chs. 12:10 to 13:6); 2d, by purifying chastisement (chs. 13:7 to 14:5a). The final triumph (vs. 5b-21). The Lord shall come; it shall be a time of darkness and judgment, both for the Church and the nations; but at a time appointed of God, at eventide there shall be light. The Church shall flourish, and a remnant of the nations shall go up from year to year to worship Jehovah, the king. Then shall the idea of the Kingdom of God be realized, the Church shall be holy.

The first to hint that The Book of Zechariah did not proceed in its entirety from the pen of the prophet whose name it bears was Joseph Mede, of Christ Church College, Cambridge, in 1653. He argued that chs. 9 to 11 were written by Jeremiah, because Matthew in quoting Zech. 11:13 refers it to Jeremiah (Matt. 27:9). This argument no longer has weight with critics. Some would say that the mention of Jeremiah is an error by Matthew, while others believe that it is probably an early corruption of Matthew's text. It has even been suggested that since the Hebrews in their arrangement of the Scriptures at one time began the latter prophets with Jeremiah, observing the sequence Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, instead of the present order, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel (see CANON, ISAAH), this prophetic section was sometimes referred to as Jeremiah, just as Christ apparently refers to the Hagiographa by the name of the 1st book in that collection, The Psalms (Luke 24:44). In somewhat similar fashion we often refer to The Psalms and The Proverbs as the Psalms of David and the Proverbs of Solomon, although David was not the sole author of The Psalms nor Solomon of The Proverbs. Since Mede's day many critics have held that in the present Book of Zechariah there are the writings of 2, 3, or more prophets. The principal views are: 1. Chapters 9 to 11 were written shortly before the fall of Samaria in 722 (721) B.C., and chs. 12 to 14 shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. 2. Chapters 9 to 14 were written in the late Persian period more than a century and a half after the death of Zechariah, or in the Maccabaeae period. 3. Chapters 9 to 14, as well as chs. 1 to 8, proceeded from Zechariah. The debate, it will be seen, does not affect the first 8 chapters, but concerns only chs. 9 to 14. The debated section contains the 2 burdens. What then is the date of these burdens? In regard to the 1st burden, when it was written the house of the Lord was standing (chs. 9:15; 11:13); but from this fact no argument as to the date of the burden can be drawn, for Solomon's Temple was standing down to the Exile, and the new Temple, built after the Return, was in use after the year 515 B.C. The reference in ch. 10:10, 11 has been cited to prove that Egypt and Assyria were great powers at the time that this prophecy was delivered, and it was delivered after Israel had been carried captive (ch. 10:6), hence after the capture of Samaria but before the fall of Nineveh, c. 612 B.C. But a prophet after the Exile, as well as a prophet of an earlier date, could foretell that the Israelites would be restored to the lands from which they had been carried, namely, from Egypt and Assyria; and although Assyria had succumbed to a later world empire, he could still say that the pride of Assyria, the power by which the Israelites were still kept in captivity, should be brought down; or Assyria may be used of a geographical region, including Babylonia, just as the term is employed by Ezra (Ezra 6:22), although the region was then under the government of Persia. Accordingly, the 1st burden may have been delivered either before the fall of Nineveh, while Assyria was still a power, or else after the Exile, when the Assyrian empire had given place to other empires, and, since the Temple is standing, after the 6th year of Darius, king of Persia. Another datum which contributes to the solution of this question is obtained from the statement that God will break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel (Zech. 11:14). The brotherhood existed until the reign of Rehoboam, when it was broken by the refusal of the Northern tribes to render further allegiance to the throne of David. It might also be said to have been broken when Samaria fell, and the Northern tribes were scattered. The brotherhood existed once more after the Babylonian Exile: Now this burden was pronounced after the fall of Samaria and the captivity of Ephraim (ch. 10:6); and therefore it properly dates from the time after the Exile, when the current conception was that Ephraim and Judah were reunited in the brotherhood. In point of fact they were reunited: many members of the 10 tribes had joined themselves to Judah; and the existing nation was universally regarded as the representative of the 12 tribes, and in Ezra's day accordingly 12 goats were offered as a sin offering at the dedication of the Temple, and a 2d sin offering of 12 bullocks was made for all Israel (Ezra 6:17; 8:35; cf. Matt. 19:28; Luke 2:36; Acts 4:36; 26:7; Phil. 3:5). It is true that the prophet frequently uses the old terms Judah and Ephraim, and this fact has been urged to prove that the prophecy was uttered long before the time of Zechariah, but many people living after the Exile used the old terms. Zechariah himself in the first 8 chapters employs them. He addresses the "house of Judah and house of Israel" (Zech. 8:13). It is to this post-exilic period accordingly that the references to the brotherhood of Ephraim and Judah point. There is a further mark. It is declared that God will raise up Judah against the distant sons of Javan, or the Greeks (ch. 9:13). It will be observed that the Greeks are chosen for 2 reasons: 1. Because the prophet describes the conflict of the Church with the most distant nations of the world. Javan and the isles were at this time within the geographical horizon of the Hebrews, and they were used as types of the remotest heathen nations (Gen. 10:4, 5; Isa. 41:5; 59:18; 66:19; Ezek. 27:13). 2. The novel feature here is that Javan looms up as the world power of heathenism. The earliest date when the coming power of Greece became evident to observers in the Persian Empire was during the years from 500 to 479 B.C., and the coming greatness of Greece as the successful antagonist of Persia was clearly evident. Greece had successfully checked the advance of Persian arms, and the Grecian cities of Asia Minor were in open revolt against their Persian lords during the years 500 to 495 B.C.; the Persians were defeated at Marathon in 490 and, after their victory at Thermopylae, were crushingly defeated by the Greeks at Salamis, 480, Plataea and Mycale, 479. Zechariah, there is reason to believe on considerable and varied evidence, was a young man, say 20 or 25, when in 520 B.C. he exhorted Zerubbabel to the work of rebuilding the Temple, and consequently these stirring events which revealed the unsuspected greatness of Greece and opened the prospect that it would successfully intermeddle in Oriental affairs occurred during the years which were Zechariah's prime of life.

The 2d burden, chs. 12 to 14, is also shown by its contents to belong to the postexilic period. The writer refers to the terror of the people when the earthquake in the days of Uzziiah occurred. He refers to it as an event living vividly in the consciousness of the people. It was vivid to them either because of recent occurrence or because it had made a lasting impression on their minds. It certainly had made this lasting impression; it is treated as an epoch by the people of the generation in which it occurred (Amos 1:1), and in the 1st century of the Christian era it was still remembered as a solemn and striking event (Jos. Antiq. ix. 10, 4). There is another historical mark in this 2d burden, the reference to the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon (Zech. 12:11). The only natural reference here is to the killing of Josiah, who opposed Necho at Megiddo, and was mortally wounded there, and soon died; his death was mourned by the singing men and singing women, and a lamentation was composed by the Prophet Jeremiah. Accordingly the 2d burden was delivered not earlier than the eve of the Exile.

Not only do the historical references in the 2 burdens point to late times, but the literary characteristics of these burdens proclaim them to have proceeded from the same source as the first 8 chapters. This is strenuously denied by certain critics. It is urged that a difference of style is discernible between the burdens and the visions. This is true, but the style of an author may differ at various periods of his literary career, especially when he essays different forms of literature. Zechariah's style naturally underwent change during a period of 30 or 40 years and differed when he depicted visions and symbolic actions from the style in which he set forth solemn warnings. Still, in the parable or the symbolic representation of the good shepherd, there are traces of the same literary hand as that which portrayed the visions and the crowning of the high priest. And the more subtle marks of the same hand are seen in the unique usage of certain words and expressions which characterize the first 8 chapters in common with the last 6. These reasons may favor the view that Zechariah was the author of the entire book, and that his mature life was passed between the years 520 and 479 B.C.

On the other hand, the date of the 2d part of The Book of Zechariah (chs. 9 to 14) has caused many problems. Critics generally, however, hold the view that these chapters are not the work of Zechariah, mainly on account of the obscure historical allusions and apocalyptic eschatology of this part of the book which are in sharp contrast with the clear historical background of chs. 1 to 8. The 2d part of the book is divided into 2 sections: chs. 9 to 11, to which should be joined ch. 13:7-9 as a conclusion to ch. 11, and chs. 12 to 14 (minus ch. 13:7-9). It should furthermore be noted that the expression "the burden of the word of Jehovah" stands at the head of ch. 9 and of ch. 12. Accordingly some critics speak of the Deutero-Zechariah and the Trito-Zechariah, to whom these sections are respectively assigned. The same words are found in the heading of The Book of Malachi. Some scholars have consequently assumed that the editor of the Twelve Minor Prophets appended to the original book of Zechariah 3 anonymous works: Deutero-Zechariah, Trito-Zechariah, and Malachi. This view assumes that the word Malachi is not a proper name, but means simply "my messenger" (Mal. 3:1).

Chapters 9 to 14 of Zechariah are divided into sections. The 1st, chs. 9 to 11 plus ch. 13:7-9, consists of 3 prophetic poems (chs. 9:1-10; 9:11 to 10:2; 10:3 to 11:3) and a description of a symbolic action containing some poetic oracles (chs. 11:4-17; 13:7-9). The 2d section (chs. 12:1 to 13:6; 14) consists of 2 eschatological oracles dealing with the onslaught of the heathen on Jerusalem and the Messianic Age inaugurated after their destruction.

The date of chs. 9 to 14 is not easily settled. In chs. 1 to 8 the lifetime of Zechariah and the objects of his interest (the Temple and the affairs of the restored community) are very manifest, but the circumstances and interests of chs. 9 to 14 are very different. It is difficult to determine the date of these latter chapters, since the evidence points in several directions. In favor of a pre-exilic date have been cited references to the nations mentioned in ch. 9:1-7, to the Northern Kingdom (chs. 9:10; 11:14), and to Assyria and Egypt (ch. 10:10, 11). Accordingly a date toward the end of the reign of Jeroboam II has been favored. Chapter 10 has been placed somewhat later, since reference to the deportation of some of the N. tribes in 734 B.C. may be detected, while ch. 11:1-3 has been dated earlier as predicting the invasion of Tiglath-pileser III. It has accordingly been supposed that the author was a contemporary of Isaiah. On the other hand, certain passages have been interpreted as implying a postexilic date (chs. 9:11, 12; 10:6-9). In ch. 9:13 the Greeks (Javan) are mentioned not as an unimportant people as they would be in the 8th century or c. 520 B.C., but as a world power. Such a position was attained only after Alexander's victory at Issus (333 B.C.). Accordingly some critics date chs. 9 to 11 not earlier than 333 B.C. Stade prefers c. 280 B.C. As regards chs. 12 to 14, critics observe that they were written after the fall of the Northern Kingdom in 722 (721) B.C. or after the death of Josiah, but some think that they were written before the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. However, for these chapters also most critics favor a postexilic date.

The historical events behind the allegory of the shepherds (chs. 11:4-17; 13:7-9) are not clear to the critics; attempts to fix them either in the decline and fall of the Northern Kingdom or at the beginning of the Maccabean revolt are not convincing. Pfeiffer writes (1941): "In view of the fact that no part of the book seems to be earlier than the time of Alexander the Great, it seems likely that the political disturbances, darkly alluded to in this allegory and in ch. 12:10, belong to the third century, during which the history of the Jews is for us a total blank; 11:4-17 is unquestionably influenced by Ezek. 34; 37:16-28." He concludes that in dating Zech., chs. 9 to 14, in the 3d century justice is done to the general apocalyptic character of these oracles and to numerous clues of postexilic origin. In this connection there may be noted the reference to ritual observances (chs. 9:11; 14:16-21), allusions to the Jews scattered among the nations (chs. 9:11, 12; 10:8-11), the decay of the prophetic movement (ch. 13:2-6), and the obvious imitation of parts of Ezekiel, Joel, and Deutero-Isaiah (cf. Zech. 12:1 with Isa. 42:5; 44:24). Jesus, the son of Sirach, knew the book of the Twelve Prophets (Ecclus. 49:10). If the "Twelve" were complete in his day, it is improbable that additions were made to a canonical book after 200 B.C.

Ze'cher (zē'kēr). See ZECHARIAH 1.

Ze'dad (zē'dād). A place, probably a tower, on the n. boundary line of Palestine (Num. 34:8; Ezek. 47:15); identified with Šadad, s.e. of Homs on the way from Riblah to Palmyra.

Ze'de-ki'ah (zē'dē-ki'ā), in A.V. once Zid-ki'jah (Neh. 10:1) [Jehovah is righteousness, or righteousness of Jehovah]. 1. A son of Chenaanah. Having joined with other false prophets in encouraging Ahab to attempt the capture of Ramoth-gilead, and having predicted that Ahab would defeat the Syrians, he was so excited when Micaiah, a prophet of Jehovah, made a contrary prediction, that he struck the man of God upon the cheek, accompanying the blow with words of insult. Micaiah told him that he would have cause to acknowledge his error (I Kings 22:11-25).

2. A lying and immoral prophet, the son of Maaseiah. Jeremiah predicted that Nebuchadnezzar would roast him in the fire (Jer. 29:21-23).

3. A son of Hananiah. He was a prince of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:12).

4. The name given by Nebuchadnezzar to Mattaniah, one of Josiah's sons, on appointing him vassal-king of Judah in place of his nephew, Jehoiachin (II Kings 24:17; I Chron. 3:15). In II Chron. 36:9, 10 he is called Jehoiachin's brother, i.e., kinsman of the same ancestry; see BROTHER. He was the younger of Josiah's 2 sons by Hamutal (cf. II Kings 23:31 with ch. 24:18). He was 21 years old when he ascended the throne, and reigned 11 years, from c. 597 to 586 B.C. Neither he nor his people gave heed to the word of the Lord which was spoken by Jeremiah (II Chron. 36:12; Jer. 37:1, 2). The Temple was polluted with idolatry (II Chron. 36:14), and justice was not executed (Jer. 21:11, 12). A strong party in the state, assisted by false prophets, urged the king to throw off the foreign yoke (ch. 27:12-22). At the beginning of Zedekiah's reign (v. 1, R.V. marg.) messengers from Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon came to him in Jerusalem to plan a united revolt from the king of Babylon; but Jeremiah was divinely instructed to condemn the purpose (vs. 2-11). Zedekiah sent an embassy to Nebuchadnezzar, probably to assure the great king of his fidelity (ch. 29:3), and in his 4th year he himself visited Babylon (ch. 51:59). Ultimately he was rash enough to rebel. On the 10th day of the 10th month, in the 9th year of Zedekiah's reign, the Babylonian monarch took post against Jerusalem, and began to erect forts around the city. It was too strong to be taken by assault; and the Babylonians held it in siege. The advance of the Egyptians compelled the Babylonians to withdraw for a time (Jer. 37:5), but they soon returned. By the 9th day of the 4th month, in the 11th year of Zedekiah's reign, the food in the beleaguered capital was exhausted. That night Zedekiah, with all the men of war, secretly quitted the stronghold and, passing as noiselessly as possible between the Babylonian forts, fled in an e. direction toward the Jordan. On learning that the king was gone, the Babylonian army pursued and overtook him in the plain of Jericho. He was brought a prisoner to Nebuchadnezzar, who had retired to Riblah, a little n. of Palestine. There, after he had been tried and condemned, his sons were put to death in his presence, and his own eyes put out; after which he was bound in fetters, carried to Babylon (II Kings 24:17-20; 25:1-7; II Chron. 36:11-21; Jer. 39:1-14), and put in prison till the day of his death (Jer. 52:11). Jeremiah prophesied during the whole of Zedekiah's reign.

5. A son of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:16); but some expositors assume that "son" is used here in the sense of successor.

6. A high official who set his seal to the covenant immediately after Nehemiah the governor (Neh. 10:1).

Ze'eb (zē'ēb) [wolf]. A Midianite prince captured and put to death by Gideon. He was slain at a wine press, which was afterward called that of Zeeb (Judg. 7:25). See OREB.

Ze'la (zē'lā), in A.V. Ze'lah (zē'lā), and so once in R.V. erroneously (Josh. 18:28) [rib, side]. A town allotted to Benjamin (Josh. 18:28). It contained the sepulcher of Kish; and thither the bones of Saul and Jonathan were carried from Jabesh in Gilead and buried (II Sam. 21:14). Khirbet Salah, n.w. of Jerusalem, has been suggested as a reasonable identification.

Ze'lek (zē'lēk) [a cleft]. An Ammonite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:37; I Chron. 11:39).

Ze'lo'phe'had (zē-lō'fê-hād) [shadow of the fear, i.e., protection against fear]. A Manassite, family of Machir, subfamily of Gilead, house of Hephher. He had no sons, but 5 daughters (Num. 26:33). This condition of affairs gave occasion for enacting the law that if a man die and have no son the inheritance should pass to his daughter (ch. 27:1-8). The law was soon afterward developed by the addition of the provision that the daughter must marry within her father's tribe in order that no part of the tribal possession be transferred to another tribe (ch. 36:1-12). The inheritance of the family was e. of the Jordan (Josh. 17:1-6).

Ze'lo'tes (zē-lō'tēz). See ZEALOT.

Ze'l'zah (zē'l'zá). A frontier town of Benjamin, near Rachel's sepulcher (I Sam. 10:2).

Zem'a'ra'im (zēm'ā-rā'im). 1. A town of Benjamin (Josh. 18:22), often identified with Khirbet es-Samrah about 3 miles w. of the river Jordan, and 4 n. of Jericho. A more likely conjecture places it at Rās ez-Zeimara in the mountain between eṭ-Ṭaiyibeh and Rammūn.

2. A mountain in the hill country of Ephraim, on which Abijah, king of Judah, stood to address the 10 tribes before encountering them in battle (II Chron. 13:4). Perhaps it was s. of Beth-el (v. 19). Probably it lay not far from the city of Zemaraim, from which its name apparently was derived.

Zem'a'rite (zēm'ā-rit). A Canaanite tribe (Gen. 10:18; I Chron. 1:16). It is enumerated between the Arvadite and Hamathite, and inhabited Sumur, Šimarra (Gr. Smyra), modern Sumra, on the coast between Arvad and Tripolis.

Ze-mi'rah (zē-mi'rā), in A.V. Ze-mi'ra (zē-mi'rā) [cf. S. Arab. Zamr; Arab. zamūr, handsome and beardless young man, and zamūr, small in stature]. A Benjamite, family of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

Ze'nan (zē'nān) [point or, perhaps, a place of flocks]. A town in or w. of the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:37). Probably the same as Zaanan (Micah 1:11), and to be identified with 'Arāk el-Kharba.

Ze'nas (zē'nās) [Gr., contraction of Zēno-doros, gift of Zeus]. A lawyer, journeying in Crete with Apollos, whom Titus was enjoined by Paul to set forward on their journey (Titus 3:13).

Zeph'a-ni'ah (zēf'ā-ni'ā) [Jehovah has hidden, treasured]. 1. A Levite of the family of Kohath and house of Izhar (I Chron. 6:36-38).

2. A priest, the son of Maaseiah. He was one of those who carried messages between Zedekiah and Jeremiah (Jer. 21:1; 37:3). A certain false prophet who dwelt in Babylon, Shemaiah by name, having sent him letters directing him to punish Jeremiah for his discouraging predictions, he showed the missive to the prophet (ch. 29:24-32). He had the oversight of the Temple, and was 2d priest under the chief priest Seraiah. After the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, Zephaniah was put to death at Riblah (II Kings 25:18-21; Jer. 52:24-27).

3. A man whose son Josiah lived in the days of Zerubbabel and the Prophet Zechariah (Zech. 6:10, 14).

4. A prophet, whose descent is traced through 4 degrees to Hezekiah (Zeph. 1:1; A.V. Hizkiah). This ancestor is probably the king, from the fact that so remote a descent is traced and because the time suits. The prophet himself lived and labored in the reign of Josiah (ibid.).

The Book of Zephaniah is the 9th among the Minor Prophets. The date given in its title (ch. 1:1) is confirmed by the omission of Gath in the enumeration of Philistine cities (ch. 2:4), by Nineveh's being still in existence (v. 13), and by the absence of allusion to the Chaldeans. The basis of the prophecy is the great doctrine of God's universal judgment. (1) A universal judgment, like the Deluge in destructiveness (ch. 1:2, 3). Idolatry will be overthrown in Jerusalem (vs. 4-6), and the sinners of Judah visited with judgment, as if Jehovah conducted a great sacrifice (vs. 7-13); and it will be a day of wrath upon men because of their wickedness (vs. 14-18). At the approach of the Scythian hordes the prophet proclaims the imminent coming of the Day of the Lord (cf. Lat. hymn Dies irae, dies illa). (2) A call to repentance as the only possible means of escape (ch. 2:1, 2), especially a summons to the humble and God-fearing to seek Jehovah and perhaps obtain deliverance (v. 3); enforced by the certainty that God will punish other nations for their wickedness (vs. 4-15), and Jerusalem shall not escape, for she does not repent and the Lord in the midst of her is righteous (ch. 3:1-8). (3) The blessed result of the judgment. The nations shall turn to the Lord (vs. 9, 10), the remnant of Israel shall trust in the Lord and be holy (vs. 11-13), and the Lord shall reign gloriously and beneficently as king in the midst of his people (vs. 14-18), who shall be gathered from captivity and be "a praise" in the earth (vs. 19, 20).

It seems that the prophecy was delivered before the religious reformation inaugurated by Josiah in 621 B.C. (II Kings 22:3; II Chron. 34:8 to 35:19). Zephaniah was a contemporary of Habakkuk and prophesied a few years before him; his prophecies may be dated in the time of the Scythian invasion along the Mediterranean coast (between 630 and 624 B.C.).

Ze'phath (zē'fāth) [watchtower]. A Canaanite town in the s. country toward the border of Edom, assigned to the tribe of Simeon. The Simeonites, assisted by their brethren of Judah, captured the place and changed its name to Hormah (Judg. 1:17); see HORMAH.

Zeph'a-thah (zēf'ā-thā) [watchtower]. A valley near Mareshah, in the tribe of Judah (II Chron. 14:10). Conder proposes Wadi Safiyeh, which, commencing about a mile n.e. of Mareshah, near Beit Jibrin, runs for a short distance in that direction.

Ze'phi (zē'fī) and Ze'pho (zē'fō) [watch]. A son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. He founded a tribe (Gen. 36:11, 15; I Chron. 1:36). The difference in spelling can be explained as a confusion of waw (w) and yodh (y).

Zē'phon (zē'fōn) [watching, expectation]. A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:15). Called in Gen. 46:16 Ziphion.

Zer (zūr). A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35).

Zē'rah (zē'rā), in A.V. twice Za'rah (Gen. 38:30; 46:12); once Za'ra (Matt. 1:3) [dawning, shining]. 1. A duke of Edom descended from Esau and also from Ishmael (Gen. 36:3, 4, 13, 17; I Chron. 1:37, and perhaps 44).

2. One of twins borne to Judah by Tamar, and the founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:20; Josh. 7:1, 17).

3. A son of Simeon, and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:13). He is called in Gen. 46:10; Ex. 6:15 Zohar.

4. A Levite, of the family of Gershon (I Chron. 6:21, 41).

5. An Ethiopian who led a vast army to attack King Asa, but was defeated with great slaughter in a battle at Mareshah (II Chron. 14:8-15). See PHARAOH 2.

Zer'a-hi'ah (zēr'ā-hi'ā) [the Lord is risen (cf. Isa. 60:1, 2)]. 1. A priest, son of Uzzi, and a descendant of Phinehas (I Chron. 6:6, 51; Ezra 7:4).

2. One of the children of Pahath-moab (Ezra 8:4).

Zē'ra-hite (zēr'ā-hīt), in A.V. Zar'hite. A person belonging to the family of Zerah. There was a family of this name in the tribe of Simeon and another in Judah (Num. 26:13, 20; Josh. 7:17; cf. Josh. 7:1; I Chron. 27:11, 13).

Zē're'd (zēr'ēd), in A.V. once Za're'd (Num. 21:12). A brook and valley, which the Israelites crossed 38 years after being turned back into the wilderness at Kadesh-barnea, and which constituted the farthest limit of the wanderings in the wilderness (Num. 21:12; Deut. 2:13, 14). It was s. of the Arnon and is probably to be identified with Wadi el-Hesā (about 14 miles s. of Wadi el-Kerak), an affluent of the Dead Sea. By some it has been identified with Wadi es-Sultān, a s.e. affluent of a tributary of the Arnon.

Zer'e'dah (zēr'ē-dā), in A.V. Zer'e'dā (zēr'ē-dā), Zer'e'dā'ṭhah (zēr'ē-dā'ṭhā) [cf. Arab. ṣard, cold]. A village whence came Nebat, an Ephraimite, the father of Jeroboam, and apparently also Jeroboam himself (I Kings 11:26); but the village itself may have been elsewhere than in the territory of Ephraim (cf. Josh. 16:9; 17:9). The exact equivalent of the name is found in 'Ain Šeredah, the fountain of Khirbet Balāṭah, in Mount Ephraim, 15 miles s.w. of Shechem, at a bend of Wadi Deir Ballūt (Albright). The LXX and Lucian, however, invariably call the city and home of Jeroboam Saireia, i.e., Zererah (I Kings, ch. 11, v. 26 LXX, v. 24 Luc.), and locate it in Mount Ephraim (ch. 11, v. 43 LXX, v. 42 Luc.; ch. 12, v. 24b LXX, vs. 28, 29 Luc.; v. 24f LXX, v. 39 Luc.); perhaps confusing it with Tirzah in ch. 14, v. 17 (Heb. and LXX, and vs. 7, 10, 13 Luc.).

Zer'er-rah (zēr'ē-rā), in A.V. Zer'erath (zēr'ē-rāth). A town in the Jordan Valley (Judg. 7:22, in the form Šerērāthāh), apparently the same as Zarethan (I Kings 4:12), and, if so, indicative that 2 r's are blended in Zarethan (q.v.).

Zē'resh (zēr'ēsh) [from the Avestan root zarsh may be derived these senses: the ruffled one, the one with dishevelled hair, the joyful or elated one]. The wife of Haman (Esth. 5:10; 6:13).

Ze'reth (zēr'ēth) [perhaps, splendor]. A son of Ashhur, of the tribe of Judah, by his wife Helah (I Chron. 4:5-7).

Ze'reth-sha'har (zēr'ēth-shā'hār), in A.V. Za'reth-sha'har (zā'rēth-shā'hār) [brightness of the dawn]. A town of Reuben, on a mountain which overlooks a valley, doubtless that of the Dead Sea (Josh. 13:19). There has been found no satisfactory identification. In the neighborhood of Machaora are hot springs known as Hammāt eš-Šara, which may have an echo of this name.

Ze'ri (zēr'i). A son of Jeduthun (I Chron. 25:3). In v. 11 he is called Izri; the initial yodh (y) may have been lost in course of transcription.

Ze'ror (zēr'rōr) [bundle or, perhaps, pebble]. A Benjamite, an ancestor of King Saul (I Sam. 9:11).

Zē-ru'ah (zē-rō'ā) [smitten, leprous]. The widowed mother of Jeroboam I (I Kings 11:26).

Zē-rub'ba-bel (zē-rūb'ā-bēl), in A.V. of N.T. Zo-ro'b'a-bel [Heb. from Akkad. zēru Bābil, seed of Babylon]. A son of Pedaiah, and heir to the throne of Judah (I Chron. 3:17-19). But he is constantly called the son of Shealtiel, who was the brother of Pedaiah, quite improbably his son (Ezra 3:2, 8; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 23; Matt. 1:12, 13; Luke 3:27). Shealtiel doubtless died childless; and either his nephew was his legal heir, and hence called his son (Ex. 2:10), or else Pedaiah married his widow, in which case the 1st child would be considered that of the deceased brother (Deut. 25:5-10; etc.). When Cyrus, after the conquest of Babylon, adopted the wise political policy of allowing the Jews to return to their own land, he appointed the prince of Judah, whose name Sheshbazzar was perhaps the name given to Zerubbabel by the Babylonians and used when he was acting as representative of Cyrus, to be governor of the colony (Ezra 1:8, 11; 5:14). The returning exiles were led by Zerubbabel and the high priest Jeshua (Joshua), with other princes (Ezra 2:1-64; Neh. 7:5-7; 12:1-9), and reached Jerusalem in 538 B.C. Arrived at the ruined city, Jeshua as head of the priesthood and Zerubbabel as head of the civil administration, acting together, reared an altar and restored the worship (Ezra 3:1-9). The foundations of the Temple were next laid by Sheshbazzar as Persian governor, acting in his official name (chs. 1:2; 5:16; 3:6, 10-13). But adversaries, failing to make Zerubbabel stop proceedings, appealed to successive Persian kings, so that building operations ceased until 520 B.C., the 2d year of Darius Hystaspis (ch. 4). In this year, urged by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel, now Persian governor under Darius, and Jeshua resumed the work; and under the constant encouragement of the prophets brought the building to completion in the early spring of 515 B.C. (Ezra 6:14, 15; Hag. chs. 1; 2; Zech. ch. 4). From the office Zerubbabel held when the 2d Temple was built, and the personal interest he took in its erection, it is often called Zerubbabel's Temple. His governorship continued at least till 515 B.C. How much longer it lasted is unknown. Zerubbabel was in his day the representative of the Davidic monarchy (Hag. 2:20-23). He was also in the direct line of ancestry of our Lord (Matt. 1:12, 13; Luke 3:27).

Zer'u'ia (zēr'ōō'īā) [probably, one perfumed with storax]. A sister of David (I Chron. 2:16), but probably, like her sister Abigail, not a daughter of Jesse, but a daughter of David's mother by an earlier marriage with Nahash (II Sam. 17:25). She was the mother of Abishai, Joab, and Asahel (II Sam. 2:18; I Chron. 2:16).

Ze'tham (zē'thām) [olive tree; cf. ZETHAN]. A Gershonite Levite, house of Ladan and son of Jehiel (I Chron. 23:8; 26:22).

Ze'than (zē'thān) [olive tree]. A Benjamite, family of Jediel (I Chron. 7:10).

Ze'thar (zē'thār) [Old Pers. yantar; Avestan yantar, smiter, slayer]. A chamberlain at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10).

Zi'a (zī'ā) [perhaps, the trembler]. A Gadite, probably head of a father's house (I Chron. 5:13).

Zi'ba (zī'bā) [cf. Aram., branch, twig]. A servant or slave of King Saul. He had been set free (Jos. Antiq. vii. 5, 5), perhaps at the time of Saul's overthrow by the Philistines, and he was father of a large family and had acquired slaves (II Sam. 9:10). David made him and his sons and slaves servants to Mephibosheth, Saul's grandson, and ordered them to till Mephibosheth's lands (vs. 9-12). When David was compelled to flee from Jerusalem because of Absalom's rebellion, Ziba appeared with a couple of asses laden with provisions for the king and stated that Mephibosheth was expecting that Israel would restore Saul's kingdom to him. Thereupon David transferred Mephibosheth's estates to Ziba (ch. 16:1-4). After the death of Absalom, when the king was returning to Jerusalem, among those who went to the Jordan to welcome him back was Ziba with his sons and slaves (ch. 19:17). Mephibosheth also went to meet the king. He had neglected his person, as a sign of sorrow, during the king's absence, and now he declared that he had ordered his ass to be saddled in order to accompany David on his flight, but that Ziba had disobeyed his orders and had also slandered him to the king, and he asked David to do what seemed right. David replied somewhat crustily and ordered half the estates to be restored to Mephibosheth and the rest left in the possession of Ziba (vs. 24-30).

Zib'e'on (zīb'ē-ūn) [cf. Arab. ḡab', hyena]. A Hivite (Gen. 36:2; if the text should not be amended to Horite), who perhaps migrated with his family to Mount Seir and became a Horite tribe (vs. 20, 24), organized under a chief (v. 29). He was ancestor of a wife of Esau (vs. 2, 25).

Zib'ta (zīb'tā) [gazelle]. A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim and head of a father's house (I Chron. 8:9).

Zib'tah (zīb'tā) [gazelle]. A woman of Beer-sheba, wife of Ahaziah, and mother of Jehoash, king of Judah (II Kings 12:1).

Zich'ri (zīk'ri) [mindful]. 1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (Ex. 6:21). 2. A Benjamite, son of Shimei (I Chron. 8:19).

3. A Benjamite, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:23).

4. A Benjamite, son of Jeroham (I Chron. 8:27).

5. A Levite, son of Asaph (I Chron. 9:15). In all probability he is the person called Zaccur (from the same root), in I Chron. 25:2, 10; Neh. 12:35; and also the person called Zabdi in Neh. 11:17. In the latter instance the letters kaph (k, Anglicized as ch) and resh (r) were misread as beth (b) and daleth (d) respectively.

6. A Levite, descended from Moses' son, Eliezer (I Chron. 26:25).

7. A Reubenite (I Chron. 27:16).

8. A man of Judah, and father of Amasiah, a captain in the army of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:16), and quite possibly of Elishaphat who aided Jehoiah in overthrowing Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

9. A valiant Ephraimite in Pekah's army, who slew Maaseiah, a royal prince, and 2 of Ahaz' chief officers (II Chron. 28:7).

10. A Benjamite (Neh. 11:9).

11. A priest, head of the father's house of Abijah. He lived in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:17).

Zid'dim (zīd'im) [sides]. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35). The Talmud calls the place Kefar Hattya, which has led to locating it at Hattin, about 5½ miles w. by n. of Tiberias, and less than a mile n. of the celebrated Horns of Hattin.

Zid-ki'jah (zīd-kī'jā). See ZEDEKIAH.

Zi'don (zīd'ōn). See SIDON.

Zif (zif). See ZIV.

Zi'ha (zī'hā). Founder or possibly only the head of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from the Captivity (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46). If he was identical with Ziha, an overseer of the Nethinim, who is named in Neh. 11:21, the family was of recent origin among the Nethinim, and small, or else it was an older family named from its present chief.

Zik'lag (zīk'lāg). A city in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:31), assigned to the Simeonites (Josh. 19:5; I Chron. 4:30). In the time of Saul it was in the hands of the Philistines, and at one time David held it as the vassal of their king, Achish (I Sam. 27:6; I Chron. 12:1-22). It was captured, plundered, and burnt by the Amalekites, but David pursued them, recovered the spoil, and sent portions of it to many other towns (I Sam. 30:1-31; II Sam. 1:1; 4:10). The connection of David with Ziklag detached it permanently from the Philistines and placed it under the kings of Judah (I Sam. 27:6). It was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:28). It is probably to be identified with Tell el-Khuweifeh, about 10 miles e. of Tell esh-Sheri'a.

Zil'ah (zīl'ā) [shadow, i.e., protection]. One of Lamech's wives, and the mother of Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:19-23).

Zil'e-thai (zīl'ē-thī), in A.V. Zil'thai [(Jehovah is) a shadow, protection]. 1. A Benjamite, son of Shimei (I Chron. 8:20).

2. A Manassite, captain of 1,000 men, who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

Zil'pah (zīl'pā) [cf. Arab., zulfah, dignity]. A maidservant, given by Laban to Leah on her marriage with Jacob (Gen. 29:24). At Leah's request, she became his secondary wife, and bore to him Gad and Asher (ch. 30:9-13).

Zil'thai (zīl'thī). See ZILLETHAI.

Zim'mah (zīm'ā) [probably, counsel, device]. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei, and grandson of Jahath (I Chron. 6:20, 42, 43; and perhaps II Chron. 29:12).

Zim'ran (zīm'rān) [probably, antelope]. A son or rather tribe descended from Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; I Chron. 1:32). An echo of the name has been surmised either in Zabram, a town w. of Mecca, on the Red Sea (Ptol. vi. 7, 5), or in Zamareni, an Arabian tribe (Pliny Hist. Nat. vi. 32, 5).

Zim'ri (zīm'ri) [pertaining to an antelope]. 1. Son of Zerah, and grandson of Judah (I Chron. 2:6); called in Josh. 7:1, 17, 18 Zabdi (q.v.).

2. A prince of the tribe of Simeon. He was slain at Shittim for participating with the Midianites in licentious idolatry (Num. 25:14; I Macc. 2:26, in A.V. Zambri).

3. A Benjamite, a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:36; 9:42).

4. A military officer who commanded half the chariots of Elah, king of Israel, whom he assassinated, fulfilling the denunciation against Baasha's house by extirpating it. Then he set himself up as king in Tirzah. Israel at once proclaimed Omri, the commander-in-chief, king. Omri marched against the usurper and captured his capital, Tirzah. When Zimri saw that the city was taken, he set the palace on fire and perished in the flames. His reign, which lasted only a week, fell within the year c. 885 B.C. (I Kings 16:8-20). It has been suggested that he may have been Saul's descendant (I Chron. 8:36), seeking to regain the throne.

5. A people (Jer. 25:25) not otherwise known. They may have been descended from Zimran, but there is no certainty in the case.

Zin (zín) [Heb. šîn]. A wilderness traversed by the Israelites on their way to Canaan. It was close to the s. boundary of that land (Num. 13:21). Kadesh-barnea was within its limits (Num. 20:1; 27:14; 33:36; Deut. 32:51). It constituted the limit of Edom on the w. and of Judah on the s.e. (Josh. 15:1-3). It was either a part of the wilderness of Paran or bordered on that wilderness at Kadesh. It is not the same place as the wilderness of Sin, the Heb. words for the two being quite different.

Zi'na (zi'ná). See ZIZAH.

Zi'on (zi'ún); in Maccabees Si'on, and so in A.V. of N.T. always, and in O.T. once (Ps. 65:1) [probably, citadel; cf. Arab. šāna and Eth. šawana, to protect, defend; Eth. šawan, safe place, refuge, fortification, castle, burg, citadel]. 1. One of the hills on which Jerusalem stood. It is 1st mentioned in the O.T. as the seat of a Jebusite fortress. David captured this stronghold and changed its name to the city of David (II Sam. 5:7; I Chron. 11:5). Hither he brought the Ark, and the hill from that time forth became sacred (II Sam. 6:10-12). The Ark was afterward removed by Solomon to the Temple which he erected on Mount Moriah (I Kings 8:1; II Chron. 3:1; 5:2). From the last 2 of these passages it is plain that Zion and Moriah were distinct eminences. For the question which hill was known as Zion, see JERUSALEM, II. 1.

2. After the building of the Temple on Mount Moriah and the transfer of the Ark to it, the name Zion was extended to comprehend the Temple (Isa. 8:18; 18:7; 24:23; Joel 3:17; Micah 4:7). This accounts for the fact that while Zion is mentioned between 100 and 200 times in the O.T., Mount Moriah is named only once (II Chron. 3:1), or at most twice (Gen. 22:2).

3. Zion is often used for the whole of Jerusalem (II Kings 19:21; Ps. 48; 69:35; 133:3; Isa. 1:8; 3:16; 4:3; 10:24; 52:1; 60:14).

4. In the Maccabaeen period the hill on which the Temple stood, as distinct from the city of David (I Macc. 7:32, 33).

5. The Jewish Church and polity (Ps. 126:1; 129:5; Isa. 33:14; 34:8; 49:14; 52:8).

6. Heaven (Heb. 12:22; cf. Rev. 14:1).

Zi'or (zi'ôr) [smallness]. A town in the hill country of Judah, near Hebron (Josh. 15:54), identified with Ša'ir (Ši'ir), 5 miles n.n.e. of Hebron. See ZAIR.

Ziph (zíf). 1. A town in the extreme s. of Judah (Josh. 15:24), identified with ez-Zeifeh, s.w. of Kurnûb.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:55), near a wilderness and a forest (I Sam. 23:14, 15). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:8); it is identified with Tell Zif, a conspicuous mound 2,882 ft. above sea level, 4 miles s. by e. of Hebron.

3. A man of Judah, house of Jehallelel (I Chron. 4:16).

Zi'phah (zi'fá). A man of Judah, house of Jehallelel (I Chron. 4:16).

Ziph'im (zíf'imz). See ZIPHITES.

Ziph'ron (zíf'i-ôn). See ZEPHON.

Ziph'ites (zíf'its), in A.V. once Ziph'im (zíf'imz) (Psalm 54, title). Natives or inhabitants of Ziph 2 (I Sam. 23:19; 26:1; Psalm 54, title).

Ziph'ron (zíf'rôn) [cf. Syriac zēphar, to stink]. A place on the n. boundary line of the Promised Land (Num. 34:9); probably to be identified with Za'ferāneh, s.e. of Restān.

Zip'por (zip'ôr) [bird; perhaps, sparrow]. Father of Balak, king of Moab (Num. 22:4, 10).

Zip-po'rah (zi-pō'rá) [bird; perhaps, sparrow]. A daughter of Jethro, priest of Midian. She became the wife of Moses (Ex. 2:21, 22). She evidently opposed the circumcision of their 2d son; but when the family was journeying to Egypt and her husband's life was in danger on account of that breach of the covenant, she acquiesced (ch. 4:18-26); see MOSES. She may have returned with her sons to her father at this time; but quite probably they accompanied Moses to Egypt, and after the Exodus, when the host of Israel was slowly approaching Mount Sinai, were sent forward to visit Jethro and inform him of all that God had done for Moses and for the Israelites, and how the Lord had brought Israel out of Egypt (ch. 18:1). Jethro returned with them to the camp at Rephidim (vs. 2-6).

Zith'ri (zith'rî). See SITHRI.

Ziv (zîv), in A.V. Zif (zîf) [splendor, bloom]. The 2d month of the Jewish year (I Kings 6:1, 37), approximately May. Later it was commonly called Iyar. See YEAR.

Ziz (zîz) [brightness, shining thing, flower]. An ascent by which the Moabites and Ammonites ascended from En-gedi toward the wilderness of Jeruel and Tekoa (II Chron. 20:16; cf. vs. 2, 20). It is generally identified with Wadi Hāsāsa, which leads from the w. shore of the Dead Sea n. of En-gedi to the tableland of Judea.

Zi'za (zi'zá) [probably a reduplication derived from children's talk]. 1. A Simeonite, descended from Shemaiah (I Chron. 4:37).

2. A son of Rehoboam, by his queen Maacah (II Chron. 11:20).

Ziz'ah (zi'zá) [See ZIZA]. A Levite, family of Gershon, house of Shimei (I Chron. 23:11). In v. 10 the name is mistranscribed Zina.

Zo'an (zō'an) [Heb. šō'an from Egypt. Dn.tj]. An Egyptian city of the e. part of the Delta, on the Tanitic branch of the Nile, near the 31st degree of n. latitude. It was built 7 years later than Hebron, which was in existence in Abraham's lifetime (Num. 13:22). Zoan existed at least as early as Dyn. VI. The earliest kings of Dyn. XII made it their capital in order to check invasions from the e. The Hyksos fortified it and retained it as the capital under the name of Avaris. After their expulsion the city was neglected, but it was re-established with great ceremony by Sethi I. Avaris (later known as Tanis) was the old home of the Egyptian god Seth. The Ramesside house traced its ancestry back to the Hyksos kings; the great-grandfather of Ramesses (Ramses) II apparently came from an old Tanite family, possibly of Hyksos origin, since his name was Sethos (Suta). In Sethi I's time the god Seth received a new temple, which was enlarged by Ramesses II, who took up his residence in the vicinity at Per-Re-emasese, that is, the city of Ramesses (Raames, Ex. 1:11). Zoan was the place of meeting between Moses and Pharaoh (Ps. 78:12, 43). It was still an important city in the time of Isaiah and also of Ezekiel (Isa, 19:11, 13; cf. 30:4; Ezek. 30:14). Between the days of Isaiah and Ezekiel, it was captured by the Assyrians. The city was known to the Greeks as Tanis. It has lingered on to modern times, now being Šan el-Hagar. The famous "400 year" stele of Tanis, erected shortly before the accession of Ramesses I, 1320 B.C., commemorates the founding of the city or an important date in its earliest Hyksos history. See EGYPT, III. 8.

Zo'ar (zō'ēr) [littleness (Gen. 19:20, 22)]. One of the cities of the Plain, and apparently the smallest of the 5 (Gen. 19:20, 22). The Plain was visible from Mount Nebo as far as Zoar (Deut. 34:3). Zoar's original name was Bela, and it had a king, one of those defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 13:10; 14:2, 8). When threatened judgment was about to descend on the guilty cities, Lot successfully interceded for Zoar and fled thither from the catastrophe (ch. 19:20-23). A mountain (or at least high land) rose immediately behind it, with a cavern, in which Lot and his 2 daughters dwelt for a time (v. 30). Zoar still existed in the days of Isaiah and in those of Jeremiah, and, from their mentioning it in connection with Moab, it may be presumed that it was on the Moabite or e. side of the Dead Sea (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34; cf. also Gen. 19:37). In the Maccabean period it belonged to an Arabian kingdom of which Petra was the capital (Jos. Antiq. xiii. 15, 4; xiv. 1, 4). It stood at the s. end of the Dead Sea (Jos. War iv. 8, 4). In the Middle Ages it was an important point on the road from Elath to Jerusalem, 3 days' journey from the latter city via Hebron. These data are satisfied by assuming that Zoar was situated near where the wadi el-Ahsey opens through the Moabite mountains into the Plain, about 2 miles from the s. end of the sea (Wetzstein), at the ruins el-Keryeh. This was the later settlement, whither the people of Zoar moved and to which they gave the old name. The original site doubtless now lies beneath the waters of the sea.

Zo'bah (zō'bā), in A.V. twice Zo'ba (zō'bā) (II Sam. 10:6, 8); see ARAM 2 (3).

Zo'bē'bah (zō-bē'bā) [cf. Arab. ḡabb, hatred, anger; lizard]. Son of Hakkōz, a man of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

Zo'har (zō'hār) [cf. Arab. and S. Arab. ṣahr, fawn color, gray on a red background; Heb. ṣāhōr, white]. 1. Father of Ephron the Hittite (Gen. 23:8).

2. Son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10). Called also Zerah (Num. 26:13); see ZERAH 3.

3. A man of Judah (I Chron. 4:7, R.V. marg.); see IZHAR, II.

Zo'he-leth (zō'hē-lēth) [a serpent or other creeper]. A stone beside En-rogel (I Kings 1:9). Clermont-Ganneau pointed out that the ledge of rocks on which the village of Silwan stands is called by the Arabs Zehwele or Zahweileh, which is like an altered form of Zoheth. But it is questionable whether the term stone would have been applied to a cliff, and the distance of the ledge from En-rogel seems too great.

Zo'heth (zō'hēth) [cf. neo-Heb. zahtān, proud]. A son of Ishi, registered with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

Zo'phah (zō'fā) [(bellied) jug or jar; cf. Arab. ṣaffaha, to make wide, and Eth. saphha, to extend]. An Asherite, son of Helem (I Chron. 7:35, 36).

Zo'phai (zō'fī). See ZUPH 1.

Zo'phar (zō'fēr) [perhaps, chirper; cf. Arab. ṣafara, to whistle]. A Naamathite, one of Job's friends (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9).

Zo'phim (zō'fīm) [watchers]. A field on the top of Pisgah, from which Balaam could see a part of the encampment of the Israelites at Shittim (Num. 23:14). Conder places it at Tal'at eš-Šufa, in the valley separating the s.e. point of Pisgah from Luhith.

Zo'rah (zō'rā), in A.V. once Zo're'ah (Josh. 15:33), once Za're'ah (Neh. 11:29) [perhaps, stroke, scourge, or hornet]. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:33), inhabited by the Danites (ch. 19:41). Manoah, Samson's father, belonged to the place (Judg. 13:2), and Samson was buried near the town (ch. 16:31). Some of the 5 Danite spies and of the warriors who subsequently took Laish were from Zorah (ch. 18:2, 8, 11). The town was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:10). It was inhabited after the Captivity (Neh. 11:29). Its site is Šar'a, on the n. side of the valley of Sorek (Wadi eš-Šarār), about 14 miles w. of Jerusalem.

Zo'rath-ite (zō'rāth-it), in A.V. once Za're'ath-ite (I Chron. 2:53). A native or inhabitant of Zorah (I Chron. 2:53; 4:2).

Zo're'ah (zō'rē-ā). See ZORAH.

Zo'rite (zō'rīt). Either the same as Zorath-ite, or a citizen of some unknown place (I Chron. 2:54).

Zo'rob'a-bel (zō-rōb'ā-bēl). See ZERUBBABEL.

Zu'ar (zū'ēr) [small, little]. Father of that Nethaneel who was prince of the tribe of Issachar in the wilderness (Num. 1:8; 2:5; 7:18, 23; 10:15).

Zuph (zūf) [honeycomb]. 1. A Levite, descended from Kohath, and an ancestor of the Prophet Samuel (I Chron. 6:35). A variant form, of similar meaning, is Zophai (v. 26).

2. A district beyond the borders of Benjamin (I Sam. 9:4, 6). It may have received its name from the settlement of the family of Zuph there. See further in connection with RAMAH 2.

Zur (zūr) [a rock]. 1. A king of Midian, ally or vassal of Sihon, and the father of the woman Cozbi (Num. 25:15). He was killed in the war of extermination waged by Moses against the Midianites for their seduction of the Israelites to licentious idolatry (Num. 25:15, 18; 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

2. A Benjamite, son of Jeiel (I Chron. 8:30).

Zu'ri-el (zū'ri-ēl) [God is a rock]. A Levite, chief of the Merarites in the wilderness (Num. 3:35).

Zu'ri-shad'dai (zū'ri-shād'ī) [the Almighty is a rock]. Father of the prince of the Simonites in the wilderness (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36, 41; 10:19).

Zu'zim (zū'zīm), in A.V. Zu'zims (zū'zīmz). A tribe occupying a district called Ham, e. of the Jordan, conquered by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:5). Apparently the same as Zamzumim.
